Do you know what became of him?—No; he visited the school several times after he left it.

You do not know where he is now?—No; I heard that he robbed his master, and left him; but I believe it was only report.

Do you know any thing of James Mulray?—Yes.

What have you heard of him?—He robbed his master likewise, and was confined in Newgate, and afterwards was released and went to his mother; he came to our school after he got out of Newgate, and Mr Devine gave him a pound note, and he was sent over to England to his mother.

Do you remember Edward Egan?—I remember his coming to the school to see the boys.

Was he apprenticed?—Yes.

What became of him?—He left his master and enlisted.

Do you remember Henry Kelly and Owen Spencer?—I have seen them; Kelly was apprenticed to Mr. Devine.

What became of him?—He enlisted.

What became of Owen Spencer?—He was with the master part of the time, but he was not apprenticed; he was apprenticed to some other gentleman, and he left his master again.

What became of him?—I do not know.

Do you know any thing of James Doyle?—No, I do not.

Do you remember William Griffin?—Yes.

Was he bound out apprentice?—No, he is about the neighbourhood at present.

Did he run away?—I believe Mr. Devine got him his five pounds from the board; he was a very bad boy, a very bad character in the school; he was with a blacksmith about the place.

Did you ever hear of Thomas Jones?—Yes.

What became of him?—He was apprenticed.

Do you know whether he has run away?—No.

Do you know any thing of William Wilson and Matthew Foy?—I do not.

Peter Wade and Christopher Stevens?—No, I do not.

John

John Ryan and John Cathcart?—Yes; both were apprenticed as servants.
Did they come back again to the school after they had been apprenticed?—Yes.
Did they leave their places?—No, they came back to see the boys; they are at present in their places.
They did not run away from their places, that you know of?—No, not that I know.
Do you remember Allen and Mackay?—Yes, I do.
What became of them?—Allen was a candidate teacher; he enlisted in the East India Company.
What did he enlist for?—Mr. Devine and he were not on very good terms; he came from Shannon Grove, where Mr. Devine was before; they were always jarring.
What became of Mackay?—He enlisted too.
He was a candidate teacher?—Yes.
Were the boys mentioned before candidate teachers?—No, none.
Do you know the reason of Mackay enlisting?—No, I do not; he left it before I went there. I have heard it was for the same cause as Allen.
Do you remember James Leonard?—Yes.
What became of him?—He enlisted last June; he is brother to the usher, Henry Leonard.
What did he enlist for?—It was his own wish; he had a great prepossession for the army.
Was he a candidate teacher?—Yes.
Was Mr. Devine absent any time this year?—He was.
How long?—About a month.
Do you know where he went?—To England.
Who was usher at that time?—Leonard, one of the candidate teachers; we had two ushers; each were selected from the candidate teachers, Henry Leonard and Cooper.
What became of Cooper?—He is there now; he is usher over the school department.
During the time that Mr. Devine was absent, did any boys elope?—Two of the candidate teachers enlisted, Leonard and Maher, one of them at least; the other was trying, and he could not be taken, and he eloped.
Was he ever taken again?—No, he did not come back; I believe he is in the north at present.
Does the catechist often come to look at you?—Yes; generally twice a week.
Does he ever catechise you?—No.
Does he ask the boys in the school any questions?—No; he used some time ago, but he does not now; the curate comes now.
Does not Mr. Long ask any questions?—No.
Does Mr. Courtenay catechise the boys?—Yes; Mr. Long never examines the candidate teachers at all.
Does Mr. Courtenay come once a week?—Yes.
Does Mr. Long live far off?—Yes, a good way; two miles, I believe.
And Mr. Courtenay lives handy?—Yes.
You are not in a hurry to get out, if you could get a good master to teach you?—I would rather stay there.

Copy of a Letter from the Reverend Charles Wolseley, Catechist of the Strangford Charter School, to the Secretary of the Incorporated Society; dated 15th February 1822.

Sir,

I BEG leave to state for your information, and that of the committee of fifteen, that I have been this day called on to visit the charter school of Strangford, upon a very unpleasant affair.

A misunderstanding took place some time ago, between the master and the usher.

The latter considered that a certain portion of the day was at his own disposal, to go when and where he liked; the master insisted, that he should not leave the school at any time, without his knowledge and permission.

I settled the difference at that time; the usher being satisfied with my judgment, that it was necessary for him, while he held his present situation, to be amenable to the authority and regulation of the master, in all things concerning the affairs of the school; that had he such a liberty as he required, he might choose a time to be absent when the master must necessarily be so also; and the boys be thus left without a superintendent.

Since that time, I think the usher has been dissatisfied. Another coolness took place from a remonstrance of the master, on account of the usher being too late out. These things may have been the cause of the present unpleasant occurrence, which took place last night at supper.

Hugh Mackay, the head boy of the first class, had been chastised by the master for a misdemeanour on Sunday last, and last night at supper he refused to take the fresh mutton broth with his bread, which was substituted for milk, the latter being so very scarce at this season of the year. But this change occurred only three or four times this season, and was done, by way of giving a variety to the boys, lest they should be tired of getting the beer too often.

The master reasoned with the boy, and told him, that as no other boy refused it, and he never did so before, and appeared to like it whenever given, that he considered his refusal now arose from mere sulkiness, and that he would chastise him if he would not take it; the boy persisted, saying, the broth was contrary to the rules of the establishment. The master was then going to chastise the boy, when the usher interfered and prevented him. He said he was placed there to see that justice was done to the boys, and that he would support Mackay or any other boy, if the master attempted to chastise them unjustly. High words and altercation ensued before all the boys, and had not the mistress run in and separated them, matters would have been still worse.

This is the statement of the facts, as I heard from them both, when brought before me face to face in the committee room this day.

I told the master that I considered that he had acted irregularly and injudiciously.

He excused himself, saying, that it was impossible for him to procure milk so often for so many boys in this season of the year; that as to the chastisement of the boy, he was led to act as he did, from a conviction, that his disobedience arose from mere sulkiness.

I told the usher also, that I considered his conduct very reprehensible,—that the master was not amenable to him, that he had no authority or right to interfere in the master's duty or management of the school; that in so doing, he in fact made himself master, and that, in saying, that he would defend (against the master) any boy he might think aggrieved, was in fact taking the authority from the master, and destroying all subordination to him, and it would be impossible for him to manage the school in this case, as the boys might at any time rebel against him, with the usher at their head. I pointed out to him, that if he saw any thing contrary to the rules of the establishment, or really reprehensible in the master's conduct, that it was his duty to mention it to the catechist, or write a report of it to the committee of fifteen, but that he should not and must not take the authority into his own hands.

He however persists in saying and thinking that he had acted right, and of course, is ready to act the same scene over again; so that in fact, he remains master of the boys, until some regulation takes place.

Such then being the case, I beg leave to suggest the necessity of taking this matter into serious and immediate consideration; as the school must suffer by every hour of delay.

From what has happened, it appears to me that it would be injurious to the welfare of this school and the interest of the establishment, to allow them to act any longer together; that it is indeed in a great measure impracticable.

The master and mistress have appeared to me to strive to fulfil their duty conscientiously to their employers, and the boys under their care.

And the usher's general conduct has been good.

I remain, Sir,
With respect, yours, faithfully,
(signed) Cha' Wolseley.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. Thomas Fleming, Master of the Charter School at Strangford, to the Secretary of the Incorporated Society, dated 18th February 1822.

Sir,

Copy of a Letter
from
Mr. Tho^s Fleming,
Master of the Charter School at Strangford, to the Secretary of the Incorporated
Society,
18 Feb. 1822.

I FEEL it a painful and very disagreeable part of my duty to be obliged to state to you the following particulars, connected with my present very unpleasant situation, and humbly to solicit your kind attention to me, and that you will be pleased (should you think it necessary) to submit this to the patient and impartial consideration of the Right honourable, &c. the Committee of Fifteen of the Incorporated Society.

I have been under the necessity for some time past of repeatedly remonstrating with Thomas Eustace, the usher of this school, for inattention to the boys; he frequently absenting himself from the school for several hours together, also for remaining out at night beyond my hour of going to bed, which is generally ten o'clock, after which hour I have been often obliged to get up, and give my serving man the keys to let him in. At length, he claimed as a privilege, allowed him by the Incorporated Society, to go where he pleased, and do what he might think proper in the hours not devoted to the education of the children in the school-room, on many of which he had already infringed. It being absolutely necessary for me to attend in those hours to the business of the farm, to going to Downpatrick market (which is near seven miles distant from the school), and to the general concerns of the establishment, I found it necessary to inform the catechist, who read to him, from the Society's book of general rules, what the duties of an usher consist in; to which he (the usher) would not consent, until the catechist informed him he would consult the Society, for their opinion more explicitly. He then consented to improve his attention, which he did for some time in a surly disagreeable manner. Since the above occurrence, and I believe on the 22d or 23d of December last, seemingly overwhelmed with grief, he read to me an extract of a letter, which he stated to have that moment received from an uncle in Dublin, informing him, that his mother was then in the agonies of death, and could not die easy unless she could see him (the usher). He solicited my permission, and an advance of money for travelling expenses, to enable him to see his mother for the last time, to both of which I acceded, and took the liberty of giving him permission on this trying occasion, confining myself to the discharge of his duty, to the neglect of my other business, on condition that he would return in a week at farthest; but he thought proper to continue absent for fifteen days. I have now good reason to suppose, that the affair of his mother's illness was a mere pretence for his going to Dublin, as, according according to his own account, she was able to make a journey of 57 miles, from Dublin to Kilkenny, the fourth day after his arrival in Dublin.

On the second Sunday after his return from Dublin, he left the school at four o'clock in the evening, and did not return until ten at night. I then told him in a very determined manner, that he was setting a bad example to the boys, in spending his Sunday evenings in idleness, or perhaps worse, for aught I knew, when he should have been present at evening prayers in the school-room; and told him, that if he thought proper to do so again, the loss of his situation must be the consequence. He said, he plainly saw I did not wish to oblige him, as the liberties he had taken were only what might be expected by a young single man. From that time, I observed the children less attentive to me than usual, and sometimes attending to me with a kind of inattention bordering on disrespect, and an apparent want of that good order that had prevailed. Their disrespect continued to increase until Thursday evening last, when the usher forcibly and violently wrested all power and authority out of my hands, and invested himself therewith, as hereafter mentioned.

At this particular season of the year, I have hitherto found it impracticable to raise a sufficient supply of milk; I have five cows giving milk, and two near calving, yet the supply is deficient. I have been obliged to substitute beer for milk, as allowed by the rules of the establishment; and in some instances treacle and butter, with stirabout for breakfast, potatoes being allowed by the new dietary for dinner every day in the week. There has been in a very few instances fresh beef or mutton broth, made from the meat dressed for dinner for my family and servants, given, made up with meal and vegetables in the usual manner, to the children with their bread for supper.

Having a firm conviction that those at present unavoidable deviations have not been injurious to the health of the children, as their appearance will testify, nor have they been practised from sordid motives, the neighbourhood of the school being such, that milk is not to be purchased for any price, I therefore hope that the Right honourable the Incorporated Society will not attach to me an unpardonable degree of culpability, for faults which I am making every exertion to repair, having made an arrangement to change some of my milch cows, and to add to their number, which is always necessary to be done at this season of the year, and have made an engagement with Mr. George Moore of Downpatrick, to get grains for soft feeding from his brewery, so that after a very short time I will have milk enough, and will require no substitute. In summer I can have always the greatest plenty.

To return to the affair with the usher. On Thursday evening last, the children got bread and broth for supper as above stated. Hugh Mackey, one of the most grown boys in the school, the head boy in the first class, and a particular favourite of the usher's, refused to take his portion for the first time; because he did not like it. I then tasted his portion, and considered it very good. He raised his voice, and said, he would not take it, because he should have milk on that evening. I told him the milk was so scarce, that all the boys could not get it that evening, and saw no reason why he should be particular, when all the others were satisfied, and that if he persisted in setting an example of insubordination, I would certainly punish him. He did persist, and I walked to another apartment of the house, and brought a small whip, took him by the arm, and gave him one slap over the shoulders, when the usher rushed from the farther end of the dining hall, pounced between us, pushed me violently back, dragged the boy forcibly from me, and attempted to rescue him out of my hands, declaring that I should not punish that boy, or any other in the school, when he considered it unjust, and that he is placed here by the Incorporated Society for the purpose of interfering should he see it necessary. The struggle between him and me ended by Mrs. Fleming coming into the hall, and taking away the boy. I should have mentioned that immediately on Hugh Mackey's refusal of his broth, it occurred to me that he was sulky, for I had to punish him the Sunday evening before for attempting to force the kitchen door in a very clamorous manner; contrary to the general instructions for no boy to go to the kitchen but on business. During the struggle the usher threw himself continually into the most menacing and provoking attitudes of defiance, for the purpose of tempting me to strike him. From the general tenor of his conduct, and his present usurpation of authority, I find it impossible ever to act in conjunction with him in the management of the school. It is now quite disorganized.

I have with strictest truth endeavoured to state the particulars of this very unpleasant affair, and now submit it to the wisdom of the Right honourable, &c. the Incorporated Society.

And although I must confess to have fallen short in some instances, I have nevertheless made it my constant endeavours to discharge my duty faithfully, for nearly eight years, I have had the honour of being engaged in their service. And have at all times done my utmost, to promote the good character of the several schools over which they have been pleased to place me.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient and very humble servant,

To James Adamson, Esq.

Copy of a Letter from Mr. Thomas Eustace, Usher of the Strangford Charter School, to the Secretary of the Incorporated Society; dated February 21st, 1822.

Sir,

Copy of a Letter
from
Mr. Tho^s Eustace,
Usher of the Strangford Charter School, to the Secretary of the Incorporated
21 Feb. 1822.

I CONCEIVE it to be my duty, as usher of this school, to inform the Society how the rule of the same is violated in respect to the dieting of the children. As for milk, they seldom get it, when compared to what they are allowed. I have seen them for weeks that they did not get a drop for breakfast, but twice or three times; and, when they do get it for dinner or supper, it is so diluted with water, that it almost loses its taste. It is all substitutes that are used, such as butter, treacle and beer; and I am persuaded that the latter is used as the milk, in respect to dilution. It is impossible for the master to find a sufficiency of milk, whereas, he has reared all his own beef on the school farm within this long time back; for the children never get fresh meat but when there's a beast slaughtered. It is salt pork that is given to the children, with some beef, the broth of which cannot be good. The children also get stinking salt herrings for dinner, in lieu of milk, on Saturdays the 2d and 9th instant. I would beg leave to call the attention of the board to an occurrence which took place on last Thursday night; the children, instead of getting bread and new milk, as the rules specify, got bread, and broth, made of the water in which their meat was boiled, for dinner, which was pig's feet and salt pork, with some beef. They said they would prefer their milk to broth, and one of them refused to drink it, when the master declared he would cut him to pieces if he did not drink it that instant, and accordingly he commenced flogging him with a whip. I begged of him to allow me to interfere, and went behind the boy with an intent to save him from the strokes, when the master took hold of me by the throat, and declared he would cut me to pieces, and knock my soul out; that he would get me immediately put out of the school, to all of which I never made an unmannerly answer; but when he said he would get me put out of the school, I said, I was in it before him, and perhaps would after. As to the truth of what is here specified, I am ready to be examined before whomever the Society thinks fit. As to what I have said in respect to the children's milk being diluted with water, and even so, they did not get more than the one-third of what is allowed, to this the catechist called my attention one day in the dining-hall, and pointed to the milk in the porringer which he held in his hand. The children get the same quantity of beer as of milk.

I remain, Sir,

Your most obedient humble servant,

Humbly Sheweth,

Memorial of
Mr. Tho^s Eustace, to the Incorporated
Society,
3 March 1822.

THAT Memorialist, on account of interfering with the master of Strangford charter school, in the ill-usage of the children in their diet, which he conceived to be his duty, as usher, has been unprecedentedly dismissed, without an investigation before the local committee. He therefore humbly prays, that the honourable committee will grant him a fair trial before said local committee, when he flatters himself, he will be able to retrieve, with credit, his injured character, which must have been unjustly represented to your honourable committee, to procure his dismissal. The kind consideration of the honourable Board will ever leave Memorialist in duty bound to pray.

We the undersigned members of the local committee of Strangford charter school, though with extreme reluctance interfering between the Incorporated Society and their servants, yet from particular circumstances in this case, and for the advantage of the school, beg most earnestly to recommend a public investigation of the matter.

Sir,

Letter from Rev.
Charles Wolseley,
to Secretary of the Incorporated
Society

ENCLOSED, I send you the report of the local committee of the charter school of Strangford, met on the 12th of March 1822; and return the late usher's letter of complaint against the master.

I also send a statement, voluntarily sworn to by the master, after our report was finished, and which, it was considered, might be transmitted for the inspection of the committee of fifteen.

As

Letter from Rev.
Charles Wolseley, to Secretary of the Incorporated
Society.

As to the letter of the late usher, I consider it very malicious containing many falsehoods, and the truth greatly exaggerated, as was proved by evidence on oath; so much so, that it was considered unnecessary to put Eliza Heyland to her oath; in regard to the paper I also enclose, to stamp his moral character, and to prove him unworthy to hold any situation under the Incorporated Society. The master has certainly deviated from the rules of the establishment, and deserved the reprimand given him; and if it should seem proper to the committee of fifteen to retain him in his present situation, it should be, in my humble opinion, on the sole condition that he would strictly observe the rules and regulations of the establishment in future; and the servants should be ready and prepared, whenever called on, to prove on oath, whether the established rules have or have not been strictly observed by the master and mistress.

I beg leave to observe, that the general conduct of the master and mistress is, in my opinion, praiseworthy, as they give their whole time and attention to the care of the boys, and the concerns of the establishment; never being absent from the school except at public worship or market, or some necessary business of the establishment.

The master has greatly improved the farm, at a considerable expense to himself; and besides the 15 acres he kept in pasturage for the cows, he had three acres of clover in the six acres he holds, adjoining the school lands, for which he pays 3*l.* per annum; and his hay, to my certain knowledge, has cost him upwards of 40*l.* this season, besides a quantity of other things given to the cattle.

As to the diet of the boys, I have always seen plenty before them; and I think they were well fed and well clothed, much better than most of them would be when they leave the school. The neglect, as to change of linen, was inexcusable; the boys, during the winter, got only one change of shirts in the week; as they have three or four a piece, the general rule might have been very easily observed.

I remain, Sir, with great respect, very faithfully yours,

To James Adamson, Esq.

Now, 2,217 pounds divided by 23, gives 96 for each week. The average number of children in the house during that period was 63, who are allowed one pound of meat each in the week; consequently, 63 to be taken from 96, leaves a residue of 33 pounds per week towards supplying my family, consisting then of three persons (myself, my wife and usher), and six servants,* and towards allowing for bone in the children's share; where the supply of beef and mutton fell short, it has been made up in pork to the general establishment.

To the best of my knowledge and belief, the above account is true, and the representation just.

Examinations taken by the Local Committee of the Strangford Charter School, in March, 1822.

Usher's Examination, on oath.

Examinations by the Local Committee of the Strangford
Charter School.

- 1st Charge.—The children seldom get milk compared with what they ought to do.
2d Charge.—The milk was diluted with water, to a great degree beyond what is allowed by the rules of the Society.
3d Charge.—Butter, treacle and beer were used, instead of milk.
4th Charge.—The boys got salt beef, and salt pork, always, except on Sundays; and the salt pork water was made into broth, for their use.
5th Charge.—Salt herrings were given, instead of milk.
6th Charge.—Did not get clean shirts, except on Sundays.

When you state the children did not get milk for weeks, do you mean to say for two, or more weeks?—They did not get milk for several weeks at breakfast, except on Sundays.

When you state two weeks, do you mean to say two weeks in succession?—Two weeks in succession, except Sunday.

What was substituted?—Treacle, beer, and butter.

Did you see any order or permission hung up in the dining hall, permitting such substitutes?—I did not.

Did similar occurrences take place, except during the two weeks above stated?—Yes, frequently, since Christmas.

Do you swear the milk was much diluted with water?—Yes; milk could scarcely be tasted in it.

What quantity of water do you suppose was in it?—More than one half; I am sure it was more than one half water.

Do you swear that butter milk, and new milk, were more than one half water?—I do believe they were both more than one half water.

Did you report that you observed such a deficiency of milk?—I did not; the catechist observed the milk was mostly water; it was butter milk, and he turned the tin aside to shew me how little milk was in the tin.

When was this?—It was previous to the beating of the boy, on the 14th ult.

Why did you not report it?—The catechist saw it.

You say substitutes were used; what kind, and when?—Butter, beer and treacle, at breakfast, and sometimes at supper.

Was there any permission given to use these substitutes?—I do not know, I never saw it.

[Here followed an examination into the number of beef cows kept on the farm by the master, the quantity of land he holds, the number of cows kept, &c.; when it appeared there are 20 acres attached to the school, and that the master holds six acres of bad land, from Mr. Wolseley the catechist, at 3*l.* per acre; that he has six milch cows, &c. &c. all which seems to signify very little as to the question, whether the children got their milk according to the rules of the Society.]

Do you say the children never got fresh meat except when a cow was killed?—They got fresh meat sometimes on Sundays; I do not recollect that they got fresh meat on Thursdays, since Mr. Fleming came here.

Did they ever get fresh meat on Thursdays, before Mr. Fleming came here?—They did.

What did they get on Thursdays?—Salt pork, with some beef.

Might it not have been the beef brought in on the Friday previous, and salted, so as to keep it fit for use on the following Thursday?—I think it was not, it was so very salt.

Did the catechist ever see the children dine?—Was often present.

Do you remember the 14th of February being Thursday?—I do.

What was the broth made of?—I believe it was made of pigs feet; it was fat.

Did the children object to it, and how many?—They did, six or seven objected to it; one said, it had not the taste of broth.

Did the master beat the boy who objected?—He struck him twice with a whip, and said, he would cut the life out of him; I put my hand between him and the third blow, when the master pushed me with his knuckles to my throat, half way down the hall, and repeatedly said, don't strike me, in order to make the boys believe I was going to strike him. I did not say any thing unmannerly to him, and left the hall.

Did the boys get their allowance of milk?—They did not get one-third of it.

Did they get their allowance of meat?—On Thursdays they did not get three ounces of meat.

Did you see it weighed?—I did not.

How do you know it then?—I saw half a pound of raw beef cut at Clontarf charter school, boiled, and the allowances cut by it.

Did they get beef and pork together?—They did.

Did the catechist often see them at dinner?—He did.

Did the boys get herrings at supper?—Twice, instead of milk.
Were they sweet?—They were not.
Was the salt meat sweet?—I have seen it not sweet.
How do you know it was not sweet?—By the smell.

Examination of Elizabeth Heyland, cook maid.

DID you make the broth on the 14th February, for supper, and what of?—I did; there was a leg of mutton in the parlour for dinner, and after they had dined, I boiled what was left in more water, with that in which it was first boiled.

Did you add any thing to it?—I added one head of greens, an onion, and oatmeal.

Did you think that would make a sufficiency of good broth for 63 boys?—(I believe she said,) she thought it would.

[Other servants were called in, and examined about the herrings, who said they were sweet; but it was allowed, that the boys got salt pork and salt beef; that the water of it was boiled into broth. It was sworn, that the broth laid up for Mr. Wolseley to taste, was the same made on the 14th, and he approved of it; and it appeared to have been in the safe keeping of the mistress until he saw it. That the mistress always prepared the milk herself, &c. &c.]

Sir,

In case it is thought necessary to examine the usher in Dublin, the foregoing is a copy of the notes I took at the time, as nearly as possible, and it may serve to enable the committee to see whether the usher will tell the same story in Dublin, and thus judge of what credit is due to him.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

To Mr. Adamson.

Extract from the Report of the Local Committee of Strangford Charter School, for the half-year ending 24th June 1822; dated 5th July 1822.

ON examining the books of the school, the local committee observe, that 23 boys were admitted between the 16th of May 1821, and the 22d of May 1822; and it appears that 19 of those boys came from the neighbourhood of Portadown. The local committee express their surprise at this circumstance and feel it their duty more particularly to call the attention of the committee of fifteen, to such an occurrence, when it further appears that the doors of this establishment seem for the most part closed to every recommendation, excepting from the quarter above alluded to. The local committee are informed that several applications for admission of destitute orphans, respectably certified, have been forwarded from the neighbouring parishes, without success; and they deem it worthy of remark, that it is to these parishes that the establishment is indebted for the apprenticing of children, whereas it does not appear that the neighbourhood of Portadown has ever relieved the establishment by drawing from it one apprentice. The local committee feel it incumbent on them to remonstrate and enter their protest against such undue influence; having the interests of the establishment at heart, they are ever ready to forward the views of the committee of fifteen, but they cannot remain silent any longer upon a subject of such importance.

Resolution of the Committee of Fifteen, in reference to the preceding Report.

Read a Report of the Local Committee of the Strangford Charter School; dated 5th July 1822.

Resolved,

THAT the local committee be informed in answer to an observation in their said report, that children admitted into the schools have uniformly been selected from the most distressing cases laid before the committee of fifteen, according to their best judgment, and that the charge of "undue influence," is unwarranted and unjustifiable.

Report of Local Committee of Strangford
Charter School.

WE the members of the local committee of Strangford charter school, met on Monday the 2d September 1822, take this opportunity of expressing our surprise and regret that any report from us should be considered by the committee of fifteen as unwarranted and unjustifiable.

Aware that those terms are wholly inapplicable to us, and fully impressed with the necessity of the remonstrance contained in our last report of the fifth of July, in which we are confident of being borne out by the facts to be found on the books of the society, We now declare it a duty we owe to ourselves and the establishment over which we preside as local guardians, to urge further consideration of the matter, and we are of opinion that a full statement of the case should be laid before the Lord Lieutenant, hoping that such proceedings may lead to investigation.

Order of the Committee of Fifteen, in reference to the preceding Report.
September 11, 1822.

Order of the Committee of Fifteen.

ORDERED, That the following observations on the remonstrance of the local committee of Strangford school, dated 2d of September instant, be transmitted to them :—

When the committee of fifteen dictated their reply to the observations contained in the Strangford report of the 5th of July last, it appeared to them that the committee of that school had forgotten that they were a "local" one, and constituted for specific local purposes; that they had assumed a kind of right of dictating to the committee of fifteen on the subject of the admission of children, and of pointing out from what district of the country children should be sent to that establishment. This the committee of fifteen considered an unauthorized, and, consequently, an unwarrantable infringement upon their powers; and the local committee of Strangford having charged the committee of fifteen (almost totidem verbis) with having suffered themselves to be governed by undue influence, the committee of fifteen, feeling most deeply how little ground there existed for such a charge, pronounced it, and still do confidently pronounce it, unjustifiable.

Now what are the grounds of this strong animadversion made by the Strangford committee?—They are these. There are on the list of boys admitted into that school within the last two years, the names of 18 or 20, who appear there to have been admitted from one district, and mostly under the recommendation of one person or family. Granted; the local committee are fully borne out in the assertion, that such is the fact, on the face of the books of the Society and of the school, nor have they been contradicted on the subject; but supposing the numbers thus circumstanced were even double or treble what they are, whence arises the right of the local committee to sit in judgment as such upon the point? the originating causes of which it is presumed impossible for them to be acquainted with. Such conduct is wholly foreign to the duty they have undertaken, which is to see that the school itself is conducted in conformity with the regulations laid down by the committee of fifteen, and not to scrutinize from whence its poor inmates may chance to be supplied. It is a power which the committee of fifteen are not disposed to vest any local committee with. Were it to become known to any local committee or any member thereof, that persons had been imposed upon the committee of fifteen, as entitled to their commiseration, who were not, in reality, objects; in such a case it would be the duty of every friend to the Incorporated Society, to put its committee on their guard, and such information would be thankfully received and acted upon by the committee of fifteen. But in the present case there does not appear to be a shadow of this nature even hinted at. If there are no grounds for hinting at imposition, what can justify the grave charge of undue influence being exercised over persons holding the rank and character and situation in life, which the committee of fifteen do? Surely nothing.

The committee of fifteen have good cause to believe, that had it been deemed matter of any consequence, the actual recommendation of the greater part of those boys alluded to in the Strangford report would be found different, in point of name, situation, &c. from what appears appears nominally most prominent in the transaction; under these impressions, the committee of fifteen cannot but consider that the local committee of Strangford, have taken a line of action beyond what the specific purpose for which local committees are constituted, will be found to warrant their doing; and have applied to the committee of fifteen, terms of animadversion which the circumstances are far from justifying. But the Strangford committee seem chiefly to feel, that other recommendations have been attended to in preference to some of those sent from that quarter; it may be so; it is far from improbable, that in the multitude of cases brought before the committee of fifteen, those from the vicinity of Strangford, may have been out-done in wretchedness; but this and this only, the committee of fifteen feel themselves again called on to say, gives a preference in their eyes. The committee of fifteen have only to add, that they can have no objection to an investigation of their conduct being instituted before the highest authority.

Appendix, N° 160.

Copy of a Letter from the Local Committee of the Strangford Charter School to the Committee of the Incorporated Society, dated October 4, 1822.

IN reply to the observations of the committee of fifteen, transmitted to us and bearing date Sept. 11th, 1822, we feel called upon to state, that in no part of our late remonstrance can it appear, that we "had assumed a kind of right of dictating to the committee of fifteen on the subject of the admission of children." From documents which, in our circumscribed, "specific," "local," capacity, we were called upon to examine, it appeared to us that an abuse existed, against which we conceived it to be our duty to put the "committee on their guard," and therefore called their attention to certain influence, which for the last year seemed tantamount to "pointing out from what district of the "country children should be sent to this establishment." How far, in thus acting, we may have outstepped the bounds of our local duty, we cannot pretend to judge; but if, in the capacity of a local committee, our line of action has been "unwarranted and unjustifiable," it is now for us, as humble members of the community, as persons interested in the welfare of a national institution, and above all as a portion of that public at whose expense the establishment is supported, to address those persons holding the rank and character, and situation in life which the committee of fifteen do, and confidently to assert, that a strict sense of duty alone prompted our remonstrance. As to the observation, that the "actual recommendation of the greater part of those boys alluded to being "found different in point of name, situation, &c. from what appears nominally most prominent in the transaction," we confess our inability to comprehend it. It would be dangerous on our part to say, that the registry books of this establishment were otherwise than true, and under such an impression, we have only to conclude, however extraordinary it may appear, "that in the multitude of cases brought before the committee of fifteen," those from the parish of Segoe, near the post town of Portadown, in the county Armagh, have not "been outdone in wretchedness."

Charter School.

THE progress of the senior classes in the several branches of their education, has not been such as might be expected, their improvement being scarcely perceptible; but that of the junior classes has been very considerable. In the senior classes, however, the 18 boys who came from Dublin were exceedingly deficient in their education. Early in the year the master was reprimanded for some deviations from the general rules of the establishment for dieting the boys; but we have found his conduct since, in that and every other respect, proper and satisfactory.

WE beg leave to observe, that nearly four months have elapsed since the boys should have received their new clothes; and having no change, and their shoes worn out, the greater part have been prevented for a length of time from attending divine service; and the master obliged thereby to stay at home to take care of them. From the general good conduct and exertions of the master and usher to fulfil their duty, especially as to the education of the boys, during the last half-year, we strongly recommend that the premiums for the whole year past should be granted to the master and usher; for from the manifest improvement and general good answering of the boys at the last examination, we do sincerely think that they are at present justly entitled to their usual premiums.

Sir,
I attended at the charter school on Tuesday, in consequence of a requisition from the master, to examine into the circumstances connected with the punishment of a boy named John Lark, by the usher Mr. Egan. As far as I could find, the boy was guilty of nothing that called for punishment so severe as that inflicted, his crime being his putting his shoes on the breakfast table, in order to put strings in them. It does not appear that the usher desired the boy to take down his shoes, but struck him with a whip: the boy having cried aloud, the usher repeated his punishment, and continued to do so, until he had inflicted very severe stripes on the shoulders of the boy. I examined the boy's shoulders, and found them much marked, having the appearance of having received most severe punishment. I consulted with Mr. Morgan, the rector of New Ross, and he recommends this statement being made. I made a minute of the circumstance in the visitor's book. In great haste,

To James Adamson, Esq.

Your obliged servant,

Sir,
AS I understand that the Reverend Mr. Morgan has considered it his duty to report to the committee of fifteen, that as usher of this school I have acted with severity towards the children placed under my care, I avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words relative to the charge which has been made against me, which I trust you will have the goodness to lay before the Board on Wednesday next.

It is now nearly two years since I was appointed usher of this school, during which time I have uniformly and unremittingly endeavoured to discharge my duty conscientiously, and with a sincere desire to instruct to the best of my power the children over whom I have been placed. In the performance of this task, however, I have met with some difficulties. Boys of stubborn and intractable dispositions I have found it very hard to govern, and have been therefore obliged to resort to severer measures than in ordinary cases would be deemed proper, particularly since the arrival of some boys from the Foundling Hospital, most of whom at first were quite ungovernable, and evinced an impatience of controul very destructive of school discipline. On this account, I considered myself called upon, in order to preserve proper order in the school, and to prevent their example from being imitated, to pursue a line of conduct which has subjected me to censure, and created an unfavourable impression;—boys of the description above alluded to, being very prone to magnify magnify even the slightest chastisement into the most unfeeling severity. I would however beg leave to say, that conscious of the influence of kind treatment, I have ever been inclined to adopt it when it was likely to be attended with success. Before I conclude, I would wish humbly to state, that if the committee of fifteen will give me a trial in some smaller establishment, an occurrence of the same kind shall not again take place. I have now, Sir, stated the motives by which my conduct has been influenced, and will only remark what I trust will not be unattended to, that boys at school are generally found to consider as severe, those teachers who are most interested in forwarding their instruction and improvement.

OBSERVATIONS.

^a The number of Children set down in the column for that purpose, from the commencement of the Institution to November 1783, is the number which the schools accommodated, as the records of the Society do not furnish the actual amount contained in each; but from the year 1783 to 1844, the number supported in the schools is accurately specified.

^b The books of the Society do not furnish an accurate account of the number of children in the schools, or of the number apprenticed between the years 1764 and 1769; but upon the most moderate calculation they were about 2,050, as stated in the annexed column.

^d The documents at present in the several schools do not furnish a clear statement of the number of children apprenticed in the early years of the Institution, and it is apprehended that there were many children apprenticed in those years where no addition is made to the preceding numbers.

^e N.B. The large sums under the head interest include the interest and dividends on money in the English funds.

^f The sums stated in the column under the head of "Total Disbursements," correspond in amount with the accounts as passed by the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts, the temporary disallowances made by them are included in each subsequent account.

^g The sums included within the brace, constitute the amount of the Parliamentary Grants for the two Sessions.

I have carefully examined the above statement, and believe it to be correct.

Association for discountenancing Vice and promoting the Knowledge and Practice of the Christian Religion.

Appendix, N° 173.

Original Resolutions entered into by the Founders of the Association, on the 9th of October 1792.

Dublin, 7, Capel-street, Tuesday, October 9th, 1792. First meeting.

In nomine Dei, cui sit honos.

Present,—Rev. Doctor O'Connor, Rev. Singleton Harpur, Wm. Watson.

1. Resolved,—THAT the rapid progress which infidelity and immorality are making throughout the kingdom calls loudly on every individual, both of the clergy and of the laity, who has at heart the welfare of his country, or the honour of God, to exert all his powers to stem the baneful torrent. But as many may be disheartened by considering the impotence of separate attempts to discountenance vice, and to promote the cause of religion and piety, it appears to us advisable to associate for that laudable purpose.

Original
Resolutions entered
Founders of the Association.

2. Resolved,—That we will meet once a week, or oftener if convenient, to consult upon the most likely means, under Providence, to restore the belief and practice of religion and virtue.

3. Resolved,—That to guard against the danger of enthusiasm, it be established as a fundamental principle, that nothing be attempted contrary to the doctrine or discipline of the established church, or that shall lead in the smallest degree to a separation from the same.

4. Resolved,—That at each meeting one person be chosen to preside during that meeting, and that from the time of such president's taking the chair, no subject shall be discussed publicly or privately but what directly tends to the business of the day, until the meeting has been regularly adjourned.

5. Resolved,—That a secretary be chosen to take minutes of the proceedings, and afterwards to transcribe the same into a book to be kept for the purpose; such secretary to continue in office for three months.

6. Resolved,—That should any expense be thought expedient, the same shall be provided for by the voluntary contributions of the members and of such other persons as may be willing to contribute to the purposes of the institution.

7. Resolved,—That if any member should wish for the admission of another person into this association, he shall conscientiously declare his opinion of such person's qualifications to the association, and they shall at a future meeting determine upon his admission or rejection, previous to his being informed that he was proposed—the strictest secrecy to be observed in case he is rejected, and that one dissenting voice shall exclude him.

8. Resolved,—That the subjects to be discussed be, the religious education of the rising generation by parents, schoolmasters, &c.; the best means of promoting a regular and conscientious attendance upon public worship and the holy communion. How to restore the practice of family prayer. How most effectually to prevent intemperance in all ranks of men. How to discourage and discountenance luxury, dissipation and extravagance in the upper and middle classes, both of males and females. How to prevent profane cursing and swearing, and particularly perjury. What may be the best means of enforcing the laws in being against immorality, and whether it may be expedient to solicit any and what further laws for the same purpose. The best means of promoting honesty and industry, and of discouraging idleness and beggary. How the really necessitous may be most effectually relieved; and, in short, whatever may conduce to the temporal and eternal welfare of the public.

9. Resolved,—That when the number of members in this Association shall amount to twenty-one, three shall be detached to form another association, to consist of the same number of persons, with like powers of detaching when complete.

10. Resolved,—That should a number of associations be formed in this city, they shall be united by means of a committee to be formed of one member elected by each association, who shall meet once every three months, and communicate to each other the proceedings of their respective associations, and afterwards report the same to the original association.

Appendix N° 174.

Examination of the Reverend James Wilson, on Oath; Wednesday, 3d November 1824.

STATE your title of office?—I am assistant-secretary and sub-treasurer to the Association for discountenancing Vice.

What is your salary?—Three hundred pounds per annum.

Describe the nature of the duties of your office?—In the former of the two offices, all the ordinary duties of the secretary of a society; the office of the "Secretaries" being considered in a great degree as honorary; and they being expected to act rather as principal members of the society than as secretaries, except in cases of a public and formal nature; and and in the latter of the two offices, the ordinary duties of the treasurer of a society, the bank of Ireland being the treasurer of the Association.

The Association was incorporated in the year 1800?—Yes, I think it was.

Do you recollect the first year it obtained any parliamentary grant?—Upon reference to our report, I find it is 1801.

What was the extent of that grant?—The first grant was £.300.

What was the grant in the last session?—£.4,846. 12s. 6½d. Irish. We asked for a less sum for the current year, in consequence of having adopted, in the preceding year, measures of economy, which operated beyond what we had reckoned upon, and we had in consequence a larger sum in hand at the end of that year than we had expected.

Mention what sum you asked for in the session of 1823?—£.9,084. 12s. Irish.

What sum did you ask for in the session of 1824?—I cannot now state it exactly, but I will ascertain it.

State the several objects of the society, and the manner in which they proceed to attain them respectively?—I think the objects may be stated to be three; to found and aid schools, to promote catechetical examinations, by holding out premiums, and to distribute the Scriptures, the Prayer Book and selected religious and moral books.

Which of those objects is it understood in the Society is of the greatest importance?—The Society began with the distribution of books simply, the other objects have been taken up since; and I think I cannot answer that question exactly, because different individuals in the Society would allow a preponderance to different objects.

How many schools have you at present in connection with the Society?—About 250, that we consider in actual communication.

[The witness was directed to furnish a list of such schools; and also a return of the number of schools in connection with the Society, in each year from the commencement successively.]

What are the rules for the government of those schools, and what is the plan of instruction given in them?—First, they are under particular superintendence; they are under the superintendence of the parochial clergy; and the master, or (in the case of a female school) the mistress, must be members of the established church; the schools must be open to children of all religious denominations; and we require that there should be no interference with the peculiar religious opinions of the children, who do not belong to the established church; the clergyman who is the visitor, answers to us for the religious education of the children of the established church attending the school; he certifies to us twice in the year, that he has carefully examined them in their progress in the Scriptures and church catechism, and is satisfied with it. We require that the Scriptures shall be read in the school by all who have attained a sufficient proficiency, whether Protestants or Roman Catholics; but we have not objected, in any instance that I am aware of, to Roman Catholic children reading their own version.

Do you permit the Roman Catholic catechism to be taught in the school?—No; we permit none to be taught, except the catechism of the established church; but we do not require it to be taught in the presence of the children of other religious persuasions.

Is it taught every day in the school?—I believe not; and I know it is often taught when the other children have been dismissed; for instance, on a Saturday afternoon.

Do any rules or regulations for the government of those schools exist in print?—Yes.

Be so good as to furnish any such to the Commissioners?—I would refer, for the regulations and rules of the Society, to the paper of the queries of the Association, and to the form of the half-yearly returns.

Does it follow that any clergyman, who applies for the aid of the Society, should succeed in receiving it for such a school as is described?—No, I think the peculiarity of the plan of the Association consists in this, that they have endeavoured to make their aids the means of having schools founded for permanence; and therefore the first enquiry is, are there any means of obtaining an endowment of land, either of glebe or the land of a lay proprietor; and they never grant aid, except the clergyman gives or obtains land, or shews that he has made use of every exertion to do so, although not successfully; he must produce an endowment of land, or shew that the failure does not arise from any fault of his own.

Have the endowments generally proceeded from laymen or the church?—I apprehend the majority have been from glebe land; the clergyman may apply to a lay proprietor, but if he should fail in such application, and there be sufficient glebe, the Society will not grant aid without a grant of glebe.

Which do the Society prefer, to get the endowment from the estate of a layman, or to have a portion of the glebe allotted?—They have never shewn any preference.

Do they try the first before they have recourse to the second?—No; when a clergyman applies, the first question is, "Can you give or procure an endowment?" no sort of preference is given.

Has there been an instance in which a clergyman has offered an endowment of land, and applied for a school, and been refused?—There may be; for he must also shew the exigency for the school; he must shew that a school is wanting in the neighbourhood, and that such school could not be adequately supported without the aid of some public society; that he had not, by his own means, or by the assistance of the neighbouring gentry, the means of supporting the school adequately. There must be, moreover, some local contribution to the school from the clergyman, and from others, if attainable.

[The witness was directed to furnish a list of all applications made for schools during the last seven years, which had been refused; with the reasons of the refusal thereof respectively.]

What

457
Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,
3 Nov. 1824.

What is the extent and nature of the annual aid given to the schools at present?—The highest aid is £.12. a year at present, and we, to very few, give less than £.10; we have reduced the amount of the annual aids in the last two years.

Previous to issuing the salary to the master, is there any inquiry as to the mode in which he has performed his duty?—Yes, a very strict inquiry; the clergyman sends in twice a year an account of the state of the school, and of the character and conduct of the master; these returns are examined by a committee, and until that committee has approved of the returns, no salary is issued; no salary is ever issued till the corresponding return has been sent in and approved of.

Are there any instances of salaries having been withheld owing to the conduct of the masters?—Yes, frequently; there is no half-year in which there are not some payments withheld, either for a time or altogether.

Are there any instances of the half-year's salary of the master being disallowed?—Yes, many.

[The witness was directed to furnish a return of those instances during the last seven years.]

Have the Association any other system of inspection of the schools connected with them, except the half-yearly returns of the clergy?—No fixed or permanent system, but we have had inspections from time to time, independently of those reports.

Describe the nature of that inspection, and how it was accomplished?—Three years ago we sent an inspector to each of our schools, and we had a report from him; it was the Rev. Mr. Lee; he was employed in the same year, by two other public bodies.

Did he make a report of all the schools?—He did, with scarcely any exceptions; he was very diligent in conducting his inspections.

[The witness was directed to furnish such report.]

Was that report in general satisfactory?—In a great majority of instances, his report coincided with the half-yearly returns.

Did he represent the schools to be in a state you deemed satisfactory?—Yes, I think so; for we do not continue to aid a school, unless we are satisfied with the progress of it, as appearing in the half-yearly returns, with which his reports generally coincided.

Do you consider that his report represented the schools in general as being in a satisfactory state?—I think it was generally satisfactory.

In point of fact, do the clergy who superintend those schools universally make the half-yearly returns you have been speaking of?—They are always signed by the clergyman, and he certifies, that he has carefully inquired into the return, and the particulars of it.

Are there any instances in which the half-yearly returns have not been received by you?—We never issue the salary except we receive the corresponding half-yearly return; the effect of the return not being sent in would be the withholding of the salary.

Has your own observation led you to the conclusion, that the half-yearly reports are drawn out in the own proper hand writing of the clergyman?—I know in many instances they are not, for the Association have taken pains to prevail upon the clergyman to write them.

Have you any reason to know that they have been written by the master, and merely tendered to the clergyman to sign?—In some instances, I believe they are; but the Society have taken every means possible to prevail upon the clergymen to make them themselves.

[The witness was directed to furnish the Commissioners with the half-yearly reports of the year 1823.]

Do you supply to your own schools books from time to time?—In a very few instances.

Do you do so as a matter of course when they are at first taken into connection with you?—No, I know no instance of that kind; I should mention, in explanation of my answer, that the Association, till within a very few years, made their giving a certain aid of money, a ground for requiring parties that were locally interested in the schools, to take care that they were sufficiently supplied with proper books, and to accomplish that object, we required a return of the books half-yearly, and if we were not satisfied, we called upon the clergyman to see that they were supplied from local means.

From what sources do you expect that at this moment the books proceed that are used in the schools?—In many instances, I am persuaded they are purchased by the clergyman and the gentlemen in the neighbourhood, and in other instances, by the parents of the pupils.

Do you consider, that in point of fact no books are used in the schools except those that have been approved of by the Association?—We have returns sent in half-yearly, of all the books in use, and we do not issue the salary if we disapprove of any, until we have an engagement that they shall be discontinued.

Would the Association approve or disapprove of the books published by the Kildare-street Society?—I am not aware that there is any book published by that Society which the Association disapproves of.

Has it ever happened that a return has been made, stating that the books of that Society were used?—Very many.

Was any objection ever taken?—Never.

There is no provision made for a supply of slates and stationery?—No; I do not know that any application has ever been acceded to for such supply.

In what manner are the qualifications of the masters of these schools ascertained?—In general

Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,

general that is left to the clergyman; they are generally parochial school masters; if the clergyman certifies twice a year that he is satisfied with the character and conduct of the schoolmaster, the Association acquiesce.

Is he generally the parish clerk?—In many instances.

Would the documents in your office enable you to specify in what instances that is the case?—Yes.

[The witness was directed to furnish such account.]

Has there ever been any instance in which a schoolmaster of the Association has been dismissed for misconduct?—Yes; it has come to our knowledge, that many have been dismissed. The Society do not appoint or dismiss them.

Have you ever had occasion to know it was the case?—I think I can make returns of some that have been dismissed for misconduct by the clergymen. The fact of dismissal is only incidentally reported to us.

Have you ever had any provision for the education or training of masters?—Yes, we had, for some years, an institution for that purpose.

Where was it?—At Kildemo, near Limerick.

Why was it discontinued?—We found reason to be dissatisfied with the management of it, and in consequence of that, it was broken up.

What was the cause of the dissatisfaction?—The accounts of the person who superintended it were of a very unsatisfactory kind.

What was his name?—Jones.

Do you mean you considered him as having defrauded the public or the Association?—I do not believe that intentional fraud was the impression upon the minds of the majority of the persons who examined the accounts, but inaccuracy, rather.

That might be a reason for dismissing him; but why was it a cause for discontinuing the plan?—The plan had grown up from the Society, thinking that they had discovered in Mr. Jones a person peculiarly qualified for it; and so far as the producing of good schoolmasters, we had every reason to think that he was successful, and many such were produced; but when the Society ceased to grant their aid to Mr. Jones's establishment, they continued to look about for sometime for some person qualified to undertake such an institution, and some fit situation in which to establish it, and they were so unsuccessful in this search, that they gave up all thoughts of it, until within a few months. They have lately engaged apartments in the Foundling Hospital for the purpose, and have appointed a master for a training school.

[The witness was directed to furnish a return of the names of the several persons admitted into the Institution at Kildemo, and the periods for which they continued there.]

What became of the persons who had been there in training, when the institution was discontinued?—I suppose there might be twenty or twenty-five at that time; and they generally went out, and were employed in suitable situations.

What ages were they generally?—From eighteen to twenty-four.

Did they live there as boarders?—Yes, they did.

Is it intended they should be boarders at the new establishment at the Foundling Hospital?—Yes, I believe so; but the plan is not fully matured.

Was any particular person appointed to inquire into this institution at Kildemo?—It was not in consequence of our having in the first instance appointed a person to inquire into it, but in consequence of a report that came to us from the late Archbishop of Cashel; Archdeacon Mansell, who resides in Limerick, reported to his Grace circumstances connected with the institution, which were communicated by him to the Association, and in consequence of that, a visitor or inspector was appointed, and sent down to examine it.

Who were they?—The Association referred the business to the Board of Education, and Mr. Walker, the secretary of that board, was the gentleman sent down by them to make the investigation.

Did he make a report to the Association?—No, it was communicated to us, but he made his report to the Board of Education.

Did the Association never receive any particular report of the state of the institution at Kildemo?—They received Mr. Jones's accounts, and Mr. Walker communicated to us, by order of the Board of Education, the minutes of evidence he had taken.

[The witness was directed to supply such minutes to the board.]

What was the nature of the tenure of the property that the Association had at Kildemo?—We could scarcely be said to have property in it; we had given a small aid towards building or enlarging the school-house, which had been one of the schools aided by us, but it was an annual aid we gave to the training institution; Mr. Jones was the clergyman of the parish; I believe it is a perpetual cure, and one of our schools at Kildemo was enlarged for the training institution.

Upon whose estate was the house built at Kildemo?—That I am not able to say.

Who is in possession of it at present?—It has been since occupied as a parish school, and is one of those we give aid to.

Was the evidence taken by Mr. Walker, and returned to the Association, considered satisfactory or unsatisfactory?—It was considered so unfavourable that the Association withdrew their aid.

What was the nature of the suggestion from the Archbishop of Cashel, or Archdeacon Mansell; did it impute any particular objection to the institution?—I think I can produce the letter written; the impression on my mind is, that he represented the public money and the the aid of the association as in this instance not well employed—that it was not answering the purposes intended.

Were there any particular immoralities ever supposed to exist in the institution, did you ever hear any imputation of that kind?—No, I do not think there was any matter of that kind urged.

Who was responsible for the discipline and the regulation of the conduct of these young men?—Mr. Jones; he was the superintendant, and the person the Association looked to altogether.

Did he live close to the schoolhouse?—Yes; the schoolhouse was situated in the perpetual cure of which he was minister, and I think it was near; he was the superintendant, and the person to whom the Association altogether looked.

Is it your opinion, that the schoolmasters of the Association are pretty generally fit and proper men for the situations they fill?—I think relatively to the other schoolmasters of Ireland, that they are.

Do you consider them now upon the whole, to be a superior or inferior class of men, in point of competency to teach, to the schoolmasters in the Kildare-street schools?—I have not the means of comparing them together, but I have the impression on my mind that our schoolmasters are generally superior to schoolmasters of the same class of society in Ireland.

Does not it necessarily follow, from the former part of your evidence, that they have had no particular means of being trained in the habits of schoolmasters?—In the majority of instances they have not been trained.

Are there many instances, or any instances, in which the schoolmasters of the Association have been trained in Kildare-street?—Yes, many instances.

Is it of course, that the Association approve or disapprove of such training?—They have always approved of it, but they do not require it.

Describe the rules for the catechetical examination you spoke of?—The Association grants premiums to any clergyman of the established church, who from his own parish or from the parish of a clergyman who has appointed him to the duty, makes a return to them once in the year of having examined young persons in a specified course, provided that he states that they answered so as to show positive merit, and does not exceed a certain proportion of the total number examined by him on the occasion; the Association grant premiums, varying in value according to the extent of the course of examination; there are five degrees of classes, and the premiums generally vary in value according to the extent of the course of examination for each class.

The premiums are books?—Yes, and in the highest class, honorary certificates are sometimes given.

It is not necessary that the children, the candidates for these premiums, should have been educated in your schools?—No, it is altogether distinct from that; they are the children of the parishioners of the clergyman who makes the return, or of some clergyman appointing him to examine.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners the amount of the grants in each year for the last seven years that were applied to the catechetical premiums referred to, the number of children to whom such premiums were respectively awarded, and the total number of children who appeared to have been catechised in pursuance of such regulation in each year respectively.]

In point of fact, the number of children catechised in consequence of this principle, is increasing rapidly year after year?—It is rapidly increasing.

The Association considers it a very important part of their object?—They do so, and it is I believe peculiar to the Association.

Do you consider that the regulation has the effect of making the clergy of the established church attend more to the duty of catechising the children, as well as increasing the number of children?—Yes, one of its principal effects has been, suggesting to clergymen a greater frequency in holding catechetical lectures and examinations.

Has the Society the means in itself of ascertaining in how many instances the duty of catechising is performed, and in which it has been neglected?—We know nothing more than cases in which applications are made to us for premiums; what instruction the clergyman carries on, unless he makes application to the Association for premiums, we have no means of knowing.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners the number of parishes from which applications for premiums have been received during the last seven years respectively.]

Are the Commissioners right in collecting from your evidence, that the catechetical instruction must be given in the church, and not merely at the school?—There is no regulation fixed as to that; we grant premiums, although the examination is not held in the church; but in addition to the premiums I have already mentioned, and which we usually call the premiums for “answering;” we grant also premiums for the diligent “attendance” of the children upon weekly catechetical instruction given by the clergyman; for instance, if a clergyman examines seven young persons, he has the power of returning two of them, one for answering, and one for diligent weekly attendance on catechetical instruction, combined with an inferior degree of answering—we allow the clergyman to return only one in six, unless he can certify diligent attendance on his own weekly catechetical instruction, but where there is such attendance, we allow him to return two out of seven; that is, we

The Rev.
James Wilson,
3 Nov. 1824.

allow him to return under the head of "attendance" one-sixth of the number that remain when the successful candidates under the head of "answering" have been deducted.

Is there any regulation provided that when a clergyman holds one of those examinations of the children, that there should be any neighbouring clergyman present at the examinations for premiums?—It very generally happens that they have conjoint examinations, and that they have the children of several neighbouring parishes examined against each other, and some of the bishops are promoting that plan very generally in their respective dioceses.

There is no regulation of the Society to that effect?—No; we give premiums, if the clergyman makes the return for his own parish singly.

Have the Association ever adopted the plan of sending any circular, or making any sort of suggestion to individual clergy, to hold catechetical examinations of this kind?—Our catechetical regulations are printed on sheets, and we distribute them as widely as we can; and in cases of application, which are generally made on these sheets, we usually send down a new sheet of these regulations.

The catechetical examination goes to ascertain the general proficiency in the knowledge of the Scriptures, as well as their power of repeating the catechism?—We intimate to the clergyman, that we do not give premiums, unless there be more certified on the part of the young persons than the mere power of repeating the catechism; and the course for each class, except the lowest, combines a specified portion of the Scriptures with the Church catechism, and its explanation, and all the classes include certain portions of the Liturgy.

Be so good as to enumerate the several catechisms approved of by the Association?—The number of commentaries on the catechism that the Association recommend, is very small; we take for granted that Secker's Lectures on the Catechism, are in the hands of the elder children.

Are there any particular explanations or commentaries on the catechism, that are approved of by the Association?—There are two or three; the only one that occurs to me at present, is Mann's. I should here mention, that the only way I can show that any explanation of the catechism is approved, is by shewing it is on the list of books which the Association distribute at reduced prices. We do not ask the clergyman, in the case of catechetical returns, what explanation he has examined the young persons in; but on the list of books which we recommend for distribution, there are certain commentaries on the catechism, and therefore they may be considered as particularly recommended.

Is Stopford's catechism one of those that have been thus approved of?—That is in our list.

Crossman's is approved of also?—Yes.

Have any particular explanations of the catechism ever been disapproved of by the Association?—Yes; I should mention here, that we have a committee in the Association called the Committee of Tracts, and the course is, when any member conceives a work is useful to be put on that list, to recommend it, by a motion made at a meeting of the Society, to the attention of the committee of tracts; they read the work severally, and report whether they think it ought to be added to the list.

Can you name any expositions of the catechism, that have ever been disapproved of by the association?—I remember Lewis's has been in that way disapproved; but the disapproval is no further than that they do not think it right to put it on the list of books, which as a Society they recommend.

Have you ever known the merits of the Bristol catechism discussed?—No.

Or the Leeds catechism?—No; I have no knowledge of them.

Are the board right in supposing that Lewis's was one of the earliest expositions used in this country?—Yes.

But it never was adopted by the Association?—No; it was recommended for adoption in the mode which I have mentioned, the committee then took it into their consideration, and in two instances their report has been not to put it on the list of the Association.

Could you make us a return of all books that have been disapproved of by the committee of tracts?—Yes, I can.

[The witness was directed to furnish the same.]

With respect to the third object of the Society you have referred to, namely, the distribution of books; what are the general principles upon which that part of the business of the Association is conducted?—The most distinctive principle which I could state as regulating the decisions of the committee, has been to abstain from every thing controversial.

Do you mean controversial between Roman Catholics and Protestants, or between the several descriptions of Protestants?—Between Protestants and Roman Catholics; and also between the Established Church and Protestant Dissenters.

State any other principles or regulations that occur to you?—I do not know any other; we distribute the Scriptures, and the prayer book, books of general piety and devotion, and books of a moral tendency.

Have you ever known considerable difference of opinion to exist among the members of the committee of tracts, as to what books ought or ought not to be adopted by the Association?—I am not sure that I can state a difference of opinion among the committee of tracts, but I think many members of the Association have wished to have books put upon the list which the committee of tracts have, on examination of them, declined to recommend for that list.

Have

461
Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,
3 Nov. 1824.

Have you any knowledge upon the subject of whether some members of the committee of tracts are extremely anxious for the addition of certain works, to which they cannot obtain the assent of the others?—I do not know that I have any accurate means of ascertaining the views of the several members of the committee of tracts.

You are not present at their meetings?—I do not think there has been in my time much discussion; the members severally read the tracts, and come to the meeting prepared upon the subject.

In what manner are the books purchased that the Society distribute?—We have not any property in the books; but we have one bookseller, with whom we settle quarterly.

State the name?—Mrs. Watson; we do not ourselves purchase any books, we allow Mrs. Watson a certain rate of reduction upon the books that are sold by her to the members for their distribution.

State the rules that regulate your allowances to Mrs. Watson?—We reduce the books at different rates, that is to say, we pay about two parts in three of the price of the Scriptures, and prayer books, and generally one-half the price of the other religious and moral books and tracts.

Do you mean, you make up to Mrs. Watson the price that the purchaser would pay in the shop?—Not so much as an ordinary purchaser would pay; we first require her to deal with us on certain terms, calculating she shall have a certain profit, and we calculate upon that rate what the total price of the work will amount to, and this is considerably below the ordinary selling price; we then pay her a certain proportion of this calculated price, leaving the remainder to be defrayed by the member who draws for distribution, of that price; we pay two parts out of three, upon the Scriptures and the prayer book, and upon other books, we pay one half of the total price, computed as above.

What rate of profit do you allow to Mrs. Watson, upon her sales?—We allow her at present twenty per cent, on that part of the total price which we pay; she has a less profit in the case of ready money payment, on that part of the price which the member pays.

Has the rate of profit to Mrs. Watson been diminished?—Yes, since the beginning of the year 1822.

Was it ever diminished before the period to which you now refer?—I am not aware of its having been diminished before; but my opinion is, that the bookseller has always dealt with the Association upon more moderate terms than with the general customers.

[The witness was directed to furnish to the Commissioners, the several rates of profit upon the sales allowed to Mrs. Watson, during the last fourteen years respectively, and also the amount of Mrs. Watson's sales on account of the Society, during those years.]

I should here mention, that till the last regulation was formed, we had not gone upon any calculation of the profit, but our last calculation went upon a fixed rate of profit.

When the documents that have been called for by the Commissioners shall have been supplied to them, will they therefrom be enabled to perceive the amount of Mrs. Watson's clear profit, upon the amount of her dealings with the Association in each year respectively?—Yes; for something more than the last two years we have dealt with her upon a fixed rate; previous to that, I apprehend it could be only conjecture, in so far as depends on any papers in the possession of the Association.

There could be no difficulty in approximating to the truth in each of those years?—In sending in the returns of these latter years we can give an accurate ratio; we can also state what were the relative prices; for instance, what a Bible of the same description has sold for since the fixed rate of profit was established, and at what price before.

What induced the alteration in the rate of allowance to Mrs. Watson, that took place two years ago?—I believe it was conceived that the profit was greater than she ought to have on so large a distribution, the Association rose from very small beginnings, the distribution of books was originally small, and when it became considerable the members began to look into it and said Mrs. Watson may be content with a smaller rate of profit as the total sale is now so great.

What allowances are made by the booksellers and publishers of the works she has to sell, to Mrs. Watson?—I cannot state now, but I can put the Commissioners in possession of it.

At present have you any doubt it is 25 per cent?—The allowances are always that at least, we have had occasion to examine the accounts she has with those publishers, we find there are allowances made by some of the publishers in addition to that of 25 per cent, for instance, for payment within a certain time, a per centage is allowed by some of the publishers.

Do the Association make any allowance in the nature of a per centage to Mrs. Watson, over and above the per centage allowed to her by the publishers of the books?—Our allowance is not in addition to that from the publishers; we consider what she actually pays, not what she nominally pays to her publisher, but what the book actually costs her, we calculate all her allowances, there is a nominal price and then certain deductions made by the publishers; we compute what she actually pays for a number of books.

Are the Commissioners right in supposing you can ascertain the price that Mrs. Watson has paid for all the books sold on account of the Society, within a certain period? Since the late regulation of profit, Mrs. Watson is bound to produce such documents quarterly to our committee of accounts.

Then it follows of course you can ascertain the amount for what she actually sold those books on account of the Society?—Yes.

[The witness was directed to ascertain for the Commissioners, the actual cost to Mrs. Watson, of the books sold on account of the Society, and the amounts for which those books were sold by Mrs. Watson during the period of fourteen years, distinguishing each year, or for such other period as the mode of keeping the accounts may render necessary, and the sum received in respect of each sale for the Society; and also, a return of the number of Bibles and Testaments and Prayer Books sent into circulation by the Association, in each year respectively, since 1800.]

The Association rent apartments of Mrs. Watson for their meetings?—Yes.

What is the amount of the allowance for that?—We pay 50*l.* yearly for all the expenses, which includes the rent of the apartments, house, attendance, coals and candles.

Do you not consider that rent a very inadequate rent to Mrs. Watson, for the accommodation she gives you?—I think it is.

Do you not consider it grossly inadequate?—I think it is inadequate.

Has there not been a feeling that it would be right to allow more liberal terms to Mrs. Watson for your dealing with her in books, in consideration of paying her so very inadequate a remuneration for the use of her premises?—No, I do not think that is the general feeling of the Society. I know that Mrs. Watson would have been content to have allowed us the accommodation we have without any remuneration from the society, and I apprehend that she might have done so on a consideration entirely distinct from the question of the rate of profit she derives from the Association, upon the books she distributes for us. Mrs. Watson derives a very great advantage from the society meeting at her house, it makes her a sort of clerical bookseller for Ireland, it brings to her house a great many clergymen and other persons connected with the church.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners, a Return of the value of the religious books and tracts, other than Bibles, Testaments and Prayer Books, sold in each year respectively, since 1800.]

How many members are there of the Association?—At present something above seventeen hundred members.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners, a Return of the number of Members of the Association, in each of the said years respectively.]

What are the regulations as to the admission of members?—A candidate for admission is proposed by two members at a meeting of the board, or at the council, and after a certain interval, is ballotted for at a board meeting of the Society.

What subscriptions are required from the members?—The lowest subscription given, except in one instance which I shall mention, is a guinea; but in the case of a stipendiary curate, or of any officiating clergyman whose income does not exceed 100*l.* yearly, there is a power of its being remitted to half-a-guinea.

Are we right in collecting that all other members of the Association are obliged to subscribe one guinea per annum?—Yes, with the exception of a few persons who have been admitted honorary members; there is a particular form for proposing honorary members, but all persons elected in the ordinary way, give an engagement for the payment of one guinea yearly subscription at the least.

Who are the honorary members?—There are very few; Mr. Wilberforce is one.

[The witness was directed to furnish to the Commissioners, a List of the Honorary Members of the Association.]

Is it not a rule of the Association that the bishops of the established church are not required to subscribe?—We do not apply to them for subscription, but I believe that all the bishops of Ireland contribute to our funds.

Are the bishops members without subscribing?—Yes, I think they would be made so; but almost every person that has become a bishop has been a member previously, with the exception of persons who have not been clergymen of Ireland; for instance, Dr. Mant and the present Archbishop of Cashel, they were made members upon special motions, immediately upon being appointed bishops in Ireland.

Then they in point of fact continued subscribers?—Yes, and they do pay subscriptions.

All of them?—I do not recollect any that do not.

[The witness was directed to search for any Rules of the Association bearing upon the questions last put, and to supply them to the Commissioners.]

Are there any instances ever of any persons proposed for admission to the Association being rejected upon ballot?—Yes, there have been instances.

Is it the rule of the Society that four black beans will reject a person?—Yes, it had been a law from the formation of the Society.

Is it necessary to be a member of the established church in order to be a member of the Association?—No, it is not necessary; but there are very few members who are not members of the established church.

Is it not a leading object of the Association to promote the doctrines of the established church?—Yes, I think it is.

Have you ever been aware of any intention on the part of any person connected with the government to diminish the parliamentary grant to the Association?—Yes; when Mr. Grant was secretary for Ireland, he communicated to us a plan that would, at the time, have tended to diminish it.

What plan was it?—That the parliamentary aid should bear a fixed proportion to our own annual contributions.

Can you recollect what it was?—Five to one; that there should be five times as much from Parliament as we receive in subscriptions and donations.

Was

 Examination of

Was it a fact, that at that period the subscriptions were much lower than they had been at some former period?—I can shew the exact state of the subscriptions in successive years; but it is not impressed upon my mind, that I can shew any change immediately connected with that communication; they are much greater now than they were some years ago.

[The witness was directed to furnish to the Commissioners the amount of the subscriptions and donations in each year respectively since the year 1820.]

Was there any particular remonstrance, on the part of the Association, against that plan?—A very lengthened negociation between a committee of the Association and Mr. Grant, upon the subject.

Was that negociation in writing, or verbally?—I have many documents in writing drawn up upon the subject.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners all written communications that existed upon that subject.]

Are you aware of any particular mission to England upon that occasion, in consequence of his suggestion?—I am not aware that there was any mission formally appointed by the Association; I know that an individual member went over to England to speak to persons in power in favour of the Association, conceiving Mr. Grant unfavourable to it.

What was the result of that?—The result was, that we obtained the amount of aid which we estimated for, and Mr. Grant's calculation would have given us considerably less.

Are you aware whether any greater amount than the sum which you actually did obtain was offered to the Association upon that occasion?—There was no formal communication made to the Association; but the gentleman who communicated with the persons in power stated, that he was encouraged to expect a larger aid, provided the exertions of the Society should be commensurate.

Did you not understand, that a larger sum was offered and was declined by the Society?—No; I can state there was no offer of that kind, and no such declining, and that the conversation which was reported to us was simply this; that the government would even go so far, as recommending to Parliament an aid of £.10,000, if the Association were found to go on so as to shew they were well employing it, if they should require and deserve it.

Are we to understand distinctly, that the Association did not in any way decline accepting £.10,000, on the ground of not being able to spend it?—There was no formal offer of that kind; the Association have gone on all along pursuing their objects, which involved a certain expenditure, and they send in an estimate each year, founded upon calculations arising out of the expenditure of the preceding year, and the applications for new aids.

[The witness was directed to supply to the Commissioners the amount of expenditure in each of the 24 years.]

In what year did this mission to England take place?—I can furnish the exact year; it was either the first or second year that Mr. Grant was secretary for Ireland; I did not mean to say there was an exact mission to England, but it might be so understood among the members of the Association; and on the return of the member who conducted the negociation, he gave an account of his success to a meeting of the Association.

Who paid his expenses?—There were no expenses expected by the member, or paid by the Association.

What has been the year of the least expenditure of the Association during the last seven years?—I cannot state.

Have you any doubt it was the last year?—I have not a clear opinion upon the subject; for although our increase of expenditure was smaller during that year than we had reckoned upon, yet our general rate of expenditure going on increasing, it may be found, that the amount we laid out was not less than in some of the preceding years; our actual expenditure in that year was less than we had reckoned upon from the rate of increase, but I can produce documents to shew the actual expenditure.

The fact being undoubted, that the parliamentary grant of last year was very considerably less than those for several years preceding, are we to understand distinctly that it did not result from any indisposition on the part of persons in power, but from the choice of the Association?—I can state exactly how the circumstance arose; it was thus; it was conceived, that we were laying out too much money in the distribution of books, and that we should go beyond that amount in which Parliament would support us; the Association formed, therefore, regulations of two kinds; they diminished that proportion of the integral price of the books that they themselves defrayed; for instance, in the Scriptures and prayer books they defrayed but half, having before defrayed two thirds, and we diminished the number of books which each member should have the power of drawing in proportion to his yearly subscription; formerly the members had the power of drawing to the amount of six times their subscriptions, and it was then changed to three times, and the two limitations combining operated much beyond what we calculated.

You were out in your estimate?—Yes, we formed a system of economy, and it operated beyond our calculation.

It produced a greater saving than you expected?—Yes.

And in consequence of that, you lessened the amount for which you applied?—Yes; we found we had a considerable balance at the end of the year, consequently we asked for a smaller sum for the use of the succeeding year.

Are we to understand that the Association has ever declined giving assistance to schools upon upon the alleged grounds of want of funds?—That ground was never alleged as far as I am aware, except while the communication with Mr. Grant was pending.

Has not that reason been assigned during the year when their expenditure was so reduced; namely, the last year?—No; the necessary limitation of our funds has been often urged as a reason for adhering very strictly to the regulation requiring land, and the fulfilment of all conditions on the part of the applicant.

Could you ascertain by a reference to your documents, in how many instances the want of funds has been alleged, in any certain period of time, as a reason for not complying with the request of the schools?—The want of funds has never been alleged as a general reason, except during the period which I have mentioned, and during that time the consideration of all applications was suspended.

The question refers to the particular applications made during the year 1823; are we to understand, that none such have been rejected upon the expressly alleged cause of the want of pecuniary means to comply with it?—So I understand.

Has any instance occurred during that period, where the regulations of the Association have been offered to be complied with, and where the want of funds has been given as the reason for not complying with such offer?—No; I have never known an instance where the regulations have been complied with, and where the exigence for our aid was shewn, where that has been assigned as a reason, or where our aid has been on such ground refused.

Have you ever known an application for a school either refused or discouraged, with any reference to the personal character of the clergyman applying?—No, I know of no such instance.

Have you ever observed any feeling in the Association with respect to the doctrinal feelings of the clergyman applying, and which should operate either for or against the success of his application?—No; the business of granting aids to a school is altogether intrusted to the committee of schools, and I have in no instance known their report negatived, or sent back by the board meeting; so that the individuals composing the committee of schools may be considered the persons to decide upon all such applications, and I apprehend, in that committee there may be some differences of opinion upon doctrinal points, so that no feeling of the kind which has been mentioned could come into effect.

Have you been present when they discussed the subject of grants to schools?—Yes, I am always present.

Are you of opinion, that the doctrinal opinions of persons making the applications never either retard or accelerate their success?—No discussion has ever taken place upon such a subject; how far individuals, in their desire to support this school rather than that, might be acted upon by any bias arising from similarity of opinions, I have not the means of ascertaining.

Have you ever observed any indications of such motives operating?—They never come into any discussion.

They have never been expressed?—No.

Nor manifested themselves?—No, not so distinctly as to furnish any surmise which would deserve to be taken down.

Is it upon an examination in the church catechism, as contained in the prayer book, that the premiums are given?—Yes, and upon portions of the Scriptures which are defined and pointed out, together with certain portions of the liturgy.

Are not the children examined for those premiums upon some exposition of the church catechism?—The clergyman states he has examined the children in the church catechism, and its explanation; we explain that to mean, that the child must show a competent knowledge of the meaning of the catechism.

What explanation do you mean?—We never call upon the clergyman to particularize it.

It may be Mann's, Stopford's, or Lewis's?—Yes; or Secker's.

You have stated, that in the circulation of books, you wish to circulate such books as would not touch upon any point of controversy either between Catholics and Protestants, or different descriptions of Protestants?—Yes, I have stated that to be the most distinctive principle regulating the committee of tracts.

In the list of books, there is "Stopford's Explanation of the Church Catechism, interspersed with occasional Remarks on some of the principal Errors of the Church of Rome;" do you not consider that book a book of a controversial nature?—I do not conceive that will be found to affect the accuracy of the opinion I have formed, because we cannot put the works of the great Protestant writers into the hands of young persons without their containing something of a controversial nature.

Do you consider this work of Stopford's as one of a moderate nature?—I am not acquainted with it; what I stated was the principle which regulated the committee of tracts, in selecting works to put upon the list.

Do you consider it influenced them in the distribution of all works?—In the addition of other works they may have considered, as in Secker, that although there was something controversial, that was not a reason for rejecting the whole work; but I have heard the opinion which I have stated expressed as the most general one amongst the members.

Do the committee of tracts absolutely read the books which they recommend for circulation, before they so recommend them?—I conceive so; they are circulated among them for that purpose.

With Secker's Lectures, do you know whether any other work is bound up?—I do not know that.

Are you aware whether a work intituled, "A brief Confutation of the Errors of Popery," by

by Porteus," is circulated by the Society?—I have ascertained that the work of Porteus, which has been mentioned, has never been circulated by our Association, although it has been printed by Mrs. Watson.

Does instruction in the catechism form an essential branch of the discipline of all schools supported by your Association?—Yes; we require that the children of the established church shall be instructed in the catechism by the clergyman.

In all schools?—Yes, in all schools where there are such children.

Can you state the amount of the balance in hand, when you made out your last estimate?—Upwards of £. 5,000.

In respect to the catechetical premiums, do you inquire whether they are given to children in any school?—They may be given to the children in any school, but an examination must take place by the clergyman of the parish, or some person appointed by him.

A school, to receive the aid of the Association, must be under the patronage or controul of a clergyman of the church of England?—Under his visitation, and under his superintendence.

Must it be under his exclusive superintendence?—We require the clergyman to certify to us his acquaintance with the school, and his visitation of it; further than that we do not inquire.

According to your notions of the meaning of your institution, could any books of any nature be introduced into the school without the approbation of the resident clergyman?—The names of all books used in the school are returned to us twice a year.

The question was, whether any book could be introduced into the school without the approbation of the resident clergyman?—We do not ask the clergyman whether he approves of the books used in the school or not.

Is it your understanding, that any books could be introduced into the schools without his approbation?—There are no means by which I can form an opinion upon that point.

Has he the absolute controul over the school?—He visits the school, and reports to us twice a year.

During that visit, has he the power of giving such directions as he may deem necessary?—The exact state of superintendence will be seen from the return which I have been ordered to send in; we say to the clergyman, tell us the state of the school, from your actual observation, and tell us all the books read in it.

Suppose a committee of gentlemen in a parish establish a school, and allowed the clergyman to visit that school, but that they insisted upon directing the school in all respects, and in directing what books should or should not be used in the school, admitting the testament and admitting the clergyman to catechise the children of the school in the catechism of the established church, would it be consistent with your Association to give aid to that school?—The exact state of the case is this, that the clergyman certifies to us the state of the school.

Would you make a grant of money to such a committee?—The applications all come through the clergyman.

No money can go, except through the hands of a clergyman?—The clergyman is always the applicant.

Money would not be granted upon the application of any other person than a clergyman?—We have no regulation allowing votes to be made on other applications than those of clergymen.

Must it be granted to a clergyman?—Our regulations imply that the clergyman must be the applicant.

In case of a clergyman being non-resident, how is the report made?—We cannot aid the school unless there is some clergyman officiating in the duties of the parish in which it is situated.

Do you take the certificate of a curate as sufficient?—We do.

Are there any instances in which the same clergyman has more than one school for the same union of parishes?—Yes, there are instances, but they are few.

[The witness was requested to return such instances to the board.]

Are there any instances in which a clergyman has more than one school for one parish, as contradistinguished from a union of parishes?—I am not certain, but I know that in some instances we have more than one school under the superintendence of the same clergyman.

When you have given aid to one clergyman, and he happens to die or be removed, is it a matter of course that his successor shall hold the same relations?—We always transmit the return to the officiating clergyman as far as we know him; but if the return comes up to us filled up and signed by the officiating clergyman for the time being, we require nothing further.

Do you consider it as a matter of course, that when another clergyman takes the charge of a parish that has been previously in connection with your Association, that he shall be considered in the same situation?—Yes; our aid is to the school, not to the clergyman; this will be seen when it is considered that we always expect an endowment of land and other local co-operation.

[The witness was directed to supply a list of the several schools in which the lands granted had been glebe lands, and also those in which they had been granted by laymen.]

I believe it is a fact, that there was no report last year from the Association?—There was not.

Can you state any reason for it?—It was postponed from time to time.

Whose duty is it to draw it?—The duty of the secretaries.

Was

Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,
3 Nov. 1824.

Was the report ever before omitted?—Yes; we have not published reports every year; we have a report in the press at present.

Do the half-yearly returns in point of fact usually or always specify the list of books as being such as are employed?—Yes, so much so that we send them back if they do not; for instance, if they put an et cetera in the return, we send it back.

Are there not a number of diocesan societies affiliated in the nature of branches to the parent society?—There are.

[The witness was directed to supply a list of the dioceses in which such branch societies existed.]

Are you able to ascertain, from the documents in your office, the state of the accounts of those diocesan societies?—I can furnish documents to shew what books they draw from the Association for distribution each year; the diocesan committees do two things; they collect the subscriptions from the members of the parent society who live in their district, and draw books in proportion to the amount from our bookseller; I can shew the quantity of books.

[The witness was requested to furnish such accounts.]

Do the names of the subscribers to the diocesan institutions appear in your books as members of the Association?—Yes; the diocesan committees are chiefly formed of members of the Association.

Do the members in the country appear in your list of the members of the Association?—A person, by subscribing to the diocesan institution, does not become a member of the Association.

Do you know of any diocesan association that has separated from you, and set up for itself?—No, I know of none such.

Has it not occurred in the upper diocese of Armagh?—A diocesan committee consists, we will suppose of twenty members of the Association; each of them pays to the treasurer of the committee their subscription, suppose twenty guineas; when this payment has been accounted for to the parent society, it enables them to draw sixty guineas worth of books from our bookseller, at a reduced price; then, if the committee say we get these books from you at a reduced price, but we wish to give them to the poor in our neighbourhood at a still lower rate, and we will form a private fund of our own for that purpose, we look upon the Stuart fund in the diocese of Upper Armagh as coming within that description.

Appendix, N° 175.

Further Examination of the Rev. James Wilson on Oath;

The Rev.
James Wilson,
19 Nov. 1824.

WHAT means have at any time been taken by the Association for discountenancing Vice for ascertaining the state of the schools which they support?—The ordinary means are the returns that come in half-yearly to them; they are authenticated by the clergyman presiding over each school; in addition to that, they have had inspections, two within my time; one by Mr. Lee, and another has taken place since.

In what form are the periodical returns from the schools?—One of the forms is before the board.

By whom was the inspection of the schools made subsequently to that by Mr. Lee, in the year 1820?—By the neighbouring clergymen; in Mr. Lee's instance we paid a stipend for it; but the last inspection we had made by clergymen in the vicinity of each school, or by clergymen of the diocese in which it was situated, it was in 1822.

Was that an inspection undertaken gratis?—Yes, it was; we wrote either to the bishop of the diocese, or to the diocesan committees, where there were any such, requesting they would have such and such schools inspected, sending a list of the schools in their district, and in some instances recommending individual clergymen for such inspection.

Did you in each case send queries to be answered, similar to those given to Mr. Lee?—Yes, similar ones, not exactly the same; as soon as we obtained the consent of the parties to undertake the inspection, we furnished them with a list of the queries; and for each instance of inspection, we furnished the inspector with the corresponding half-year's report last sent in from the school, in the same manner as when Mr. Lee went out. We gave him the half-yearly returns immediately preceding, that he might compare them with the state of the school.

Did persons to whom you applied, in any instance, omit to furnish a report?—I think the inspection took place very generally, in some few instances they were omitted.

Did it appear, by a comparison of the returns made in 1822 with those furnished by Mr. Lee, that any considerable change had taken place in any schools, in any important respect?—I think all the schools have been progressively improving.

Do you mean that the attendance has been greater?—That the order in the school has been greater, and the regulations have been more steadily enforced, and that all which depends upon the superintendence of the school has been improving.

I observe by the returns made by Mr. Lee, that the schools in existence at the time of his inspection in 1820, amounted to 104, I now understand from you, that the schools established by the Society amount to 250?—Yes.

Has the number of pupils increased in the same proportion as the number of schools?—I am inclined to think not.

What reason have you for entertaining that opinion?—I have a general impression on my

 Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,
 19 Nov. 1824.

my mind, that the number of schools established by the different societies in the country, has tended to diminish the numbers that would have attended our schools.

Are the masters of the schools paid in proportion to the number of the children that they teach, or do they all obtain the same amount of salary?—Our original plan, and from which we have not much varied, was to proportion our aid to the degree of local exertion that was made to endow the school and set it going; for instance, originally, if an acre of land was made over, and a house built, we granted, in addition to an aid for building, a salary of 15*l.* annually; and where it was shewn that all other conditions were fulfilled, but that land could not be obtained, we granted an aid of but 12*l.* a year; our aids were proportioned to the degree of local exertion in endowing and founding a school. I do not know that they have varied much from that.

By that am I to undersand that in no case has the payment to the master any reference to the pupils?—No immediate reference.

Have you ever had reason to believe that the number of children stated to have attended at the schools in the returns, has in reality been greater than the actual attendance?—I do not know that I could state any instance in which such a thing has come to my knowledge; but we contrive our returns as much as we can to indicate that; for instance, the clergyman is not to state merely the number on the roll for each of the months, which might be fallacious, but the average attendance during the same months, therefore, unless that average is falsified, we cannot be deceived.

Referring to the half-yearly return made from the schools, I see that the classes are seven in number, and it appears that the last class are taught the church catechism?—Yes.

Are all children who attend these schools taught the church catechism?—The clergyman certifies to us as to the children of the established church only; we have not inquired respecting others, nor have we ever encouraged the practice of putting the church catechism into the hands of children that did not belong to it.

Is there any fixed rule upon the subject?—I think the rule may be collected from the form of the certificate; the clergyman is called upon to certify as to the children of the church of England attending the school; we ask no question as to others.

Am I to understand that if any children of persons dissenting from the church of England are admitted into the school, and are not taught the church catechism, that it is rather by a tacit connivance at the practice, than by any directions given to the master to that effect?—I conceive the view of the Association is, that they do not expect nor require the children that do not belong to the established church, to learn the church catechism in their schools.

In what way has that been conveyed to the superintending minister, by writing or any printed document?—It could only have been conveyed incidentally. We have never required that children not belonging to the established church should be taught the church catechism, nor intimated to the clergyman that we desired it.

If any superintendant of a school was inclined to require that all the children, Roman Catholics, Presbyterians and others, who attended the school, should be taught the church catechism, is there any thing in the regulations that would prevent him carrying his wish into effect?—I think when it was communicated to the committee of the school, they would express their disapprobation of it. I do not think that I could refer to a form of regulation, which they would transmit to clergymen; but I have no doubt that they would express their disapprobation. I think I can mention one fact to show that such is the general feeling in the Association. There is no person who exerted himself so much in framing and putting into execution the regulations respecting schools, as the present Bishop of Ferns; he assisted more than any other in the framing of them and making them work, and I know that when he went to Limerick, as bishop of that diocese, he published a direction to his clergy, that the Roman Catholic children should not be present in the schools, under the superintendence of the clergy in that diocese, while the children of the established church were taught their catechism. He directed the dismissing of the Roman Catholic children, when they were about to teach in the school the catechism of the church of England.

Are you aware that it was stated in one of Mr. Lee's reports, that in one of the schools the Roman Catholics were forbidden to attend?—I do not remember the instance; but I can state universally, if the committee of schools find that no Roman Catholic children are attending in any of them, they write to know the cause.

What rule is followed in the schools of the Association as to the catechetical instruction?—We have no rule beyond this, that we require the number in the catechetical class, to be stated to us half-yearly, and we require the clergyman to certify he has examined half-yearly the children belonging to the church, in the Scriptures and the church catechism; we compare the catechetical class with the number of Protestants stated in the return, and if there is a great inequality, we send to the clergyman to ask the reason. Sometimes he states that some of them are Protestant dissenters, and we consider that a sufficient reason.

Are any catechisms allowed to be taught in the schools, except the catechism of the church of England?—We expressly say in our general regulations, that no catechism except that of the church of England shall be taught in the school.

Does it appear that is abided by?—We have found instances where other catechisms were taught, and we have always directed the practice to be discontinued; and if it was not discontinued we have withdrawn our aid.

Would the salary be withdrawn if the master continued to permit the Roman Catholic or Presbyterian

Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,

Presbyterian catechism to be taught in the school?—The salary would be eventually withdrawn if the practice were persevered in; it would be suspended till we wrote to the clergyman.

What regulations have the Society with respect to the religion of the persons to be appointed masters?—We require that they shall be of the established church.

How are the masters chosen, and in what way is that fact ascertained?—The Association leaves the appointment and removal of the master to the superintending clergyman; they do not themselves assume the power of removing or appointing the master, but they require the superintending clergyman to certify twice a year, that the master is a member of the established church, and that his character and conduct meet his approbation.

Would it be considered by the Association as an assumption of power, if they were to appoint or dismiss a master of their own authority?—The Association have never, in any instance that I know of, assumed the power of appointing a master; they may have recommended a removal upon the report of the visitor, or they may have said, unless you remove such a master we will not continue the salary.

By whom was the master appointed whom the Rev. Mr. Neligan dismissed?—I think in that instance, what was done by the Society was, that they withheld their aid; they withdrew the aid upon the half-yearly report, and they have not given any aid to that school since.

What became of the money that was given for the building, or the grant of land?—We had no means of securing the money given for the building.

Was there any grant of money for building the school at Kilmactigue?—We voted aid for that purpose.

What sum was given?—I believe 40*l*.

Has any inquiry ever been made as to the building erected at the expense of the Association?—The Association believe the money was laid out in building the school-house.

Did the board communicate with Mr. Neligan upon the subject?—They communicated to him the ground of their withholding the aid.

Is the letter to Mr. Neligan in existence?—I believe that I have a copy of it.

[The witness was directed to furnish the same.]

What account did Mr. Neligan give of his conduct, with regard to the school at Kilmactigue?—He is at this time applying for a renewal of the aid of the Association.

With what prospect of success?—He has sent in his application very lately, which was considered imperfect in point of form; and it has been sent back to him to fill up all the queries.

Is it generally understood, that a school, superintended by a clergyman and supported by the Association, is to become a parish school to which the clergyman shall contribute under the statute of Henry VIII?—I think it appears, from the regulation of the Association, that when they commenced their aid first, it was to enable clergymen, who might not otherwise have it in their power, to found and maintain parish schools. I think the first sentence in the general regulations prefixed to the queries, supposes that.

Are they expected to contribute towards it, under the powers of the statute of Henry VIII?—We always require a contribution from the clergyman, where he is able to contribute.

Is it considered that that contribution makes it a parochial school?—I do not think it is with that view and object that the Association have called upon the clergyman to contribute; but they say, you must yourself contribute, and you must procure from every person who has means, and whom you can influence, some contribution to the school.

Is it preferred by the Association, that the parish clerk shall be the master?—I think it is.

Is not the parish clerk, in a great majority of instances, the master of the school?—At present, he is in many instances; and of these instances I am now making out a return. The Association have preferred this union of offices, as making the situation more respectable and valuable.

Is it considered by the Society as making the situation more valuable to the clerk?—As making the situation more valuable in itself, and therefore more likely to induce a well qualified person to come into the situation of a schoolmaster.

Are the schoolmasters allowed to appoint deputies?—In many of our schools there are ushers.

Is the schoolmaster allowed to transfer the whole care and management of the school to the usher, and pay him part of the salary, and withdraw himself from the management of it?—No; whenever we discover that the master of the school is not the principal teacher, we consider it a ground for withholding or suspending our aid.

Who is permitted to appoint the usher?—We do not inquire.

What rule is there with regard to the qualifications of the usher?—We have no form of regulations respecting it.

Is there any regulation with respect to the religion of the usher?—I could not state any fixed regulation; and I think that perhaps there may have been some variety of practice on the part of the Association in what relates to that.

Have they permitted Roman Catholics to be ushers in the school?—I think in some instances they have permitted it, and in some instances they have objected to it; I should consider it as one of the points that has not been exactly settled by any general rule, but determined in each case by the particular circumstances of the case.

What rule is there with respect to the money paid on the part of the pupils to the schoolmaster; is it limited in amount, or is there any regulation with respect to it?—There is no precise regulation respecting it; we require it to be stated every half-year what the children pay, pay, and we expect that none shall be excluded from the school on account of their inability to pay.

Are any precise instructions given upon that point, or is the superintendant left to collect it as well as he can?—It is one of the queries we put half-yearly to the superintending clergyman, whether any are excluded on account of their inability to pay; the meaning of which is, that we consider that all who are desirous of attending should be admitted, and that our payment should be a ground for admitting such as have not the means of paying for themselves.

Are the school-rooms allowed to be used for any other purposes than the instruction of the children?—I think, as much as is in the power of the Association, they have endeavoured to prevent their being used for other purposes.

As the school-rooms are most of them either erected at the expense of the Society, or the Society contributes to the expense, is it not understood they have an absolute power of directing what shall be the use of them?—In such cases the Society would direct it; but we have aided some schools with salary; in market towns, for instance, where a school is taught in some public room that is not under our controul.

It appears in Mr. Lee's reports, that on his inspection, several schools were used as places either of public worship, or at least were used for the purpose of preaching in, by persons of different persuasions, generally described to be Methodists—what was done in consequence of that information?—I think in every instance the disapprobation of the Association respecting such use of the school-room, was communicated to the superintending clergyman.

Do the copies of the letters remain in which the disapprobation was communicated?—I apprehend that all the particulars of the proceedings of the committee of schools upon Mr. Lee's returns remain, and they were communicated as nearly as possible in the words of the votes of the committee.

To whom?—To the superintending clergyman.

Was it left to the superintendent of the school to exercise his own discretion as to the means to be taken for correcting the abuses which were discovered by Mr. Lee?—The Association communicated their disapprobation; and, in the great majority of instances, the abuse was corrected.

Did the Association communicate their disapprobation in every case where Mr. Lee disapproved?—The form of the proceeding that was adopted was exactly this: the half yearly returns that followed the sending in of Mr. Lee's reports were brought, in the ordinary course of business before the committee; and, in examining these returns, the committee of schools referred at the same time to Mr. Lee's reports, and the judgment they formed was upon the combined information from the half yearly returns and the report of Mr. Lee, and the result of it was afterwards communicated to the parties in each instance.

Was it communicated in the way of information, or was it accompanied with specific and positive directions as to the abuses discovered?—The tendency must have been to require them to be rectified.

Can you state whether it was a tendency only to be inferred by way of implication, or whether it was a positive direction?—I think it was a positive direction; I believe that in every instance it was enforced as far as was in the power of the Association.

Referring to the school at Killeade, and Mr. Lee's report upon it, he states that in that school there was a pulpit; that it was used by persons of several denominations of dissenters; can you recollect what direction was given in that particular case?—No, I cannot; but I have no doubt the disapprobation of the Association was communicated, and that such practice was desired to be discontinued.

If any such direction was given, can we now see the copy of the document in which it was contained?—I can find the vote of the committee upon the report, and I have no doubt that such vote was communicated to the party.

Can it be ascertained in each case what was done in consequence of Mr. Lee's report?—I am not certain that it can be ascertained exactly what was done; because, although the disapprobation of the Association was communicated where it was considered as deserved, it was sometimes the result of some negotiation to put it into execution.

What description of negotiation could take place between the superintendent of the school and the Association?—When we communicated to the clergyman that such a thing had been stated to us, the clergyman might answer, in some instances, that the school-house was not his property; that he had no controul over it to prevent its being employed at times when it was not used as a school-room, in other ways. In every instance where it was a school of our own founding, we insisted upon the discontinuance of any such practice.

It was stated in Mr. Lee's report upon the school at Kilmore, that an Orange lodge was from time to time held in the school; do you know what was done in consequence of that communication?—I do not recollect now what was done, but I have no doubt a communication was made to the party, and I can refer to it.

Does a copy of the communication that was made in that case exist?—I have no doubt the vote of the committee upon it is in existence.

It was reported by Mr. Lee that the school at Derryvullen was in connection with the London Hibernian Society; can you recollect whether any thing was done in consequence of that information?—I know the uniform practice at the time was to write to the clergyman in such cases either to choose to relinquish the aid of the other Society, or to relinquish our aid.

It was reported by Mr. Lee, with respect to the school at Finglass, that the master does not receive the Association grant, but does receive a gratuity, although he signs a receipt for for both?—I do not recollect the instance, but I know such a report was made to us in several instances; and, in some instances, it had taken place without the intention of fraud upon the Association. I do not particularly recollect the instance at Finglass, but we found it in several of our schools; the plan adopted was this, that the aid derived from the Association was put into a general school fund, out of which the master was paid a fixed salary. That certainly was the case in some instances, that they paid the masters out of a general school fund, into which fund our salary went; and the gratuity, which was a more variable aid derived from the Association, they allowed to pass from the Association immediately to the master.

Examination of

You say in some instances it had taken place without the intention of fraud; had it taken place with the intention of fraud in some instances?—I do not know that I can state any instance in which fraud came to our knowledge, but we disapproved of the system generally.

Was there no instance in which the salary, though paid by the Society, was not wholly applied either to the payment of the master or some other necessary purpose connected with the instruction of the children?—I remember one instance in which, on investigation, we discovered that the aid granted by the Association as salary had not gone to the person represented to us as the master.

State in what instance, and to whom the salary had gone?—It was an instance we became acquainted with upon the investigation respecting the seminary at Kildemo; it was the instance of a school in that neighbourhood.

Has it occurred in any other instance than that?—I do not remember any other.

Do the Society permit the arrangements to be made which you have spoken of, and the salary, though directed to be given to the master, to be applied to other purposes of the school?—No, the Association requires the receipts to be signed by the master himself.

Is not the arrangement you have described as having been discovered, in several instances extremely liable to abuse?—We consider it so; the Association have always expressed their disapprobation of it.

Are distinct directions given to that effect, or is the superintendent left to infer it from the general directions?—The rules of the Society should secure that. Our mode of payment is to transmit a half note for the amount, with a receipt, under cover to the clergyman, and the remaining half note is not transmitted till the receipt comes up signed by the school-master himself; there is, therefore, a deception on the Society when the money does not pass immediately into the hands of the master.

Were Mr. Lee's reports taken under the consideration of the Association one by one, or was there any general minute made from them by yourself, and submitted to their attention?—Mr. Lee's reports were examined exactly in this manner, according as the half yearly returns came in from the schools that Mr. Lee had inspected; the committee of schools, on examining each return, compared with it Mr. Lee's report of the same school; so that no payment was issued to any school, subsequent to Mr. Lee's report, till his report had been read upon it.

What course was pursued with regard to the reports that were made in the year 1822?—Exactly the same course was adopted; the reports of the inspection were considered at the same time that the half yearly returns immediately subsequent were examined.

When were the last returns received from the schools?—There are returns coming in at present.

Up to what day are they made?—Up to the 30th of September.

Does it appear that the number of scholars in attendance is materially diminished?—I think in several instances scholars have been withdrawn from the schools; several Roman Catholic children have been withdrawn from the schools in the last year or two.

I see that the first condition which is required by the Association to be complied with in the case of granting aid of salary, is, that there shall be a grant of land, unless the clergyman will certify that every exertion has been made to procure ground, though without effect. In the number of schools that have been aided since Mr. Lee's inspection, were a large proportion erected without a grant of land?—No; I think the majority of them are with land.

The next condition which the Society require before they will grant a salary, is, that there shall be an annual contribution towards the support of the school. I would ask you, supposing the clergyman contributes 40s. a year, under the Act of Henry VIII. would the Association think that a sufficient contribution to induce them to grant the salary?—I suppose they would consider 40s. as sufficient for the clergyman himself, but he must take care to provide contributions from other persons living in the neighbourhood, if there be any such who are able to contribute, and whom he can influence.

Would it be necessary for him to procure other contributions?—He must shew he has obtained as much local contribution as he can obtain.

Suppose he can obtain no local assistance, and has only paid the 40s. would that be sufficient?—Yes, if he shew to us that he has made sufficient exertion.

Have many cases of that kind occurred?—At every examination of half-yearly returns there are communications made by the committee to the superintending clergyman, desiring them to procure local contributions whenever it appears that there is a deficiency of such.

It appeared, on Mr. Lee's inspection, that no school was kept at Howth; can you recollect in that case what was done as to the house and land?—I apprehend there had been no grant of land or house built at Howth by the aid of the Association; but we withdrew our aid of salary from Howth school.

Is

471
Examination of
The Rev.
James Wilson,
19 Nov. 1824.

Is it paid any salary at present?—They have within these few months obtained a grant on the usual conditions; viz. that they shall obtain land, and build a schoolhouse upon it.

Have they received any money yet?—No, they have not yet fulfilled the conditions.

Has there been any reduction in the amount of allowances granted to schoolmasters?—Within two years we have made a general reduction.

On what ground?—We reduced the schools that received 15*l.* to 12*l.*; and those that received 12*l.* to 10*l.*; and we stated as our reasons, that we were desirous of aiding more schools than the number then on our list, and that we conceived that the value of money had increased from the time that the greater part of those grants had been made, for instance, that we considered 12*l.* at the time of the reduction, was as valuable as 15*l.* at the time we passed the original vote; (I was asked on my last examination, whether a tract of Bishop Porteus's was circulated by the Association; I find it is not on their list, it is published by their bookseller, but they have not inserted it in their list, nor have ever circulated it as a society.)

Do the Association for discountenancing Vice, object to the schools which receive aid from them, being in connection with any other society or association?—It was the original regulation of the Association, that the schools receiving their aid should not receive aid from any other society, and it was uniformly acted upon till the last year, when some difference of opinion appears to have arisen among the members of the Society, and although they have received information that some of their schools receive aid from the Kildare-street Society, they have not in every instance written to them as was formerly the practice, to say they must make their election. The majority of the committee of schools were disposed to communicate that to the schools, but the doing so has been retarded; there was even a circular letter drawn up by the committee at the commencement of this year upon the subject, to be sent to the schools, but the sending it has been postponed by a vote of the Society at large.

You have spoken of the last year, as if there was a difference between that and the preceding years?—Yes, there was; in the current and past years the practice has not been so steady as it formerly was.

Has the committee of your Association, or the Association itself, ever made any communication to any school, or to the patron of any school which it found in connection with any other society, expressive of disapprobation?—In many instances, formerly.

In the case of the Kildare-street Society?—Yes, in many cases we communicated to schools, "we withhold our aid, till you agree to relinquish the aid of any other society." I think during the present year we have not steadily enforced that regulation, though it appears upon our printed paper as a fixed regulation that the school must not receive annual pecuniary aid from any other public institution. In some instances where we have written to them, calling upon them to make their election between our aid and that of another society, they have answered us, "the aid we derive from the Kildare-street Society is not a salary, but a gratuity voted to us, in consequence of our school being reported as an efficient one;" and in some cases latterly, that has been acquiesced in by the Association, and our aid not withdrawn.

Have you ever done any thing, in consequence of finding schools in connection with the Hibernian or Baptist Society?—Yes, formerly in every instance where we found our schools receiving aid from any other society, we called upon them to relinquish that aid, or their aid from us.

Were there any instances of your schools being in connection with the Baptist Society?—I do not remember any instance.

Are you aware, that the school at Mountshannon, in the county of Galway, in connection with you, is either in connection with the Baptist Society, the Hibernian Society, or the Kildare-street Society?—No, I am not aware of it; but I admit, that in the present year the practice has not been fixed. I think that at present there is a difference of opinion among some of the members of the Society upon the point. The practice was formerly uniform.

Have you ever made any grant for the purposes of schools, either for building or otherwise, to Sir John Read, of the county of Clare?—I do not think he is superintending any school that receives our aid.

Have you made any grant to him?—We may have made a conditional grant on his application; in many cases we make conditional grants, and those conditions not being complied with, we have never been called upon for the money.

Until the present year, have you been strict in adhering to the rule, that no school receiving aid from you should receive aid from any other society?—I think so; I do not remember any instance previous to the present year in which it came distinctly before the committee of schools, that a school received aid from another society, in which the salary was not withheld, except in one case, that was the school at Drumcar, which was reported to us last year as having received a gratuity from the Kildare-street Society.

Are copies of your printed rules furnished to all persons who apply for aid?—Yes, that paper now before the board is the form of making the application, and at the head of the paper the regulations are printed.

So that any person obtaining aid from you, obtains it upon the understanding that he is not to receive it from any other society?—Yes, so I conceive; for that paper is always sent down to the person making the application.

What do you conceive is the principle of the objection of the Society to their schools being in connection with other societies?—I think the chief objections are twofold, they were desirous to have a single superintendence, that is, they wished to guard against their schools being under the superintendence of other societies, whose rules might be at variance with their own; and also, as a general principle, they thought it better that the aids of different societies should be distributed to different schools, rather than accumulated upon a few.

The Rev.
James Wilson,

Which of those two principles, do you conceive, was the strongest in its operations upon the mind of the Association?—I cannot state that; I have heard both the principles frequently put forward.

Have they any objection to the plan and principle of the London Hibernian Society?—I do not think we ever inquired particularly into the regulations of the Hibernian Society.

Have they any objection to the plan and principle of the Kildare-street Society?—I think that the majority of the committee of schools thought there was not a fairness of proceeding on the part of the superintendents of schools that received aid from our society and from the Kildare-street Society also.

What do you mean by a want of fairness?—We state to the public that our masters must be members of the established church; the Kildare-street Society state, that there is to be nothing fixed as to the religion of the masters; we conceived that any applicant who came to us, and stated that his schoolmaster was a member of the established church, as fulfilling one of the conditions for obtaining our aid; and also went to the Kildare-street Society for aid, and stated there that there was nothing fixed upon that subject, that such applicant was not acting with fairness; the answer given in some instances when we enquired upon the point was this, we stated to you only that our master is a member of the established church, and we know we relinquish your aid as soon as he ceases to be so.

Did you ever hear of any other objection to the principle of the plan of the Kildare-street Society?—There is none occurs to me at present.

Did you ever hear it objected, that it was not sufficiently religious?—That has never been made an objection on the part of our Society.

Or that it excluded the catechism during school hours?—No; nor would that have necessarily formed an objection, because in some of our schools that course was recommended.

Do you think there was any feeling of dislike or jealousy, at the circumstance of the Kildare-street inspectors examining your schools?—No, certainly not.

You would have preferred it?—Our committee would have preferred that their schools should be inspected as much as possible.

Has it ever been in contemplation to adopt any general system of inspection?—Yes, it has been mentioned, but the Society dreaded the expense of a permanent inspector; in the instance of Mr. Lee, two other societies contributed to the expense.

Did you ever hear it mentioned, that there was such a system of permanent inspection in the Kildare-street Society?—The members of the committee of schools are aware of that.

Was it ever suggested among them that they might avail themselves of the assistance of those inspectors upon very cheap terms?—That has not been suggested.

Do the half-yearly reports by the superintendent tend to show whether the school is in connection with other societies, or not?—If the reports contain the whole truth, they will state that; for we require them to state every source of aid or income that comes to the master, and from whatever quarter.

Do you know whether Sunday schools are held in your school rooms?—I believe in many there are.

Has any objection ever been expressed or felt to it?—No, never; they have considered it entirely without their province, they have not expressed any objection or any opinion one way or another.

Up to what periods are your half-yearly returns made up?—The 31st of March and the 30th of September.

Could you inform this board, by reference to the reports up to the 31st of March and the 30th of September last, how many and which of your schools were at those respective periods receiving aid from any other society?—Yes, I can; so far as the returns state it.

[The witness was directed to furnish such information.]

Has it ever occurred that a book, after having received the sanction of the Society, and been inserted in their lists, and exposed to sale under their regulations, has subsequently been expunged from the list?—I recollect an instance.

Was there only one?—I recollect but one instance.

What book was that?—It was a work called "Adams' Pastoral Advice before Confirmation." The present Archbishop of Dublin when Bishop of Raphoe, brought it to be reconsidered by the Association.

Could you, without much trouble, inform the board whether there were any similar instances?—I could.

[The witness was directed to furnish such information.]

Examination of the Rev. Dr. C. R. Elrington, on Oath; Saturday, 22d January 1825.

Rev. Dr.
C. R. Elrington,
22 Jan. 1825.

YOU are a fellow of Trinity College Dublin, and vicar of St. Marks?—I am.

We believe that you have given particular attention to the conduct of the business of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I have, for the last seven or eight years particularly.

413
Rev. Dr.
C. R. Elrington,
22 Jan. 1825.

Have you generally attended upon the committees of the Society?—As often as I could; they sometimes interfere with college hours, but as often as I could I have.

Will you be so good as to state the principles of the Society with respect to the schools; what are the rules they impose upon every school in connexion with them?—The schoolmaster must be a Protestant of the church of England. It must be under the superintendence of the clergyman of the parish. No catechism must be taught in the school except the catechism of the church of England, and that is not to be taught until the children of the different persuasions are removed from the school.* No other must be taught, and the New Testament must be read in the school by the higher class. I am not aware of any other rules.

Are children of other persuasions than the established church required to read the New Testament?—Yes; there is no distinction made in that.

The New Testament is read before that separation takes place you have adverted to?—Yes; that separation generally takes place on Saturday.

Do you understand that the Scriptures are to be used every day in the week as a reading book?—I cannot say that; they are read in the course of the week by either the highest or the two highest classes, so that it shall not be a mere school book; they must learn to read first.

Is it your impression, that a portion of each day is set apart for the reading of the Scriptures by the two senior classes, or that they are read twice or three times a week?—I never belonged to the committee of schools of the Association, but I have visited several of the schools; the general practice was that it was read every day.

You have said that those schools are to be under the superintendence of the clergyman; will you be so good as to explain what degree of superintendence you consider the clergy are called upon to exercise over the schools?—The Association look to him for all the reports upon the school; in any complaint about the school it is to him they refer.

Do you conceive it is understood between the Association and the clergyman, that he is to visit it once a week or once a month, or once a quarter, or that there is any rule upon the point?—There is no limit upon the point; he is to visit so as to make his returns, which guide the Association in giving the salary.

Would he visit it sufficiently, if he visited it only once in half a year to give the certificate?—No, certainly not; he could not sign the certificate if he only did that. Have you seen the certificate?

We have; but we have reason to believe that in very many instances the writing of the certificate is the work of the schoolmaster, and that the signature is the only work of the clergyman, and that leads us to wish to ascertain from you what sort of inspection the clergyman is expected to give?—It is very hard to limit a man to days or times; I should conceive he should frequently visit the school in the course of the half year.

Is the clergyman, in point of fact, the person that recommends the schoolmaster to each school?—The schoolmasters are frequently appointed by the clergyman of the parish. When application is made to them the Association do send down schoolmasters, and they have a book kept for the purpose, in which names and qualifications of candidates are entered.

You have said no catechism but the church catechism is allowed; are we to understand there are no explanations allowed?—Yes, certainly there are.

Enumerate any that are used in the schools of the Association?—The general one used in the schools of the Association is Mann's, and the catechism broken into short questions; those are the catechisms used in the examinations for which the catechetical premiums are given.

Is Stopford's catechism or Crossman's recommended or allowed?—They are on the list of books.

Are they used in the Society's schools in point of fact?—I rather think they are not; I have attended several examinations, and it was always Mann's and the catechism broken into short questions.

Would it be possible for a child, who had learnt the church catechism and been instructed in the Scriptures, to attend and answer successfully, upon the examination, supposing he had never read Mann's catechism?—That is a question I really do not feel myself competent to answer, never having been engaged in instructing children to prepare them for that examination.

Have you ever attended the general catechetical examinations in St. Mary's church, which are upon a much more extended scale, we understand, than in any other part of Ireland?—Yes, I have.

Can

* Association, Capel Street,

Sir,

January 27, 1825.

On referring to the books here I find that there is a mistake in my evidence which I think it right to communicate to the Commissioners of Enquiry. I confounded the practice in the schools I had visited with the law. There is no order of the Association to remove the children of different persuasions before instruction in the catechism commences. The practice has been adopted by the clergymen superintending the schools, in order to remove charges of attempt at proselyting, and has been countenanced by the Association, but there is no standing order on the subject. There is a printed notice posted up in every school of the diocese of Leighlin and Ferns, giving such an order to the clergy, but it is on the authority of the Bishop, not of the Association.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(signed) C. R. Elrington.

To the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Enquiry.

Examination of
Rev. Dr.
C. R. Elrington,
22 Jan. 1825.

Can you offer any opinion as to the necessity of a child's learning Mann's catechism to acquit himself in a proper manner in St. Mary's church?—I should think the child who did not would labour under very considerable disadvantages.

You have said that the children of other religious persuasions than the Protestant are permitted to withdraw before the commencement of the catechetical examination on the day appointed for that purpose, are we to understand that that observation includes the Presbyterians?—Yes, certainly.

Is it your opinion that, in the north of Ireland (where the Presbyterians are very numerous), the Presbyterian children do in fact withdraw before the catechism of the church of England is brought forward?—I never heard a suspicion that the children of dissenters were compelled to listen to the explanation of the church catechism; such conduct would be inconsistent with the views of the Association. I know, in several instances, that they do by their own request, and have got premiums at the examinations; nay, there have been instances of Roman Catholic children coming to the examination and getting premiums.

Is any explanation given to the children when they are reading the New Testament of what they are reading; does the master put any questions to the children upon the subject?—I suppose he does; but he is strictly limited as to the nature of those questions; the limitation is that all subjects of controversy are to be excluded.

Is he allowed to give a spiritual explanation as contra-distinguished from mere grammatical explanations, about which there may be no dispute?—I should think he might.

It is the master of course who teaches the church catechism and Mann's catechism?—Yes; generally with the assistance of the clergyman of the parish.

Do you mean in the school, on the day set apart for it, or in the church?—Both in general; the master may prepare the boys for him; the clergyman of the parish comes generally one day in the week and hears them the catechism, in addition to the Sunday that is appointed by the Association for the certificate of attendance.

Do you conceive it to be what we should call a general habit; of course there must be exceptions for the clergy who have schools connected with the Association to attend on the day of catechism in the school, and themselves instruct in the catechism?—Yes, they do it most frequently; the master is supposed to prepare the children for them.

At what time does he prepare them?—On the same day I should think; but the Association give no precise directions upon the point, they leave it to the discretion of the clergyman, limiting him only on the grand questions.

Our wish is to collect from you as to what is the general practice, rather than the precise rule: we are aware that the rules of the Association are not precise upon certain points, and the better for not being so perhaps; is it your impression that those clergymen, who have schools connected with the Association, do, either universally or generally, hold catechetical examinations in their churches on the Sunday, of the children in their schools?—Universally.

Do you conceive it at present to be a universal or almost universal practice of the clergy of Ireland, who have not schools connected with the Association, to hold similar catechetical examinations in the church on Sunday?—I believe it to be universal; it is very frequently, in many parts of the country in Ireland, given up for the five months in winter; but when the children can come I believe it to be universal.

The Commissioners have never had any doubt it was a very general practice, but we wish to be particularly informed whether you conceive there are any considerable number of exceptions?—I should think not.

Do you believe that such catechetical examinations are in general attended by almost all the Protestant children of the peasantry, within any convenient distance of the church?—They are very anxious to attend.

In point of fact, what do you conceive to be the usual time given up for such catechetical examination?—Various, in various places; most usually before the morning service; there is very generally in Ireland a Sunday school; it depends upon matter of convenience whether the school is held before the service and the catechism after, or whether the catechism is taught before the service and the school after.

Are the Sunday schools you allude to held in the church?—Not usually.

Who in general are the teachers in those Sunday schools, what class of persons?—It varies according to the nature of the parish; in some parishes they are exclusively taught by the higher orders, in others they are obliged to go lower where there are none of the higher orders.

Are such schools under the superintendence of the clergy, or do the clergy in fact assist in them?—There is one in almost every parish under the direction of the clergy; there are some that are not.

In general, is it your impression there is such a Sunday school that has the countenance of the clergymen of the established church in each parish in the province of Ulster?—Since I became a member of the Association, I know very little of the province of Ulster; I have only been an occasional visitor in it; I know it to be the case in Leinster to a great extent; I do not know a parish in the diocese of Leighlin and Ferns that there is not.

Do you not think this practice must have one very beneficial effect among others, that of bringing the higher and lower classes together, in an intercourse of affection and good will?—Yes, the greatest possible; the children are as proud as possible of the higher orders coming and hearing their classes.

Have you ever had occasion to observe, whether much practical good feeling has been the result of that communication?—I think so.

We should be very glad to have your opinion, as to how far it is generally desirable or otherwise, otherwise, that the schoolmaster of the Association school should be the same individual who holds the office of parish clerk?—It is very generally advantageous, that he should, because the funds of the Association allow them to give so small a sum to their masters, that they are only, by joining it with the parish clerk, able to get men qualified as they would wish to superintend the schools.

What do you conceive may be the ordinary profits of a parish clerk, as a parish clerk?—In some parishes, as low as 5*l.* a year, in none in the country parishes higher than 15*l.*

In towns, such as Limerick or Waterford, what may it go to?—There it depends upon much the same as the country.

Then you consider about 10*l.* as the probable average?—Yes, and a high average.

The salary is about 10*l.* or 12*l.* that the Association gives?—Yes, from 12*l.* downwards.

In addition to that salary, is there not a certain income arising from the payments of the scholars?—That is very uncertain.

The Association does not require that the education shall be gratuitous?—No, they do not in all cases; they will allow the master to receive payment.

Do you think that the persons who at present are usually parish clerks, are in general qualified to act as schoolmasters?—Certainly not; but I think that class of persons has been very much improved by the recent practice of sending out the same person as clerk and schoolmaster.

State any circumstances that in your judgment have tended to improve the description and quality of parish clerks and schoolmasters such as we have at present, contrasted with those that were general in Ireland ten or twenty years ago?—I should think it arises from the education of the lower orders being better than it was ten or twelve years ago; there have been also several attempts made to establish schools in which the schoolmasters should be taught.

One of those attempts was made at Kildemo?—It was.

The Commissioners have heard rather different opinions as to the success of that experiment; they would be very glad for the expression of yours?—The suppression of Kildemo took place before I became an active member of the Association; but I know of some very good schoolmasters that were sent out from that place.

Did you know of any individuals who did not turn out well that have been educated there?—I really do not recollect any.

The Commissioners have had occasion to observe, that several of the schools of the Association have become connected with other societies, and some with the society for promoting the education of the poor of Ireland, commonly called The Kildare-place Society, and some with the London Hibernian Society, and some with Erasmus Smith's trustees, they would beg of you to state what your impression is as to the principle of those different unions of your schools?—I do not know that they are connected with Erasmus Smith's trustees.

Perhaps only in a few instances?—I think the connection wrong.

Even with Erasmus Smith's trustees?—Yes; I did not know that any did, but I proposed in the Association myself in the last six months, that no school should receive aid from the Association in union with the Kildare-place Society, upon the ground that it was the same school receiving aid from two government Funds.

Do you disapprove of the schools of the Association receiving aid from the fund, called the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—No, I do not.

Is it not equally a school receiving aid from two sources?—No; because the Association have not, since they found the Lord Lieutenant's commission in operation, given aid for building; the answer is constantly to applications, get money from the government fund for building a school, and we will give you a salary.

It is the principle of receiving annual assistance that you object to?—Yes; and that the certificate for the two societies must be different, in our case the master must be of the church of England, and in the other he may be either; therefore the school that receives aid from the Kildare-place Society, cannot comply fully with the requisites of the Association.

Is there any other circumstance in the Kildare-place plan of education, except the possibility of the schoolmaster being of any religious persuasion, that induces you to object to the union of your schools with that society?—Not that I am aware of; that was the ground of my motion in the Association, and I think it was carried that they should not.

Are you not aware that it is the rule of the Kildare-place Society, that the catechism shall not be taught in the school during school hours?—Yes.

Do you conceive that that rule is compatible or incompatible with the rules of the Association?—In a certain degree compatible, because if children of certain persuasions are dismissed, the school is dismissed, the ground of my objection to the same school deriving aid from two societies, was simply that I thought it wrong the same school should appear on the lists of two different societies; and then my attention was turned to the different qualifications of the master required by the Association and the Kildare-place Society.

Then if there was not an incompatibility, should you dislike the union with the Kildare-place Society, it being obvious it would be attended with some advantages, namely, additional inspection and additional check, and allowance of books and other matters that must be desirable in any school?—I should have very carefully read over all the regulations of the Kildare-place Society, before I could answer that question.

Have you an objection to the union of your schools with the London Hibernian Society?—I know very little about them; I fancy there is the same objection as in the Kildare-place Society, the religious denomination of the master is indifferent.

Examination of
Rev. Dr.
C. R. Elrington,
22 Jan. 1825.

You are not acquainted, either with the plan of the London Hibernian Society, or the manner in which their schools are worked?—No, I was never in one of them.

What do you conceive to be about the number of the Association schools, at present?—Upwards of 250.

It seems to us obvious, that whether we consider the actual number of schools, or the very slow rate of progress at which they have advanced of latter years, the Association can hardly propose to itself to become the instrument of supplying any general plan of education for the whole of Ireland; what is your opinion of the extent at which they aim, in that work?—Their limit is the parliamentary grant; the applications for schools are numerous indeed.

Do you conceive, if the parliamentary grant was to be increased ten fold, you could increase your schools in an equal proportion?—I do.

Do you think it would be desirable you should be able to increase your schools almost indefinitely, or within such limits as would be able to supply education to the whole population of Ireland?—Yes; so far as they could be kept under the regulations of the established church.

Would it be desirable to allow half a dozen schools to be under the superintendence of one clergyman, or would you say there should be one school to one clergyman?—One clergyman could attend to more than one school.

Would you think it desirable to have more than one Association school in one parish?—Yes; I have seen the good effects of it myself.

Would you like to see half a dozen of them in one parish?—That would depend upon circumstances; I know a parish which has four in it, under the superintendence of the clergyman.

Do you think the principles of the Association are such as would make their schools a convenient or popular instrument for educating the poor of Ireland?—I think they are more popular with the Roman Catholics than either the Kildare-place schools, or the Hibernian Society's schools.

Are we to understand that it is the general feeling of the Association to wish to procure an extension of its grant from Parliament, for the purpose of pursuing those desirable objects?—Certainly.

Did they not, in point of fact, last year ask for a less sum by 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* than in the preceding year?—Yes, because they undertook that no sum would be granted to them except what was actually necessary to carry on the existing engagements.

Have you any means of knowing whether there was not a perfect disposition on the part of the government to have given them a sum as large as that which they had the year preceding, if they had had a disposition to take it?—No; it was their feeling that the government wished for nothing to be applied for except what was necessary, and it was followed by an application for an increase of the grant in consequence of the training school, and that was refused. In 1822, the Association sent in their estimate, and applied for 9,500*l.* and an answer came from government, that no greater sum than 7,000*l.* Irish, would be recommended by them to Parliament; measures of economy were thus forced upon the Association. The measures they adopted, produced a greater diminution of expenditure than was contemplated, and they accordingly took off some of the restrictions, as I have mentioned; but still they conceived themselves bound by the communication with government, not to ask for more than was absolutely necessary to carry on their present restricted system; and hence the small sum that was asked for this year.

The Commissioners observe, that in the year 1821, the expenditure of the Society was 9,206*l.*; that in the year 1822, it was diminished to 7,026*l.*; and in the year 1823, it was further diminished to 5,966*l.*; is there any general reason which you can give for that progressive reduction?—Yes; the aid for building schoolhouses has been absolutely withdrawn, and the salaries of the masters have been reduced from 15*l.* to 12*l.* and 10*l.*

Your reductions have taken place in the building department, and in the salaries?—Yes.

Is it your impression, you have equally diminished that portion of your expenditure which relates to the distribution of the Scriptures, and other books?—There was, in consequence of the failure of the funds of the Association, a rise made by the Association in the price of the Bibles, and of course a diminution of the circulation of them; but that they found so prejudicial, they determined at all risks again to diminish the price as much as they had at first, in order to increase the circulation.

At what time did they come to the last resolution you have spoken of?—I do not immediately recollect.

Was it in 1824 or 1823, they came to that resolution?—I am not sure.

The facts collected by the Commissioners are these; that in the year 1821, the Association were the means of distributing 22,735 Testaments; that in the year 1822, there was a diminution of that number to 7,586 only; and that in the year 1823, even that reduced amount was further reduced to 3,219 only; the diminution in the sale of Bibles, Prayer books, and other religious books, appears to have been pretty nearly in the same proportions. Are we to understand, that you attribute that progressive diminution to the cause you have stated, and merely to that cause, namely, the increased price of those books?—Yes; and the limit imposed upon each member of not distributing more than three times the amount of his subscription,

Is it not your own impression, that such a result, in whatever manner occasioned, is very much to be lamented?—I think so.

It is a diminution in short, of nearly six-sevenths, as would appear upon that statement?—Yes.

Do you not further feel, that it would be very desirable to get rid of any rules, whatever they may have been, that have occasioned it?—Certainly.

Are you aware whether the facts now suggested to you by these questions have ever been considered in that light by the persons conducting the Association?—Yes, certainly; it was the result of long continued discussion, the imposing of those limitations; they were found absolutely necessary; if it had gone on on the average of the consumption of Bibles by the members of the present day, the reduction upon the Bibles and Prayer Books alone, would have amounted to more than the parliamentary grant.

Is it your opinion, that if the 7,000*l.* or 8,000*l.* which forms the amount of the income of the Association, from its different sources, was doubled, there would be means taken on the part of the Association to expend the whole of the sum placed at their disposal, in giving effect to its objects?—Certainly.

Do you think they would feel any difficulty as to the means of expending profitably such increased sum?—No, none whatever.

They would contrive to dispose of any sum placed at their disposal?—Yes.

Is it your opinion, that if there was an addition to their annual income, they would expend it in increasing the number of their schools, or in restoring the circulation of their religious books, at least to its former amount, or to one considerably greater?—I should think in increasing the number of their schools.

Do you think they would increase the number of their schools, and be content to leave the circulation of their books at the present diminished amount; or would they in the first instance, secure the restoration of their book circulation to its first amount, and then apply the surplus to schools?—The first thing would be to take the limit off the members; that has been particularly inconvenient.

Is it your impression they would, in addition to that, restore the former cheapness of their books?—That is restored in the Bibles, Testaments, and Prayer books.

Is it as to the religious books?—No, it is not; the others remain at the higher rate; it is not so necessary to reduce them lower.

Without descending to particulars, which is it your impression, that the Hibernian Bible Society, or the Society for discountenancing Vice, is at this moment the most effective instrument for distributing the Scriptures, speaking of no other object of the Society for discountenancing Vice?—I do not know the number distributed by the Hibernian Bible Society; I understand generally their circulation is diminished, but I know nothing of the particulars.

You are not aware how the comparison would stand for five or ten years past, as to the mere number of the Holy Scriptures circulated?—There have been a great many more circulated by the Hibernian Bible Society than by the Association.

Does not it occur to you, that whatever the regulations are that succeed in circulating any given number of the Scriptures through the Bible Society, might, if adopted, mutatis mutandis, by the Association, enable them to become the instruments of an equal degree of good?—Yes; but the number of the members of the Association is so much smaller than in the Bible Society, the work of individuals in it must be much greater.

There are about 1,800 members of the Association, and it may perhaps be doubted whether there are so many members of the Hibernian Bible Society; but supposing the number of the latter even greater, surely the Association has the aid of public funds, which the Bible Society has not; therefore it occurs to us to enquire how the fact is—by which of the two systems the greatest quantity of the Scriptures do get into circulation?—That can be ascertained by numbers—I do not know.

The Commissioners understand, that in the course of the year 1822, some regulations were adopted by the Association, for diminishing the profits of their bookseller?—Yes.

Describe the nature of those regulations?—I could not.

Did you take that regulation into consideration at the time it was adopted?—I did, and I remember it being laid before the committee of accounts.

Had you laid before you at that time, a fair statement of what proportion of the funds of the Society had in the preceding year gone into the hands of your bookseller?—I think not.

Was the matter investigated by the Society?—As far as it could be; but the matter was involved in considerable difficulty in consequence of Mr. Watson's death; they had a general idea of its being too great.

Can you speak as to any conception of the amount of those profits that may have been in the minds of the committee?—No, except that it was too great.

Have you any doubt that the representatives of Mr. Watson threw difficulty in the way of your coming at more precise knowledge upon that subject?—I do not know that.

Do you think they could have ascertained it if they had been so disposed?—The accounts had been very badly kept.

Who are the successors of Mr. Watson?—The widow, and now the son, who is grown up.

At what time did Mr. Watson die?—Five or six years ago.

Prior to 1820?—Yes, he did.

Do you think Mrs. Watson could have any very serious difficulties in ascertaining the amount

Examination of
Rev. Dr.
C. R. Elrington,

amount of her own profits during the years 1820 and 1821, to say nothing of any profits that might have accrued during her husband's life?—I should think not.

Did the committee press her upon that point?—Yes.

And they did not succeed in making out her profits in those years?—Not accurately I believe.

We believe it was the principle of the Society antecedently to the late changes in 1822, to allow to Mrs. Watson the usual retail sale price of the books upon this principle, that the Association should defray one proportion of that sum, and the purchaser the other?—Yes.

It appears, that the sales during the year 1821 amounted in value to 7,426 l. 9 s. 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. received by Mrs. Watson, that of that amount the proportion paid by the Society was no less than 4,808 l. 1 s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; can you inform us from such knowledge as you probably possess of the principles that regulate the trade of a bookseller, what proportion of the 7,426 l. was profit to Mrs. Watson?—I believe the ordinary profit of a bookseller to be 25 per cent, I have heard so.

Are the Prayer books and Mrs. Trimmer's Lessons included in the books used by the Society?—Yes.

The rule at present seems to be, to oblige Mrs. Watson to satisfy the committee as to the sums really paid to the booksellers and publishers for the works; to account for the whole of the sale price, and be allowed twenty per cent upon the amount, that is the rule of 1822?—Yes, I believe it is.

The Commissioners would wish for your opinion, as to whether the allowance of even 20 per cent upon a transaction of so large an amount as £.7,426, would not be rather an unreasonable share of the public money to devote to your bookseller, it being in fact upwards of £. 14,00 per annum?—I always thought the profits of the bookseller too high.

We would beg of you to state, whether you conceive the superintendence of the clergy of the schools of the Association, is so effective as not to make it desirable that you should have some additional plan of inspection to be executed by other individuals than the clergy themselves; suppose, for instance, some particular officers appointed for the express purpose of going round to all the schools at stated periods, and making you reports?—That was often debated in the Association, and the impression was, that it was not worth the expense; in 1822, I know a plan was adopted of getting the bishops to appoint three or four or five clergymen, to report to them the state of the schools in the districts that were not their own; that I remember being carried into effect in 1822 in Limerick; I remember attending some of the enquiries myself; the Commissioners are aware, that the Association did so at one time by Mr. Lee.

Are there any circumstances connected with the Association, that you conceive it might be desirable, for the benefit of the Association or the public, to state to the Board?—No; I know the Commissioners have examined Mr. Wilson at full length, and he is more acquainted with the details of it than I am; the only subject I wish to direct your attention to would be, to inquire whether I am correct in the fact I stated here, that among the Roman Catholics there is less objection to the schools of the Association than to the schools of other Societies.

Has any instance occurred in the Association in which a Roman Catholic has been appointed schoolmaster?—No.

Nor a Presbyterian?—Yes.

Do you think with regard to a Presbyterian teacher, otherwise qualified to offer himself, that the circumstance of his religion would be an objection, or otherwise?—I rather think by the regulations he must be a church of England man, and he must teach the catechism.

Could your Association in a very extreme case, entrust the teaching of the catechism of the established church in the hands of a Presbyterian?—In an extreme case, I should think they could.

It appears by the return to the Commissioners, that in the parish of Connor, which furnishes the episcopal title to one of our prelates, there is one Protestant child of the established church, and 517 Presbyterian children now in the course of education; supposing a parochial school to be established in that parish, connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice, would you think it reasonable that the master should be a Presbyterian or a member of the established church?—I was not at all aware of the fact, I think the regulations of the Association might be made such as to meet that extreme case, but taking the regulations as they are at present, he ought to be a church of England man.

Supposing no regulations to exist, and putting the matter to you upon the general grounds of reason and expedience, not forgetting your character of a member of the church of England, should you consider it upon the whole proper, that the master in that extreme case should be a Presbyterian, always supposing he was a Presbyterian of perfectly unobjectionable character?—That militates with the superintendence by the clergyman of the church of England,—he would not submit to the superintendence of the clergyman of the church of England.

Supposing the clergyman of the church of England should have free access to the school at all times, and that it should be not merely open to him, but be his duty to superintend the education of the single Protestant child in that school, and that he was further to be at liberty, if he thought proper, to see that the Presbyterian master observed any rules it might be fit to observe as to the Presbyterian children, why should not that be sufficient to satisfy the Association, at the same time that it would not excite any jealousy on the part part of the Presbyterians?—I should think in that extreme case, the rules might be accommodated to it, but in another extreme case I should say no to it, namely, if there were 517 Roman Catholics and one Protestant, I do not think the Association could undertake the superintendence of a Roman Catholic master.

You have stated it was your impression, that the schools of the Association were less unpopular among the Roman Catholics than either the Kildare-street schools, or the schools of the London Hibernian Society, we would beg of you to explain from what causes you think that proceeds?—I think it has proceeded from the Roman Catholics imagining that the compact of not attempting to proselyte, has been more faithfully kept in the Association schools than the others; and from another reason, that with all the Roman Catholic's dislike to the clergymen of the established church, they have more respect for them than for those who do not belong to the establishment.

Do you mean that it is your impression, that they have more objection to Presbyterians than to members of the establishment?—The Roman Catholics certainly have a greater objection to Presbyterians than to members of the established church; but that was not the meaning of my former answer; I meant to say, that they preferred the superintendence of the clergyman of the church of England, to that of any other persons not of their own religion; the fact that they attach respect to the members of the church of England can be proved directly; I know Roman Catholic servants will attend family prayers where a clergyman of the church of England reads the prayers; but if he should be absent, and a lay member of the family should read them, they will not come.

Appendix, N° 177.

Extract from the Examination of The Venerable the Archdeacon of Dublin;
 Thursday, 6th January 1825.

The Archdeacon of Dublin,
 6 Jan. 1825.

YOU are a member of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I am.

Have you been so long?—I should think I have been a member 16 or 17 years.

Have you been able to pay much attention to the objects of that Society?—For the first eight or nine years I was at a distant part of the country, and not in the way of attending it, but latterly I have occasionally attended the Association.

Are not the schools that are maintained by the Association principally in intimate connection with the established church?—They are.

Are they not most of them parish schools, meaning by parish schools, such as receive contribution from the minister of the parish under the Act of Henry the Eighth?—Some of them are; I dare say I have five or six parish schools, and I do not know any of them that receives aid from the Association, except one.

The question rather went to invert the order of consideration, whether, although there may be many parish schools that are not connected with the Association, it is not likely that most of the schools that are connected with the Association are also parish schools?—I think it is likely that they are so, but I have not ascertained that it is the case—in a distant part of my parish I have no aid from the Association; in the archdeaconry of Dublin there are either four or five parish schools, they receive aid from the Association only in one.

In many of the schools under the Association, the parish clerk is the schoolmaster; is it desired by the Association that that arrangement should take place, or is it merely accidental?—Merely accidental, I believe; it is at the discretion of the parish minister, and I should think that there are very few parish ministers that would not permit it; I think the duties might be very well performed by one person; the parish clerk is seldom called upon, but on Sunday; if it was in towns, that would be impossible, for instance, in my parish of St. Peter it would be so.

If it was an object to provide a system of general education in this country, do you think the parish clerk would be a desirable schoolmaster, or whether a person so closely connected with the established church would not be more an object of jealousy on the part of the Roman Catholics than a layman disconnected with the church?—I think some time ago, six, eight, or ten years ago, a parish clerk was as popular a man in the parish as any man with all parties; that is not the case now, but I do hope it may be the case again.

On what do you found that hope?—I hope a great deal of the present excitement will cease; I think, after the present year, when the lower people are in expectation that a certain revolution will take place, (I am in possession of most positive information upon the subject,) that when that subsides, they will see their disappointment, and give up their hopes.

Do you think the Bible societies will relax in their endeavours to circulate the Bible?—I think they will be forced to do it.

Do you think the Roman Catholic priests will diminish in their resistance to the efforts of those persons who wish to circulate the Bible, and spread the principles of the Reformation, there being a society bearing that name?—I have been in the church thirty-four years, and during the first part of my ministry there was no sort of objection made by the Roman Catholics to read the Testament and the Bible; they read it in the north of Ireland, where I was then; they never made the slightest objection to it, nor did their priesthood.

To what do you attribute the change?—Political feelings, and the excitement of the idea that they are likely to get possession of the country, as they allege they had it before.

Do you think it is not connected with any view towards the danger their religion would be exposed to if the Bible was to be put into their hands, attended with such comment and explanation on the part of the persons who gave it, which might counteract the instruction they gave their children in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic religion?—Yes, it may be that too; but I think the political feeling has been the great cause of the present activity, and also their increase of numbers.

Examination of

Do you know whether the Association requires that every school shall be under the special direction of the clergyman of the parish?—I think it does.

Does it require that the church catechism should be taught in the school?—Yes, it does, to all of the Protestant religion.

Do you know that it is the rule of the Kildare-place Society, that no catechism shall be taught in the school?—Yes.

Those two rules being severally obligatory upon the schools supported by the societies, can you explain to us how the same schools can receive aid and support from both societies at the same time, and yet say they comply with the rules of both?—I cannot say; I have no connection with the Kildare-place Society myself, nor have any of my schools; I would not have the management or superintendence of any school in which the Protestant catechism was not taught to the Protestant children of the school; I would not interfere with persons of other creeds, but with my own I should make it a sine qua non.

Would you give assistance or countenance to any school in which a Roman Catholic was the master, suppose it was a school established in the midst of a Roman Catholic population?—A Roman Catholic could not be master of a parish school.

The question alluded to any school?—Yes, certainly, I would assist every one.

Would you, in your private capacity, object to support or countenance a school in which the Roman Catholic catechism was taught to the Roman Catholic children, as well as the Protestant catechism to Protestant children?—No, certainly not; on the contrary, though I should doubt whether I was authorized to give such directions, yet I would approve of both parties being taught their separate catechisms.

And you have contributed towards some of the Roman Catholic schools in Dublin?—Yes, I would give any assistance or aid; I would give assistance in any way I could to education; I think it is the duty of every parish minister and man to further every sort of education in this country, though it may not come up to his ideas of propriety.

You would wish to have the Roman Catholics Protestants if you could?—No doubt of it.

But you think it better, being Roman Catholics, they should be educated, than not at all?—No doubt of it; the very first schools I visited, in the town of Rathfarnham, were the Nunnery schools, and I trust they received my visit as gratefully as the visits of their own people; I have met with every attention from them wherever I have been in my parish; I educated a certain number of them myself at Narraghmore; it is not always we can get that number, but they are not taught the church catechism, but their own.

Do you know the rule of the Kildare-place Society, with respect to the reading of the Scriptures, that no explanation whatever should be given, and no note or comment?—So far as I am individually concerned, I do not like to connect myself with any society or any people who would place me under rules; I do not allow it in my own parish—where I am sworn to keep a school, I ought to have the direction of it, and though I cannot give as much emolument to my master or mistress, I would rather have it under my care, and my object would be to have the Scriptures taught with note and comment, with proper explanation, and let the other people be educated as the Kildare-place Society order, if they like to enter their schools.

Do you entertain any doubt that the children receiving religious instruction would have a much more serious impression upon their minds if they read the Scriptures under such circumstances, as would enable them to receive fuller explanation and comment upon them, than if they were left alone to interpret them as they could?—My idea is, that it makes a much deeper impression upon them, and a much more faithful one, when explained by persons qualified.

Do you not think that religious instruction given to persons under those circumstances, would be much more likely to keep them steady to the established church, and prevent them from enlisting themselves among the numerous bands of dissenters found in the country, than if they were merely taught to read the Scriptures, and interpret them as they could?—Yes, that is the rule by which I go, that being my opinion.

Do you entertain any doubt, that in the present state of this country, it is extremely desirable to educate children of all persuasions in the same schools, if such education can possibly be given in a form that should be acceptable?—I should think it might be desirable, but very difficult to accomplish.

Do you not think that separate education, as well in general instruction as in religious doctrines, would necessarily tend to widen the existing breach among the inhabitants of this country?—I think not; I think, if the Protestant was properly educated and taught, and made a true christian, I do not think that person will ever be a very bigoted man; at present, it would be as well to let the political feeling subside a little, and then try this mode; I think it is more for the peace of the country they should be kept separate and apart; I think hereafter, if the Roman Catholics extend their education enough, that that sort of feeling will be done away very much by both parties.

In giving religious instruction to Protestant children, do you think it is desirable they should be taught any thing likely to bring into hatred and contempt persons of different religious persuasions?—I do not know; I do not say as to hatred or contempt. I would not excite one or the other, but I would enforce my doctrines by drawing comparisons as strong as I could draw, but not with an idea of exciting any unchristian feeling.

Would

481
 Examination of
 The Archdeacon of Dublin,
 6 Jan. 1825.

Would you think it so desirable to instruct the children in the religious doctrines of the church of England, as to bring to their minds very strongly that which, as Protestants, we hold to be the errors of a different church?—I think it is impossible to explain the Scriptures without doing so to them; I think, wherever the doctrines of the Scriptures bear upon our own doctrines, it is necessary to explain them; and, where you think it is misconstrued by others, you must explain to what these misconstructions lead.

Suppose the church of England was the only one in the world, and that therefore it would be impossible to illustrate the doctrines of the Protestant church in comparison with any other, in what way would you think it desirable that religious instruction should be given?—By shewing that that church comes as nearly as possible to the apostolical church.

Would it be possible in that case to give instruction by comparison?—No, certainly not, if there was no other existing; but when we know, on the part of others, there is great activity to make as many persons of their own way of thinking as possible, it is necessary to guard against such conversions.

Do you think it is necessary to guard against that, to give what may be called a controversial education?—I fear it is.

In any of the schools that are regulated according to your directions, to what extent do you carry the religious education of the children and the study of the Scriptures, and to what extent do you occupy them in general?—In general on Saturday; and, where there is a Sunday school, Saturday and Sunday are almost entirely devoted to religious education. They read the prayers that are read in the morning, according to the rules of the school; and the portion of Scripture read in the day is more examined into on those days than controversial education.

If a child in the course of the week read one chapter in the New Testament, and that chapter was only explained to it on one day, on a proper occasion in the course of the week by a competent person, would you think that sufficient to provide for the religious instruction of the child?—No.

To what extent would you carry it?—According to the age of the child; the child should be instructed in the catechism, and the explanation of it.

The question was confined to the study of the Scriptures only, always assuming that a proper catechetical instruction was given in addition?—In general it is the practice of my curates to explain the collects of the week, and the epistle and gospel; and very probably the higher classes of those lectured in the church, before service or afterwards, their attentions are directed to the lessons of the day, and they are partly explained.

Do you prefer that mode of Scripture study to the consecutive reading of the Gospel?—No; in the schools the consecutive reading forms no part of the instruction. We should prefer a partial reading; it is better selected by our church; and there may be portions of the Scriptures not so easily understood. Those read in the church are selected by the heads of the church and the fathers; we think it is better they should understand what they are supposed to hear in public every day.

You have stated you consider some parts of the Scriptures not so clear as others; do you apply that to any portion of the gospels, or is it to the epistles?—No, the epistles.

Is there any portion of the four gospels you think it desirable for the children not to read, on account of the difficulty of understanding them?—No; in some parts the references are more difficult, but they should read them.

Do you apply the same observations to the Acts of the Apostles?—Yes.

If, from the difficulty of making selections, it was necessary to decide whether the children in the school were to read all the epistles or none, in what way would you decide, supposing the children were come to an age to understand the common meaning of what they read?—Certainly; all, rather than none.

Can you state, if you were to make selections, what you would decide upon putting before the children, and what you would reserve?—No, not immediately.

Could you give any general statement?—I would generally instruct them in St. Paul's epistles. I would then certainly shew the effect that the Gospel had upon the different states that existed in the world before the establishment of christianity, and the feeling of the different writers upon that subject. I would give them the entire epistles rather than none, but I cannot exactly state the particular parts I would enforce.

Are you aware that, according to the rules of the Society for discountenancing Vice, that one chapter, the 13th chapter of the First Epistle of the Corinthians, is selected?—No, I am not.

Would you think it desirable to confine it to that one chapter if a selection were made?—No, certainly not. At present our habit is to carry it on every Tuesday in my church; we have the children from the different schools, and different apprentices. Two hundred are collected perhaps; they are divided into several classes, and attended by the different clergymen attached to them, and instructed in the general view of the Scriptures by the different clergymen; and there are some people who attend who are rather advanced in scriptural knowledge.

Are you acquainted with a little work that contains selections from the Scriptures, put together by Mrs. Trimmer?—I am.

Is that a book desirable to put into the hands of children?—I think it is.

Provided the children are made acquainted with the volume of the Scriptures, and that they receive the mass of their instructions from that volume itself, and therefore are prevented from any mistake of what the real volume of the Scriptures is, do you see any objection to the use of extracts in the school?—No, I think they are very necessary; that they ought to be put into the hands of the younger children in that form at first.

Do you think that a Harmony of the Gospels, in which the transactions occurring in the life of our Saviour are put consecutively, is better for the use of children than the four Gospels themselves?—Yes; I think a young person is much more likely to recollect them.

Have you ever observed that the children are much struck with the differences in the account of the same event given in the four Gospels?—Yes.

Is it often embarrassing to their minds before they can comprehend that; it is the necessary result of different persons giving an account of the same transaction?—Yes, that is a part of the labour of the clergy to explain why such is the case; therefore, I think in the first instance, the extracts and a short compendium is better before their minds come forward to maturity, and can retain any explanation that may be given to them.

If you could choose, would you prefer putting the New Testament itself, or any volume of extracts accompanied by notes, assuming that they were such notes as you considered desirable, would you prefer using it with notes?—I would first put into the hands of the children those small extracts; and, to shew that those extracts were proper, I would allow them to read the chapter out of the Scriptures, to shew where the weight of authority was derived, and also to encourage them to go on; and, having got some instruction from those books, I would conceive they were advanced in knowledge in a certain degree; I would allow them the use of the Testament now and then, and let them read the part most intelligible to them.

Have you ever observed that considerable difficulty arises in the schools in which the Protestant and Roman Catholic children are mixed, from persons of different persuasions, using different translations of the Scriptures?—No, I do not; there may be some difference of opinion about it, but I never knew an objection till lately on the part of the Roman Catholics to receive our version.

Your experience has generally been, that the Roman Catholic children were satisfied to read from the authorized version?—They were certainly.

If it was insisted upon by the clergymen, who had the care of the religious instruction of their flocks, that they should be instructed in none but the Douay version, would you think that to be an insurmountable objection to permitting the children of Protestants reading in the same class with themselves?—I would not think it any objection; the Protestants having their own version; I am afraid the objection would be made by others, I am afraid if there were such classes at present, it would be objected to by the Roman Catholic priests.

Do you think that the Douay version is sufficiently accurate to prevent its being objectionable to a Protestant child to read it, provided it had the opportunity of reading the authorized version in its own religious instruction?—I should not permit a Protestant child to read it, till he was able to form an opinion of the doctrines contained—there are some very strong distinctions between the two; I think it would be contrary to my duty to permit it—I know there are some clergymen who think otherwise.

Are the points upon which the two versions essentially differ very numerous?—I think not; they differ certainly, but not essentially.

In arranging extracts from the Scriptures, or a harmony of the gospels for general study in a school, in which it is assumed, that the children of both persuasions are mixed; do you see any objection to the formation of such collection upon the principle recognized in the work that has been circulated by the Kildare-place Society, namely, the omitting the parts that were most controverted, and of mixing the two versions, so that in point of fact it did not strictly conform with either, provided it appeared that such work had not any thing obnoxious to or inconsistent with the doctrines of the Protestant church?—I think it would be very hard to make such a selection.

You know there is such a selection in existence?—Yes; but it does not follow I should approve of it; I have but one opinion of the Protestant version, that it is the best, and as such I would make no compromise with my own people.

Whether you applied it to the selections or the Testament?—Yes; I have not joined with those gentlemen, who are very anxious to disseminate the Douay Testament, and to permit it to be read among our own people; I am most anxious to give them the book I conceive to be right myself; I do not think they are justified in giving the Douay to their own flock.

Do you go so far as to think, that the principle upon which that book is founded, is inadmissible as a principle?—As a principle I would not with my own people give them any thing that would not give them the very best information of the truth; with them I would make no compromise.

Assuming that the priests of the Roman Catholic church, would hold for their church a similar doctrine, would not a strict adherence to that doctrine by both clergy, prevent the possibility of the children ever reading out of the Testament, or extracts from it together?—There is a difference between permitting their reading it and teaching it in your schools; I do not think you could prevent any people in our schools from reading the Douay version; I dare say the greater part of them do from curiosity, but I would not teach it in my school, nor permit it to be a reading book by the Protestant youth.

And that whether selections or the Testament itself?—Yes, either one or the other; I feel so confident in the matter, I conceive it to be inconsistent with the doctrines of the established church.

Do you disapprove of Mrs. Trimmer's History of the New Testament?—I do not.

Do you know that she has departed from the language of the New Testament in some instances, instances, and adopted her own?—Yes, I know she has, and I do not think she should have done so, but I consider her selections the best that can be had.

Assuming that the selections were so taken, as in no instance to controvert in the slightest degree the doctrines of the established church, and that they were so made also as not in the slightest degree to vary the real meaning of the authorized version, would it be admissible to form selections, upon the principle of deviating in some instances from the text of the authorized version, and admitting the text of any other translation?—I think it would be very difficult to accomplish what is now asked; I should think, if it was possible, it might be desirable; I doubt the possibility of it; I think that any thing that could possibly be devised to spread abroad the knowledge of scriptural truth should be done.

Would you consider it an objection to a compilation of that nature, if some passages you might consider essential to the object of the work were to be omitted, as well as some translation of it that you conceived to be erroneous?—I would not, if a portion was to be omitted, because the person giving the instruction should refer to the original.

Do you think the schools of the Association, being as they are necessarily in close connection with the established church, although they do admit a certain number of Roman Catholics within their walls, are likely to afford general instruction to the inhabitants of this country?—I think they are very useful to a certain extent; I do not think it can be supposed, they will give that general utility to the great mass of the people you could hope for.

Who are the persons preparing any plan for establishing an institution for the instruction of schoolmasters in the Foundling Hospital, supported by the Association for discountenancing Vice?—We have only just got it at this moment into operation; it is scarcely in operation; but the committee was Mr. Pomeroy, Mr. Magee, Mr. Russell, Mr. Foote, and myself; I have not been able to attend much to it; I rather declined being a member of both bodies.

Can you inform us at what age it is proposed the schoolmaster should be admitted?—I do not believe there is any specific age; I suppose it would be for the general improvement of parish clerks and schoolmasters, and improving the education of those men who may have been at an advanced age employed.

Would it then enter into the plan, that a person, suppose thirty years old, should be admissible to the institution?—For a certain time I should be very glad if I had a parish schoolmaster or clerk to send him there, if he was thirty years of age.

Would you admit any person so young as eighteen?—I would; the objection that I have made to the young men at Santry is different here—I would take a man educated in society at large; I should think him a fitter person to be employed at twenty-one than a person at twenty-five not so educated.

What is your opinion of the average length of time that those persons should continue in the Foundling Hospital?—A great deal would depend upon their acquirements before they came there.

What do you conceive would be the longest time, the shortest, or the medium time?—I should think they might be very well prepared for it in two years, and I think a person might be very much improved by coming there and staying there one year.

About what number is it proposed should be in the institution at a time?—I am not certain that that is ascertained; we have had a good number of applications, I think it is not quite regulated; I forget what the rooms will hold, they are now finished; the number is not filled up, that they originally intended to receive; what it was I do not particularly remember.

By whom is it proposed the candidates should be recommended?—By the clergy, or any persons.

Would you receive a schoolmaster to train, if he was not to be appointed to a parochial school under the direction of the clergy, but to a school under a lay patron?—I should think so.

Are they to pay any thing, or is their education to be entirely gratuitous?—Gratuitous.

Is it intended to take under the direction of the Association, the education of the children in the school in which the masters are themselves to be trained?—No, I think they are to get pupils from the establishment of the Foundling Hospital, and to have a school of their own.

In that school are we to understand that the Association are to direct the machinery of the education, and not the governors of the Foundling Hospital?—I fancy it is to be the conjoint opinion of both; they are so united that there are very few of the governors of the Foundling Hospital that are not members of the Association.

Are you a member of the Foundling Hospital?—I am one of the board of the Foundling Hospital; any arrangements I have taken a part in, have been as a governor of the Foundling Hospital.

Do you think the plan of instruction now pursued in the male schools of the Foundling Hospital, is such as could be applied in a profitable manner for the instruction of training masters?—No; but I think there might be a selection made from the children of the Foundling Hospital, put in there under the instruction of those men who are to practise upon them.

Do you conceive the mechanical plan of instruction now employed in the schools, under the direction of Mr. Flenley, is good or bad?—I think the skeleton of it is good; it is on Bell's system; the books in general are, I think, well selected, and I think the education is good.

Then are we to understand, that the masters are to be trained and taught to administer instruction in a similar manner?—I should suppose they were under Bell's system.

Do you conceive that Mr. Flenley's system of instruction is Bell's system of instruction?—

Examination of
The Archdeacon of Dublin,
6 Jan. 1825.

It ought to be Bell's system; we had him instructed for the purpose, but I do not think he has kept it up as correctly as he ought.

Who is to teach the candidate masters?—There is a master appointed, a clergyman, a man highly recommended to the Archbishop of Dublin, and by Doctor Murray, who has undergone a certain degree of education.

If it should happen that that individual should totally disapprove of the system of instruction pursued in the school of the Foundling Hospital, do you conceive he would be allowed to change the system?—Yes, on submitting his reasons to the committee of the Association, no doubt he would.

Do you understand, that Doctor Murray, the present chaplain, approves of that system of instruction?—I have heard him complain of Mr. Flenley.

Have you witnessed it for any considerable time at once; half an hour, or a quarter of an hour?—Not so much in the male schools as in the female; I think it is very much improved of late; but I go there as a governor, to superintend the interior of the institution; to see that the clothing and food are in proper order.

Do you think Mr. Flenley is a proper person to be continued the master of that school?—It is hard to give an opinion that would affect the bread of the personal man, but I should have no great opinion of Mr. Flenley's talents as a schoolmaster; his manner is not such as I would entirely approve of, although I do not think it is such as to injure the children; I have seen some children very well taught by him; he is not a person I would select as master if I had the choice, and that is the feeling of a great number of people connected with the place.

Is it proposed that those training masters should have an opportunity of witnessing any other instruction than one of a peculiarly religious nature?—I should suppose so, because the person selected to teach them has had a very general instruction.

Are the children selected from the Foundling Hospital to be taught any thing by the training masters but religious knowledge?—Yes, I suppose so.

Have they been taught any thing else as yet?—No, certainly not, the thing is yet in its infancy; the apartments were not prepared for them till very lately.

Do you think it would be desirable to establish an annual system of inspection of the schools connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—There has been some conversation on this subject; the Association are thinking of establishing a provincial inspection.

By the same persons who execute the parochial inspection?—No, by one person, not by persons; one person in each province, and I think it very likely that plan will be matured; as being a member of one of the committees it meets with my approbation.

What description of person is it contemplated should hold the office of provincial inspector?—I do not think it is at all settled; I only heard it mentioned this day.

It is understood, is it not, that the clergyman of the parish is habitually to be the inspector, and to report once or twice a year upon the state of the schools?—As far as every school is connected with the Protestant church, it is the duty of the clergyman to report the state of each school; he ought to be the master of the state of each school; I do not say that his report should exclusively be depended upon, but some other persons to counteract him, to see that he does his duty as well as others.

Do you not think that all local inspectors who live in the vicinity of the schools that they are to report upon, would be more likely to perform their duty considerately and efficiently, if they felt they were subject, at stated periods, to have their work reviewed by persons who might be strangers to them?—I think so; but I think a man appointed in each province must be acquainted with some; yet I think he would be sufficient for one inspection, and then it might be desirable to change them from province to province; I think if there was but a single inspector, the time it would take to go all round, and the notoriety of his being upon his travels, would excite a certain degree of preparation; the provincial inspectors could be upon the spot at once.

Is it your impression, that a person appointed for the province of Ulster for example, ought habitually to reside in that province, or in some other?—I think for that province he ought to be a native; I think a southern, unacquainted with the manners and customs of the northern, would be totally unfit to make a proper investigation.

Should you think a northern equally unfit to visit the province of Munster?—I would not, because the north has a great number of persons similar to Munster; but in Munster they have none of the sharp tolerably well educated Protestants of the same description, and I think there is a great degree of astuteness and industry and cleverness in the north.

Do you think it desirable, that the provincial inspectors should be clergymen?—I may carry my attachment to my own profession too far, but as far as I could, I would connect the education of the country with the clergy; I think it would be better to have the clergy inspectors; I think the clergyman has more ties over him; he is under the controul of his bishop; he ought to pay a great deal more attention to the consequences of character than other men; I do not say that other men do not pay equal attention to it.

Appendix, N° 178.

Examination of the Very Reverend Doctor Graves, Dean of Ardagh, and Professor of Divinity in the University of Dublin, on Oath; Tuesday 25th of January 1825.

YOU are honorary secretary to the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Yes.

How long have you held that situation?—I suppose not less than fifteen years; I do not remember exactly the time.

The Commissioners are already so well acquainted with the objects of the Society, they will not trouble you to recapitulate them; but they have noticed a remarkable diminution in the operations of the Society for the last three years, and they will be much obliged to you to account for it?—It can only be a general account.

We will direct your attention to a remarkable circumstance pointing that out. It appears that the expenditure of the Society for 1821, was 9,206*l.*; in the year 1822 it was reduced to 7,026*l.*; and in the year 1823, it was reduced to 5,966*l.*; and the Commissioners have understood, that in the last year, 1824, the Association sought for a Parliamentary grant more conformable to its present reduced scale of expenditure than to its former more extensive exertions, the amount of the present year's grant being understood to be in or about three or four thousand pounds less than it was in the year preceding?—As I recollect, when Mr. Grant was secretary, we received an intimation that the government did not wish that we should any further extend the grant for schools, and we suspended all applications for schools that were on our journals, and had it understood that we would receive no more; that cut off one considerable branch of our expenditure. We also applied for 9,500*l.* in the year that we expended the 9,200*l.* you speak of; and intimation was given us from Mr. Gregory that we should receive no more than about 7,000*l.* On that assurance we entered into resolutions for a committee to examine in what points we could diminish our expenditure, to meet this diminution of income; and we did diminish the quantity of books that each member was allowed to purchase for distribution, from being in price six times the amount of the subscription, to a considerably less sum.

The difficulty the Commissioners are under is, that it appears to them that the economical plans of the Society have greatly outrun any necessity that any disinclination on the part of government to extend their grant could have occasioned; for it appears admitted, that, though the government refused to give a grant of 9,500*l.* they were content to give a grant of 7,000*l.*; in addition to which there was the income arising from the ordinary subscriptions of the Association, which cannot be rated at less than 1,000*l.* a year. There was then an assured income of 8,000*l.* per annum still remaining. The Commissioners will be obliged to you to explain why it became necessary, in the year 1822, in such a state of things, to reduce the expenditure to 7,026*l.* and in the year 1823, to 5,966*l.* In 1824 they are not able to state the expenditure; but this seems to be understood, that the Association sought for 4,000*l.* less than the government were disposed to give?—I am ignorant of government having intimated that disposition; our grants for schools were suspended for a length of time, and the quantity of books that each member was to distribute was diminished, and we increased the prices of our books; for example, our Bibles; but I think the economy in all those various branches went further than we calculated upon. There was an idea among many of the members that we could not be too economical; that it would be grateful to the government we should diminish our expenses as much as possible; and I remonstrated against such great diminution of expenditure, but the majority was of a contrary opinion.

What is the present opinion of the majority of the Association; is it their wish to adhere to this very diminished scale of expense and usefulness, or revert to their former course?—It would be their anxious wish to return to the exertions they made, and increase their expenditure.

Is it not the plain result of what has taken place, to whatever causes attributed, that during the last three years there has been a very reduced and continually diminishing rate of usefulness in the institution?—I certainly think the great point on which we have saved money is in the increased price of books for distribution, and the diminished number of books distributed, each of which diminishes our expenditure.

The Commissioners, looking to this part of the case, find the facts to be, that in the year 1821 the number of Testaments, which the Association in various ways distributed, amounted to 22,735; that in 1822 they were reduced to 7,586, being only about one-third of the amount they had attained in the year 1821; and further, that in the year 1823, they were reduced to 3,219, being about one-seventh of what they had been the two years preceding. It appears that this excessive reduction at once of expenditure and usefulness was not called for by any necessity that was imposed by government upon the Association, because the legislature was actually granting them an income greatly exceeding what they were expending; so much exceeding it, that in the last year, 1824, the Association did not find it necessary to apply for the ordinary amount of the parliamentary grant. The question is, whether, upon the whole, it is your impression that the Association has been disposed to act as energetically during the last three or four years as during the three or four years preceding?—The expenditure of books has certainly not been so great; on the contrary, the members have been perhaps slower to take books, having to pay a high price for them, and they have also found fewer persons to take them. I do not know whether the application for books, which must be a limited number, having been more extendedly supplied, may have caused an alteration.

Examination of
Very Rev.
Dean Graves,

Examination of
Very Rev.
Dean Graves,
25 Jan. 1825.

The Commissioners do not come to that conclusion, seeing for a considerable series of years preceding 1821, the amount of books sold appears to have been tolerably steady; and, on the contrary, since that alteration was made in the system of the Association, it has been progressively diminishing in the manner stated; and you will further perceive that the reduction in the number of Bibles distributed, and Prayer books and other religious books, has been in at least the same proportion as has been stated with respect to Testaments; is it your opinion, there are any circumstances connected with the finances of the Association, that made this extensive reduction in the sphere of their operations a matter of necessity?—The impression upon my mind was, that we were a little afraid to engage ourselves to the full extent, for fear we might not get funds to go on with.

But surely you would not be afraid to expend your income?—No; I can say that there is one point of expenditure where our expenditure has been upon the increase, namely, the premiums for catechetical examinations. They have been extending to every part of the kingdom more and more; and, in my judgment, that was one of the best things the Association did.

Do you conceive that the scale of catechetical examination at present prevailing admits of being considerably extended?—Oh, yes; I do not know that we have in any instance refused it, or checked it in any way.

We are already sufficiently informed of the nature of those examinations not to trouble you in any considerable detail about them, but we wish for your opinion generally as to which are the proper catechisms to be used on those occasions?—Mann's has been generally used; and the explanation of the Church Catechism, and others. Lewis's Catechism, with Scripture proofs, I believe, and, at least, that was one of which I should be very fond.

You approve of Lewis's?—Yes, I do. Mann's has been in use a good deal; Stopford's has been used.

Do you approve of Stopford's?—I do not like it so well as Mann's or Lewis's.

For the purposes of those catechetical examinations of which we are speaking, is there much reference made to the Scriptures?—Yes; the children are much examined in the Scriptures.

Which are considered the most important in those examinations, the Scriptures or catechisms?—The Scriptures; the examination goes more into the Scriptures. A great deal more of time and attention is paid to the Scriptures than merely catechism, except for the very lowest classes.

Are you aware that the Association have pronounced Lewis's catechism to be a book unfit to be in their catalogue?—I do not now recollect that it was.

We observe a resolution of the book committee to that effect?—I did not now recollect it.

Are you a member of that committee?—Yes.

Have you been in the habit of attending it?—Not always.

How often in the course of the year do you attend it?—About once a month, or so.

How often does the book committee sit?—About once a month at least, not much oftener than that; the school committee is very constantly sitting.

Do they usually add so many as two or three books to their catalogue in each year?—I cannot say they do; to tell the truth, I think they have been at great difficulty in getting books to insert in the catalogues; there have been persons there who have had a great objection to books that had a sectarian tendency, or any thing very warm, or any thing strong; they wish them to be of a moderate character.

Is it not a fact, there are a great many good books that might be inserted in the catalogue, in addition to those of which the list at present consists; it does not appear to be a very extensive one?—I think so.

Are we to understand there is a degree of caution amounting to indisposition, to admit almost any other book into the list than those that stand upon it?—I think there has been more difficulty in that than was necessary; I have seen and recommended books that I thought might be usefully added to it, which the committee did not adopt.

So far as your observation goes, is that indisposition to admit books upon the catalogue, upon the score of their not being sufficiently moderate in religion, as you have stated, increasing or diminishing on the part of the book committee?—I think it is diminishing; there are some individuals that had great weight, and those most strenuous about it are rather removed from attendance, and not able to attend, from various circumstances. I think the committee are more disposed to admit books than they were.

Are we to understand it was on account of their warmth or their heterodoxy that the books were objected to?—They, I believe, considered them bordering upon sectarianism too much.

Suppose a book moderately warm, but still orthodox, would that book stand a good chance of being admitted?—Yes, it would, I think, at present.

Are the children who become entitled to catechetical premiums entitled to make choice of any books they think proper upon the Association list?—Yes, certainly.

Of any without exception?—I conceive so; I believe so.

The Commissioners have been informed by Mr. Watson, the bookseller, that there is one book in the cheapened list of the Association, and only one, which he is positively prohibited by a special order from giving out as a catechetical premium to any child; are you aware of this circumstance?—No.

Mr. Watson states that to be a book, one of the last that the Commissioners would have expected to be marked by such a distinction, namely, the Homilies of the church of England;

487
Examination of
Very Rev.
Dean Graves,

England; can you state any reason for that, now your attention is drawn to the subject?—I declare I did not know that book was interdicted.

How do you account for the Homilies not being among the premium books?—I could produce an individual of great weight who has objected to it.

We are to understand there is an individual of weight and influence in the book committee who objects to the circulation of the Homilies of the church of England?—There is.

May we inquire from you the grounds of his objection; any grounds he may have stated?—I believe one of the grounds of his objection was, that the Homilies gave the Apocrypha more importance than he seemed to think it ought to have; I remember that ground distinctly.

Do you remember any other ground?—There may have been other opinions of his about imputed righteousness, or something connected with it.

Did he or did he not consider them what is called Calvinistic?—He did.

Have you heard him use that expression?—Indeed I think I have.

The Commissioners have no right to express surprise at the opinions of any particular individual; but they would wish you to explain in what way he was able to influence the majority of the book committee?—The committee is a small number, and it is very seldom any book is put in where there is a decided objection to it.

Even if that book were the Homilies of the church of England; do not the clergymen of the church of England subscribe to the doctrines of the Homilies as well as the Articles of Religion?—Most undoubtedly.

Are we to understand, that it is the same committee which decides what works are heterodox and sectarian, that has marked, in the distinction before referred to, what we should consider the standard of the orthodoxy of the church of England?—I do not recollect the particulars of any debate upon that subject in the committee.

Is it your impression, that if the circumstance should become a matter of discussion at present among the proper authorities of the Association, that the Homilies of the church of England would be pronounced not a proper book to be distributed as a premium?—I cannot think it would; I have a decidedly contrary opinion.

Do you conceive yourself that any authority, be it what it may, or where it may, that pronounced the Homilies of the church of England unfit for any members of the church of England, is a proper authority to determine what other works may be of a heterodox or sectarian description, or too warm, as you have stated?—I consider, that any person offering that opinion committed a great error upon that; and I should disregard his judgment upon other things.

We believe it has devolved upon you, as secretary to the Association, to take the trouble of writing the reports of the Association?—Sometimes I have done it, not always.

The Commissioners are struck by a paragraph in the report of the Association in the year 1820, which is the last printed by the Association?—That report I wrote.

The paragraph in question may be found at pages 6 and 7 of the book, which you are requested to read, and to mention particularly what societies or associations were intended to be described in these words,—“In order to secure the steady pursuit of these objects, it was necessary to take the best precautions in their power, that the members hereafter to be admitted should be animated by a similar spirit; they could not therefore act like other institutions, pursuing only some fixed charitable object, and admitting indiscriminately all who would subscribe to that object, without seeking any other recommendation than their solvency; they, therefore, adopted the mode of admission by ballot, as the best mode of guarding against that fluctuation and inconsistency, to which a mixed and changing multitude, actuated by no fixed principle, is ever subject; they chose thus to prefer a moderate, and gradual, but safe and certain progress, to an immediate, but perhaps transient or dangerous popularity, and to strengthen themselves, by endeavouring to combine in their select phalanx piety and sincerity, intelligence and prudence, rather than incumber it by numbers without union, zeal without discretion, or wealth and rank without the moral qualifications necessary to ensure a well directed application of the influence they confer.”—[The Report was handed to Dr. Graves.]—I certainly do not recollect that I had, when I wrote that paragraph, any institutions in view, except those that wished merely to collect money, and apply it to one particular object.

Were there any institutions in your view that wished to collect money, and not to expend it?—Only those that were connected with charity.

Will you specify which institutions were in your view, when you wrote that paragraph to which your attention has been directed?—I cannot remember, even now, that I meant it against any particular Association, having an object different from and additional to the procuring money for the aid of charity.

Would you mention any associations to which that description would in your opinion have applied; would it not have applied, according to the tenor of the context, to all societies that did not make admission by ballot one of their fundamental rules?—I think it would.

Can you state about how many schools have been added to the list of the Association schools in the last few years?—No, I cannot.

Are you proceeding at the rate of adding four or five schools per annum to the list?—I should think a great many more than that.

[The witness was directed to furnish a list of the number of Schools in connection with the Association on the 5th of January each year respectively, during the last twenty years.]

Examination of
Very Rev.
Dean Graves,
 25 Jan 1825.

Are you aware of the intentions of the Association with respect to the new branch of their establishment, namely, the establishment of a seminary for training schoolmasters, to be held within the walls of the Foundling Hospital?—Yes.

Can you state to the Commissioners generally the nature of that plan?—We shall instruct in singing, and in the Scriptures, and in such branches of knowledge as will be most likely to attract the attention of the people, surveying land, knowing arithmetic very well, and even the elements of algebra, surveying particularly. We wish to have the children educated in all those things that would gain them confidence and respectability among the people, and that they should be qualified for instructing in the Scriptures.

Have you calculated the probable expense of that part of the establishment?—At present, the plan has not begun to operate, but thirty we limit ourselves to; I suppose the expense will not be less than at the rate of from thirty to forty pounds a piece.

Have you observed whether there has been as full and active attendance of the members of the different committees during the present year and the last year as there was three or four years ago?—I think there has been.

Is it your impression, that there is as much disposition on the part of the leading members of the Association to work its machinery with vigour and energy at present, as there was some years ago?—I do.

Do you think they are doing it?—Yes; and there is another branch of machinery that has begun to work, and will be going on working more effectually, that is, the diocesan committees, which is an addition to the plan of the Association.

Do you consider that the diocesan committees are extending themselves?—Yes, they have been extended to a number of dioceses in the last few years.

Is it your impression, that the funds of the diocesan committees are improving; that they have produced as much in 1824 as in 1823 or 1822?—I should think they have increased; the number of diocesan committees has increased.

If there should be an extension made of the parliamentary grant given to the Association, to which of their objects do you think it would principally be directed; whether to the extension of the number of the schools, or to the increasing the salaries of the schoolmasters, or to augmenting the distribution of Bibles, Testaments, Prayer-books and other religious books, or extending the catechetical examinations, or increasing the number of schoolmasters to be trained in the Foundling Hospital?—It will certainly be applied to increase the number of schools; when it is known we can certainly increase the number of schools, we shall receive, probably numerous applications; the catechetical examinations will be extended; and I know a great number of members of the Association felt great pain at the prices of our books being increased, so much as to check them. Among other things, we diminished the salaries given to the schoolmasters; it was 15*l.* and now it is no higher than 12*l.* I think there was a panic about the expenditure, about the schools particularly. We were afraid, if we pledged ourselves to the schools, there would be something unpleasant in giving them up; there was a great saving in diminishing the number of books the members might have.

Is it your feeling, that the allowances made by the Association to their bookseller, are too great, or moderate, or not sufficient?—The committee of accounts was the committee that had that particularly in observance, and they were very strict in examining it; they cut down the allowance as much as they could.

Do you know whether they have been successful in cutting down his profits in any other way than by diminishing the amount of their books distributed?—I think the bookseller gets less on a given number of books.

What should you consider a fair annual remuneration for your bookseller?—I do not now remember having heard the question debated.

Do you think, if it turned out that upwards of 1,000*l.* of the public money went to him as profit, that it would be too large a profit, or a moderate one?—I think it ought to be proportioned to the number of books that went through his hands. We do not give him, as I believe, any fixed salary, merely as being our bookseller.

Do you not think he ought to be satisfied with less profit upon large transactions than upon small ones?—Certainly.

Do you think he ought to have, in any state of things, so much as 2,000*l.* a year of the public money. In point of fact, he has had within a few pounds of it in the year 1821?—I do not think he ought to have any thing beyond a reasonable allowance for the quantity of books he sells; we pay him for the rooms, and he ought not to have any thing beyond a fair allowance.

Do you not think 2,000*l.* profit would be a greater share than belongs to such transactions?—I should, decidedly.

Is it understood as the meaning of your rules, that the catechism of the church of England shall be taught in your schools?—Yes, to all the Protestant children in our schools, but not to any who do not declare themselves Protestants.

Is that a rule applicable to all schools that receive any aid from your Association?—Yes.

Is it also the meaning of your rule, that the master or mistress should be in all cases a member of the established church?—Certainly.

Are you aware that some of your schools are in connexion with other associations or societies?—It had been for a length of time the rule strictly acted upon, that we gave no aid to schools that received aid from others; but I think that has been latterly relaxed; we do not require it so strictly. If we find a school wants books, and they shew they do, we do not require a compliance with that so strictly; but the rules for teaching the Protestant catechism, and and having the master and mistress members of the established church, have been always attended to.

They are considered indispensable?—Yes.

No aid of any sort would be granted, except those rules were observed?—Not as I recollect.

Are you aware, that by the rules of the Kildare-place Institution, it is indispensable that all persons, without reference to religion, shall be equally eligible to fill the office of master or mistress?—Yes, I understand that to be the case; I do not belong to that society.

And that it is also a fundamental rule of that association, that no catechism shall be taught in the school to any class of children?—Yes, I understand so.

Are you aware that some of your schools also receive aid from the Kildare-place Association?—Members may be aware of it privately; I have no distinct recollection of any such fact. The rule still continues with us, that we will not aid schools that are supported by other associations; but it has not been, as I believe, so minutely inquired into.

Do you not conceive, that where a school receives aid from both associations, the rules of those associations being directly at variance, a fraud must be practised upon one or other of those societies?—No; I think the Kildare-place Association says, that the master and mistress shall be eligible of any persuasion; but we would not, I believe, instantly withdraw our aid from our schools so long as we saw the master and mistress were Protestants, because they afterwards might receive aid from the Kildare-place Society.

Do you consider that that is an adherence to the spirit of either of the rules?—We give aid to those schools that have masters and mistresses Protestants, and that teach the church catechism; but we do not consider it to be necessary to be absolutely declared to us, that they would never elect any but a Protestant. We give aid to schools so long as we get a report, from proper inquiry, that the school is conducted in a way we approve of. We should not consider them conducted in that manner, if we found the master and mistress were not Protestants; we should conceive it a deviation from our principles and our rules.

How do you think the rules with respect to catechism, which appear conflicting, can be reconciled, the one association positively requiring catechism to be taught, and the other association positively prohibiting it?—We would not support any schools, where it was brought forward to us, that they did not teach the Protestant catechism.

If a school, in connexion with the Kildare-place Association, teaches the catechism, do you not conceive that that school practises a fraud upon the Kildare Association?—We do not give aid to schools that are declared to us as not teaching our books in it; the books taught are returned to us, and there must be the church catechism among them.

The question does not at all relate to the propriety of teaching the church catechism, but the impropriety of receiving aid from two associations, the rules of which, with respect to teaching the catechism, are directly opposed the one to the other?—The Association would not knowingly contribute to those who do not teach it.

If the Association be aware that a particular school receives aid from the Kildare-place Association, and notwithstanding gives that school aid, must not the Association by that act, place the master or mistress in the situation of violating the rules of one or other society?—I think it might, and ought therefore to be avoided.

Do not some of your queries desire information, as to the fact of whether the school, for which aid is requested, be, or is intended to be, in connexion with any other society?—We ask them, whether they do receive aid from any other society; I do not know that we asked that question lately; we have been less strict about that, knowing they were in a very poor state.

Is there any rule or principle of the Association that would go to exclude Presbyterian Protestants from being teachers of schools?—I do not remember the word Presbyterian used.

We understand you to state, that the master must necessarily be a member of the established church; but you do not mean thereby to state, that they would exclude Presbyterians?—I do not recollect any particular discussion about it.

In point of fact, are you aware whether there are not Presbyterian schoolmasters in the different schools?—There may be; but I do not know that there are.

The question is, whether the master or mistress is to be a member of the established church, do you conceive a Presbyterian could be stated to be a member of the established church?—I rather think that the Protestant church was the meaning; it never came to our knowledge that any masters of our schools were not members of the established church; it might be so, but it was a matter unknown to us.

Do you conceive, if a master was recommended, who was in other respects perfectly well qualified to teach in the school, but was of the body of Presbyterians, that that circumstance would, in the view of the Association, form an objection to his appointment, and be considered a disqualification?—For myself it would not. I cannot speak for others; it is a new case, and has not, as I remember, been brought under consideration. I do not know that that application has been made to us; I would certainly say myself, I would vote for him, but I cannot judge for others.

You are not aware of any case in which that objection has been stated and adhered to?—No.

But the rule, as laid down is, that he must be a member of the established church?—Yes.

Do you not conceive that the rule so laid down, might, in the north of Ireland, operate as a prevention of the establishment of schools in various counties?—I should think it might be injurious in its operation undoubtedly; and the difficulty of getting masters in all respects qualified, induced us to go to the expense of that place at Kildemo, and now to endeavour to form this training school at the Foundling Hospital.

Examination of
Very Rev.
Dean Graves,
25 Jan. 1825.

Appendix, N° 179.

Examination of the Reverend William Lee, on Oath; Thursday, 18th November 1824.

Examination of
Rev.
William Lee,
18 Nov. 1824.

CAN you call to mind the number of schools established under the society called, "The Association for discountenancing Vice," which were visited by you?—The number that came under my inspection was 104, as well as I can recollect.

Can you describe in general terms the state in which you found them?—I considered the Association schools in general the best conducted and the most efficient of any of those that came under my inspection; of course there are some exceptions.

Upon the whole, were they well attended?—I consider they were very well attended.

Were they in a proper state as to repair and cleanliness?—The observation I had occasion to make, as to the schools of Erasmus Smith, on the point of cleanliness, applied to these schools, but I consider the general management and superintendence better, and the appearance of the Association schools to be much more favourable than those of the others I visited, and the Association altogether I look upon as operating more good in this country than any other public establishment connected with education; it has less of display and exhibition, it is true, but I think it is silently working more good than any other public establishment in Ireland; the point upon which I found this general view of the Association, is not confined to their schools; I would extend it to their catechetical examinations, which I think the most valuable system for promoting the objects of religious instruction existing in this country.

Will you describe the course of their catechetical instruction?—It is confined to the church of England children; the practice is to have a public examination of those children in the parish church on a certain day in the year; this examination is generally attended and conducted by the adjacent clergy assisting the parish minister, and upon their certificate there is a premium given at the rate of one to six of the best answerers, and another premium in the same ratio for those children who have failed in the other premiums; the second premium is given for correct attendance at classical lectures for a certain period preceding; this certificate, when forwarded to Dublin, is immediately taken into consideration, and the premiums forwarded to the country.

Do the premiums consist of books?—Yes, proportioned in value to the class to which they are adjudged.

Are the premiums given with reference to answering from the catechism only, or with any general reference to instruction of any other kind?—With general reference to religious instruction; I do not consider it at all limited; it is understood no premium will be given to any child, however well it may have answered, if there be not satisfactory evidence as to its conduct; progress in religious instruction, combined with correct and proper conduct, for the preceding term, entitles to the premium; I have great satisfaction in stating a very interesting proof of the fact I am now laying before the Commissioners; I did not begin this system in the parish of which I am curate till last year; a very large number of children attended, seventy-five, I think, in my church, and I find, since then, the children have not only been more anxious to become well informed christians, but their parents have been infinitely more attentive to the public duties of religion than I ever knew before in the parish, and the congregation has considerably increased in consequence.

In what catechisms are the children examined in the schools under the Association?—The catechism of the church of England.

Are Mann's or Stopford's catechisms used, or the Protestant catechism?—I consider this is left entirely to the discretion of the minister; I never heard of the Protestant catechism, so called, being used in these schools; Mann's and Stopford's are used, certainly; my own practice is to use none of these forms, except the church catechism.

Are the examinations confined to the catechism, or connected also with the service of the church?—Strictly connected with the liturgy of the church of England.

Do the children learn prayers by heart?—Yes, they form part of the public examination, and certain portions of the liturgy are selected for that purpose.

Will you specify what portions?—The portions vary according to the class; the junior classes have less to get by heart than the elder; the first and second collects of the communion service, the general confession, the thanksgiving, and the second and third collects for morning and evening service; I do not immediately recollect any other.

Are the children forced to commit to memory any portion of the Scriptures?—I do not think they are to commit them to memory, but that they shall understand certain portions of them.

Do you happen to know what portions are selected for their particular study?—Mrs. Trimmer's Lessons from the Old Testament, the four Gospels, the Acts, the 13th chapter of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to Titus.

Do those studies occupy the whole time of the children, or do they read in any other books?—They do not occupy the whole time of the children; I look upon it, those are not their school books.

Do they read the Testament in the school as a class book in school hours?—That must vary in many cases, according to the discretion and views of the attending clergyman.

Is every school under the immediate superintendence of the clergyman?—Strictly so.

Are these schools generally considered parish schools, and does the clergyman contribute to them under the statute of Henry VIII?—I have generally found the clergy did contribute to them under that statute, and that they were deemed parochial schools.

Did you often find that the parish clerk was master of them?—In a very great majority of cases.

491
Examination of
Rev.
William Lee,
18 Nov. 1824.

In what manner was this system of instruction adapted to children who were not of the church of England?—I did not find that the Association system of instruction tended to exclude the Roman Catholic children, for I believe there has been no interference whatever with the religious tenets of Roman Catholic children.

If it was the rule of the school, that the catechism should be taught, and also that the liturgy should be taught, and also that very large portions of the Scriptures should be read, in what way was the instruction so managed as not to be unacceptable to the Roman Catholics and Presbyterians?—I beg leave to draw a line of distinction between the catechetical examinations and the mode of instruction pursued in the schools; the catechetical examinations may take place without including a single individual that has been attending the Association schools; they are for the examination of all the children in the parish belonging to the church of England.

Am I then to understand, that when you praise the system of catechetical instruction, you intend a system separate and independent of the instruction given in the schools of the Association?—Yes; I consider them separate branches of the system of education pursued by the Association.

Will you have the goodness to describe, as exactly as you can, the system of instruction pursued in the schools, and its application to all the descriptions of children that attend?—Children are taught to read and write; the books are usually provided by the children themselves, under the controul of the visiting clergyman, and the master of the school; there is no exclusive system of instruction observed in the schools.

Are any books provided at the expense of the Society?—I do not think there are; they are sold at very reduced prices by the Association to the members, the privilege of which the clergyman of the school avails himself of.

Are not the children in the school necessarily forced to provide a Testament and a Prayer book?—I do not consider they are forced to do so.

In what way can they acquire a knowledge of the liturgy and a knowledge of the Testament, which it appears they study for the purpose of qualifying themselves for catechetical examination in the church, if they have not necessarily access to the Testament and Prayer book?—I am afraid the two subjects to which my evidence refers are not kept sufficiently distinct in your mind; the catechetical examinations and the instruction in the school are perfectly distinct.

Do not the children study in the schools the subjects upon which they are examined in the church?—I do not consider they do; I consider the catechetical examinations bear reference specifically to the instruction communicated by the clergyman at his private catechetical lectures in the church.

Do the children learn the catechism in the school?—They do.

How do they obtain the book out of which they learn the catechism?—Supplied in some cases by themselves, and in others by the clergyman.

Is any catechism, except the catechism of the church of England, allowed to be taught in the schools?—I have found many schools in which the catechism of the church of Rome was taught.

According to the regulations of the Society is it allowed?—I conceive the teaching of that catechism was not in accordance with the regulations of the Association.

Did you meet with any instance in which the catechism in use among the Presbyterians was taught?—I do not just now recollect, but in the north of Ireland I have very little doubt that it is taught.

Did you find many pupils in the schools who were not of the church of England?—Yes.

Can you state in what manner the Catholics are taught in these schools?—They are taught to read and write and cypher.

Do you happen to know if they remain in the schools when the Protestant catechism is taught to the children of the church of England?—I believe they do in many schools.

Did you understand that at that time they went on with some other study, or did they merely stand still in a separate part of the room?—It appeared that they were taught both catechisms in some schools indiscriminately.

Did you find any instance in which a house had been erected partly at the expense of the Society which had been afterwards abandoned, and in which no school was kept?—I do; I recollect a very strong case in the county of Sligo, I think there was no school kept there in connection with the Association, but there was a school in connection with the Baptist society there; that was at Kilmactigue.

Who was the superintending clergyman of that school?—A Mr. Neligan.

Is that the same Mr. Neligan who published a book in which he stated himself to have converted fifty persons to the church of England?—I believe it is the same.

To what purpose was the building applied?—The upper part of it had been let to a poor family whom I met there.

By whom was it let?—By the master, as I was informed.

To what purpose was the lower part applied?—The lower part was let to a teacher under the Baptist society.

Did you find any attendance at the school?—There was none, nor had there been for the last three weeks, I was given to understand.

Is that school regularly visited by the inspector of the Baptist society?—I was informed it was.

Examination of
Rev.
William Lee,
18 Nov. 1824.

What happened on occasion of his visits?—I was told when his visit was expected, that the master took care to collect a full attendance in order to pass muster before him.

From whom did you derive your information?—From the master himself.

Is Kilmactigue the only place at which you found no school at all?—Howth was another place where there was no school.

Do you remember Moortown?—The name is familiar to me.

In what state did you find the school there?—It was suspended, and the house locked up from December to April; the master resigned his situation, and Mr. Pendleton, who took a lively interest in the school, had undertaken to furnish a successor.

In what state did you find the school at Kilglass?—The master was absent, there were no scholars, and the master's wife could give no information about it. I enquired of a Mrs. Jessop, who lives in the neighbourhood, who said the schoolmaster had obtained Mr. Jessop's leave to go from the school; the master was the parish clerk.

Can you call to mind whether you subsequently learnt that any school was usually kept there?—I do not recollect any subsequent information upon the subject.

In what state was the school at Croneban?—I considered it in a state of great neglect.

Who superintended the school?—Mr. Oувerrind.

Who was the master?—James Moorhead.

Had the master any other occupation than that of schoolmaster?—Several.

What were they?—Assay master and clerk of a copper mine, and a permanent serjeant of a yeomanry corps, occupations which I conceive detached him altogether from his appropriate duties as schoolmaster.

Had he appointed a deputy?—His wife represented herself as teaching the children in his absence.

Did you ascertain whether he was paid the full salary?—I have no reason to doubt he was.

Did you visit the school at Ballymachugh?—I did.

Did you find that school in a satisfactory state?—A very satisfactory state.

Was the room in which the school was held, ever applied to any other purpose than that of a school-room?—I find upon reference to my report, that prayer meetings had occasionally been held in the school-room.

Is not such an application of the room a breach of the regulations of the Society?—I consider it is.

In what state did you find the school at Carlow?—The attendance was very considerable there.

What number of children did you find in attendance?—On the roll of the school I found 160 names.

What portion of them were Roman Catholics?—Sixty-five.

Did you ascertain the cause of so large an attendance?—I presume it was to be attributed to the wise regulations which had been adopted for its management.

Did you observe there was any difference between the regulations for the management of that school and others?—I perceive, by reference to the report, it states I attributed it to the wisdom of the regulations and the zealous care of its local guardians.

Was the Roman Catholic catechism taught in Carig school?—It was.

Was the school well attended?—Very well attended.

In what state did you find the school at Castleconnel?—I found the attendance very good.

How many Catholics were there?—Ninety-four Roman Catholics.

What number of Protestants?—Fifteen.

Was the Testament read in the school?—It does not appear that it was.

Would it, from the omission of the statement, be certain that it was not?—I found no Testament in the school.

Did the schoolmaster receive the whole of the salary?—He stated to me he received but half of the salary.

Did he state any reason for it?—I do not recollect that he did.

Did he state from whom he received that half?—He did not.

From whom, according to the practice of the Society, must he have received half?—From the minister of the parish.

Was any inquiry made into the fact in consequence of your report?—I am not aware.

Is there an annual payment to the school at Castlenock, over and above the allowance of the Association?—There is.

What is the amount, and whence does it arise?—The amount of a bequest of 10*l.* made by a gentleman to the Archbishop of Dublin, in trust for the use of that particular school.

Was the master of the school at Charlemont of the church of England?—He was a Presbyterian.

In what state was the school?—I found forty-nine children in attendance; the roll contained the names of eighty-one, six of whom were Roman Catholics. The school-house I had occasion to report as being exceedingly filthy.

What was the religious instruction of the children?—There is an hour each day appropriated to religious instruction.

Who was the superintendant of that school?—Mr. Oliver.

Did it appear that any person interfered with the religious instruction of the children?—It appears that a Mr. Nelson, whom I met in the village, objected to the introduction of any religious instruction in the school.

Does

Does it appear he was a clergyman?—No, I think not; I was referred to this gentleman by the master of the school for information on the subject.

Was the school at Clonfert a parochial school?—Yes.

Was that school much opposed by the priest?—It was opposed by the priest.

Does it appear for what reason?—I do not immediately know to what cause it is to be attributed.

Did it appear that the Roman Catholic clergyman had expressed a wish that the Roman Catholic catechism should be taught in the school?—It would appear that he had, and that the Archdeacon, who was the superintending clergyman, had consented to do so with a view to neutralize the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergyman, but proposed gradually to withdraw the use of it.

Did you find that the school-house at Derryvallen had ever been used as a place of divine worship by dissenters?—I found it had been applied to the use of Methodist preachers on two occasions.

Did you find that that school was in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—Yes, it was in connection with the Hibernian Society.

What did the pay boys pay who attended the school at Donoheny?—Two shillings and sixpence a quarter.

Was that charge so high as to discourage good attendance, or was it above the sum allowed to be charged by the Association?—I considered his charges somewhat too high.

Is the Roman Catholic catechism taught in Durrow?—It was.

Does it appear that there was a large attendance of Roman Catholics in consequence of that?—The majority of the children were Roman Catholics.

Was the school at Farmer's Bridge under the Association or not?—It was under the Association.

Did there exist any doubt upon that subject?—I have no reason to doubt it was under the Association.

Was a Roman Catholic usher appointed to teach in the school at Foghart?—I found a Roman Catholic usher in that school.

Were the children who attended chiefly Roman Catholics?—A very large majority of them were so.

State the proportions?—As fifty-six to sixty-two.

Were prayers from the church of England Liturgy taught to all the children?—They were.

Did the master at the school at Finglass receive a grant from the Association?—I find, upon reference to my report, he does not receive the Association grant.

Have you any means of knowing there was a sum of money given by the Association that ought to have been received?—The fact of my being sent there as visitor makes me conclude they did grant a salary.

Did you make any further inquiry about it?—Nothing more than making my return to the Association.

Did the master teach the children himself, or appoint a deputy at Galtrin?—It appeared to me he did his duty by deputy.

Who was his deputy?—A Roman Catholic master, to whom he yielded up the house and the profits of the school.

Did he pay him the whole salary he received from the Association?—He paid him 9*l.* a year.

What did you find with respect to the course of instruction in that school?—The Testament, religious tracts and spelling books were the general course of instruction in the school.

Was it known to the superintendant that the master appointed a deputy?—I had not an opportunity of conferring with the superintendants upon the subject.

Was the school-room at Glanworth applied to any other purpose than that of instructing children?—It does not appear that it was; it appears, by my report, the Methodists resorted to the house of the master, but did not preach in the school-room.

Was the master in the Methodist connection?—I cannot say he was.

Did the master of Glasnevin teach the children in person, or was his duty delegated to any other?—I have no reason to doubt he did attend the school correctly.

What system of catechetical instruction was pursued in that school?—The master and mistress taught the Protestant children their peculiar catechism, while some of the more advanced Roman Catholics taught theirs on Fridays.

What was the attendance of Roman Catholic children in that school?—Thirty-five out of fifty-one were Roman Catholics.

Was the school-room at Kilgobbin applied to any other purpose than for the instruction of children?—I am disposed to think it had occasionally been applied to accommodate Methodist preachers.

What induced you to believe that, and how was it a matter of uncertainty?—The master told me that such a thing was to occur on the following week.

In what state did you find the school at Killeade?—I found a pulpit in the school-room, which appeared to have been made use of by preachers upon various occasions.

In what room was the school at Kilmeadon held?—It was kept in the vestry-room in the church.

Had no allowance been made by the Association for building a school-room?—I am not aware.

Examination of
Rev.
William Lee,
18 Nov. 1824.

What catechisms were taught in the school?—The catechisms belonging to the respective communions that attended the school.

Were any Presbyterians in that school?—I do not think there were, it was in the county of Waterford where there are very few if any Presbyterians.

Was the school at Kilmore in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—It was.

Was the master of the church of England?—It does not appear.

What account did the master give of the school?—His answers were so very inconsistent that I was unable to form any decided opinion upon it.

Did he admit to you he was the master of the school?—He said at first that he was not the master of the school, and he subsequently told me he was the master of the school.

Did he say there was any other master than himself?—He said there were two masters of that school, but I believe he said so with a view to explain the gross inconsistency of his former statement.

Had you reason to believe he was the person who received the salary from the Association?—I believe he was the person who received it.

Did you ask him what system of instruction was pursued in the school?—I did.

What did he answer?—He said "the new system of Sir Erasmus Smith."

What number of children were present in the school?—I found on the roll the names of ninety-five children.

What number were present?—Forty-four.

Of the proportion of children on the roll, how many were Roman Catholics?—Sixty-five were Roman Catholics.

In what condition was the school-house?—It appears that besides the school-room, there is here a house for the master's use which house I found uninhabited and full of potatoes.

Was that particular room applied to any other use than the instruction of the children?—I find upon reference to my report that an Orange Lodge met there once a month.

What catechisms were taught in the school at Kilserry?—The catechisms of the churches of England and of Rome.

What was the attendance of the children, and what proportion were Roman Catholics?—It appears that of sixty-one children, nine were Roman Catholics.

Is the school at Kinsale a girls school, or for boys and girls?—It is a female school.

By whom was it superintended?—By Mr. Beamish and the governesses.

Was it opposed by the Roman Catholic priest?—It was opposed by the Roman Catholic clergy.

Does it appear for what reason?—It appears that a correspondence upon the subject of the school had commenced between the governesses and the Roman Catholic clergyman, the consequence of which was, that the latter caused his flock to be withdrawn from the school.

Did you find an efficient schoolmaster at Lismore?—I do not think the master was efficient.

Had the master any books?—There was an abundant supply of them in the school.

Were there any Testaments in the school?—I believe there were, there is no distinct report of it. Testaments are mentioned among the books in use in the school.

In what state did you find the school at Magheracluny?—I thought in a state by no means satisfactory; I found the school in a very slovenly condition, and considered it as very little above the level of the hedge schools of the lowest class.

Were there any Testaments in the school?—There was no copy of them in the school on the day of my visit.

Had you any reason to believe that an arrangement had been made by the existing master at Magheracross with his predecessor, with regard to the salary?—Upon reference to my report I have reason to believe that some such compromise was existing between them.

Did you ascertain the nature of it?—That the person whom I met in the school was to do the duty and receive the profits of the school, while the master who had lately resigned was to receive the Association salary without doing any duty.

Was the school-room at Mallow fitted up for the accommodation of a dissenting congregation?—Yes, it was.

Do you know by whom and on what occasion it was used for that purpose?—I was given to understand it had been occupied three times a week in that way by a Calvinist preacher.

Was the school at Maryborough much opposed by persons in the neighbourhood?—It was opposed by the priest of the parish.

On what account?—I presume on account of the use of the Scriptures.

Does it appear there was any other cause for the opposition given to it?—I do not know that any other cause was assigned.

Was it opposed by any other persons than the Roman Catholics?—I do not think it was.

Was it an efficient school?—I did not consider it so.

What catechisms were taught in the school at Magorban?—The catechisms of the churches of England and of Rome.

Did you find a good attendance at the school at Monkstown?—A very large attendance.

What proportion were Catholics and Protestants?—As 111 to 145.

Was that large attendance owing to any particular circumstances that you could ascertain?—To the attention and good conduct of the master and the vigilance of its local guardians.

Was the school-room at Newcastle in any way made use of except for teaching the children?

children?—It was used as a Methodist meeting-house by the permission of the superintending clergyman.

Was the Roman Catholic catechism taught in the school at Seaford?—It was.

Had you any conversation with the superintendant upon that subject?—I had.

What did he state to you upon it?—He told me it was his intention to give up the use of that catechism, and that he thought it would not tend to diminish the attendance, for that in his opinion the Roman Catholic clergy would prefer the total neglect of any religious instruction to that equivocal instruction they might derive from a Protestant teacher.

To what use was the school at Seepatrick applied occasionally?—The Presbyterian minister made use of it as a place of worship.

Have you any means of knowing whether that practice has continued since your visitation?—I have not.

Was the Testament read and the catechism generally taught in the school at Skull?—I observed something particular in the conduct of this school, and the master informed me that the few Roman Catholic children who attended, not only read the Scriptures, but learnt also by the desire of their parents, the catechism of the church of England; and another singularity I observe as to this school, that the priest has sent relatives of his own to it.

How many Roman Catholic children did you find there?—Seven out of 106 that were on the roll, but I found only two there.

There is a very considerable Protestant population in the parish of Skull?—Yes.

It is the most southern parish in Ireland?—No, I believe Bantry is more southern.

Who is the curate of the parish?—Mr. Jagoe.

Was there a church for the Protestant population you have spoken of to attend?—That subject did not come under my inquiry. I believe there was, I have no reason to doubt it.

Was Mr. Jagoe resident in the parish?—He was.

Do you know the rector of the parish?—No; Mr. Jagoe is considered one of the most efficient clergymen in the south of Ireland.

In what state was the school-room at Tentour or Killermo?—I found a pulpit in it.

By whom was that pulpit used?—I understood by the rector of the parish.

Was there any church in the parish?—I did not inquire, I took for granted there was; the fact of my noticing this confirms me in the opinion that there is a church in the parish, for if there was no authorized place of worship in the parish, it was very natural he should make use of the school.

Was it used by the Protestant clergyman?—Yes.

What could be the inducement to use it for that purpose, if he had a church in the parish?

—I had no reason to form any opinion as to his motives for so applying it.

How often was it used for the purposes of divine worship?—Three times a week as I was given to understand.

Did the school at Tralee appear to meet with any opposition?—It does appear to have been much opposed by dissenters of various descriptions.

Was it much opposed by the Roman Catholics?—I understand the Roman Catholic clergy did not oppose it in any shape.

What was the ground upon which the dissenters rested their opposition to the school?—Its connection with the established church I conceive would lead to that result.

Was it well attended by the children?—The number on the roll was 62, and the number present was 45; that number I did not think proportionate to the population of the town.

Were the children Catholics or Protestants?—Of the 62 upon the roll, 21 were Roman Catholics.

What do you conceive may be the relative numbers of the dissenters and members of the established church at Tralee?—I have no means of forming an opinion; I was informed the town was very much split into dissenting opinions.

Was the school-room at Tullacreen applied to any other purpose than that of teaching the children?—It had been made use of as a preaching house.

By whom?—By Methodist preachers.

What attendance of pupils did you find at that school?—Twenty-two I found in the school, and on the roll the names of 34.

Of what persuasions?—Two-thirds of them were Protestants.

Did they appear to be very poor children?—Exceedingly poor.

Is the school at Wherry in a satisfactory state?—I found it in a very satisfactory state.

What was the attendance?—On the list of the school there were 68 children, 64 of whom were Roman Catholics.

Did it appear that there was any particular cause for the numerous attendance of the Roman Catholic children?—I cannot trace any particular causes to which I can attribute it.

What description of school-house is provided at Cove?—A remarkably fine school-house.

Is it ever used for any other purpose than the instruction of children?—Upon reference to my report, I find it had been occasionally used as a ball room.

Were the profits of the ball applied to the maintenance of the school?—They were.

At whose expense was the house erected?—I cannot say; I presume it was aided by the Association in the usual manner.

Have you any reason to suppose that a larger amount than the customary 50*l.* was granted to this school?—No, I believe their grants are limited to 50*l.*

Did you visit a school at Ross, supported or assisted by a society called "The Friends of Education"?—I think, I did; I am sure I did.

Have you occasion to know, whether that school was in connection with the Kildare-street street Society?—I think it was not then; I am quite sure if it had been, that under the head of salary, I should have found some mention of it.

Examination of

Can you state, whether the church catechism was taught there as in other cases?—I find there is no church catechism made use of in the school, no religious instruction of any kind is permitted there.

What number of children were in the school?—I found 101 children in the school, and on the list 192, of which number 93 are Roman Catholics.

Were there any copies of the Testament in the school?—There were.

By "no religious instruction," do you mean there was no catechism taught?—Yes.

You have spoken in several instances of the schools of the Association being made use of by Methodists for the purposes of their worship; by the term "Methodist," do you mean those in connection with the Wesleyans?—At the time of my visit, the distinction was not so broad as it exists at present between persons of the Methodist connection; it was since then the great schism occurred between the two classes.

Will you define exactly what you mean by the term Methodist, in the answers you have given respecting these schools?—Persons belonging to that connection which is distinguished by the name of the Methodist connection, which term I conceive comprehends a great variety of religious opinions.

Do you conceive that the Independents can rank under that term?—I do not consider the Independents as Methodists.

Do you consider the Presbyterians Methodists?—No, certainly not.

Do you consider any persons as Methodists, except those who either now still continue in connection with the Wesleyans, or were once in connection with them, but have lately withdrawn from it?—When I used the term Methodist, I intended it to apply to both the classes you have mentioned.

Did you intend to apply it to any others?—The followers of Wesley and Whitfield; I intended to confine it to those two.

Do you consider the Baptists as Methodists?—No; I consider them as distinct dissenters from the church of England; the Methodists I do not consider as dissenters from the church of England.

Do you conceive that the term Methodist can apply to any person who is in communion with the church of England, who constantly receives her sacraments, who disapproves of the Wesleyan doctrines, and who believes in all the thirty-nine articles of the church of England?—The term Methodist has been exceedingly misapplied, and is frequently used in speaking of persons of a serious and religious turn of mind, but I certainly would not apply the phrase to the person defined in the question.

Then are we to understand, that you consider a belief in the Wesleyan doctrines essential to constitute a person a Methodist?—Certainly, I consider the doctrines of Wesley as the essence of methodism.

Then you conceive that the different preachers and masters to whom you have applied the term in the account given by you of those schools, all believe, more or less, in the peculiar doctrines of Wesley?—Yes, but some are included in that appellation who entertain the tenets of Whitfield.

Did you know at what hours the school-rooms were used for the purposes of divine worship?—I cannot say at what hours I did not enquire, but as soon as I ascertained the existence of this practice, I reported it to the board.

Did it interfere with the instruction of the children?—I believe not in any degree.

Was any thing paid for the school-room by those who used it for the purposes of preaching?—I am quite sure not, or I should have heard of it.

At what time did you give in the reports you made to the Association?—Immediately upon my visiting each school, I transmitted a report of its condition.

Had you ever any subsequent oral communication with the Association upon the subject of these schools?—I do not know that I had, either oral or written.

Have you any means of knowing what measures were adopted by the Association founded upon these Reports?—I have not been able to attend any meeting of the Association myself, consequently have had no means of judging what steps have been taken.

Have you understood that any steps were taken upon those reports or not?—From my view of the activity and attention of the Association to these schools; I have little doubt but every flagrant case of abuse which I reported, was immediately noticed and punished.

Have you any means or grounds for forming a general opinion, as to whether the state of the Association schools is better or worse than when you visited them?—My professional duties have confined me, since my functions as visitor ceased, to my parish entirely; I have no means of judging whether my visit has produced any beneficial result, though I confidently trust it has done so.

You spoke of a Calvinist preacher being in the school-room of Mallow, do you conceive that a Calvinist preacher is necessarily a Methodist?—The followers of Whitfield are all Calvinists I conceive.

Do you conceive that all Calvinists are followers of Whitfield?—Many persons put a Calvinistic interpretation upon the articles of the church of England.

Do you mean to use the words Calvinist and Methodist as synonymous, or as not being synonymous?—I look upon Calvinist and Methodist to be synonymous in common parlance.

Do you know whether the Independents are Calvinists or not?—I cannot say I have much acquaintance with the system of doctrines of the Independents, but my impression is, that they all hold the Calvinistic tenets.

Then

497
Examination of
Rev.
William Lee,
18 Nov. 1824.

Then do you consider them as Methodists or not?—I do not consider them Methodists, for although all the followers of Whitfield are Calvinists, I do not consider all Calvinists as followers of Whitfield.

Then do you consider the Independents as Calvinists?—I believe them to entertain Calvinistic tenets.

And you do not consider them as Methodists?—No, I should not designate them as such.

Do you consider the kirk of Scotland as Calvinistic or not?—I believe a schism has recently occurred in the kirk of Scotland.

Do you conceive that the members of either part of that schism are or not Calvinists?—Really in my retired sphere of life, I have had very little opportunity of judging in these matters as they stand at present.

But I presume you have studied the history of the Reformation sufficiently to apply some definite idea to the term Calvinism?—I believe the church of Scotland to be holders of the doctrines of Calvinism.

Do you, therefore, consider the established church of Scotland to entertain the Wesleyan opinions?—Wesley did not entertain the opinions of Calvinism, which I consider as of the essence of the church of Scotland.

Do you consider the church of Scotland and the members of it, to hold the same opinions that Wesley did?—Certainly not.

Do you consider that all the Presbyterians and dissenters from the established church of Scotland are Methodists, in your understanding of the term?—I do not consider them to be Methodists, I have mentioned already in my evidence that the phrase Methodist is used in a very vague and undefined sense, applied to all persons who entertain serious views of religion.

We are only desirous of being informed in what sense you have employed the term in the evidence you have given here to day?—I would confine the term to those who hold the tenets of John Wesley and Mr. Whitfield, and who meet in connection where those tenets are the point of union.

Do you conceive the tenets of Wesley to be at all Calvinistic?—On the contrary, the reverse; that was the great point upon which he and his friend Whitfield separated.

Then the term Methodist when applied to the followers of Wesley, means the reverse of Calvinistic?—I do not say so; there are two classes of Methodists, the followers of Wesley, and the followers of Whitfield, both are called Methodists.

I ask you what the term Methodist means when applied to a follower of Wesley?—A Wesleyan Methodist.

Then in that instance, does not it signify the reverse of a Calvinist?—There being two classes of Methodists, one holding the doctrines of Wesley, and the other the doctrines of Whitfield, it does not mean the reverse.

Will you give any definition of the term Methodist, that shall apply at once to the followers of Wesley and the followers of Whitfield?—This would lead me into too extended a view of the doctrines of both those teachers of religion.

You have spoken of the schoolmaster of Erasmus Smith's school at Newtown Barry, as being a Methodist, what reason had you to suppose him so?—At this distance of time I must conclude it was from local information derived upon the spot.

You have now before you the Report made on that occasion, was there any pulpit or desk to indicate a place of meeting for divine worship?—There was not.

By the term Methodist, as applied to that individual, you mean he was a Wesleyan?—It is quite impossible for me to recollect at this distance of time what his peculiar tenets were.

Are we to collect that you did mean he had tenets distinguished from the church of England?—I must repeat the same answer, that after five years it is impossible for me, as my report does not specify the grounds upon which I have called him such, to recollect what were those grounds.

Would you have applied that name to him if you had considered him to hold all the articles of the church of England, and none other?—I think I would; I think it is not an uncommon thing to see a person who holds those articles, but still in so close connection with the body of Methodists, as to be led to attend conventicles, and adopt other practices which I consider not perfectly regular for a master in the employment of a society in strict connection as this is with the established church.

On what account do you think the schoolmaster described there was particularly obnoxious to the Roman Catholics?—I conceive the more zealous Methodists are more obnoxious than any other class of persons to the Roman Catholics, because they hold in greater antipathy the doctrines and practices of the church of Rome, and the fact of the school being badly attended by Roman Catholics, leads me to think he was exceedingly zealous.

In your acceptation of the term Methodist, could you apply it with propriety to any of the beneficed clergy of the established church?—Certainly not.

That is, you do not consider any rector or curate of the established church as being a Methodist?—No, I do not, except in the vulgar acceptations of the word.

But not in your acceptation of it?—Not in mine, certainly.

Appendix, N° 180.

Examination of Mr. William Watson, on Oath; Monday, 24th January 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
William Watson,
24 Jan. 1825.

ARE you the bookseller of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—My mother is the bookseller at present; there has not been any appointment in my favour; I am in partnership with her, and have been since the beginning of the present year.

What is your age?—Twenty-one the next month.

Does Mrs. Watson herself look after the business of her house?—No, she never did, further than staying in the shop; she was not able to manage it.

Do you manage the shop business at present?—Yes.

How long have you done so?—For the last three years.

Who managed it before you?—Richard Beer, the principal clerk.

How long has he managed it?—Since the death of my father.

When was that?—In 1818.

Did your father manage it during his lifetime?—Yes.

How long was he manager?—From the commencement of the Society.

Your father, mother and yourself, have been for about 29 years booksellers to the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Yes, and my grandfather with them; my father was in partnership from the date of the Association till 1804, when my grandfather died.

Do the Association meet in your house?—Yes.

What accommodation do you afford them?—They have three rooms at present.

How often do they meet?—The meeting of the Association is weekly; the committees meet oftener.

Have they the exclusive possession of those rooms?—Yes.

How much do they pay you?—£.50 a year.

Is not that a very inadequate compensation for three rooms in Capel-street?—These rooms might produce a greater rent if offered to the public; but in consideration of the Institution having originated in the house, my mother was unwilling at the time to receive any rent.

Is it not extremely desirable for a bookseller to have such an Association as that in question, giving their countenance and protection to a shop; does not it necessarily induce a great many members of the Association, the clergy more especially, to deal with that house?—It undoubtedly is so; we have always found it so; the business is confined almost exclusively to divinity.

Have you a great demand from clergymen, and other members of the Association, at your shop?—There is a demand; I do not think it can be called a considerable demand.

Do you find, that those persons, members of the Association, buying books of the description we are referring to from other shops in preference to yours?—Yes, they do.

Can you account for that?—No, except that the business of the Association has been so extensive, and occupying so much time, that the manager has not been able to attend to the other business.

Do you mean, that the customers would find themselves more easily served at other houses than yours?—No, I do not think they would; but the managers of the business have not had the time to pay attention to the other parts of the business in the way of enticing custom.

What is the nature of the present arrangement with respect to your own profit, that subsists between your mother and the Association?—A fifth of the entire price of the books is allowed as profit.

In what manner do you supply yourself with the books necessary for the purpose of the Association?—Bibles, Prayer books and Testaments, we are obliged to order of the King's printer, principally in England and Scotland (the principal supply is from Scotland), and the tracts we principally print ourselves.

Are you printers?—No, we employ a printer.

Books, that are neither tracts, nor Bibles nor Testaments, where do you get them?—I mean by tracts, miscellaneous books and tracts.

The homilies of the church of England?—Those we print.

Are we to understand, that the miscellaneous books in the catalogue of the Association, that are neither tracts, Bibles, Testaments nor Prayer books, are printed by you?—Yes.

Did you print Mrs. Hannah Moore's tracts?—Yes.

Is Paley's Natural Theology printed by you?—No, it is ordered from the publisher in London; Gray's Key to the Old Testament is another book of that kind.

Is there any rule with respect to the price at which you are to retail those books?—No, there is not any made with the Association.

What is the sale price to you of Paley's Natural Theology from the publishers in London?—That is a question I cannot answer exactly.

Could you ascertain it?—I can; that is a book not on the list for distribution; it is only used as a catechetical premium, and not used in such quantities as others of all those books that are published in London; the catalogues of the publishers give you a list of the retail price to the public, and the price they charge to the bookseller.

Do you strictly conform to those retail prices?—Yes.

And in your account with the Association, you assume those, and those only, to be the prices?—Yes.

With respect to Bibles, Testaments and Prayer books, such as you get from Scotland, in what manner do you regulate the retail price of those?—To the cost of the book to us

499
Examination of
Mr.
William Watson,

(including binding), we add one-fourth for profit, so that of the price charged the Association one-fifth is profit.

The present rule with respect to your profits is only dated from 1822?—Yes.

Antecedent to that time, in what manner did you determine the retail price you would charge for a Scotch Bible?—The profits were a fourth of the entire price, instead of a fifth.

We do not understand that answer; we will suppose the price of the Bible in Scotland to you to be 5s. 4d. British, what was the retail price you affixed to that in Dublin?—I cannot immediately recollect the price charged to the Association.

The question is not the price charged the Association, but what was the retail price the book would be sold for to any stranger in your shop?—10s. 8d. would be the retail price of that book.

Upon what principle do you proceed in calculating that?—5s. 4d. is the price of the book itself; 5½d. the exchange, 2d. for the expense of bringing it over, 2s. the binding, and an addition of one-third makes it 10s. 8d.

Would the binding really cost you 2s. in that case?—Yes, it has always done so.

Then, your real profit upon that book, selling it to a stranger, would in fact have been 33 and a third per cent above all charges?—Yes, it would.

Was that the same retail price you charged in account with the Association?—It was.

Speaking now of books published by yourself, in what manner did you ascertain the retail price of such books to the Association?—There was a fixed price in the catalogue of the Association that was always kept to.

Who ascertained those prices?—On the first publication for the Association of such books, the price of the original copies must have been a standard.

In publishing a new edition, you did it as cheaply as you possibly could for yourselves?—Yes.

Was the new edition you published as good an edition, and as costly a one as that to which the price had been in the beginning affixed?—The only instance in which I recollect a book being published from an English edition is the Homilies, which I think full as good as the original.

The question is not as to English editions, but to any edition. You say there was a retail price affixed to the books, and that you afterwards published them as cheaply as you could; the question is, how much per cent was your profit upon those publications, between the actual cost to you and the original retail price that has not varied?—That is a question I cannot answer exactly.

Go as near it as you can?—Within the last three years I made a new calculation of all the books and tracts published for the Association. To endeavour to bring them as low as possible, I made a calculation for printing a certain number, and added one-half of the cost to it; supposing the cost of an edition of 1,000 amounted to 50*l*. I added 25*l*. to it.

We will come to an actual instance, and take your account in the year 1821 with the Association, to illustrate this point, fearing, that so long as it is treated in the abstract, we are not likely to understand each other. In the year 1821 it appears you charged the Society for Bibles 2,950*l*. 3s. 6d.; the question to you is, and which the Commissioners require to be answered with extreme and perfect accuracy, how much those Bibles had cost you?—£. 2,187. 12s. 8d. but I could not say that was the exact cost.

Why do you state that sum; how do you make it out?—I deduct one-fourth for profit, the rate at that time.

Why do you not deduct one-third, thirty-three and a third per cent, according to your former answer?—Deducting one-fourth from the full price is the same as adding one-third of the cost price to us to the cost price.

How much was your profit upon that?—£. 762. 10s. 10d.

Was the manner in which you determined the particular prices of those Bibles, in point of fact, by adding one-third of the cost price to you?—It was.

Did you ever follow any other rule about that period?—Never any other before the late alteration.

Did you pursue the same rule with respect to the Testaments and Prayer books in that year?—The small Testaments and Prayer books did not admit of that profit; for what reason I cannot assign.

Which did not admit of it?—The small Prayer books and Testaments. There was a fixed price for all those Bibles, Testaments and Prayer books, which had been always kept to; on the Bibles, large Prayer books and large Testaments, the profit was one-fourth of the entire price of the book.

We will come again to a specific sum. It appears that you charged the Society in that year 1,762*l*. 18s. 6d. for Testaments; the question is, how much those had cost you?—That I could not answer now.

What is your difficulty?—From what I have been saying, that there was not the same profit on the small as upon the larger.

Will your books not shew you that?—They will.

Will you ascertain it by to-morrow?—I will.

The sum charged for Prayer books in the same year, was 1,504*l*. 17s.; can you, by reference to your books, state what they had cost you?—No, for the same reason.

Can you, by reference to your books?—I can.

In the same year the religious books and tracts you sold the Society, you charged them 1,208*l*. 10s. 10½d.; can you state, by a reference to your books, what they cost you?—No.

Examination of
Mr.
William Watson,
24 Jan. 1825.

Was your profit greater or less per cent upon the religious books and tracts than upon the Bibles, Testaments and Prayer books?—It was greater.

How much greater?—That I could not say. Some of those tracts have been printed perhaps twenty years, the editions lasting out that time, and some of them printed in the course of the year.

The Society appears in the subsequent year to have altered their rates of dealing with you, and to have restricted you to a fifth instead of a fourth; what was the cause of the Society adopting that mode of dealing?—What first gave rise to it was the great increase of the sales; they thought a smaller profit would compensate where the sales were so much increased, as a larger profit when the sales were smaller.

Have not their sales considerably decreased in the subsequent years?—Very much so.

To what do you attribute that?—The rise in the price to the members, and the restriction of the privilege of the members.

Why did they rise the price to the public?—Any thing I am saying now must be from surmise.

The best of your opinion, if it is founded upon such intelligence as you believe, we will be satisfied with?—I believe they considered at that time they were going too far, and spending too much money; in fact, they thought it prudent to limit their expenditure, which was effected by raising the prices, and reducing the privilege of members in purchasing to one-half. Before that time they had the privilege of purchasing books, at the reduced prices, to six times the amount of their subscription, and then they altered it to three times the amount of their subscription.

In what proportion do the Society at present cheapen to the purchaser of a Bible?—Some bibles they cheapen one-third, and on others there is no fixed rate.

What is the price of a common new Testament in your shop at this moment to a stranger going in to purchase?—One shilling and eight-pence, the cheapest.

What is the price at which a subscriber to the Association could purchase it?—Sixpence.

Who pays the additional fourteen-pence to you?—The price we charged the Association is eighteen-pence; we make a difference to the Association of two-pence, as they purchase in such large quantities.

You charge the Association 1 s. 6 d. for the Testament; the member purchasing pays you sixpence, and the Association pay you the other shilling?—Yes.

They pay in fact two-thirds of the price?—Yes, on that particular book.

Can you state at what price the same new Testament would now be purchased by any stranger going into the shop of the Hibernian Bible Society?—I cannot.

Have you never had the curiosity to enquire?—Yes, I have.

What is the difficulty of your stating it?—I have not it on my mind.

Will you endeavour to recollect it between this and to-morrow?—I will ascertain it.

Have you ever enquired, either from the reports of the Bible Society or otherwise, to what extent their sales proceed in a year?—Yes, I have from the reports.

What number of cheap New Testaments do you recollect that the Hibernian Bible Society sold in the last year?—I could not recollect it.

Will you ascertain that against to-morrow, and for the two or three years preceding that?—I will.

Have you not naturally considered the Hibernian Society as a very material competitor with you in this particular branch of the trade?—They certainly must decrease the sale; I do not consider them in that light much.

Have you not so far considered them as to look with some degree of anxiety as to the prices on which they were conducting their dealings?—At the present time I do not; but at the time the Association raised the price to the public, I perhaps did.

Have the Association again lowered the prices to the public?—They have.

When did they lower them; we did not collect from your former evidence they had done so?—I think it was the beginning of the last year they lowered them.

Are they as low now as they ever were?—Yes; they are sold at the same price as before the rise, but the restriction continues upon the members.

Is there not this material distinction, that the purchaser of Bibles and Testaments at your shop and at the shop of the Bible Society, would derive no advantage in your shop, unless a subscriber to the Association, but that all strangers are upon an equal footing of advantage at the shop of the Bible Society?—That is not exactly the case; a stranger can purchase, at the depository of the Bible Society, at first cost to them, but none except subscribers can purchase at half price.

Are we to understand it is the rule of the Hibernian Bible Society that all subscribers can purchase at half price, and not at a third part of the price, as at your shop?—They only reduce one-half.

The difference is this, that a subscriber to the Bible Society may buy a Testament at the Bible Society's shop, for half its original amount, but at your shop, if he is a subscriber, to the Association he may purchase it at a third?—He may.

Does not it follow from that, that a person may make a considerably cheaper purchase of a Testament, of equal quality, at your shop, than at the shop of the Bible Society?—Yes; but then the full price at our shop includes our profit, which is not the case at the Bible Society; so that the difference is not so great.

Is it sixpence or sixpence-halfpenny?—Sixpence Irish, the reduced price of the common list.

501
Examination of
Mr.
William Watson,
24 Jan. 1825.

Is it not a fact that there are several books in the list of distribution for catechetical premiums, that are not admitted into the catalogue of the Society, for sale at reduced prices?—There are.

Can you explain the nature of that distinction?—No, I cannot; it is a regulation of the Association to which I am not at all privy.

We wish to be informed from you, which you can hardly fail from knowing, what is the general principle that would determine that a book may be distributable as a catechetical premium, but is not upon the list of books to be cheapened to the public?—I cannot tell it, from entire ignorance; those books have been upon the list for at least half a dozen years.

Enumerate them?—Gray's Key to the Old Testament; Disney on the Psalms, is another; Paley's Theology, is another; Graves's Essay on the Character of the Apostles. I do not recollect any other.

Do you conceive that the Association consider those books as less meriting their distinguished favour than those which they undertake to sell at reduced prices to the public?—No, I do not, certainly. The only surmise I can make is, that they are expensive books; and, at the time they were put in the catechetical list, they did not wish to put upon the other list such expensive books, although they have now books almost as expensive.

Are there any books beyond those upon their list to be sold at reduced prices, that are not upon the catechetical list?—Yes, there is one, and only one; that is, the Homilies of the Church.

What is the cause of that book being made a solitary distinction?—I was never aware of it in the slightest degree.

Is that the only book at this moment that is in the cheap list, but not in the catechetical list?—Yes.

Is that the only book sanctioned by the Society, that a child, getting a premium, is not at liberty to ask for?—The only one.

Did you ever hear any particular reason for it?—Never.

Was there any order made upon the subject?—Yes.

What was the order?—That it should not be given as a catechetical premium.

When was that order made?—I believe an order was made by the Association as soon as it was put on the list; every book on the Association's reduced list is, by its being on that list, allowed to any child to be got as a part or the whole of its premium; so that it required an exclusive order to prevent the Homilies being given as a premium.

Appendix N° 181.

Further Examination of Mr. William Watson, on Oath; Tuesday, 25th of January 1825.

HAVE you made the calculations that were called for yesterday?—I have.

You stated yesterday, your profit upon the sale of Bibles upon the account of the Association in 1821, amounted to 762*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* have you since that been able to ascertain the precise amount of profit upon the sale of Testaments in the same year?—Yes; 455*l.* 3*s.* 7½*d.*

Mr.
William Watson,
25 Jan. 1825.

How do you make that out?—By ascertaining the exact cost of the book to us, which, deducted from the full price charged to the Association, leaves that sum.

What was the gross amount you paid for the Testaments, that in that year you sold on account of the Association?—£.1,307. 14*s.* 10½*d.*

What did you charge to the Association?—£.1,762. 18*s.* 6*d.*

Have you ascertained the true amount of your profit upon the sale of Prayer books in that year?—Yes; 409*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.*

How do you come to that result?—The cost of the Prayer books was 1,095*l.* 15*s.* 4*d.*

How much did you charge to the Association?—£.1,504. 17*s.*

Have you ascertained the amount of your profits upon the miscellaneous books?—No; that I could not ascertain with any degree of accuracy.

Was it greater or less, in proportion upon any given sum, than the dealing in Prayer books?—It was greater, I should think.

How much greater should you suppose it was?—There are so many things to be taken into consideration in the price of the tracts, it is almost impossible to say what they cost.

Suppose it to be only equal to your profit upon the sale of Prayer books, what would it have amounted to?—I have not got before me the sum paid for the tracts.

The amount charged by you to the Association for religious books and tracts in that year, was 1,208*l.* 10*s.* 10½*d.* do you suppose that they cost you as much as the full half of that sum?—They cost certainly more than that.

Did they cost as much as two-thirds?—That I could not indeed say with any accuracy.

Supposing your profit upon the tracts to have been no greater than upon the Prayer books, how much would it amount to upon 1,208*l.*?—About 350*l.*

We collect upon the whole your profit in that year upon the sale of Bibles, as you stated yesterday, was 762*l.* 10*s.* 10*d.* and upon the sale of Testaments, as you have stated to-day, 455*l.* 3*s.* 7½*d.* upon Prayer books, 409*l.* 1*s.* 7*d.* and upon tracts some sum exceeding 350*l.* is that the true result?—The last sum is as near as I can state it.

The Association, in the year following, reduced your profits from 25 per cent to 20?—Yes.

Examination of
Mr.
William Watson,
25 Jan. 1825.

Are we correct in understanding that your present profits, upon equally extensive transactions, would be one-fifth less than the sum of 1,906*l.* which the former sums would give?—Yes, except on the tracts, the profits on which were reduced in a greater proportion than on the Bibles, Testaments and Prayer books; this reduction on the tracts I made without being required to do so by the Association.

At what time did you publish the last edition of the work, entitled The Protestant Catechism?—About two years ago.

Is that one of the works cheapened by the Association?—No.

Did you publish it on your own account?—Solely.

Were you desired to do it?—By no person.

Have you sold many of them?—Not many of the last edition; and the former edition was a long time on hand.

Did you think it a good speculation to republish a work that had been so heavy on sale?

—There were several persons who required them, and it was not pleasant to be without them.

What description of persons required them?—Clergymen.

Were they to use in their schools?—I should suppose so.

Do you know whether that book is used in any of the schools of the Association?—I cannot give any answer to that.

Did you ever understand that it had been discontinued in a formal and authoritative manner by the Association, previous to your publishing it?—No.

Can you give us any general idea of the number of Protestant catechisms you may have sold since its republication by you?—On reference to the book, I find the number to be about 200.

Was it known to the Association, or the book committee, you had republished that catechism?—I should think it was not, except to two or three individual members.

We believe the present edition of Secker's Lectures, cheapened by the Association, was printed and published by you?—It was.

Does not it contain Porteus's Confutation of Popery, as a sort of Appendix to it?—That cheapened by the Association never did to my knowledge.

Have you any other edition that does?—We sell them to the Incorporated Society, and to them only.

To strangers?—Strangers never ask for it.

Was it you that published that work with Porteus's Confutation of the Errors of Popery?

—That is a separate tract, which we published, and it is bound up with the Lectures, for the Incorporated Society.

Had you any directions to that effect?—Yes, certainly.

At what period did you receive that order?—On the appointment of my father to be bookseller to them, I suppose; I never recollect any directions given.

We conclude then, for a period, as far as you know, of twenty-five or twenty-seven years, the work has been published in that form for the express use of the Incorporated Society, and not for any other society?—My father was not bookseller for that number of years to the Incorporated Society.

At what period did your father commence bookseller to the Incorporated Society?—I suppose about twelve or thirteen years ago.

Is Secker's Lectures often taken as a premium by children who become entitled to catechetical premiums?—Frequently.

Do you never, by mistake, give them that copy that has Porteus's Confutation?—I may safely say, we do not. Those copies with the Confutation are bound in sheep, and those books for premiums are bound in calf; so that I do not think that mistake could occur.

In what manner do the children make choice of books; do they come to the shop to do it?—Only in the case of those examined in Dublin.

In what way is it certified to you what book you are to give them?—The certificates, signed by the examiner, are sent into the Association, and are returned to us, with the mark of the secretary, that those certificates are correct. The children then come and choose books from the list of premium books. I was yesterday desired to ascertain the price at which the Hibernian Bible Society sold their Testaments; I find that fifteen-pence is the price at which they sell the Testament to strangers.

How much to subscribers?—Half of that.

You sell the same book at twenty-pence to strangers?—Yes, and sixpence to subscribers. There is this advantage also to the subscribers, we allow them 10 per cent discount for prompt payment of that sixpence.

Examination of Chamberlain William Walker, Esquire, on Oath;
Tuesday, 30th November 1824.

C. W. Walker,
Esq.
30 Nov. 1824.

DID you not at one time, at the desire of the Association for discountenancing Vice, undertake an examination into the establishment at Kildemo?—Not immediately at the desire of the Association, but it was promoted by their application, in the first instance, to the Commissioners of Education, whose secretary I am. The Commissioners of Education appointed me, under the Act of Parliament the 53d Geo. 3, the visitor, under their hands and seals. I have brought the minute with me of the transactions relating to that appointment from its earliest origin. The present Bishop of Ferns (who was the provost of Trinity College)

College) was one of the ex officio members of the Board of Education, and who happened also to be a member of the Association, applied on a particular day of the meeting of the Commissioners of Education to the Board, having in his hand a letter which he deemed a private document, and which, as such, was not entered upon our minutes; but it was understood by me to be a letter from the Archbishop of Cashel (Archbishop Broderick), stating, that he had learnt that there were great abuses existing in the school of Kildemo. The provost mentioned, that the Association was extremely anxious to have those abuses inquired into, but that its hands were not sufficiently strong, not being armed with any power to visit and tender an oath; therefore it was conceived, as the Association derived its resources from Parliament, and as the Commissioners of Education were empowered to administer an oath, and as their jurisdiction extended over all schools so assisted, it was expedient to apply to the Board of Education to appoint a visitor, who should be able to report to the Board of Education, in the first instance, all those matters which were the subject of inquiry, and which could afterwards be submitted to the Association, so as to obtain that for the Association, through the medium of the Commissioners of Education, which they could not obtain by themselves.

When did you receive your appointment as visitor of the school at Kildemo?—On the 19th of July 1817, the application from the Association to the Commissioners of Education was made; it was on that day ordered by the Commissioners of Education, that I, as their secretary, should write to the Archdeacon of Limerick (Archdeacon Mansell), and require from him a specific statement of the charges and the names of such persons as could give evidence as to the abuses alleged to have existed in the school at Kildemo. I have here that letter and his answer, and the documents transmitted; these were taken into consideration at a subsequent meeting; the letter of the archdeacon in answer to that of the secretary was read, and also the affidavit of George Banks, and the statement of Francis Devine.

Those documents contained the grounds of charge?—They did, part of the grounds of charge, because I received instructions, when I went there, to view what was the actual state of the Kildemo seminary, and upon that view I conceived that there were additional grounds of charge, and therefore I embodied the whole under seven heads of charge, which I furnished to the then superintendent, and I have copies of those.

Will you hand in those heads of charge?—[The Witness delivered in the same, with the statement of Devine, and the affidavit of George Banks, and the answer of Mr. Jones to the charges against him.—The answer of Mr. Jones to the charges was tendered in the progress of the examination and inquiry, but not wholly preliminary to the inquiry that had been entered upon; and I thought, after having examined witnesses for one or two days, it was right he should be aware of Banks's charge and Devine's; but I thought it was better to shape the whole of the charges in that form, and to hand it to him. I have here his original letter, acknowledging the receipt of those charges; and that is the answer to it (handing them in.)

In what way did you proceed in the examination of witnesses?—In the first instance when I went down; but I should first say, that the order given to me on the 26th of July was, "That Chamberlain Walker, esquire, secretary to this board, be appointed to visit the seminary of Kildemo, county Limerick, on Thursday the 31st of July, and succeeding days, until he shall have fully examined and inquired into all matters requisite and necessary, and that he do report to the board thereon:" the appointment was accordingly executed by the Commissioners present.

What persons did you examine with a view to investigate the truth of the charges made against Mr. Jones?—A great number of persons, whose names were tendered to me by Archdeacon Mansell, the person who seems to have first promoted the inquiry, and for whom he obtained summonses from me, as the visitor; for by a clause in the 53d of the King, it is penal to disobey the summons; and it appeared to be necessary, as there were several persons to attend upon this occasion; and as to several of them, there was an apprehension they might be annoyed if they should come as volunteers, therefore the summonses were procured for them, and I have the form here.

[The same was handed in.]

Were your powers sufficient to compel the witnesses to attend before you?—They were. I was obliged to threaten to put the Act in force against Mr. Jones himself; I told him I should proceed for the penalty of 20*l.* and he seemed disposed to incur that penalty; but I told him I should put it on every day, and he submitted.

After having examined the witnesses, and having heard Mr. Jones in his defence, what judgment did you come to as to the truth or falsehood of the charges exhibited against Mr. Jones?—It is contained in this Report.

Does that report contain the statement of the evidence received, and your opinion upon it, or did your powers go far enough to authorize you to decide upon the truth or falsehood of the charges, and to act upon that decision by dismissing him, or reprimanding the master?—My powers as visitor were very definite. Under the Act of Parliament, the visitor is not enabled of himself to dismiss the superintendent; had he been competent to do so, the superintendent would have saved him that trouble, for he abandoned the institution himself, I believe either a day or two before I quitted Limerick to make my report. The Act of Parliament directs, that no master shall be dismissed in consequence of inquiries made by a visitor, without a solemn investigation of the matter of complaint before the Commissioners themselves; therefore Mr. Jones appears to have withdrawn himself, and I take it our board would have left him to be handled by the Association.

Were the papers transmitted to the Association without a decision on the part of the Board of Education?—The communication was, “that the charges, together with the evidence taken on the visitation of Kildemo seminary, and the documents contained in the different parcels, together with the books of the seminary, be transmitted from this board to the secretary of the Association, for the use and inspection of that body.”

Was that the final step that the Board of Education took in the matter?—That is the final step that appears upon our minutes; the fact is, that the then provost was (and Mr. Disney, as I believe, was also) a member of the Association, as well as Commissioners of Education; and it was well understood that they attended the Association subsequently to that report; what passed there (as I was not a member) I cannot tell, and was never called before them.

Had the Board of Education power to act in the case, to dispose of it of their own authority?—I protest I could not answer that without a little doubt; it strikes me, that they having instituted the inquiry at the instance of the Association, conceived that they were “functi officio,” when they had sent down their visitor, and got this body of evidence, and returned it to the Association; but if they had been called upon again, I heard it said in my presence by the Commissioners, that if it were thought proper by the Association to come back to them to exercise their power in any way, after they had investigated the charges and the evidence, that they were ready to do so.

Do you believe that the Board of Education, by the Act that appoints them, have the power to dismiss a schoolmaster, whose conduct they have appointed a visitor to inspect?—Certainly, after a formal investigation, there is a special clause in the Act to this effect; but this master had resigned, and we were obliged to have recourse to another person’s aid in the interim to manage the school, until it should be known what the Association would do,

What was the object of the establishment at Kildemo?—Out of the evidence I gathered, and the confession of Mr. Jones, that it was for the education of parish clerks and country schoolmasters.

Do you recollect how many persons it contained?—At the time that I was there, it appears somewhere on the minutes, but I cannot say exactly from recollection.

With reference to the first charge, which states Mr. Jones to have taken credit for sums for the maintenance of young men, which sums had not been expended; was it your opinion, after the investigation, he was proved guilty of that charge?—It was.

The second charge is, that he had charged the Association with different sums for building and works not expended to the amount, or in the manner therein set forth; did he appear to have been guilty of that charge?—If as well as I can recollect, without referring to my report, if his own evidence, or the evidence adduced by himself, were to be believed, he was guilty of the latter part of that charge; he was guilty of the whole of it, for I can refer to some of the witnesses, and I believe to his own declaration, that part of that money which was said to have been expended in building or sinking a pump was not so applied; but he alleged he had applied it in other modes, that he did not wish to make public; upon being pressed extremely as to those modes, and being told he would be let in to give evidence of them, if they were praiseworthy, or at all applicable to the purposes of the institution; he seemed to me to fail in making it out—he generally alleged, but for accuracy I refer to the minutes, that he had paid the expenses of some young man travelling to look for a situation, and he had paid physician’s fees for another, but nothing at all, apparently to my judgment, to an amount sufficient, to bear out the gross charge made; my report upon the first charge is, “with the best attention I have been able to give to the subject, and on weighing the evidence, I cannot discover that the number of young men, for whose maintenance the public and the Association have been charged, really equalled the specific amount for which the superintendent has demanded credit. I do not find that the maintenance has been equivalent to the consideration expected for it; and I am of opinion, that the salaries and wages of masters and servants for which credit has been taken, are in some instances over-rated, and in others have not been paid.” Then as to the second charge, “from what has been signified respecting the items for labour and works, it follows, that the second charge is not only proved but admitted by Mr. Jones, to have been founded, so far as concerns the manner; but to me also, the amount appears a mis-statement. Furniture has been an article of charge, which from evidence and inspection I consider to have been greatly exaggerated; and that part of the third charge which relates to clothing, (as far as what is advanced in the printed report, on the foundation of which the general computation of a student’s expense has been made, and attended to by the Association), is undoubtedly true; but it also appears, that latterly this point has been better attended to;” that is regarding the nature and quality of the clothing. “The particular allegation in the third charge, as to a sum of 370 l. sterling is introduced, because it happened to be the amount of what the committee of the Association had consented to be paid over to Mr. Jones on foot of his alleged advances, on condition of his refunding, if it should not be passed in their account by the commissioners of imprest accounts; that it will be rejected should Mr. Jones be examined before the Commissioners as to the accuracy of his statements, may very naturally be expected; and I am compelled, from the evidence on the inquiry, to believe the sum paid over to him without being fairly accounted for to have exceeded that amount.”

Now go to the fourth charge; did you find him guilty of the fourth charge?—I think I did.

As

505
Examination of
C. W. Walker,
Esq.
30 Nov. 1824.

As to the fifth charge, feeding the students in a manner unsuitable to their health; was he guilty of that?—I found him guilty of that also; I will just refer to the report; I state upon the fourth charge,—“ I shall now advert very shortly to the remaining charges, and while I cannot hesitate to declare my conviction that considerable benefit has accrued to the public from the invention and establishment of the seminary for schoolmasters, and that the defects or abuses incident to that at Kildemo have not discouraged many from recommending it to their friends and connections, so desirable an object has this sole establishment of its kind proved to the middling order of Protestants, yet in relation to the fourth charge, I fear too much anxiety to spread the fame of this establishment has tended to shorten the period of stay originally designed for each student. To this, in some degree, the impatience of young men to obtain a settlement conducive to their livelihood may be supposed to have united, but the result of such premature diffusion of half-educated, and consequently conceited youths, wherever it has taken place, has had the effect of directly injuring the Institution in the minds of those of the higher order, whether clergy or laity, who have come in contact with such ensamples; some have been returned as incompetent, others disappointed in not meeting the encouragement they expected; however the number of deserving and qualified students, appears to me, from what I could gather out of the evidence, the letters of individuals who employed them, and the communications I personally had with many of them, to exceed the number of those to whom I have alluded in the last observation.” Upon the fifth charge, I say, “ although I am far from thinking the students of this seminary ought to be pampered in respect of diet, it seems an indispensable requisite that this, of whatever description of food, should be good of its kind; without entering then into the motives which may have unsealed the lips of the students in the seminary of late when the visitation took place, it will be found that the evidence of former inmates, with little exception, admits that bad provision and diet were too frequent; and the acknowledgment of the caterer on his cross-examination, that bone always was included in the weight, to which he had deposed, alters considerably the force of his abstract testimony.”

In regard to the sixth charge; was that charge proved?—I recollect this perfectly, that the caterer swore that Mr. Jones was in the habit of sending coarse meat and the worst parts of it from his own farm to the establishment, and that he furnished him, the caterer, with a newspaper, containing the price of meat in the market of Limerick, and that he directed him to charge the highest price for prime meat, at the same time it was of that inferior quality; it appears that the cattle purchased by the superintendant in the year 1810 from Joseph Sullivan, were converted to the use of Mr. Jones's own family afterwards.

As to the seventh charge, which Mr. Jones seems to have treated so lightly; namely, the charge of the irregularity, idleness and the neglect of education that subsisted in the seminary; was that proved?—Yes, it was, as will appear by the report.

How many years did the school exist?—I apprehend from 1808 to 1817; I know that comprized the range of my inquiry.

Did it appear there was any local committee that superintended this institution?—There was a local committee that had been occasionally referred to.

Did they appear to have attended to the progress and management of the school?—I think very carelessly.

Did they appear to have had regular meetings?—I apprehend they had not regular meetings.

Was there any neighbouring clergyman who received any pay for superintending or otherwise inspecting and controuling the establishment at Kildemo?—No, I do not think there was, not as far as I carry in mind; I rather think Mr. Jones considered it would have been a very improper interference, and certain feuds did arise between him and the curate of the parish (whose house was within a stones throw of the schoolhouse) when he interfered at all. Mr. Jones was catechist of Pallas Kenry charter school, but there was evidence relating to that; the names of the committee, the survivors of the committee who had been quoted in one of those printed books that were in the hands of the Association were, the then Bishop of Limerick, now Bishop of Cloyne, the Dean of Limerick, the Reverend Mr. Jeffries, the Reverend Gustavus Wybrants, and Mr. Bolton Waller.

Was Mr. Jones a man who appeared qualified, as far his own attainments went, to the discharge of the duty?—I believe so, perfectly.

Was it a matter of much surprise in the neighbourhood that this discovery should have been made of his conduct?—I believe it was matter of very considerable surprise with some persons; however there were other persons who seemed not to have entertained the same opinion.

Was Mr. Jones punished in any way, or was his withdrawing from the situation, the only consequence of his speculation upon the funds of the Society?—I cannot speak of my own knowledge, not being a member of the Association, but I have heard it spoken of among the Commissioners of our Board, who are also members of the Association; I heard it said, that the result of the examination had been, that a decision had been come to by the Association to proceed against Mr. Jones for a sum of money.

Regulations respecting Aids to the Schools of the Association.

Board Room, N° 7, Capel Street, Dublin,
April 3d, 1823.

THE Association incorporated for discountenancing Vice, and promoting the knowledge and practice of the Christian religion, hoping to be enabled this year, in consequence of their expectation of continued Parliamentary aid, to assist in the establishment and support of parochial schools, give notice, that they will receive applications from clergymen who are willing to connect their schools with the Association.

Regulations respecting Aids to the Schools of the Association.

The following are the conditions on which aid for building will be granted.

1st. That there shall be an acre of ground made over in perpetuity to the minister and churchwardens for the use of the school; or, in circumstances which raise the value of land, or make it difficult to be had, a piece of ground worth forty shillings per annum. To facilitate the grants required in this condition, there is an Act of Parliament, passed in the fiftieth year of the late king, intituled, "An Act for enabling tenants in tail, and for

" life, and also ecclesiastical persons to grant land for the purpose of endowing Schools in Ireland."

2d. The school-house must be erected on the land made over as above, and built of lime, and stone or brick, and slated.

3d. There must be a plan and estimate sent up and approved of by the Association, before any grant can be voted, and it will be afterwards necessary before the aid voted can be paid, both to certify that the building having been erected according to such plan and estimate, is now ready for the reception of scholars, and to engage that the children shall be instructed according to the principles laid down by the Association.

4th. It will be particularly insisted on that the school-rooms should be large and airy.

Where these conditions are complied with, the Association are willing to contribute towards the erection of such a school-house, a sum not exceeding fifty pounds, provided double the sum granted by the Association has been collected from private contributions, and that in every other respect the school shall appear deserving of their assistance.

The following are the conditions on which alone salaries to masters and mistresses can be granted :

1st. There must be a grant of land, as is required in the first condition for obtaining aid for building, unless in peculiar circumstances, when the clergyman applying shall fully satisfy the Association that every exertion has been made to procure ground, though without effect.

2d. There must be some local contribution towards the annual support of the school, unless as in the above case respecting land, the clergyman applying shall satisfy the Association that every exertion has been made to procure local contributions, though without effect.

3d. The school must not receive annual pecuniary aid from any other public institution.

4th. The masters or mistresses must be members of the established church.

5th. The Scriptures must be read in the school by all who have attained suitable proficiency.

6th. No catechism, unless that of the church of England, must be taught in the school, and no books used in it of which the Association shall disapprove.

7th. There must be regular half yearly reports, both of the school, and of the conduct of the master or mistress, certified by the minister or curate of the parish, which must be approved of by the committee of schools, before any salary previously voted can be paid.

Where the above conditions are complied with, and provided also that the general merits of the case shall appear to entitle the school to such aid, and that the existing engagements of the Society enable them to afford it, the Association will feel themselves at liberty to grant salaries of not less than four pounds, and in no case exceeding eight pounds per annum, according to the circumstances of the parish; and at the expiration of each year, on their being fully satisfied as to the conduct and exertion of the master or mistress, and the general progress of the children in the school, they will also grant a gratuity in no case exceeding half the amount of the annual salary.

Clergymen applying for either salary or assistance for building, are requested to give full and detailed answers to the following queries, that the Association may be enabled to decide upon the merits of their particular cases, and also may obtain information on the general state of education of the poor in Ireland.

By Order,

Richard Graves, } Secretaries.

- Bleary.—Salary to be withdrawn for the future by desire of the parties, who wish to receive aid from another Society.
 Carrig.—The gratuity to be withheld, unless Mr. Skelton can sign the printed certificate.

 Finglass.—Gratuity withheld.
 Galtrim.—Salary and gratuity to be withheld, as the master employs a deputy, and the deputy is a Roman Catholic.
 Grange Silva.—Gratuity to be withheld in consequence of the recommendation of the clergyman, and the general report of Mr. Lee.

List of Schools,
the Payment of Salaries to which has been suspended
or withheld by the Association.

Kilmore Kilcock.—To pay the second half of 1820 only ; assigning the reason to the parties, that James Wilson was the master for the former half year, who did not do the duty in person.

Magheraclooney.—Not to be paid until we have further information respecting the state of the school.

Magorban.—Salary to be withheld until the school-house shall be put into repair.

For the former half of 1821, the following :

Finglass.—Voted on the 31st of May : That salary be withheld until the master shall be found to deserve a certificate, to be signed by the clergyman.

Killegny.—Voted on the 31st of May : To send back the return to have the first query answered, and to inquire respecting funds. Salary not to be paid until these questions are answered.

Killenaule.—Voted on the 31st May : To send back the return to have the dimensions of the school room inserted ; and also the names of all books used in the business of the school, and to inquire respecting funds. Salary not to be paid till an answer is received.

Seapatrick.—Not to receive payment for the last half year, in consequence of the neglect of the master.

For the latter half of 1821, the following :

Ballymodan.—The school in the town of Bandon, in this parish, not to receive any aid in future, aid having been voted to a school situated in a country part of the parish.

Clonfert.—Payment to be withheld until the grant of land has been made over in perpetuity.

Creggan.—Salary to be suspended until it shall appear that Manson's spelling book has been disused in the school.

Kildress.—Not to receive salary until the new school house is completed, agreeably to the former vote.

Mogorban.—We recommend that no payment be issued for the period during which the school was suspended.

Ross.—Voted on the 20th of December : That salary be withdrawn from this school, as it appears that the master is not a member of the established church.

For the former half of the year 1822, the following :

Cavan.—Voted on the 23d of May : To inquire why there are no funds for the support of this school, and to state that no payment shall be issued until this point has been satisfactorily explained.

For the latter half of the year 1822, the following :

Belleek.—Recommended that gratuity be not paid for the current year, in consequence of the unfavourable report of the visitor, and of the smallness of the number in the school who are reading the Scriptures, it appearing that the master does not devote sufficient time to the business of the school ; to intimate to the parties that it is expected that children attending the school, of whatever religious denomination, shall read the Scriptures.

Christchurch.—Voted on the 3d of December : That salary be withheld from this school, as the parties interested have not complied with the resolution communicated to them in the close of last year, respecting the exclusion of Roman Catholic children, it appearing from the report of the visitor, that all children attending the school must profess themselves Protestants.

Denn.—Gratuity withheld on account of the want of certificate.

Glasnevin.—Gratuity withheld on account of the imperfect state of preparation of the boys, as reported by the visitors.

Hollymount.—No aid can be issued at present, as the master is stated in the return to be a Presbyterian.

Kilpeacon.—No payment to be issued to this school for the current year, as Mr. Garstin has sent in an unfavourable report of the master's conduct.

Lorum.—Gratuity withheld, on account of the general inefficiency of the school, and from the incorrectness of the certificate.

Magorban.—Gratuity withheld, as the school appears to be inefficient, and as it appears from the visitor's report that a more numerous attendance would in all probability be obtained by a more energetic and efficient master.

Santry.—To be paid salary only for the current year.

Stradbally.—Gratuity withheld in consequence of the state of education in this school, as it appears from the visitor's report.

Tentower.—Gratuity withheld.

Thomastown.—Salary to this school shall not commence until business shall have commenced in the new school house, as it appears from the return, that the children of the established church do not attend this school, but that they are expected to attend when the school house now building has been completed.

Wicklow.—To withhold gratuity, and to notify to the parties, that in consequence of the inefficiency of this school, no further aid will be paid to it by the Association.

List of Schools,
the Payment of Salaries to which has been suspended
or withheld by the Association.

For the former half of the year 1823, the following:

Adamstown.—Voted April 1824: That no salary be issued for the current half year, as we have as yet no return for any portion of this period. The consideration of payment for the current half year, or for any portion of it, is therefore to be held over until the return for the half year ending September 30th, shall be before us.

Clonoulty.—Voted on the 1st of May: That in consequence of the inefficiency of this school, salary be withheld for the present; and this vote was confirmed on the 2d June, the school to be suspended accordingly.

Horetown.—Voted June 5: That aid of salary be not paid to this school until business shall have commenced in the new school house, and the school shall appear more effective in point of numbers than the last return shows it to be.

Killegny.—Voted June 10: That salary be withheld for the present, until it be ascertained whether a more effective master cannot be appointed.

Loughash.—Voted the 10th of June: That no aid be granted to this school, as the conditions of the Association are not complied with. The land made over being reported as of little value, and the present master being a dissenter. See Mr. Hamilton's letter; see also, the Records of Visitation, at the Kildare-street Society house.

For the latter half of the year 1823, the following:

Crumlin.—An order was sent in by Mr. Magee, December 20, in consequence of an inspection which he had made of this school, that the payment shall not be issued until the business should be again inquired into; and on the 8th of January, the committee ordered that no payment should be issued to this school, until they should obtain fuller information respecting it.

Donoughmore, County Down.—No payment to be issued for the current half year, October 23d; it appearing to the committee that the children of the poor are excluded from this school, in order to admit those who can pay. Voted, That payment be suspended, until the system shall be altered.

Glankeen.—Voted on the 18th of December: That salary and gratuity be withheld until the particulars communicated by Dean Bernard have been satisfactorily explained.

On the 8th of January, upon a re-examination of the return from Glankeen school, with reference to the communications transmitted by Dean Bernard, and the letter of Mr. Maunsell;—

We are of opinion, that no payment should be issued to this school, until a more competent master than the present one has been appointed; it appearing from the report itself, under the head of the reading class, especially the Scripture one, also the writing and arithmetic classes, that the master is either incompetent or negligent.

His incompetency also appears from the necessity of calling in an usher, considering the total number of boys.

Hollyfort.—Passed for the current half year only; the school having been inefficient during the preceding half year.

For the former part of the year 1824, the following:

Ballykeel.—Voted May 20: To withhold salary, until the return for the next half year shall be before us, on account of the great diminution of the numbers attending this school.

Brooklodge.—Voted May 27:—That this school be paid for the current half year; but that after that time, it shall cease to be on our list, as the school appears altogether undeserving the continuance of our aid.

Kilmallock.—Voted, June 14:—Not to issue any payment to this school, until the return for the next half year shall be before us.

Mullingar.—No payment to be issued for the half year ending June 30th.

The above Votes extracted from the Minutes of the Committee of Schools.

have reason to be satisfied with it.

EXTRACTS from the Report of C. W. Walker, Esq. Secretary, on the Seminary at Kildemo.

STATEMENT of the Charges (as collected from the Visitor's inquiries) which it appeared incumbent on Mr. Jones to refute, with regard to his management of Kildemo Seminary.

Extracts from the Report of
C. W. Walker,
Esq.

1st.—CLAIMING credit from the Association for discountenancing Vice, &c. as well as from the public, for considerable sums set forth in accounts furnished by him to the Association for maintenance of the young men who passed through the seminary from 1808 to 1817, when such sums had not really been expended in the manner and to the amount therein stated; and the like for master's salaries and servant's wages.

2d.—Charging the said Association and the public with divers sums, for building and other works, not expended in fact to the amount and in manner set forth by him.

3d.—Charging the Association and the public with certain sums for furniture bought by him between the years 1808 and 1813, which had not been laid out; also for clothing for the young men more than had been supplied, through which over-rated expenditure Mr. Jones is charged to have received from the Association and the public, (in addition to other sums not justly accounted for) the sum of 370*l.* sterling, alleged by Mr. Jones to have been due to him, as for and on account of a balance on advances and expenditure made by him for the use and benefit of the Institution at Kildemo.

4th.—Departing from the proper objects of the Institution, in sending out the pupils in many instances incompletely educated and disqualified for arduous situations after a short period passed in the seminary, and with little pains used to instruct them.

5th.—Feeding the students of the seminary in a manner unsuitable to the health and proper maintenance of its inmates.

6th.—Converting the property of the seminary to his own private use, in various respects, employing the students in his service on the most menial offices, and the servants paid for the seminary in labour and employment for himself and family.

7th.—Suffering irregularities to prevail, and idleness and neglect of education to exist in the seminary, and permitting the Institution to become discreditable in the eyes of the public, as being rendered unanswerable to the declared objects of its foundation and inadequate to the sums of money hitherto supposed to have been devoted to it.

Reply to the 1st charge:—With the best attention which I have been able to give to the subject, and on weighing the evidence, I cannot discover that the numbers of young men for whose MAINTENANCE the public and the Association have been charged, really equalled the specific amount for which the superintendant has demanded credit; I do not find that the maintenance has been equivalent to the consideration expected for it, and I am of opinion that the salaries and wages of masters and servants for which credit has been taken, are in some instances over-rated, and in others have not been paid.

2d charge :—From what has been signified respecting the items for labour and works, it follows, that the second charge is not only proved, but admitted by Mr. Jones to have been founded, so far as concerns the manner; but to me the amount also appears a misstatement.

3d charge :—Furniture has been an article of charge, which from evidence and inspection, I consider to have been greatly exaggerated; and that part of the 3d charge which relates to clothing (as far as what is advanced in the printed report, on the foundation of which, the general computation of a student's expense has been made, and attended to by the Association) is undoubtedly true; but it also appears, that latterly this point has been better attended to. The particular allegation in the 3d charge, as to the sum of 370 l. sterling is introduced, because it happened to be the amount of what the committee of the Association had consented to be paid over to Mr. Jones on foot of his alleged advances; on condition of his refunding, if it should not be passed in their account by the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts; that it will be rejected, should Mr. Jones be examined before those Commissioners as to the accuracy of his statements, may very naturally be expected; and I am compelled from the evidence on the inquiry to believe the sum paid over to him without being fairly accounted for, to have exceeded that amount.

4th charge :—I shall now advert very shortly to the remaining charges, and while I cannot hesitate to declare my conviction that considerable benefit has accrued to the public from the invention and establishment of the seminary for schoolmasters, and that the defects or abuses incident to that at Kildemo, have not discouraged many from recommending it to their friends and connexions, so desirable an object has this sole establishment of its kind proved to the middling orders of Protestants; yet in relation to the 4th charge, I fear too much anxiety to spread the fame of this establishment has tended to shorten the period of stay originally designed for each student;—to this, in some degree, the impatience of young men to obtain a settlement conducive to their livelihood, may be supposed to have united; but the result of such premature diffusion of half educated, and consequently conceited youths, wherever it has taken place, has had the effect of directly injuring the Institution in the minds of those of the higher order, whether clergy or laity, who have come in contact with such ensamples. Some have been returned as incompetent, others disappointed in not meeting the encouragement they expected; however, the number of deserving and qualified students, appears to me, from what I could gather out of the evidence, the letters of individuals who employed them, and the communications I personally had with many of them, to exceed the number of those to whom I have alluded in the last observation.

5th charge :—The subject of the 5th charge was considered by me as fit to be inquired into, from the strong representations made by the greater number of the students whom I found at the seminary when I repaired to it to prosecute the inquiry; their letters which were conveyed to me at Limerick, and to the truth of which they have deposed, speak for themselves; they represent their diet to have been of bad quality, and at times insufficient; meat not three times in the week, as set forth in the printed report, and when they got it, not an adequate supply for the meal. The defence to the charges contained in those letters consisted of the same allegations of undue influence to excite misrepresentations, and recourse to the evidence of Stephen English, the present assistant master, and Bolton Magrath, the caterer, to show, that the majority of the young men were in some degree of intimacy and intercourse with the curate of Kildemo, who was one of the clergymen I have alluded to, as connected with the promotion of inquiry—that he appeared to entertain the expectation (if not the wish) that the management of the seminary would devolve on himself, conjointly with Archdeacon Maunsell, and that Mr. Jones would be dismissed from the superintendence, which being once held out to the students, their desire to come under a less strict and regulated sway, had the effect of engaging their voices towards the removal of their existent governor.

Magrath was produced to show, that he weighed out for being dressed one pound of meat per man, yet they would not be satisfied; and he also stated, that the students in general appeared adverse to the superintendant, to the assistant master, and to himself.

6th charge :—The cattle purchased by the superintendant from Mr. Joseph Sullivan, in the year 1810, appear from the evidence to have been converted to the use of his own family afterwards, though not during Sullivan's stay. The memorandum, by way of security for the purchase money which has been produced by Sullivan, expressly words the obligation for account of the seminary; doubtless if Mr. Jones be entitled to credit for the amount, it fell on him to shew the consideration to have turned to profit, or at least to be forthcoming in some shape; but this has not been done with regard to the cattle, value 46 l. 3*s.* The hay, manure, and garden provision may have been used in the service of the seminary in a short period, but the employment of the land, the interest in which was sold for a trifle at that time, as being considered property to be annexed to the providing the seminary, has not been established fully to have been brought into account by the superintendant; and Turner, one of the former masters, very conscientiously has declared, that he felt great reluctance to share in forwarding the statement, of a piece of ground being in possession of the master, which he did not enjoy, and having been promised an equivalent in account, he never obtained it.

7th charge :—The establishment or refutation of the 7th charge (however too futile for serious refutation it has been styled by Mr. Jones, in his reply to all the charges) seems

Extracts from the Report of
C. W. Walker,
Esq.

nevertheless to be closely connected with the truth or falsehood of every one of the preceding. If the statements, coming from the head of such an establishment, or adopted by him, which relate to the expenditure and particular details of a public institution be discovered, or be known to the whole or any of its members to be misrepresentations in matter of fact, or exaggerated in any respect; if all be not quite transparent in the view of the part he has held in it, the doubts, the inquiries, the surprize, until matters are explained, and explained satisfactorily they could not be, without a formal and well authorized investigation; there is no great room for wonder that the seeds of irregularity should spring spontaneous in such a state of the soil, that application should give way to idleness, and that the assistant, master and caterer themselves should be diverted from their regular occupation and duty to go and question the superintendant, "How he could account for those charges." If latterly, idleness and insubordination, or neglect of education by the assistant master, whose time has been as much engaged in the exertion of a laudable zeal to serve and aid the defence of the superintendant as that of the students can have been idled in caballing on their side; surely the effects must be attributed to the true cause, although remotely perceptible; and any discredit attaching to the character of the Institution, or injury to the confidence it ought to hold in the eyes of a public that administered to its existence, and is drawn upon for its supplies, must be considered due to the superintendant, who has in my opinion given too many grounds for this inquiry.

EXTRACT from the General Report of the Association for the year 1822.

General Plan of the Association for encouraging Catechetical Examinations throughout Ireland.

Extract from General Report of the Association.

THE Association incorporated for discountenancing Vice, and promoting the knowledge and practice of the Christian Religion, desirous to promote the public examination of children in the principles of the christian religion throughout Ireland, do hereby notify, that they will grant to the best answerer, in a division of not less than six candidates, at every such examination, held annually in a parish church, day-school, boarding-school or academy, the following premiums:

FIRST CLASS.—To each division of not less than six candidates, a Bible; or if the successful candidate have one, any book on the Association list, at the discretion of the examiner, not exceeding the value of 15s.

SECOND CLASS.—To each division of not less than six candidates, a Bible; or if the successful candidate have one, any book selected as above, not exceeding the value of 10s.

THIRD CLASS.—To each division of not less than six candidates, a Bible, Prayer book or New Testament; or if the successful candidate have all these, any books selected as above, not exceeding the value of 5s.

FOURTH CLASS.—To each division of not less than six candidates, a duodecimo Bible, Prayer book or New Testament.

FIFTH, OR LOWEST CLASS.—To each division of not less than six candidates, a Prayer book or New Testament.

Provided the examiner at such examinations be the minister or curate of the parish, or a clergyman appointed by him, and shall transmit to the Association a certificate in any of the annexed forms, according to the class the children shall rank in, should the division exceed the number above specified, premiums will be given in the same proportion of one to every six children examined.

And in order to encourage continued attendance at these annual examinations, the Association will grant honorary certificates to such young persons as, having obtained the premiums of the first class in a former year, are found at a subsequent examination, at least equal to the successful candidates for premiums in that class.

And to encourage attendance at weekly catechetical lectures, held by the clergyman of any parish, the Association will grant the premiums of their respective classes, to such of the unsuccessful candidates for the above premiums, in the proportion of one to six, (of the number that remains after the successful candidates have been deducted) as shall have attended with remarkable diligence such lectures; provided it be certified, that they have attended for six months of the preceding year, and have made adequate progress.

The Association beg leave also to remark, that in every part of the examinations they will expect the claim to a premium to be founded, not on mere quickness of recollection, or exactness of recitation, but more on a clear apprehension of the meaning, a serious attention to the subject, and an application of Scripture suitable to the age of the children.

The examiner is particularly requested to direct his attention to the connection between the Scriptures and the daily service of the church, and not to return any young persons for premiums, miums, who did not show an acquaintance proportioned to their age, and other attainments, with the morning and evening prayers.

The Association require that the examination for the first class, shall especially include the general confession, the first collect in the communion service, the second and third morning and evening collects, and the general thanksgiving.

For the second class; the general confession, the first collect in the communion service, the second and third morning and evening collects.

For the third class; the first collect in the communion service, and the second and third morning and evening collects.

The fourth and fifth classes; the first collect in the communion service, and the third morning and evening collects.

The minister of the parish should certify in writing, that the children in each class can repeat the prayers thus pointed out for their examination.

The Association earnestly hope for the co-operation of the clergy, of the parents, and of the masters and mistresses of schools and academies, in forwarding a plan so evidently conducive to the best interests of those with whose care they are entrusted. And it is recommended, that when the examination is held in any school, due notice shall be given to the parents or friends of each pupil, that they may have it in their power personally to attend, a measure the utility of which need scarcely be pointed out.

All certificates to be directed to the secretaries, at N° 7, Capel-street; and if sent by the General Post office, to be enclosed in an unsealed cover, addressed to "Edward Smith Lees, esquire,"—"on the business of the Association."

Application for the premiums may be made to Mrs. Watson, bookseller to the Association, N° 7, Capel-street, within a week after forwarding the certificates.

No premiums will be granted by the Association on any former system of regulations, after the 1st of October next.

Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, commonly called The Kildare Street Society.

Appendix, N° 199.

Extract from the Fourteenth Report of the Commissioners of the Board of Education, in Ireland, October 1812.

Extract from Fourteenth Report of Commissioners of the Board of Education in Ireland.

“ THAT instruction, except in a very few instances, extends no farther than reading, writing, and the common rules of arithmetic; and the prices paid are on an average ten shillings per annum for reading, seventeen shillings and four-pence where writing, and one pound six shillings where arithmetic is added: but even this limited instruction the masters are in general very ill qualified to give, having been themselves taught in schools of a similar description, and consequently deficient in information, unacquainted with regular plans of education, and unaccustomed to that discipline, from the steady and temperate enforcement of which some of the best advantages of education are derived.

“ The poverty of the lower classes of the people, which limits the recompense of the masters to the low rates above-mentioned, and thus holds out no temptation to a better class to undertake the office of instructors, produces effects, if possible, still worse, by incapacitating them from purchasing such books as are fit for children to read: whence it frequently happens, that instead of being improved by religious and moral instruction, their minds are corrupted by books calculated to incite to lawless and profligate adventure, to cherish superstition, or to lead to dissension or disloyalty.

“ From the facts here stated, we conceive it clearly to appear, that the lower class of the people in Ireland, are extremely anxious to obtain instruction for their children, even at an expense, which though small, very many of them can ill afford; and there is a circumstance to which we beg leave to call Your Grace's attention, that puts this desire in a yet stronger point of view—we mean the existence of evening schools, established (and in one parish there are eleven of them) for the instruction of those children, whose service during the day, their parents could not afford to lose.

“ Were it therefore even admitted that the benefits of education are not to the lower classes of the people as great as we conceive them to be, yet the necessity of assisting in obtaining it for them in this country would not be diminished, but increased; for such education as has been objected to, under the idea of its leading to evil rather than to good, they are actually obtaining for themselves, and though we conceive it practicable to correct it, to check its progress appears impossible; it may be improved, but it cannot be impeded.

“ To substitute for the ill-taught and ill-regulated schools which we have been describing, a systematic and uniform plan of instruction, such as should gratify the desire of information, which manifests itself among the lower classes of the people of Ireland, and at the same time form those habits of regularity and discipline, which are yet more valuable than mere learning, it appears to us necessary that Commissioners should be appointed, with extensive powers, as we shall more fully describe in the subsequent parts of this Report.

“ With respect to the selection of these Commissioners, it does not appear to belong to us to enter into any particular suggestions,—that on their abilities, liberality, and prudence, and on the general confidence to be placed in them, the success of the plan will depend, we deem it almost superfluous to remark.

“ We recommend, that in the first place, those Commissioners be instructed to apply to the governors of all the existing establishments for the education of the lower classes, wherever the information which has been received by us shall appear to be insufficient, and to require from them returns of the several institutions, over which they preside, such as may enable them to ascertain in what districts, supplementary schools, to be put under the direction of Protestant or Roman Catholic masters, as the circumstance of the case may render eligible, are most immediately necessary; which schools the Commissioners should be empowered to found, to endow, and to regulate. The check which the existing schools would receive, were the superintendence of them to be transferred to the proposed Commissioners; the difficulty of changing long settled establishments, and the waste of time to the Commissioners, who would be much more profitably employed in forming new seminaries, than in altering old ones, induce us strongly to recommend, that the institutions which now exist, should remain under their present managers, and that the spirit of improvement already manifested among them, should be left to operate undisturbed, under the influence of that emulation which the new establishments would naturally excite.

“ For the purpose of ascertaining more exactly the number of those supplementary schools; for selecting proper situations for erecting and establishing them where wanted; for prescribing the mode of education to be pursued; and for the general superintendence of them, we are of opinion, that a Board of Commissioners as above-mentioned, should be appointed, under the authority of an Act of Parliament, empowering them to receive and dispose of Parliamentary grants for building and endowing schools; to purchase or accept conveyances for the sites of such schools; to decide, in the last resort, on the appointment, conduct, and dismissal of masters; to prescribe the course and mode of education; to provide for the expense of furnishing books, and to have a general controul over the whole of the proposed establishments for the instruction of the lower classes.

"Some time, perhaps, must elapse, before the Commissioners can have procured the necessary information, to prepare them for entering on the part of their duty, we have been last describing. But that interval may be most usefully employed in forwarding a measure of the highest importance to the success of any plan of national instruction; we mean, that of preparing a sufficient number of teachers, completely qualified to convey that instruction. We have already adverted to the deplorable want of such qualification in a great majority of those who now teach in the common schools, and to the pernicious consequences arising from it; their ignorance, we have reason to believe, is not seldom their least disqualification; and the want of proper books often combines with their own opinions and propensities, in introducing into their schools such as are of the worst tendency. Even for schools of a superior description, and under better controul, there is a general complaint, that proper masters cannot be procured without much difficulty; and we are persuaded that a more essential service could not be rendered to the state, than by carrying into effect a practicable mode of supplying a succession of well qualified instructors for the children of the lower classes. It fortunately happens, that there are in this country existing establishments, as well Roman Catholic as Protestant, which, we are persuaded, might, with little difficulty, give effectual assistance towards this great national purpose. This the Commissioners would find no difficulty in arranging with the governors of the several institutions. In such arrangements, and indeed in the whole of this part of the scheme, much will of course depend upon the discretion of the Commissioners; and we recommend that they should be directed and required to apply themselves immediately to the preparing a sufficient number of well qualified masters, to undertake the conduct of such supplementary schools as they should from time to time proceed to endow; the progress would naturally be gradual, and time would thus be allowed for competent masters to be prepared for them.

"In their choice of situation for the supplementary schools, the Commissioners should be directed not solely by the apparent necessity for them, from the want of proper or of any schools, but partly by the facilities afforded for a proper establishment for the master, and partly by the prospect of their succeeding to such a degree as to hold out example and encouragement for their farther progress and success.

"We are willing to hope, that in schools thus advantageously situated, the general adoption of, and a steady adherence to, a course of education manifestly superior in its mode and objects of instruction, and uniting a careful attention to moral and religious principles, with an evident purpose of respecting the peculiar tenets of different sects of Christians, would excite at first, in their immediate neighbourhood, and by degrees, in every part of Ireland, a strong prepossession in favour of such establishments, and effectually obviate any prejudices that might have been entertained against them.

"During the period in which the Commissioners may be employed in the preparatory inquiries already alluded to, their attention may also be directed to the selection of proper books for the use of all the schools under their management; it being our opinion that nothing should be taught in any of them, without the express approbation of the Commissioners, nor any book introduced which has not been sanctioned by them; and from the execution of this part of the plan, we anticipate advantages of the utmost importance to the whole country, inasmuch as we cannot doubt that the books thus prepared will, by degrees, be universally adopted in every school, whether public or private; and while education is thus facilitated by an uniform system of instruction, the evils arising from the want of proper books adapted to the inferior schools will be removed, and the children no longer exposed to the corruption of morals and perversion of principles, too often arising from the books actually in use.

"In such selection of books for the new schools, we doubt not but it will be found practicable to introduce not only a number of books, in which moral principles will be inculcated in such a manner as is likely to make deep and lasting impressions on the youthful mind, but also ample extracts from the sacred Scriptures themselves, an early acquaintance with which we deem of the utmost importance, and indeed indispensable, in forming the mind to just notions of duty, and sound principles of conduct.

"It appears to us that a selection may be made, in which the most important parts of Sacred History shall be included; together with all the precepts of morality, and all the instructive examples by which those precepts are illustrated and enforced, and which shall not be liable to any of the objections which have been made to the use of the Scriptures in the course of education.

"The study of such a volume of extracts from the Sacred Writings would, in our opinion, form the best preparation for that more particular religious instruction which it would be the duty, and we doubt not, the inclination also, of their several ministers of religion to give, at proper times, and in other places, to the children of their respective congregations.

"To enter into a minute detail, or to define the limits of the instruction to be given in those schools, or the manner in which it ought to be communicated, we deem not within our province, but to belong to the duty of the Commissioners, whose appointment we have proposed, as the first step towards establishing a better system of education for the children of the lower orders of the people. At first we reckon that instruction will be confined to reading, writing and the common rules of arithmetic, taught at different prices, and with a free option to the parents to have their children instructed in one or all of them. Time and experience will determine the expediency, and the means of giving to such as may desire it, a more enlarged course of education, and of providing for those, whose talents may deserve it, that instruction which their poverty might place beyond their reach. But we are of opinion, that more advantage will at present result from giving a limited education to a considerable number, than from providing a better system for a few, particularly as masters qualified for the latter purpose, could scarcely be procured; and we anticipate, as the first and most certain fruits of the appointment of these Commissioners, the selection and publication of a number of books for the use of the schools which they shall establish; a prompt and liberal supply of which to the schools at present in existence, will produce immediate and beneficial effects."

Examination of Joseph Devonsher Jackson, Esq. on Oath; Wednesday, 1st December 1824.

Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

YOU are a practising barrister?—I am.

You fill the situation of secretary of the Society for promoting the education of the poor of Ireland, commonly called the Kildare-street Society?—I do.

Do you receive any remuneration?—Not pecuniary.

Do you receive any other?—I apprehend we shall receive ample remuneration hereafter, from witnessing the improved state of the country; but the gentlemen concerned in the management of the Institution have associated for the purpose of carrying forward the business of national education gratuitously.

In what manner are the affairs of the Society administered?—By a committee consisting of thirty-one members; and that committee which exercises a controul over all the business of the Institution, is divided into sub-committees.

Enumerate the several sub-committees into which it is divided?—There is a sub-committee of correspondence which manages the communications between the Institution and the various applicants for aid, and correspondents of the Society. There is a sub-committee called the Book Sub-committee, whose business it is to superintend the publications which issue from the press for the use of the schools, and for forwarding the education of the poor; there is also a sub-committee, consisting I believe of the same members, called the Library Sub-committee; the business of that is to superintend the making of grants to institutions, for lending libraries for the use of the poor; there is a sub-committee also for the house concerns, for managing the domestic concerns of the Institution; that sub-committee has not now very much to do, the business having been put upon a proper footing some time since; there is a sub-committee whose duty it is to look to the model schools of the Institution in Kildare-place, they are to see that the schools are properly conducted, that they afford instruction to the poor of the district, and to superintend the department for training masters and mistresses for schools throughout the country; and there is a sub-committee of accounts, they are to see that the accounts of the Institution are properly kept, and that they come before the general committee properly vouched.

Are the proceedings of any of those committees final before they have been examined into by the general committee?—No, none of them; all the sub-committees are controuled by the general committee; the stated meetings of the general committee are held every Saturday, and there are special meetings for such purposes as may be necessary. The sub-committees have also their stated days of meeting. They have their regular periods for making reports to the general committee, and upon any occasions requiring it, they make special reports; but all the business of the sub-committees is brought before the general committee before it is finally decided upon.

About what number usually attend the meeting of the general committee?—Of course the numbers vary; we have larger meetings sometimes than at others; but upon an average I should say, we have from ten to twelve, but if there is any thing more than mere routine business, we have a full meeting, perhaps twenty; there are special summonses issued when there is any thing out of the common course, and then we are sure to have very full meetings.

At what hour are the meetings of the general committee held?—I think for eight months of the year they are held at eight o'clock in the morning, and the committee continues sitting till the business is finished; during the winter months we meet at half past eight.

Is there any particular reason for so unusual an hour being appointed for business?—We have various motives for it; one is that we shall breakfast together, and that gentlemen should then have conversation upon the general concerns of the Institution, so as not to interfere with the course of business in the committee room; another object is, to accommodate the great portion of our body, who are engaged in various pursuits in life, and who must get away at a reasonable hour to their own business. If the committee did not meet at an early hour we could not do that.

Is that breakfast provided out of the funds of the Institution?—No, it is not; we have perhaps been rather particular about the whole of that concern; the expense of our tea equipage, as well as of our breakfasts, is provided by subscription of the members of the committee, as we do not think it right that the public should pay for any thing connected with our own accommodation.

Can you state the religion of the several members that form the managing committee?—I believe we have members of almost all persuasions in the country.

State how many members of the established church are in the committee of thirty-one?—There are at present two vacancies in the committee; I think there are twenty-one members of 535

Examination of

of the established church; I cannot say I have seen every one of them at church, but I believe they are members of the establishment.

How many Roman Catholics are there upon the committee?—There are at present but two of that persuasion upon the committee; a short time ago we had another, an excellent man indeed, Mr. Nolan, one of the most efficient members we had upon the committee.

How many Presbyterians have you?—I believe there are two Presbyterians.

How many of the Society of Friends?—Four, I think.

Is there a member of any other persuasion than those you have enumerated?—I think not.

You have enumerated twenty-nine, and you say there are two vacancies?—Yes, that is right.

Is there any person upon the committee whom you know or believe to belong to the connection of Wesleyan Methodists?—I do not believe that there are any connected with the Wesleyan Methodists; I would not be understood to say that I speak positively as to the persuasions of members of the committee; but to the best of my judgment and belief they are as I have described.

Are you aware of any member upon the committee belonging to the connexion of Whitfield Methodists?—No, nor to any Methodists.

Can you state why there is not a larger proportion than two of the Roman Catholic persuasion?—Indeed I cannot assign any particular reason for it; we should have been at all times happy to have had the co-operation of more members of that communion; those now on the committee I believe were invited to be members of it; I do not think they proposed themselves; indeed I never knew an instance of any gentleman canvassing to become a member of the committee.

In what manner are the members of the committee appointed?—They are elected at the annual general meeting of the subscribers; a general meeting of all the subscribers is held every year, and they have all a voice in the election of the committee.

Is the committee elected by ballot, or is a list proposed and adopted?—A member moves that such and such be of the committee, and such and such the treasurer and the secretary of the Institution for the ensuing year, and if any body chooses to move an amendment, he is at liberty to do it.

Has any difference of opinion prevailed at such meetings, as to the persons to constitute the committee?—Never.

Is there, in point of fact, any substantial difference between the committee one year and another?—Not much; we are anxious to take into the committee such gentlemen as are anxious to promote the education of the poor; we look out for such, and I am sorry to say it is not an easy thing to obtain such gentlemen, but whenever we observe an individual who seems to have objects of this nature at heart, and who having time to spare, is willing to devote it to such objects, we invite him to belong to the committee.

What is the mode of admission to the Society at large?—There is no previous qualification, merely subscribing a guinea a year, or ten guineas at one payment would constitute the subscriber a member; it is free to the whole public.

Are there many Roman Catholic gentlemen members of the Society?—I do not think there are very many; there are some.

Do the two Roman Catholic gentlemen usually attend in the committee?—They do not.

Do either of them?—As to one of them, I do not think I have seen him more than once in the room; as to the other he is a barrister in very considerable practice; I have seen him in the room, but he does not often come.

Was not the attendance of Roman Catholic gentlemen in the committee a few years ago more frequent than at present?—We have had but two other Roman Catholic gentlemen in my recollection upon the committee, and of them we were deprived by death; one was never absent when in health, he was one of our most laborious members, he was one of the book sub-committee; the other was a gentleman advanced in life, but who frequently attended the meetings of the general committee.

How many vice presidents are there of the Society?—Eight.

State the religion of the vice presidents?—I think there are six Protestants of the established church, and I think two Roman Catholics.

Of what religion are you yourself?—I am a member of the established church of England and Ireland.

Enumerate any officers of the society who are of the Roman Catholic religion?—There are two of the inspectors.

Two out of what number?—Six at present; but we have it in contemplation to appoint more inspectors. The master of our model male school is a Roman Catholic, he has been the master from the beginning; the mistress of the female model school is also a Roman Catholic.

Do you recollect at present any others of your clerks or officers who are Roman Catholics?—As to the clerks, I do not know of what persuasion they are, I believe there are some of them of the Society of Friends, their garb bespeaks this, but otherwise, I cannot say what persuasion they are of. I ought to mention as the reason for my not being better informed upon this point, that we never do regard the persuasion of the individual in making any appointment to any office. This is an essential rule of the Institution. With respect to the masters and mistresses of country schools who are trained with us, we know their persuasions, because, having the superintendence of their conduct whilst training, and holding ourselves responsible for it, we direct that they shall go to their respective places of worship upon the Sabbath day, and they are obliged, therefore, to state of what religious persuasion they are respectively; but as to the pupils in the schools, or persons in any other department of the Institution, we do not know of what persuasions they are.

Look again at the list of the committee, and describe the several professions of those members, how many, for instance, are barristers?—I think there are eleven barristers, and one master in chancery.

How many merchants are there?—I think there are six merchants; there are besides gentlemen who may be said to belong to the mercantile world, but they are bank directors, and bankers, and I do not know that they are to be called merchants; there are two directors of the national bank, and there are two private bankers.

How many gentlemen who have no particular profession?—I think there is but one who has not a profession or business. There are two solicitors.

Are there any clergymen?—No, there is not a single clergyman on the committee; we thought it better not to have any member of that profession on the committee.

Is there any rule for their exclusion?—I cannot say there is any rule, but it is a principle we have been acting upon; we thought it might be a subject of jealousy, as we were a society for promoting the education of the poor of Ireland, and as the poor of Ireland consist chiefly of Roman Catholics, we thought it would be more agreeable to them to have the affairs of the Institution administered by laymen than by clergymen.

Did you ever take it into consideration that you might have clergy of all persuasions?—We thought it better not to have clergy at all; the Society never had in view the making of proselytes from one religion to another, and we thought it might be suspected that proselytism was in view, if there were persons upon the committee whose profession rendered it perhaps their duty to take all means to make proselytes. We thought it better not to have clerical men upon the committee; it is not in this country a very easy matter to carry forward the business of education. We have unfortunately so many differences, and it has been our study to place the institution upon sound and liberal principles, and to steer clear of every thing that could give reasonable ground of offence.

You have mentioned there are eleven barristers upon the committee, and that they take upon themselves a considerable proportion of the trouble; are they, generally speaking, gentlemen of considerable business in the profession?—Some of them are very eminent in their profession indeed; several of them are in very respectable business.

Do those persons take as much trouble as others who have less business?—Except one of them, who is a gentleman in an official situation, they do, and that individual before he filled the situation he now does, did take his full share of the business, and he now attends on special occasions.

Is there some committee or other sitting every day in the week except Sunday?—Very nearly so; I cannot say there is a sub-committee which has a fixed meeting upon every day in the week, but each of the sub-committees has a meeting in the course of the week. I should have mentioned there are special sub-committees frequently appointed upon occasions which arise incidentally, and when taking into consideration such occasional sub-committees, I think it may be said there is one sitting every day in the week, or nearly so.

Are there any days in the week when there are more than one sitting?—Yes, frequently; some of the sub-committees are obliged to sit on more days than one in each week; for example, the sub-committee of correspondence which is in my particular department, meets on every Wednesday, and frequently continues sitting by adjournment each day till Saturday.

How many applications are made in a week to the correspondence sub-committee?—A great number; the fact is, that from habit and experience we have been able to classify our business; was it not for that, it would be utterly impossible for the sub-committee to carry it forward, but our officers are now able to judge what business it is necessary to bring under the consideration of the sub-committee; there are some letters involving mere routine business, or matters of form. When applications come in the first instance to us (for example), it is often only necessary to send down the queries and a printed circular, apprising parties of the course they must take, and those applications do not now come before the correspondence sub-committee; nothing is brought before them but what requires the exercise of discretion, and the making a special order of that description; I think our number is about seventy or eighty per week, but the communications received and to be answered, are more than twice or perhaps three times that number.

How many schools are at present in connection with the Society?—I cannot take upon myself to answer that question with precision. I was not aware till I was in court to day, that I should have the honour of appearing before the Board; at the close of the last year we had about a thousand efficient schools in connection with us; the number was 1,122 upon the books, but we entered into a close examination of the schools, and any we found to have merged into other schools, or to have become inefficient, we struck off the list. During the present year, we have been adding each quarter at the rate of a hundred and thirty new schools, and we are now in the fourth quarter; I should think we have now upwards of 1,400 effective schools.

Is it your own hope that this exertion upon the part of the members of the committee, such as you have described it can continue—that the public can look permanently to their exercising the office?—I have every hope of it; I should be extremely sorry to think otherwise; we began upon a small scale, and the Institution has gone on thriving and prospering under under our care; we have all become attached to it, and I am sure it would cost each of us a pang to be obliged to desert it.

Do you not conceive, that the present regularity of attendance may be, in some degree, attributable to the interest naturally excited by a degree of discussion, and in some instances of opposition, which the proceedings of the Society have latterly given rise to throughout the country?—I cannot say so; the faces I see at the meetings of the committee are just the same as I was in the habit of meeting before the opposition commenced.

Is it your own impression, that the number of 1,400 schools, is likely materially to increase?—Yes there is every reason to expect it; it is notorious there has been a great deal of opposition for some time past, particularly since this commission has been in exercise; and notwithstanding that, the applications for establishing new schools, and for aid to old schools, have gone on increasing, and I have not a doubt upon my own mind that the opposition will subside, and that the increase will proceed on a much greater scale by and bye.

It appears from your evidence, that the number of new schools likely to be added in the course of the present year, are 520; is it your opinion, that for the year ensuing for instance, 500 schools and upwards would be added to the list?—Certainly, I should think so.

Do you see any reason to suppose, that for the four or five years following that year, that the number will be less?—I should think not; my opinion is, that the number will go on increasing progressively, till a sufficient number of schools shall have been established to meet the exigencies of the country.

Is it your opinion, that the committees would if they could, or could if they would, give sufficient time to the management of so extensive a system as that you are now contemplating?—No doubt; we have felt ourselves, from time to time, a good deal pressed by the weight of business; and I am quite certain, if the business had been as great at an earlier period as it is now, we could not have carried it on; but the experience we have been gaining in the management of the Institution, the arrangements we have been able to make for the dispatch of business, our officers becoming daily more skilful; all these things combined, enable us now to do what we should have been unable to dispatch at a former period. Besides the difficulty of management does not increase in the same proportion as the extension of the Institution; because when certain well-considered rules and regulations are established, they govern many cases.

We collect that it is your opinion, that there is a very increased opposition to the proceedings of the Society in the present year, compared with the year preceding?—Yes, quite unprecedented; there has been nothing like it before in my experience.

Are we to understand, that the number of applications for new schools during the present year has been greater than during the last year?—Greater far.

How do you account for that?—The applications do not come from the parties opposing the Institution. It becomes daily more extensively known. It was some time indeed before its nature and objects were understood. It has been gradually extending the advantages of education throughout the country; and the very opposition we have had to encounter at our annual general meetings and elsewhere, and the discussions which have arisen in the country, in which we were sure to be drawn in; all these have effectually called the attention of the public to the Institution. This has led to inquiries as to its objects, and as to the facilities it affords to those desirous of establishing schools; and this again has naturally led to increase the applications for aid to schools throughout the country.

Are we to collect that it is your opinion, that the friends of the institution are increasing as well as those who disapprove of it?—Certainly.

You have spoken of quarters from whence opposition has arisen, will you explain a little more fully what you mean by that?—It appears to me, that the Roman Catholic clergy are the chief causes of the opposition at present; it seems as if they were acting under the orders of superiors, as if some direction had been issued from authority to the parochial clergy throughout the country, to oppose the schools in connection with the Institution; and as if many of them obeyed such orders with reluctance.

To what period would you refer the issuing of those orders?—I should refer them, for the most part, to the period of the issuing of this Commission of Inquiry; there was some stir at the Roman Catholic board or association upon the subject previously; there were some meetings of that body, at which letters were read from some bishops and clergy of the Roman Catholic church, disapproving of Scriptural education.

In what manner do you suppose the existence of this commission is connected with such opposition, or the issuing such orders?—I should think the object was to shew the power possessed by the Roman Catholic church in that respect; perhaps it may not be right for me to make surmises of this kind.

We wish for your opinion, founded upon so much experience as you must possess upon this subject?—I am bound to give my opinion, and therefore I must say, that I conceive the object of those who oppose the schools is to shew they possess power over the people, and that it is essential to the success of any system of national education, that it should be in their hands, or under their management. I have known a great many instances in which clergymen of that persuasion have been in correspondence with us, and I am happy to say, we have still some who continue to act with us, notwithstanding the opposition.

Have the instances been frequent, antecedent to this year, of Roman Catholic clergy applying to you for assistance for schools, and undertaking to conform to your regulations?—Yes, a great many; and there have been some this year.

Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

When had you any such last?—Many within the last fortnight; there is one very respectable gentleman, the Rev. Mr. Gibbons, at Castlebar, who has been an applicant to us in the present year, and has had aid from us for several of his schools, which are doing very well, as appears from our inspector's reports; and the teachers of his schools have been considered entitled to gratuities in consequence of their good conduct, the state of their schools, and their conformity to our rules.

Have you not had some applications consequent upon the tour of some of the Commissioners?—I have no doubt that we have had recent applications for aid from clergymen of the Roman Catholic persuasion; and I believe that several of them have been under a mistake as to our principles; and that a good deal of the opposition that the Institution encountered, both before and during this year, arose from misconception. I have heard of instances, from authority which I can rely upon, where those misconceptions have been removed, and the consequence has been, that we have received applications from those quarters for aid.

Have any instances fallen within your observation of schools, where the Roman Catholic clergy had a few years ago applied to you for assistance, and had undertaken to conform to your regulations, and who have, within the present year, detached themselves from your connection?—There are such instances, certainly; there is a Mr. M'Davit, in the North-West (I forget which county), he was a satisfactory correspondent for some time, and I was surprised, on the last day of meeting, to receive a letter from him, desiring to withdraw all his schools from connection with us, on account of the reading of the Scriptures. I was very sorry to see such a change, amounting to inconsistency; for a very short time before, he had applied for aid for a new school, pledging himself to observe our rules in all respects.

In that case, is not the money that the Society may have advanced for the building, irrecoverably lost?—I cannot say, irrecoverably lost; for in similar cases it has been returned. In one case, a Mr. O'Loughlin, of Ennistymond, said he would refund the money granted to him. Mr. M'Davit has not made such a proposition to us, but I am not sure that we shall not call upon him for that purpose. There may be a question of law upon it, whether we could recover by a hostile proceeding; but it is right to state, that whenever we make a substantial grant for building, we require that a lease shall be made of the ground upon which the building is erected, to secure the application of the building to the purposes of instruction; so that there cannot be any great loss to the funds of the Society from that circumstance: there must be a very gross fraud, in order that any loss should be sustained. When we make a trivial grant for repairs, or a grant of books or school requisites only, we do not require a lease; but we do require it when we make a substantial grant for building.

What is the amount of the grant that makes the Society think it necessary to insist upon a lease?—If we go so far as 30 l.; indeed we have done it when we have not gone so far.

Do you require any land to be attached to the scite of the schoolhouse?—We do not require much land, merely that which is necessary for the scite of the school, and for the school offices; we do not wish the master to be engaged in agriculture.

Who are the trustees ordinarily selected for the purposes of those leases?—They are various; we do not interfere in that respect; we do not in any instance name the trustees; we wish to interfere as little as is consistent with the carrying forward of our business with the local managers or patrons of the schools in the country; we leave it to them to name such persons as they think fit; they are sometimes laymen in the neighbourhood, sometimes clergymen, we would rather not have them of the latter class; however there are districts in Ireland where the resident gentry are so few, that the clergyman of the parish is necessarily brought a good deal into action.

Do you frequently find, that the regulations of the Society are departed from in your schools?—Yes, there have been a great many instances where departures have taken place from inadvertencies and misconceptions which have arisen from persons thinking they were complying with our rules; for instance, by using the book called the Scripture lessons, in place of the Scriptures; when such instances have been discovered, a letter has been immediately written, calling the attention of the manager to the deviation, and informing him that the use of the Scripture lessons is not a compliance with the rules of the Society, for that the Scriptures of either version must be in the school, and that no other book is admitted as a substitute for them.

Describe the system of inspection that the Society adopts, in order to inform itself of such deviation?—We have at present six inspectors, and they are out upon their tours of inspection for almost the whole year; it is their business to inspect closely every school connected with the Society, and to transmit a detailed report, according to a certain form, of each school, these reports are brought before the correspondence sub-committee, and where we perceive a deviation in any instance, a letter is written calling the attention of the patron or manager thereto, and as I have already stated, almost in every instance, such deviations have been rectified upon such letter being sent.

Are those inspectors of the rank of gentlemen?—Yes, they are for the most part, I think they are all entitled to be so considered; for although one (Mr. Mills) was in humble life, his conduct entitles him to that character; I believe he was a schoolmaster and clerk of a parish—his conduct has been very correct indeed as an inspector; all the rest are gentlemen by birth, one is a barrister, and a most excellent officer; our experience taught us to look for persons of that description; Mr. Mills was the first we had appointed, and we took him from humble life, he had been trained in our school as a master, and was known to

539
Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

Mr. Veevers ; in that way he knew what his capabilities were, and considered he would be a very fit man for the office of inspector ; he was particularly well acquainted with the mode of conducting schools upon the improved mode of teaching ; however we very soon became aware that there were other very important functions for the inspector to perform, besides merely the examination of the conduct of the school ; for example, the inspectors are in fact the representatives of the Society, they come in contact with the gentlemen of the country who are engaged in promoting education, and we found it was necessary to have persons intelligent and well informed, capable of holding communications with the resident gentry, and of explaining the principles and objects of the Society, and of encouraging persons every where throughout the country to embark in the cause in which we were engaged. In our earlier years that was a very important part of our business ; it is astonishing how difficult it was to excite the attention of the public to the subject, and to engage gentlemen to establish schools and to superintend them when established ; there has been a great deal of attention awakened lately.

State the allowances you make to those inspectors ?—Sixty pounds a year is the salary the inspectors are allowed at present ; I think it is 15s. a day when out on inspection, for travelling allowance ; we made the calculation as nicely as we could ; it has varied ; it was at one time but 12s. 6d. and we found they really could not bear the expense of travelling upon that allowance, because there are a great many parts in this country where public coaches do not travel, and our schools are many of them situated in bye places, and our inspectors have to go to all those schools, and must make reports thereon, they are obliged to keep a horse or gig. In fixing this allowance we had the assistance of some of our mercantile brethren of the committee who were in the habit of sending out riders in the course of their business, persons of an inferior class, and we found that our allowance was fair, our object being merely in the allowance for travelling to cover the expenses, as the salary was to be the remuneration of the officers.

Have they not some further allowances ?—Yes, we allow them when commencing what we call outfit ; I believe it is 60l. for they have to buy a gig and horse ; I am not quite sure of the amount.

Is there not an annual allowance for the wear and tear of their travelling apparatus ?—There has been some change made lately, we have had the subject under our consideration ; I think there is an allowance of 10l. a year for wear and tear ; in the very depth of winter, at the close of the tours of inspection, the inspectors remain in town a few weeks, and it sometimes becomes necessary to call back an inspector from his route to attend on the business of the Institution in Dublin, and whilst he is in town, by a late regulation, we allow the expenses of livery for the horse, and so when not employed in inspection ; those I think are all the allowances they have, and with respect to these, it is not the intention they should produce emolument to the inspector ; these were to cover expenses that appeared to be inevitable.

Are your six inspectors able to visit among them every school in connection with the Society in the course of the year ?—I am afraid they will not be able to do it this year.

Not even once ?—I am afraid not.

Do they visit any schools twice ?—It has become necessary to direct them to visit schools a second time when any thing particular has come to our notice.

Is it the aim of the Society that each school should be visited once ?—It would be our desire, unquestionably, that they should be visited twice a year, and we should wish it to be even oftener if we had officers sufficient for the purpose ; we have had this subject lately under our consideration ; the Institution has been growing up so rapidly, that work for new inspectors arises every quarter.

Do you think the system of inspection a vital part of the whole plan ?—Unquestionably, it would be impossible for the committee sitting in Dublin to be responsible for the management of the schools, unless they had their eyes abroad by means of the inspectors.

Do you send the same inspector twice successively to the same district ?—No, we rather wish to change them ; we wish to hear from different men reports of the same schools, and we have no objection to such reports proceeding from men of different persuasions ; to have, for example, a report from a Roman Catholic inspector this year, and from a Protestant inspector next year ; we are considering of an arrangement to have local inspection, and to engage persons who shall not be chargeable to the Institution to any considerable extent.

You have said you have two Roman Catholic inspectors ; describe their rank and situation in life ?—One of them is Mr. Donelan ; I believe he is nephew to Lady Fingal, and nephew to Sir Edward Bellew, one of the oldest families in Ireland, he was a barrister ; Mr. Malachy Daly, is the other ; I believe, he is a nephew of the late Lord Wallscourt.

The emolument being so small, what has induced such persons to seek the office ?—Our inspectors are all unmarried men, it would be impossible for them to support themselves upon the salary if they were not ; it is not however a disagreeable occupation, and that I think has influenced them in accepting it. I can very well conceive, gentlemen not influenced so much by the emoluments of the situation as by a desire to be useful. I know, with regard to one of the inspectors, that he was a good deal engaged, before he was employed by us, in superintending schools.

Have you had as much reason to be satisfied with the mode in which your Roman Catholic inspectors have executed their duties, as you have with regard to the Protestants ?—With respect to Mr. Donelan, we have had every reason to be satisfied ; no man could discharge his duty more scrupulously, more faithfully, or more prudently, than he has done.

Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

With regard to Mr. Daly, I would not be understood to say any thing unfavourable of him, but he is a very young inspector, and he has not had the same experience to guide him, which Mr. Donelan possesses.

Have you reason to know, whether the system of inspection has been practically useful with respect to the correction of abuse, and the gradual improvement of the schools?—Oh, certainly it has led to the correcting, in numerous instances, errors and mistakes which had crept into schools. I hold in my hand an abstract of Mr. Mills's last report, upon which it appears there were thirty-seven instances of deviation in his district, and that twenty-six were rectified upon his reports being made known to the committee, and letters written thereon; with respect to the remaining eleven, the result of which he states to be unknown, the probability is, that they have been since rectified, or that we are in actual communication with the managers.

With respect to the eleven, the result of which are not yet known, do you imagine in any and what proportion the deviations will be corrected?—I have no doubt but that they will be all rectified.

Do you pay any salary to your masters?—No; we have never paid any salary.

Do you not give them some pecuniary reward?—Yes; we give gratuities to meritorious teachers.

Describe the system that regulates your proceedings in that respect?—The inspectors reports are a very important source of information; but we avail ourselves of all other sources; we consider the relative merits of the teachers, and not only that, but the merits of each teacher compared with his former merit; we have the inspectors reports of the former years before us, and we compare them; we examine into the progress of the scholars, that is one of the particular points upon which the inspector has to report; we look to the teacher's efforts to produce cleanliness and good habits among the scholars, and we award gratuities, varying in amount in proportion to the respective merits of the teachers.

Mention the extremes of those gratuities?—The highest is 10*l.*; and we have gone as low as 1*l.*

Do you withhold in some instances?—Yes; in cases where there has been a deviation reported, we give no gratuity till that is set right; and there are many refusals for want of merit, positive or relative.

Do you think it is generally the result of your system to ameliorate the state of the schools progressively, in connection with you, or do you think it occurs in this as in other instances, that where a school is pretty good in its first institution, it has a tendency in successive years to become a scene of abuse?—I think the tendency of our schools would be towards improvement; all our regulations have that in view.

The question has relation to any facts you may have a knowledge of upon the subject, rather than to mere matter of opinion?—Our experience warrants me in saying that the tendency is towards improvement, and the gratuity and the increase of it, according to the merit of the teacher, tends to that; if we find that a teacher who had been meritorious to a certain degree on a former occasion, has not been progressive, that would affect his gratuity.

We have already had so full an account from Mr. Veevers, of the method pursued by the Society in training masters, we shall not trouble you as to the details of that part of the system, but ask your general opinion as to its importance with respect to the final success of the objects of the Society?—I consider it of the very first rate importance; I am not prepared to say that any other branch of the institution is more important than that; it has been our desire to get into the service as teachers a better description of persons, and I think all our regulations on this subject have that tendency.

Can you speak as to the fact of whether the persons, who during the last year have applied for admission into the training school, have been equal, or inferior, or superior to those who applied five years ago?—I think superior; there is a better description of people applying for the office of teacher, you may see that in the appearance of the persons now assembled in the training school.

Have you reason to be satisfied generally with their conduct?—Yes.

Have you formed any opinion of your own, whether they leave the schools with any greater feelings of attachment than they approach to it?—They generally do; and they are very useful in the country in removing the prejudices that have gone abroad. Their sojourning with us, cannot fail to have a good effect upon the teachers; we should say so from the nature of the thing, but experience warrants us in saying that the very best consequences do result; individuals of the different persuasions live together like the members of one family; they have no differences between them, and I have often questioned them upon the manner in which they were employed out of school hours, and how they lived together, and I have always been answered by such individuals expressing great satisfaction, and even surprise, that they could live together so happily, differing as they did. I am sure the very best consequences have resulted.

Do you consider when they return to their schools throughout the country, that they retain those good feelings towards the institution?—Certainly they do.

Are you able to state whether the majority of schoolmasters in the schools at present in connection with the Society are Protestants or Roman Catholics?—I have no data to guide me with regard to any but those schools which have had masters trained for them; we do not inquire into the religious persuasions of the teachers of other schools; we could not assist any school, unless all persons of whatever profession of Christianity were admissible as teachers therein.

541
Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
1 Dec. 1824.

Have you any means of ascertaining in point of fact the religion of the different masters connected with the Society?—None, except those we have trained; those we can tell, because we know to what places of worship they respectively go, whilst training.

It appears from the evidence of Mr. Veevers, that the number of masters you have trained is about 801; do you conceive that the majority of them are Protestants or Roman Catholics?—I should conceive the majority were Protestants.

Be so good as to ascertain that fact for us?—I will; I should say the majority were Protestants, from my observation, for I have been looking at the list from year to year, as a matter of some interest; we have at present under training, two-thirds Protestants, and one-third Roman Catholics.

Does the Society look out for individuals to train, or are the applications perfectly voluntary on the part of the individuals?—They are quite voluntary.

Does the Society seek to establish schools, or find out schools to which they shall extend their aid, or do they leave it to be made a matter of voluntary application?—We do not seek out any particular schools, we leave it to those who may be interested in the establishment of schools, to make applications to us for aid; but this is to be understood, that all our inspectors, as well as the different members of the Society, endeavour to stir up a feeling, and to excite interest amongst individuals in promoting education throughout the country; and in that way we may be said to seek schools, but in no other way.

Are we to understand that you are equally without data to enable you to ascertain the number of Protestants and Catholics in your schools throughout the country?—It would be a violation of our fundamental rule to take any measures to enable us to form a judgment on that subject.

You can hardly be without some impression upon your mind as to the majority in your schools?—I should say, certainly, that by far the greater number are Roman Catholics.

We should wish to know your opinion as to the extent to which the opposition you have described in the former part of your evidence has been successful in detaining Roman Catholic pupils from your schools?—It has been very successful in Munster; a great proportion of the pupils have been withdrawn in some instances, and in other instances some scholars have been taken away; there are not wanting instances, however, already, where the scholars have begun to return, and in considerable numbers. I recollect, for instance, in the county of Cork, a school from which all the children were withdrawn by the direction of the Catholic clergy, but they have come back again; and even the parents of the children purchased Testaments to send them to the school, although it was to the use of the Scriptures the objection had been made.

Are we to understand that it is your impression, that even in Munster, the children who have been withdrawn will sooner or later return to the schools?—Yes; I judge from the past, we have had interference with schools at times, not upon the great scale now operating; the children have been withdrawn, but only temporarily, and they have returned again.

What is your opinion as to the extent of the success of the opposition in Connaught?—I do not think it has been so extensive as in Munster; there has been opposition, but not so efficient as in Munster.

What should you say of the province of Leinster?—Still less than Connaught, and hardly felt in Ulster at all.

Speaking in round numbers, is it your impression that half of the Roman Catholic pupils in the province of Leinster have been withdrawn?—I do not like to make an answer, when I have not some data to go upon, and I have not made the calculation.

Are you able to express any confident opinion as to what the feelings of the parents of those children are generally, with respect to the withdrawing their children from your schools?—I have had a good deal of evidence before me in the correspondence department, which is that more particularly within my province, as secretary, showing that the children have been taken away by the parents, with great reluctance; they have in many instances, complained bitterly of the coercion under which they acted.

Are you aware of any instance in which the parents of the children seemed to have entered sincerely into the views of their clergy, with respect to the school?—I have not the means of judging positively upon that point; I have seen the children withdrawn; how far it may have been done cordially I cannot take upon myself to say; I have seen a great deal to lead me to believe the parents have done it reluctantly, and that they have been sensible the children derived considerable advantages from instruction in the schools of the Society, and would have been anxious that they should continue to go on enjoying that instruction; but still they have bent to the authority.

Has your experience in the correspondence department of the Society, brought under your observation any instances of attempts to make proselytes in any school connected with the Society?—I cannot call to mind any such instance; I have heard that in some schools connected with us, which happen also to be connected with other societies, that it has been alleged, that something improper in that respect has been done; but I have never had an instance authenticated which I can recollect.

Has any definite charge upon that subject been brought under the view of the correspondence committee?—Never to my knowledge, and I think it could scarcely have occurred without my knowing it; there sometimes has been found a catechism or other objectionable book in schools, and immediately upon such a circumstance appearing, the committee bring to account the patron or correspondent, and the master of the school, and they do not cease till they bring the parties to correct the deviation, and to promise not to suffer it to occur again; again; and unless they comply, we should strike the school off the list, and endeavour to get back from them any of our property which may be accessible, and which we had given upon the pledge that our rules should be abided by.

Has any complaint ever been made to the Society of a direct attempt to change the religion of any of the children in these schools?—Not to my knowledge, and I scarcely think it could have occurred without my knowledge. It already appears that I am a practising barrister, and I am absent from Dublin twice in the year, upon circuit; and it also has happened that I have been obliged to be absent from the country for a time; in those intervals things may of course occur that may not meet my attention; but, however, I think I have a pretty general knowledge of what has occurred during my occasional absence.

If an instance of a complaint of that peculiar nature had occurred, do you think you could have escaped hearing of it in the subsequent meetings of the committee?—Scarcely, I think.

Would it not become the subject of considerable discussion?—No doubt it would; we are particularly anxious and jealous upon the subject of any deviations from our principles in that respect.

Did you ever hear an instance of a child in any of the schools having changed its religion?—Yes, I think I have heard of one instance; on recollection, however, I am not very sure that it was a school of ours; I recollect some time ago, to have heard of some changes of persuasion in a school in the county of Limerick, not far from Castleconnel; but I am not sure whether it was a Sunday school or not, but I rather think it was a Sunday school; and at all events I think I may safely say, that no such case was brought before the committee, nor has there ever been a complaint made to us to my knowledge, that a child in any of our schools had changed its persuasion, in consequence of any attempts to tamper with its religious principles; if such a thing came before us, it would be visited by us immediately, and in a very decided manner.

You are of course aware that many of the schools in connection with your Society are also in connection with other societies?—Certainly.

Is that a circumstance that the committee are disposed to approve of or regret?—I conceive that they are not disposed to approve of it; it arose in the early period of the Institution, rather perhaps from necessity than from choice; in the first instance our funds were very small; and even after we had received grants from Parliament, we had not a very large fund disposable for the general purposes of education, our first parliamentary grants having been for building; we were of course anxious to assist schools conducted agreeably to our principles, as far as it was in our power, and as we gave no salaries to the masters, we were glad to find a provision made in that important point from some other source; in that way we were led to make grants to schools, connected with other institutions. We became sensible, however, that inconvenience might arise from other societies over which we had no controul, and with which we had no connexion, interfering with our regulations in the schools assisted by us, and for a time we withheld aid from schools in connection with other societies, partly on that ground and partly from a wish to give more effectual assistance to such as were entirely dependant upon us; however, on reviewing our principles, and seeing we were pledged to give such aid as we possessed, to schools conducted agreeably to our rules, we thought that we could not consistently refuse aid to applicants merely on the ground that the schools were in connection with other societies; of course we at all times exercise a close inspection over those schools. I believe the committee would now be desirous rather to disconnect their schools from all other interference.

Have you experienced any practical inconvenience from the circumstance of the connection that has been alluded to?—I think I have observed, that prejudice has arisen against our schools in some instances, from the circumstance of other societies being engaged in those schools, whose principles were not so agreeable to the country as our own.

Could you ascertain for us, how many schools are in connection with the London Hibernian Society, that are also in connection with yours, and the same with respect to the Association for discountenancing Vice, and the same with respect to the Baptist Society's schools, and the same with respect to Erasmus Smith's schools?—Of course we must have documents that would enable us to give that information, because we require in our queries to know whether the schools receive aid from any other, and what sources; and in answer to that we have generally the information now sought.

Have you ever had any direct communication with any of those societies?—None whatever; we have only to do with individual schools; and if an applicant on behalf of a school shows us, that it stands in need of aid, we give it; if that person appears trust-worthy, we feel bound to entertain the application on behalf of that school.

Do you not consider the rules of your Society and the rules of the Association for discountenancing Vice to differ?—I believe with respect to the schools to which the Association give aid for building, they require an engagement that the master shall be a Protestant. With respect to such a school as that, it would be impossible for us to give aid to it; but we have found that the Association and other institutions have given certain aid to schools, finding that the teachers were in fact Protestants, without any antecedent obligation, or requiring any pledge for the future, that the teachers should at all times be Protestants. We have never given assistance to any school where we have not conceived that practically the office of schoolmaster was open to persons of all religious persuasions; the subject adverted to in this question had not escaped our notice. With respect to the Association and Robertson's charity, we felt it our duty to inquire into the principles upon which the schools deriving aid from them were conducted, and we got such explanations as satisfied us, that we could assist schools assisted by them consistently with our principles, on receiving a pledge that they should be conducted upon our principles.

 Examination of

 Esq.

Are not the rules of the Association matters of notoriety?—I believe so.

If a school is found to be in connection with the Association, must there not be this practical distinction between them; that the condition of the Association is, that the master shall be, at all events, and under all circumstances, of the Protestant religion, and that the catechism shall be taught in the school; and are not those two rules incompatible with the rules of your Society?—They are incompatible, and we could not give aid where any such appeared.

If a school receives aid from the Association, must it not abide by its rules?—We have been given to understand not; it is considered that that rule of the Association is complied with, if, in point of fact, they find the teacher a Protestant, without any antecedent stipulation that he shall be so; if they find him a Protestant they will give certain aid.

They give aid, annexing a condition to it, that you say shall not be annexed?—We are very pointed upon that subject; we have an express query to the following effect: “Are all denominations of Christians admissible as governors, teachers and scholars in the school, on behalf of which you are now applying?” and unless we are informed that all are admissible, we cannot and will not aid the school; we have in no instance aided any school where we did not receive an answer upon those points in the affirmative.

Could that answer have been given fairly, and in the spirit of a true answer with respect to any school established under the Association?—I cannot but believe it could.

Is it not inconsistent with the spirit of that rule, as it is published in the Appendix to their Report?—I think it is; there is something in it I confess like double dealing.

Would not the plain and intelligible result be this; that if a school received money from the Association, it must have been received under avowed conditions; which conditions, looked at in their true spirit, are incompatible with the Kildare-street rules?—It would appear to be so, but we have assisted a great many schools on the exclusive application of Roman Catholic clergymen; now there is a moral certainty, that while the school is under the management of the Roman Catholic clergyman, he will have a Roman Catholic teacher; but he tells us, he has no rule whereby he excludes other denominations of Christians; with reference to Mr. O’Loughlin, of Ennistymond, he gave us an answer that was not very satisfactory at first to that question, and we had some correspondence before we got a distinct answer from him; I held it to be my duty to question him about it, and I put it to him thus: I am quite aware that the population about you are chiefly Roman Catholic, and your school will be frequented probably by children of that persuasion for the most part; you will therefore probably appoint a Roman Catholic teacher, it is what I should myself do if I was in your circumstances; but just let me put this to you as a test; suppose the state of things were changed, and your schools were frequented chiefly by Protestant children, would you feel yourself at liberty to appoint a Protestant teacher; and he said he would, and I considered that as sufficient; I have already observed, that our dealing is not with the Association, but with the individual schools; and when we have received the assurance from a respectable quarter, that our rules are adopted, and will be observed, we have considered it sufficient.

As the learning the church of England catechism is a necessary condition in the establishment of schools under the Association, how do you reconcile that rule with the rules of the Kildare-place society?—With respect to the catechism, it cannot be taught during school hours, during the time the school is assembled for the purpose of general instruction, without a deviation from our rule; there must be a fraud practised upon us if that be done; and if such a thing appeared upon the report of our inspector, or otherwise, they must give up that practice, or they could not continue in connection with us.

Are not the persons who regulate those schools, the masters of the hours at which the children are to be taught?—We do not lay down any rules in that respect; we leave that to the local manager of the schools.

If the local manager of the schools was to chuse to direct, that the hours of general instruction for children of all persuasions were on Saturday to be so regulated that the school was to break up at 11 o’clock, and the Protestant children to remain from 11 till 4 to be taught the catechism in that school, would that be deemed a compliance with the rules of the Kildare-place society, or would it be considered a mode of teaching the catechism?—It is not very easy to answer that question with a yea or nay; I can very easily conceive that evasions may be practised, and I believe evasions have been practised; but it is our rule, that nothing shall be done in the school to elicit a knowledge of religious differences existing among the pupils attending the school; and if there were to be a proclamation made in the school, or a notice given, that the Protestant or the Roman Catholic children were to be separated from others, it would be a breach of our rule; but if there be an arrangement, that upon a certain day, or at a certain hour, the school should be broken up, and the children depart to their homes, we should consider that our rules were complied with in that respect, and we do not interfere with what the children do afterwards; we expect that the school shall be bonâ fide broken up; and I should consider any thing else but that a violation of our rule.

Consistent with a compliance with that regulation, how is it possible that the church catechism can be taught?—It may be taught in the same building, but out of the hours of general instruction; we would not permit any regulation that a child, in order to obtain the advantages of the school, must attend at those hours to learn the catechism.

In the sermon of Dr. Elrington, which is published as part of the report of the Association tion for discountenancing Vice in 1822, speaking of the Association, there is the following passage: "Steadily fulfilling their engagement to support that church, that church which they believe to be the only true follower of the religion of Christ, the Association requires, that every school shall be under the special direction of the clergyman of the parish; to him they look for its superintendence, and from him alone do they receive any application for its improvement; and further still, they require, that the catechism of our church should be taught in the school to all who are willing to learn;" do you conceive the observance of that rule is consistent with the rules of the society of which you are a member?—Certainly not; I never read that sermon, and was not amongst the hearers of it; unquestionably, if I was aware of that circumstance, I should myself bring forward the proposition, that no schools in connection with the Association, should remain in connection with us; it is at right angles with our principles.

Must it not necessarily happen, that if a school receives aid both from the Kildare-place society, and the Association, that in some way or other the rules of one of the societies must be broken?—It seems to me, from what I have heard, that there is great reason for saying so; the subject has been brought under my view this day in a light that it never before was; and it does appear to me, that the spirit of the regulation of one or the other must be violated; and were our committee aware of that, I have not the slightest doubt in my mind, that there would be an end of all aid to schools in connection with the Association.

You have stated in your examination, that, according to the rules of the Kildare-place society, the Testament is not considered as a class book, but that it is read only by the older boys, and such as may be thought likely to comprehend the meaning of it; are you aware, that in the schools which are under the regulations of the Hibernian society, the Scriptures are invariably and necessarily read as a class book?—Yes.

In what way do you think it can be compatible with your rules, to permit your schools to be under the control of Hibernian inspectors?—We have but three rules that we consider fundamental that must be complied with; the one is, that the Scriptures, without note or comment, shall be used in the school by all who have attained a sufficient proficiency; that all catechisms and books of religious controversy, shall be excluded from the school; and that persons of all persuasions, all denominations of Christians, shall be eligible to all stations in the different schools; when those three rules are complied with, our principles are satisfied; we can assist the school, and we have not a "must;" as to the rest, though we recommend the mode in which the Scriptures should be used, we do not feel at liberty to withhold our aid, because our regulations are not followed in that respect.

Are we to understand, that when you said it was a "rule" of the Kildare-place society, that the Scriptures should not be read as a class book, you meant a recommendation?—It is a practice recommended by the Society, that the Scriptures should be used by the children capable of improving by them, and not like a horn-book; but we do not say, unless the thing be done precisely as recommended, we will withhold our aid.

Are you aware, that if any person who overlooks the school, does not choose to comply with your regulation, but admits the rules of the London Hibernian Society, that that school becomes much more objectionable to Roman Catholics, than if your rules alone were complied with?—I incline to think they are. I incline to think that the practice of having the Scriptures as the only book in the school, and committing the Scriptures to memory (which we do not enjoin, but which we do not prohibit,) are calculated to produce, and do produce opposition to schools.

Are you aware that it is a rule of the London Hibernian Society, that the Scriptures should be taken home by the children?—I have heard it said that it is; and we do not object to that.

Are you not aware, that it makes your schools much more liable to objection by the Roman Catholics?—I am not sure about that; I do not know that Roman Catholics are quite agreed, that the reading of the Scriptures is against the principles of their church.

Are you aware that it is a rule of the London Hibernian Society, that no version of the Scriptures should be used but the authorized version?—I was not aware of that.

Would that be a sufficient objection to permitting the Hibernian schools to be connected with yours?—I incline to think, that if that were ascertained to us, we should be of opinion that we could not assist such schools; but I should tell you, there was not such a thing as a Rhemish Testament without notes, when our Society was formed. The publishing of the Rhemish Testament without note or comment, has been comparatively a recent thing in this country; but it is quite within our rules; it is the Scriptures without note or comment.

Are you aware that in the schools under the regulation of the London Hibernian Society, that the spelling book that is called theirs, is necessarily used?—No, I was not aware of that.

Did you ever look at the extracts from the Scriptures in that spelling book?—I did; but I cannot say I have examined them very minutely.

Are you aware that they contain the commandments exactly as they stand in the book of Exodus; and not as they are taught in the Roman Catholic catechisms?—I have not examined the book with that view.

Would it not be held by the Society, that such an extract would necessarily be extremely objectionable to the Roman Catholic children?—If we were making a book of extracts from the Scriptures, we should be cautious not to make extracts of an objectionable kind; but not having examined that book, I cannot say what the Society would do. The ten commandments are in the Old Testament, and they might be fairly selected, with other parts, for the use of schools.

Looking

Looking at the regulations of the London Hibernian Society, do you not think the pains that have been taken to clear the schools may have arisen in as great a degree from the connection of your schools with that Society, as from any feelings entertained by the Roman Catholics in consequence of the appointment of this commission?—I should think not; for that Society existed, and carried on its operations, long before the appointment of this commission; and yet there was not the opposition we have experienced since the existence of this commission.

Has not the connection between the Kildare-place Society and the London Hibernian Society been very recent?—We have no connection with it; but it has happened that we have aided schools also connected with them.

Has not the London Hibernian Society become connected with a considerable number of your schools in the last few months?—I am not aware of that; perhaps it has gone on extending progressively, as our Society has; but I have not observed that increase.

Has not the London Hibernian Society been particularly active in holding meetings and otherwise, since the existence of this commission, and during the period of the increased opposition you have mentioned?—I do not know that it has; there has been but one meeting of the London Hibernian Society, that I know of, lately, and that was at Cork.

The London Hibernian Society consists of two branches, one for the circulation of the Scriptures, and the other for the establishment of schools; did not the Society commence holding meetings, for one or other of these purposes, immediately after the issuing of the commission; and did they not continue to hold such meetings at different places contemporaneously with the tours of the Commissioners?—I was not aware that they had. I was not aware that, except the one at Cork, the meetings lately held were of that Society; I thought they were meetings of the Hibernian Bible Society.

Are you aware, that from the Kildare-place and the London Hibernian schools being found so often in connection, the Roman Catholics have believed that their rules, regulations and objects were the same?—It may have been so, and I have no doubt has.

Appendix, N° 201.

Further Examination of Joseph Devonsher Jackson, Esquire, on Oath;
Tuesday, 7th December 1824.

YOU were asked whether the majority of the masters were Protestants or Roman Catholics, can you now tell that?—I mentioned as my opinion, that the majority were Protestants, and I have ascertained that the fact is so; up to the closing of the school this season, the number admitted was 771, of that number 461 were Protestants, and 310 were Roman Catholics; and of those who were admitted on the re-opening of the school last November, who were 33 in all, the numbers were, Protestants 21, and Catholics 12; I was also asked another question as to numbers, and that was as to the average number of members of the committee who attended to the transacting of the business, and I said I thought the average attendance was 10 or 12; I have had the numbers counted over since, and it turns out that the average for the last year has been 10 and a fraction; I have also precisely ascertained the emoluments of the inspectors, which I could not take upon myself to speak to with precision on my former examination, they are rather multifarious; there are 60*l.* allowed for outfit, to provide them with the means of travelling, horse and gig, &c. which things are at all times to be considered the property of the Society, so that if a man ceased to be an inspector, we should have the property. The inspectors have also a salary of 60*l.* and an allowance of 10*l.* a year for wear and tear; we found that expense rather pressed upon them, besides which there is an allowance of 15*s.* a day for expenses when out travelling, and one guinea a week while in Dublin off their tours of inspection. Mr. Foster desired me to furnish any new book which should be published; this is one that has just come out to day, and I have brought it with me, it is entitled "Travels in the Islands of the Pacific Ocean."

[The same was delivered in.]

You stated in your examination, that it is an object of the Society, to provide generally for the education of the poor, of whom you state a large proportion to be Roman Catholics; do you think from the experience you have had, that the regulations of the Society are likely to provide such an education as would be acceptable to the Roman Catholic population?—Indeed I do think so.

Does not the resistance which is at present made to the mode of instruction adopted in the schools, lead you to think that it is considered by the Roman Catholics as a system that materially interferes with their religious principles?—There has been a great deal of misrepresentation as to the rules and principles of the Society, and a great deal of misunderstanding.

To what do you think the misrepresentation is owing?—In some respects to what was alluded to on the last day I was examined, the Society being sometimes confounded with other societies whose principles are more objectionable than ours. I think it has arisen in some degree also, from the opposition that was made by individuals at some of our public meetings and elsewhere, some years back, I mean from Mr. O'Connell and Lord Cloncurry coming and making speeches at our meetings, which were published without any counter-vailing statements, and from similar speeches being made at other meetings, and then again from letters being published, not stating accurately the principles of the Society; all those things were received in the country as true, and it would have been impossible for us to contradict all that was said and written on the subject.

Has it ever occurred to the committee, to consider whether or no any alteration could with propriety be made in their rules, that might tend to remove the objections made to the system of education by the Roman Catholics, or do they think their regulations are not fully understood?—We do believe that our regulations are not fully understood.

Do you believe if they were fully understood, that they would not be strongly objected to?—Indeed I should hope so, and I found my opinion upon experience; I know that the main features of our system were acted upon for years in this city by a local institution established in the liberties, whose object was to afford the means of instruction to the poor of the district; all the principles of our Society were there acted upon, namely, that the sacred Scriptures, without note or comment, should be read, and all catechisms and books inculcating peculiar religious views should be excluded; and that all persons should be eligible to the situations of masters and managers and scholars; that school went on educating a prodigious number of children of different persuasions, and that under the eyes of the clergy of both persuasions; and there is the visitor's book, from which I have brought extracts with me, where the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic church, and the inferior clergy and private individuals of both persuasions, and dignitaries of the established church have entered their approbation, and we find that some Roman Catholic priests have been educated there, who are now fulfilling their functions in Dublin. I would further state, that our institution went on for some time without opposition, having Roman Catholics as well as Protestants as subscribers, and some Roman Catholics on our committee, therefore I think if our rules were fully understood and misrepresentations done away with, and if we were a little more calm in this country (for unluckily politics become mixed up with every thing in Ireland), if I say our principles and objects were calmly considered, I think there would not be any opposition, and certainly not to the extent we have witnessed.

It being the object of the Society to steer clear of every thing that can give offence to persons of any religious principles, you are still of opinion it is not desirable to make any alteration in the rules of the Society as they were established?—As to the three great principles upon which the Society was formed, I think it would be wholly inexpedient to make any alteration in them; I think it would be highly inexpedient to divest any system of education altogether of religious instruction; then the question is, what religious instruction, and how much, can be given, and in what mode; the founders of this institution directed their attention most anxiously to this, and they took what they conceived to be common ground to all the denominations of christians—they did not wish to go one jot beyond that. Now all denominations of christians professing to receive the sacred Scriptures as a divine revelation, and admitting that the Bible is a book to be received as of authority by all of them, we conceived that to be the common ground; but inasmuch as the moment you allow any particular religious instruction to be given, you must leave it equally open to all sects, and as it seemed to us to be a great object to bring together the youth of this country to receive instruction together like members of one family without religious distinction, to try to do away those old prejudices and heart burnings which have so long existed and been the bane of this country, we saw right to exclude from our schools all catechisms and books teaching particular religious creeds; not that we thought such works bad in themselves, or unfit to be used by any persons teaching their own particular principles, quite the contrary; but we leave it open to persons of all persuasions to convey instruction in their own peculiar tenets to the children, by not opening the school upon a particular day in the week, or by closing it earlier than usual on some particular day, so as to permit the parents, pastors or friends, to give such religious instruction as they may think proper out of school hours; then as to the other point, we thought it quite essential that all description of persons should be freely admitted into every office connected with the schools; and with regard to these three points, my opinion is, that it would be very inexpedient to meddle with any of them, and I question if our Society as at present constituted, could depart from them. With respect to every thing else, as to the mode of carrying into effect our general principles and the details throughout, they are all matters of arrangement; and I think there could not be any objection on the part of the committee to adopt any suggestions that could be given to them to make their system less objectionable. We have obtained from private contributions and in the way of bequests, large funds, and we have received most bountifully from the legislature large grants, upon the specific pledge that we would act upon those three great principles; it is, as it were, the very charter of our existence as a society, and I do not see that we could depart from them without a breach of trust.

Can you state the amount of the contributions that have been made by private individuals in aid of the different schools?—I cannot give it as a matter of calculation in pounds shillings and pence. I have given directions that the calculation should be made, understanding that the Commissioners desired it; but I think I can take upon myself to say, that the amount contributed in that way by individuals who were applicants to us for aid, has been much more than we have given from our funds towards the objects. I mean to say, that for buildings and fitting-up schools, the contributions of private individuals to meet us, have been considerably more than we have given.

Do you mean that the sum that has been contributed by private funds, is equal in amount to what has been given by Parliament, in addition to the general subscriptions to the Society?—I am not prepared to say so at this moment, because there was one grant made specifically for building, and others for aid towards the building in Kildare-place, and there has been a good deal given for the cheap book department; but what we have disbursed in the various direct modes in which we assist schools in building and fitting-up, stationery and school requisites, and the expenses of inspection and training schoolmasters, all of which may be considered as aid directly applicable to the schools, I am convinced that the contributions of private individuals to the schools throughout the country, would very much exceed the total of those sums.

Deduct the amount of what was expended in building in Kildare-place, and the amount of the grants for cheap books, what would be the total amount of aid given by Parliament?—I believe, between 54,400*l.* and 54,500*l.*

It appears, by your last evidence, that the number of schools has increased in the last twelve months from 1,000 to 1,400, have the goodness to state whether you believe the increase of the scholars has been as large in proportion as the increase of schools?—It would be, I apprehend, were it not for the abatement that must be made by reason of the late opposition and taking away of the scholars.

Have you no reason to believe that the establishment of one school would deduct from the amount of another school?—We take pains that the schools shall not be too near each other, but it has so happened in some few instances; we found it necessary, in our commencement, to assist an inferior description of schools, to which we would not now give aid, and it has lately occurred in some cases, when we have established a school of a better description, that it has merged a school of a worse description, but we generally endeavour to place our schools so that they shall not interfere with one another.

Have you, in deciding upon the establishment of any school, reference to the local position of any schools belonging to the Association for discountenancing Vice, and Erasmus Smith's?—We have reference to all the schools which may be in the district; we have a query pointed to that amongst those which must be answered by all applicants for aid towards establishing schools; viz. "What number of schools are in the parish or "neighbourhood, and at what distance from your school-house;" and by those means we endeavour to spread instruction as much as we can over the face of the country; we may not in all cases be successful, because it has turned out in a few cases, that some schools we have assisted have interfered with others in some degree.

Have the applications that have been made for the establishment of new schools in the last twelve months, come principally from any one quarter of Ireland, or have they been pretty generally distributed over the whole face of Ireland?—I should say they are very much in the same proportion from the different provinces as they have been heretofore; I believe it has happened that there has always been a greater proportion of applications from Ulster than from any other province.

How do you account for the circumstance of a much larger number of schools being established in the north?—In the first place, in a great many counties in the north, there is a thicker population of resident noblemen and gentlemen who would be interested in the establishment of schools than is to be found in the extensive counties which constitute the province of Munster, and among the middling and lower orders themselves, there is a greater desire in the north to have an improved description of schools established; there are a great many descendants of Scotch ancestors, and a great many manufactories established in the north, where a description of persons different from the common peasantry in Munster may be found.

Do you attribute it to the taste of the country, and not to any peculiar predilection of the society for that particular district?—Most unquestionably; if we had any preference, it would be for Munster, where the population stands most in need of instruction.

Is your system more popular in the north than the south?—We were rather, in the outset of our exertions, more opposed by the high church party, and by Protestants in general, than by any other class of people; I should say, with regard to the peasantry of Ireland, that the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants are more to be found in Connaught and Munster than in any other part, and I think they are most particularly desirous of education; but they are not the persons with whom applications to us for aid to schools would originate; those poor people avail themselves of the means of instruction they have in hedge schools and otherwise with great avidity, but in the north there is a description of population which they do not possess in Munster.

You have stated you were more opposed by what you call the high church party at the outset of your course; in what way was that opposition manifested?—They did not choose to apply to us for schools on behalf of the poor; they said we did not give sufficient religious instruction; that we should give instruction to children in the principles of the Protestant religion, and have the catechism taught in the school; and that the teachers ought to be Protestants; we were thought to be too liberal, that was the objection, and up to the period when the opposition was manifested at our public meeting, led by Lord Cloncurry and Mr. O'Connell, we had a great deal more to do with objections from the high church party than from the other side.

Can you tell whether a large proportion of the late applications for schools have been made for assistance to such as are already in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—With respect to that, for one district, namely the southern counties, I think it very likely they may have been so, and I will tell you why; because there is a committee in Cork that call themselves the committee of the Munster School Society, and I apprehend the teachers of their schools all receive salaries from the London Hibernian Society; I believe the gentlemen who belong to that committee have been very active in endeavouring to establish schools, not only in the county of Cork, but in the adjacent counties in Munster, and I think that a great many applications to us have originated in the exertions of that local committee.

Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

Did the applications from that district form a considerable part of the four hundred?—I should think the applications from Munster during the present year bear the same proportion to the applications from the rest of Ireland which they bore during previous years.

Is it necessarily known to you, when an application is made, whether the school is in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—We have a query amongst those to be answered by applicants for aid, intended to elicit whether the school is in connection with any other society; but it often happens, that at the time of the application to us, there is no connection with other societies, and that afterwards such connection has been superinduced, and that there may have been some management in that respect on the part of the applicants, particularly those who have had it in contemplation to apply to the Association in Capel-street; such persons might have found themselves hampered in answering our queries, if they had made their application there in the first instance; I have no doubt there has been management in that respect.

Can you give us the distinction between the Munster Hibernian Society and the London Hibernian Society?—The distinction between them, I should think, consisted in this, that the former are merely a local association formed for promoting schools conducted agreeably to our principles, deriving aid, so far only as the salaries of the masters and inspectors, from the funds of the London society; but whether there is any connection beyond that with the London Hibernian Society, I have not the means of knowing; I have been at the meetings of the committees of the Munster Society, during the assizes at Cork, and it did not seem to me that they were very closely united with the London Society; the London Hibernian Society, on the other hand, have other objects besides the establishment of schools.

It appears, that where a school of any importance is to be established, that it is a condition that a lease of the land should be granted to some individuals; do you mean to say that those individuals named trustees are generally laymen in the neighbourhood of the school; have the goodness to state the conditions of the lease?—The fact is, we have no solicitor of our Society; that was very much considered at one time in our committee; therefore, as to the preparation of leases, we do not take it upon us, but the kind of lease or grant which we recommend is merely an ordinary lease or grant to local trustees, with a clause stating that the object of making it is for the purpose of securing the permanent application of the building to be erected upon the piece of ground, for the purposes of education according to the principles of our Society.

Suppose the principles of your Society were not conformed to in the system of instruction in the school, what power would you have over trustees to enforce the condition?—That would involve a legal question, which we should have to submit to legal advisers; but I apprehend one course might be to file a bill in equity in the name of the grantor or lessor of the land, or to obtain the sanction of the attorney-general to an information to be filed in the name of a relator, to compel such trustees to fulfill the trust, and apply the building to the purposes to which it was designed; and I apprehend another course might be, to bring an action at law in the name of the person with whom the covenants in the deed or lease might be made.

If the lease was held by persons immediately connected with the institution, and the immediate right of the school, was at once in the hands of any body connected with the Society, would not the efforts of the Society be more prompt than now?—We have hitherto had no occasion to resort to legal measures, but it should be borne in mind, that we are a body of persons acting gratuitously, and that it might be throwing an onus upon individuals which they would not perhaps wish to submit to, to be made trustees in so many leases, thereby exposing themselves to much litigation; no doubt, if the covenants were with us directly, or with any one of our body, we could at once put the machinery in motion.

When the petition from the Society was first presented to Parliament, do you recollect whether it was referred to a committee?—I do not think it was; it was during the administration of Mr. Peel, and when Mr. Fitzgerald was the chancellor of the Irish exchequer, that this Society was first assisted from the public purse, and I believe it was the wish of both those gentlemen to promote its objects,—they were very desirous of having a system of education upon a liberal plan; they saw our Society existing, and doing a good deal of good with very limited funds; and I believe that those statesmen approved of the principles upon which the Society acted, and we were a good deal encouraged by them to seek a grant from Parliament; and though we felt some reluctance to undertake the responsibility, we yielded, conceiving it to be our duty to do so; our petition therefore was presented with the sanction of government, and I believe the Society obtained the grant without any reference to any committee.

Has there ever been any report from any committee of the House of Commons, upon any matter connected with your Society?—I am pretty confident there has been none; I never heard of it; I think I must have heard of it if there had been any sent.

Is it a part of the object of the Society to convey instruction in the Irish language?—Certainly not; we have published three books in the Irish and English languages, in parallel columns, and I should mention how it came to pass that we did publish any thing of that kind; we were applied to by a society calling itself the Irish Society, to publish certain books for the use of schools in which the Irish language was taught; we were not aware that the Irish language prevailed in certain districts to the extent it actually did, nor of any schools established to convey instruction in that language, and we were rather disinclined to the undertaking; however the thing was pressed upon us, and such facts were were stated to us as made us think it our duty to inquire into the matter; accordingly we appointed a sub-committee to inquire into the facts, and ascertain the extent to which the Irish language prevailed in particular districts, and the proportion of persons who spoke that language, and the number of schools conveying instruction in that language; upon the report of that sub-committee, we had ample reason to conclude that we should not redeem our pledge of providing the means of education for the poor of Ireland, if we did not provide means for the instruction of so large a portion of the population by supplying books, without which they could not proceed; upon this report we felt it our duty to print certain books, one of them was the Psalms and Proverbs, and another the History of Joseph; they had previously appeared in the English language, among the cheap books published by the Society; the third was a Spelling Book, giving it, not exclusively in the Irish language, but in the English and Irish in parallel columns; it was by no means with a view to promote the Irish language, or to extend it; on the contrary, it was with a view to extend the English language; and I recollect taking pains to ascertain what had been the experience of the Gaelic society, which had been established for promoting education in the Western Islands and Highlands of Scotland; and the information thus acquired was very satisfactory to us, and shewed the utility of spreading instruction through the native language, as the most efficient vehicle of the knowledge of the English language.

Is it your opinion, that the tendency of those Irish schools is to perpetuate, or rather to protract the use of the Irish language in Ireland?—I am not prepared to say that it may not perpetuate the use of the Irish language as a written language, but I am satisfied the tendency of it would be to extend the knowledge of the English language throughout the whole country.

Can you say upon recollection, what number of inhabitants of Ireland it appeared upon that report spoke the Irish language exclusively?—I think one million and a half.

Can you state to what extent those Irish publications have been sold by the Society?—Not to any great extent; we never gave them, except upon a direct application for them on behalf of individual schools.

Have the Irish Society become purchasers of them to any considerable extent?—No, they have not; they made an application to us to transfer to them a parcel of the English and Irish books which we had published; but we declined to do so, because we did not feel ourselves authorized to delegate to any Society, however respectable they might be, the trust reposed in us.

State the regulations of the Society as to the lending libraries?—They are these; we give grants of books for lending libraries to any respectable applicants who can state to us, that there is an institution of any kind in which the books would be useful, and for which proper persons will pledge themselves to us that they will preserve them.

Would you then make a grant of a lending library to a school not in connection with the Society, nor intending to connect themselves with it?—Unquestionably.

Would you to a school in a gaol?—Certainly.

Would you to a penitentiary?—We would.

Would you to a voluntary association of adults in a country village?—Certainly, under the foregoing regulation.

Have you made many such grants?—Yes, I believe to all the classes of institutions mentioned.

Do you find that the schools upon Erasmus Smith's foundation (of which there are about 150) generally apply to you for grants of such lending libraries?—I believe there have been such applications, but I am not prepared to say the number.

Have such applications proceeded to any considerable extent from those schools?—I believe not, for I have not been struck with the number of them.

Stating also to you, that there are about 200 schools connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice, can you say whether applications have been made from a large proportion of those schools for lending libraries?—I should think not; it has not struck me.

Can you account for that at all?—I rather think those institutions do not very much like us; they do not wish to have fellowship with us.

Do you mean that they have books of their own, or that they do not like your books; or that they think it is better to be without them?—I do not know what their opinion may be of our books; there has been a very unaccountable prejudice against our books in some quarters; there was a very extraordinary instance of objection made upon the part of a dignitary of the Roman Catholic church, to the use of our cheap books in his own school; it turned out, however, upon examination, that the books actually were in his school, and used with his approbation, but he did not know them to be ours; I think that instance was found by Mr. Veevers, or by an inspector whom we sent down upon some special mission—something I think which had occurred at a school at Westport; on that occasion objections were made to the institution by the dignitary in question, and among the rest he objected to our books, but being undeceived as to the books, he was led to further inquiries, the effect of which was to remove several misconceptions from his mind.

How many varieties of cheap books are included in the grant of a lending library?—I rather think the one I brought to day makes the number fifty-one.

Have all those been prepared and published by the Society?—All of them, and with very great care.

Has every care been taken by the Society to exclude from those books every thing that could give offence to Christians of every denomination?—The very greatest care and tenderness has been exercised unquestionably; I only know of one specific complaint against any one of our books.

Was that in the case of Mungo?—Yes, it was; and in the next edition we struck out the passage, though we did not feel there was any well-founded objection to it; but as it seemed to have offended even an individual, we thought it better to omit it.

Have you not heard that very considerable objections have been entertained throughout Ireland to the use of a book edited and given by the Society, entitled, "Scriptural Lessons," by permission of the most Reverend Doctor Troy?—Yes; that is the only other book that I ever knew any objection made to, besides Mungo.

Will you state the circumstances that led to the publication of that book by the Kildare-place Society?—I will; and I have the means of doing it with perfect accuracy, because I desired certain books and documents to be brought here to day which will enable me to do so, understanding that I should be interrogated on the subject. The book was brought to our committee room by a respectable gentleman of this city, who is a subscriber to the institution, but not a member of the committee; he requested a conference with the committee, and brought this book with him, saying, that it appeared to him to be a most valuable work, appearing to have the sanction of Doctor Troy, who was the titular Archbishop of Dublin; and he recommended that it should be published by the Society, for the use of the schools throughout Ireland. He thought, from the sanction it appeared to carry with it, that it would be an acceptable book; and being selections from the New Testament, it appeared to him to be a very desirable work for general use.

Was that the first occasion upon which the Society ever heard of it?—Yes, that the Society ever heard of it, to my knowledge; individuals perhaps might have seen it.

It was then exhibited to you in a printed form?—Yes.

What steps did the Society take upon that application?—It was in the month of January 1818, that the application was made to us; and it was referred to a sub-committee to examine the work minutely.

What did they report?—There was a most laborious examination of the work itself; it was collated with the original work by Mrs. Trimmer, which appeared to have the sanction of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and it was collated also, where it was necessary, with the Greek; I am not sure that it was examined with the Latin vulgate, it is very probable however that it was; and I believe also with the authorized and Rhemish versions, and every deviation either from the work as it was produced by Mrs. Trimmer, or from the Greek, or the authorized translation, was reported by the sub-committee to the general committee.

Could you furnish us with that report?—I can.

Can you state now, generally, whether there were many instances of deviation from the authorized version?—Not many; I could state the whole of them; it appeared that some of the points that were in difference between the two churches, were rather given up in this publication to the Protestants, particularly the word in the original Greek μετανοείτε, which is translated "repent," and which, in the Roman Catholic translation, is generally "do penance." The gentleman who brought the book to us, said that Mr. William Parnell, the member for the county of Wicklow, conceiving Mrs. Trimmer's selections to be a book well adapted for circulation among the lower classes of society, submitted it with that view to the inspection of a Roman Catholic clergyman, who perused and approved of it for the use of schools, and who introduced Mr. Parnell to Dr. Troy, for the purpose of obtaining Dr. Troy's permission to have this work published; that Mr. Parnell accordingly obtained Dr. Troy's permission, and that Dr. Troy allowed his name to appear upon the title-page, as sanctioning the publication; that it was printed in the form he then produced it, by Mr. Blenkinsop, a well-known Roman Catholic bookseller and stationer to the college of Maynooth; he also stated to us, that he understood that Mr. Parnell was most anxious that the committee should adopt the work, or at least that he was willing to make over to them a considerable portion of the edition that had been printed off. Upon this, the general committee of our institution referred the work to the sub-committee, as I have already stated, and they deputed three of their members to hold the scrutiny and investigation I have already mentioned, and they were directed to report on the nature of the variations in it from the authorized version of the Protestant church, and also from Mrs. Trimmer's selections; and to report their opinion, whether in its altered form it was a work calculated for general circulation, and one that the Society might adopt; in obedience to this reference, the book was examined by the sub-committee, and as the result of several meetings, a report was presented to the general committee on the 24th of January 1818, and I have here a copy of that report, which I believe will be found very satisfactory; it gives a table shewing all the variations.—[The witness read the report of the committee.]—It should be mentioned, that the gentlemen who prepared this report, had the advantage of Mr. Parnell's attendance at one of their meetings, and upon each variation or alteration that occurred, either from Mrs. Trimmer, or the authorized version, Mr. Parnell assigned a reason for such having been made by the Roman Catholic clergyman who prepared the book. Upon this report, the book sub-committee were directed to purchase from Mr. Peter Blenkinsop, the 900 copies which remained unsold, of that edition printed by Mr. Blenkinsop at the instance of Mr. Parnell; they were also desired to inform themselves fully, by an application to Mr. Parnell, of the nature of Dr. Troy's sanction, in order that the possibility of misapprehension might be removed before the Society should undertake to reprint the work.

Did the Society take any particular measure to inform themselves of the fact of Dr. Troy's

Dr. Troy's having given his approbation?—They did; indeed they have been exceedingly cautious on all occasions, knowing the ground on which they trod to be delicate ground, they did not think it at all right to set about printing this book, without seeing most distinctly, that it was what it professed to be, a work actually having the sanction of Doctor Troy; it professed to have it printed upon the title page, but still they directed their sub-committee to ascertain it beyond a doubt.

In what manner did the sub-committee proceed for that purpose?—The members of the book sub-committee undertook to communicate with Mr. Parnell upon the subject, and on the 11th of February, he transmitted to the book sub-committee the result of his correspondence on the subject, and laid before them the document, the original of which I hold in my hand; it is in Dr. Troy's hand-writing, "I hereby certify, that the selection from the "Scriptures lately published by Mr. Peter Blenkinsop, Printer, of Dublin, has been approved by me. Dublin, 28th January 1818. J. T. Troy, D.D." &c. This was annexed to a letter dated "Dublin, 26th January 1818," signed, "Peter Blenkinsop," and addressed to Mr. Parnell; "Dear Sir,—I received your favour this day, and having waited upon Dr. Troy, he gave the certificate on the other side; I hope it will give that satisfaction to the Society that they require. Dr. Troy has also desired me to acknowledge for him, the receipt of a letter from you this day. With great respect, I remain your obliged servant, Peter Blenkinsop."

Did the Society proceed to print an enlarged edition of the work after the receipt of that letter?—They did.

To what extent was that edition?—I should mention, that on the 21st of February 1818, the purchase of 900 copies was effected, and another edition of 5,000 copies ordered from Mr. Blenkinsop; and a certain form of advertisement, which you will find affixed to the edition, published by him, was affixed to the edition on that day; and I should also mention this fact, that in making the contract with the printer, his prices were found to exceed very much the rates at which other people worked for the Society, and those were acceded to at the instance of Mr. Parnell; namely, upon this consideration, that the reprint appearing from the same press, and the name of Mr. Blenkinsop upon the title page, would convey a satisfactory proof of the fidelity with which the first edition had been copied; we thought right to make some sacrifice for that sanction. The book sub-committee, on the 22d of April, accordingly directed, with the consent of the general committee, that the edition should be extended to 25,000 copies, and the printer was ordered accordingly to prepare that edition. At the time when this order to increase the edition was given to the printer, there were printed off, three sheets and a half of the work, it was therefore determined he should finish the remaining three sheets conformably to the enlarged order, and afterwards complete the required number of the part already printed.

After the work had been completed, did Mr. Blenkinsop or any other person propose to you to publish any erratum to it?—I do not think there ever was a proposal to publish an erratum to the book; but I distinctly recollect a proposal through Mr. Blenkinsop, and purporting to be from Dr. Troy, that certain alterations should be made in the text of the book. On the 4th of July 1818, the literary assistant of the book sub-committee reported to the general committee a communication from Mr. Blenkinsop, respecting some alterations proposed to be made in the Scripture Lessons, and handed in a copy of the first edition, forwarded to him by Doctor Troy, in which the following passages were proposed to be altered; page 4, "Thou art highly favoured," to be altered to "full of grace;" at page 17, "Woman, what have I to do with thee," to be changed to "Woman, what is that to thee or me;" and page 33, the doxology to the Lord's Prayer to be omitted. Then in pages 12, 43, 73, 77, 80, and 139, the word "repent," to be changed to "do penance."

What was the state of the publication of the work at this time?—It was very far advanced.

Had you actually printed those pages or not?—We had; on the 9th of July, in obedience to the directions of the general committee, the literary assistant informed Mr. Blenkinsop, that the edition of the Scripture Lessons had been printed with the approbation of Dr. Troy, and was in circulation before the Education Society had taken any steps in the matter; that they were induced to adopt the work, in consequence of seeing his sanction prefixed to it, and also from seeing nothing in it contrary to the principles of the Protestant persuasion; that they had, in consequence, applied to Dr. Troy for a renewal of his sanction, which he had been pleased to give; that they had, subsequently, on the faith of Dr. Troy's renewed approbation of the work, ordered 25,000 copies to be printed, exactly conformable to the first edition, which had been all disposed of; and in their annual report, they had stated those facts to the public, and therefore could not enter into any consideration of the proposed alterations. On this occasion, Mr. Blenkinsop stated, that Dr. Troy did not regret the approbation given by him; that he felt extremely distressed at those objections being started; in truth he gave us to understand they were not his own, and he hoped the Society would not think that he and Mr. Blenkinsop were willing to act unfairly by us. On communicating to Mr. Blenkinsop what he had in charge from the Society, the literary assistant received Mr. Blenkinsop's assurance that the work should be proceeded on without delay.

How long after Dr. Troy's communication of his original approbation to the Society, were those objections started?—The approbation was on the 26th of January, and the objection was made the 4th of July; at the time those objections were urged, the book was within one sheet of being completed.

Are we to understand, that all the sheets, except the last of the work, had been actually printed printed before the objection was made?—Yes; and in the mean time we were committed to the public; it was stated in our report, that an order had been given for the enlarged edition, and that the work was in progress; it was five months from the time that Mr. Blenkinsop had received the order to print the 5,000 edition, and two months from his having received the enlarged order, that this communication of the objection was made.

Was the work in the edition of 25,000 copies, critically the same as the work originally printed by Mr. Blenkinsop?—It was precisely the same, except in two particulars.

State what those were?—One in page 28, in Matthew the 12th chapter and 6th verse, where the particle “not” being obviously a misprint, it was omitted in the second edition.

Was that ever objected to by any body?—No, never.

Will you state how the verse stood in the first edition with the word not, and how it stands in the second?—It is thus: “Wherefore I say unto you, all manner of sin and “blasphemy shall not be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost “shall not be forgiven unto men.”

State how the verse stands in the second edition?—It stands precisely similar, with the exception of the particle “not,” where it first occurs.

State now the instance of the second deviation that occurs between the first and second edition?—There appeared a note at the foot of page 45, of the first edition, as follows:—

“Nota bene: In the third edition of the Scripture Catechism this is numbered 30, as well as “the foregoing lesson.” This note has an asterisk referring to lesson 31, and it was omitted in the second edition, it being considered that it had been suffered to remain there by an oversight; for there is nothing like it in any other part of the book, and the reference to the catechism was thought objectionable.

What catechism do you think was referred to?—The Protestant catechism; there was a most diligent examination of the two editions by the literary assistant, and it was found that the foregoing were the only two points of difference between the second and the first.

Are you aware that the main points of difference between the authorized version and the Roman Catholic version, the English being a translation of the Latin vulgate, are found in those extracts, and, being found in those extracts, the passages are given according to the authorized version, and not according to the Roman Catholic version?—I believe the passages chiefly in difference are those in the gospels, where the word μετανοείτε occurs; and that in the Epistle to the Hebrews, where it is said, in the Rhemish version, “Jacob worshipped the top of his staff,” in the Protestant version it is, “Jacob worshipped, leaning “upon the top of his staff;” and I believe those will be found to be the two principal points, except the addition of the doxology to the Lord’s Prayer, which seems to me to involve nothing doctrinal; and I believe you will find that the word μετανοείτε is in some parts translated “repent,” in the Roman Catholic version; and with respect to the other passage in the Hebrews, in which a difference is, it is not introduced in this work at all.

Μετανοείτε is translated here as “repent,” and not “do penance?”—Yes.

Which would be the translation, according to the Latin translation?—In the Latin it is “penitentiam agite.”

And that is given here which is not to be found in the Roman Catholic version, and which the Roman Catholic church believe not to be a part of the prayer of our Lord?—Yes, and I believe it did not escape notice in the report of the sub-committee; and it appeared to us to be a liberal concession made to the Protestant views upon the subject. I have no hesitation in saying this, that, had we been apprised, before we had entered into the undertaking, before we had actually ordered and printed and nearly completed the edition of 25,000, that Dr. Troy had the least objection to the work, we would never have undertaken it. It now proves most fortunate that the committee did look before them; they were anxious and astute to ascertain that they were not imposed upon; and though they were told upon the face of the book that it had the sanction of Dr. Troy, they applied to the Doctor himself on the subject.

Was there any notice taken of the objections made on the part of Dr. Troy in any note annexed to the publication when it took place?—No; the publication was nearly completed at the time that Mr. Blenkinsop communicated the message of Dr. Troy. With respect to the proposed alterations, we were given to understand that they were not Dr. Troy’s suggestions, and that he was not displeased that they were not made. It is upon the minutes of the committee’s proceedings, that Dr. Troy was really hurt at making the communication to the committee on the subject.

How many copies do you conceive of those Scripture Lessons have been circulated?—I believe very nearly the whole of them, if not quite the whole.

Do you know whether the Society have it in contemplation, in the event of publishing a new edition, to notice this alteration?—I rather think not. I am not sure that they will publish a new edition; if my advice be taken, they would not. I think it is an ill advised measure; for this reason, that I am satisfied it would be impossible to make a selection from the Scriptures that would not be objected to by some party.

Are you aware that the work entitled, “The Evangelical Life of Christ,” which is a work similar in principle to that called the Scripture Lessons, has been published by the authority of Dr. Troy, and which contains in it extracts from the four Gospels and the Acts as fully as those contained in the Scripture Lessons, but which extracts are taken from the Douay version?—I am aware that such a work was published, and was recommended as a very fit and proper family book and school book; but that book appeared so lately as the year 1820, with notes affixed to it with the sanction of that prelate, and with that recommendation of it as a fit family and school book, which notes are of the most objectionable description.

Are

533
Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

Are you aware it has appeared without those notes?—I am not aware that it has so appeared. Under the word Rome, there is this note: "To this church, on account of its superior headship, every other must have recourse; the Roman Catholic church alone retains the true worship, into which he that enters not, and he that goes out, forfeits the hope of life and eternal salvation." We examined it at the time it was recommended; we found on examination that there were some notes that would make it impossible for us to sanction the use of it as a school book. That is so lately as 1820; and I think our attention was turned from the book, as a school book, in consequence of those notes.

Was not it proposed to your committee that the work should be published without notes by a Roman Catholic bishop?—Lord Cloncurry came to one of our annual meetings, and he read a document that he said came from a Roman Catholic bishop, as to the mode of conducting the business of the Society; the result of that is contained, with certain observations upon it, in the Appendix to our eleventh Annual Report for the year 1822 (N^o 11, page 91). Our attention was certainly diverted from that work in consequence of finding those notes, and I rather think the business of making selections from the Scriptures would now be considered by the Society as a very difficult undertaking. From the experience we have had it seems quite impossible to make a selection for general circulation and for adoption in schools, without running the hazard of offending some of the classes into which our community is divided. We think that having the whole Scriptures in the school, and requiring no particular part to be read, we leave it in the power of the managers and teachers to make the best practical selection, and we presume that they will select that which they consider best suited to the capacity of the children; we think that better than taking it upon ourselves to make a selection to please all, which we think would be a forlorn hope.

Will you explain why the Society do not sell the Testament at their depositary, either the one version or the other, at the same time that they require them to be used in their schools?—At one time we had the Scriptures in our depositary, and we thought it right to sell them, and give them with our grants of school requisites; at that time there was no version of the New Testament without note or comment, except the authorized version; but afterwards the Rhemish edition of the New Testament was published without note or comment, and some of our members had a scruple about being actively engaged in the dissemination of a book in which they thought they saw something that was erroneous; other of our members were active in spreading the book, and were delighted at the publication of it.

Does not it occur to you as involving something of contradiction, that a society requiring the one version or the other to be used in their schools, should yet neither give nor sell nor even possess in their depositary either of the versions which they require to be used?—It always appeared to my mind certainly as an inconsistency, that we should hold the Scriptures to be an indispensable requisite in the schools assisted by us, in fact the only sine qua non which we require, and yet that we should not supply that indispensable book with the other school requisites; but the anomaly arose from this, that we actually lost one member of our committee when it was determined that our fundamental principle was satisfied by the use of the Rhemish version of the New Testament without note or comment—others of our members (a few of them only) thought they could allow the use of the book in the schools, but that they could not conscientiously engage in the active circulation of a book which they believed to contain errors.

Do you yourself see any objection to printing and publishing, and selling and making gratuitous donations of both versions of the Scriptures?—I do not see the least; I do think the Rhemish version of the Testament a most excellent book, and to contain all the fundamental truths of Christianity most distinctly revealed, and I accordingly myself was a subscriber to the work, and I consider it a particularly useful work; we resorted to the measure adverted to in the last question as the lesser of two evils; we thought as both versions were accessible at the booksellers' shops, to which we could immediately make a reference upon moderate terms, it was the lesser of two evils not to grant either version than to incur the certainty of losing some of our most eminently useful members, some of the Society of Friends.

We are desirous of knowing your own opinion as to the limit of the grammatical explanation of texts of Scripture used in your schools,—do you conceive the Society would disapprove of a schoolmaster giving a fair explanation of the word "hypocrite," or "wilderness"?—As to "wilderness" there could be no objection; but "hypocrite" might lead them into something of a controversial nature.

How would you describe the limit of what is permitted and what is disapproved of by the Society?—Any thing that leads to doctrinal instruction, or any thing that touches upon the points in difference between different denominations of Christians even remotely is strictly forbidden.

Are we to understand that you conceive mere grammatical explanation is admissible?—I do conceive so.

What security can you have for your masters conforming to such distinctions?—One security we have is by inspection, and with this view as well as others, we would wish to increase the frequency of inspection very much; another check is by inquiry respecting the conduct of the teachers from those who are in the neighbourhood, and have an opportunity of visiting the schools, what the course and practice of the teachers is. I think it would not fail to reach our ears if there were deviations in that respect.

Have you a confident impression amounting to conviction in your own mind, that your masters really do not give oral expositions of the Scriptures in any instances, in the schools connected with your Society, to such an extent as would be disapproved of by the committee if they themselves could be the witnesses of it?—I believe it has been done in some instances, it has appeared in the reports of our inspectors and we have uniformly set the matter right, and when it has been done advisedly it has always forfeited the gratuity the teacher would otherwise have received, and the committee has in such cases notified to the patron that if such practice were continued, the school must cease to have connection with us.

Will you state in about how many instances in the last year such deviations have occurred?—I cannot, but they have not been numerous; there have been instances of deviations of a different kind, but I do not think that is a head of deviation so frequent as others, I could have the number of instances ascertained.

We wish to know your own opinion of the degree of advantage or probability of improvement to be expected from the reading of the Scriptures, under the limitations you have described?—I conceive the advantages are very great indeed; I conceive the great want of our peasantry in this country, is not the mere instruction of letters in reading and writing or in arithmetic; I believe it will be found on examination that those things are possessed to as great a degree among our very poor people, as in most other countries, but I think that the great want of the poor is moral instruction; they seem to be totally deficient in it; my experience as a circuit going barrister leads me to that conclusion, and I have heard the same observation from others of more experience than myself; we see constantly exhibited in our courts of justice a total insensibility to the obligation of an oath, so much so that the administration of justice in this country is a matter of the greatest difficulty, and I am sure all the judges would tell you, that in the most important trials it is a most difficult thing to get at the truth; we constantly hear witnesses deposing directly contrary to each other; they are not conscious of the solemn sanction under which they come to give their evidence; and again, in Munster we see lamentable instances of homicides, almost innumerable, committed without motives of any sort or kind; men going to fairs and convivial meetings for the purpose of fighting without the least previous hostility, and knocking one another's brains out for amusement,—these things argue a total want of religious principle or moral sense, and I do conceive there is no mode of meeting this evil, so great and so extensive as I conceive it is, by any other process than that of dispersing among the people religious instruction, sound religious instruction. Now that is to be found in the Scriptures, and I think it is to be found in the Scriptures alone, in that form in which it ought to be unobjectionable to all classes.

Is it your opinion, that the senior classes of the school can sufficiently understand the texts of Scripture read under the limitations and regulations now under consideration?—Of course it cannot be expected they should understand them so fully as if there was a latitude of commentary given; but I think they can understand the moral and practical parts of the New Testament where the Christian duties are enlarged upon; they are so plain and intelligible that the youth of the country can understand them as well as the adults.

Is it your impression they would be more likely in future life to recur to the study of the Scriptures, from having been thus previously introduced to them?—It is; I think that is one of the strongest arguments for putting the Scriptures into the hands of children at school; I prefer it to reading merely by the teachers, or by an advanced pupil; I like to accustom a child to have the book in his hand.

Do you think the probability is, that without that previous introduction, he might not be able even to distinguish the Scriptures from other religious books, if he met with them afterwards in life?—Unless he had access to them himself, he might not be able to distinguish them, because there are works that consist so much of extracts from the Scriptures and commentaries thereon, that he might be deceived.

Does your own experience enable you to speak to the circumstance, whether many, both children and adults, are in the habit of applying the names Bible and Testament to books that are really not the Bible and Testament?—Certainly; for instance, there is no one deviation that is of such frequent occurrence with us as the deviation with respect to the non-use of the Scriptures in the schools, by reason of the substitution of the Scripture Lessons, which they sometimes call the Bible or Testament; I mean the unlucky book, respecting which I have been so much examined this evening,—they have taken it for granted as we sent them down, that they were the Scriptures; they always call them so.

Have you ever known them apply the term Bible and Testament to other books than those extracts?—Yes, I have, to books touching on religious subjects, to histories of the Bible certainly, and to other books.

Did you ever know them apply the title of "Testament" to a book, entitled, "The Christian Doctrine"?—I have heard of it.

Do you not conceive there is some practical inconvenience in the constitution of the Kildare-place Society, on account of the danger that a sudden influx of occasional voters previous to the annual meeting, might in effect carry resolutions very hostile to the spirit which has hitherto actuated the Society?—Such a thing might take place; and there was an experiment made at one time to introduce a number of occasional voters to carry a point, but there are now regulations made to provide against that; there can be no new law enacted or any old law altered without a second meeting held at a certain interval to ratify what has been done at the first; this was found necessary to counteract any thing of the kind to answer an occasional purpose.

Describe

535
Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

Describe the experiment to which you have adverted, when it took place, and what were the circumstances attending it?—It is but a few years ago; I cannot give the precise date; it was made by a number of persons just on the eve of one of our annual general meetings; they subscribed for the first time to enable them to vote,—they came on the day of meeting, and the day previous to that; it was known a little before that there would be an endeavour to carry some point, and a great many subscribers came in on the other hand; in fact, the Institution was very much served by those means, and I question if it would have become so extensively known if it had not been for the discussions thus occasioned. When these discussions arose, an interest was excited, and people enquired into the objects and conduct of the Institution.

Do you recollect what number of occasional voters subscribed in the manner stated?—I believe about twenty.

What were the questions that they attempted to carry?—The question assumed the shape of an amendment proposed by one of the persons present, instead of adopting the report of the committee, to refer it to a sub-committee to inquire whether our rules were well adapted to further our professed objects, or whether other means might not be adopted that would have a better tendency to that end.

Was the motion for that amendment accompanied by speeches against the principle of introducing the Scriptures into education?—It was.

Was it avowed, that the object of the reference to the sub-committee, was for the purpose of excluding the Scriptures?—Yes, certainly, that was the great object—to alter that rule which required the Scriptures to be read.

Was there a division?—There was, and a very strict scrutiny; it became a very serious business; the amendment however was lost by a considerable majority. The members of the committee opposed the amendment on the ground that it was impossible for that meeting to alter that fundamental principle of the Society—the Institution was formed upon that principle, and we conceived we could not part from it without a breach of trust.

Do you conceive that the regulation to which you have adverted, that compels a law being submitted to a second meeting before it is carried into effect, a sufficient guarantee for the future against any attempt of that kind?—I do, because I think the Society cannot be right, unless it has the concurrence of the well informed and candid part of the community, and I am sure when any similar attempt shall be made to carry a point by such means, it would be met on the other hand by such persons as I have described, who would come in and support what they conceived to be right.

Have you ever observed political feelings to manifest themselves in any degree at the meetings of the committee that govern the Society?—Never, in the slightest possible degree.

Are there frequently considerable discussions at the meetings of the general committee, as to the propriety of adopting certain measures?—Yes, certainly, every thing out of the mere common routine of the business is always notified to the members by a special summons; special meetings are always fully attended, and special matters are always fully discussed; members come prepared to canvass them.

Have those discussions ever led to any unpleasant difference of opinion between the members of the committee?—Never; we never had any material difference upon any subject, those discussions almost always end in unanimity.

Have you ever known any member of the committee derive any personal advantage from the circumstance of his being concerned in the management of the Institution, direct or indirect?—Never; nor do I conceive any such thing has ever occurred, or indeed that it could occur.

Have any of the officers of the Institution ever defrauded it?—That is a hard word for me to use with regard to a person employed by us; I fear however that one officer who was employed as storekeeper and salesman, did not act with integrity and fidelity.

What was his name?—Thomas Burnside.

What became of him?—We dismissed him on ascertaining a deficiency in the stock, and we proceeded against his sureties.

Did you succeed in your action?—No, we were defeated upon a point of law.

Is that the only instance in which you have had reason to suspect any of your officers?—Yes, with that exception, I believe they have all been most faithful in discharge of their duties.

Have you ever heard it imputed to the Society that there was an exportation to England of their books for the purposes of profit to some individual connected with the Society?—Yes, I saw it in print.

Can you state whether there is any and what foundation for that imputation?—There is not any foundation for it in truth, not the slightest.

Do you believe that any books of the Society have been exported?—Yes, by persons in trade, I believe they have been exported from time to time; but the particular instance adverted to was with regard to some books that had been printed as premium books, they were the first editions of the cheap works we had struck off upon a finer kind of paper, they were lying upon our shelves for years; we had new and improved editions of those books, and the copies in question were falling off and becoming not very saleable, and we thought as they were not selling, it was better for the Institution to dispose of them, which we did accordingly upon the best terms we could get for them; the individual to whom we sold gave us a considerable advance upon the highest price we had been offered by any other persons; I believe so much as ten or twelve per cent.

Examination of
J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

Did you sell them for more than they cost you?—I think we did considerably.

Are we to understand distinctly, that the entire produce of that sale was brought to the credit of the Society?—Yes, to the uttermost farthing; it is quite monstrous to suppose that any imposition of the kind could escape the vigilance of the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts, the smallest fraction of a farthing could not escape them.

Is there any explanation you would wish to give of any point of your evidence on the last day you were examined?—Yes; on leaving this room the last day, I was considering some of the points I had been examined to, and I recollected a question and answer respecting clergymen being on our committee, I believe I answered rather more extensively than I ought to have answered, as to no clergyman being on our committee; I spoke with reference to the present time chiefly, and it escaped my recollection that at one time there had been a clergyman on our committee, that gentleman was a doctor of medicine, and was one of the original founders, at the close of 1811 or beginning of 1812, and being an active man, was elected one of the committee in the first instance; however he published a pamphlet that was of a political nature, and rather calculated to excite angry feelings in the minds of a certain portion of our fellow subjects, and though he was a very able and valuable man, we thought it better he should no longer continue to be a member of our committee, and he was not re-elected the next year; that was the only instance of a clerical man being ever upon our committee.

Further Examination of Joseph Devonsher Jackson, Esquire, on Oath;
Saturday, 22d January 1825.

J. D. Jackson,
Esq.
22 Jan. 1825.

UPON my former examination, in answer to a question put to me, I said that I apprehended there had been no application made to us, as a Society, upon the part of the London Hibernian Society or the Association for discountenancing Vice for any assistance; that our communications had been with individual schools and not with societies. Being anxious to be quite precise upon every point upon which I have given evidence, I caused search to be made among our papers, and I find that in the year 1820, on the 12th of January, his Grace the Archbishop of Tuam addressed a letter to us, stating, “As Vice President of the London Hibernian Society, I beg of you to lay before the committee of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor my application for aid for the maintenance and the extension of our schools in any way which may appear to the committee most fit; we are in very great want of slates, &c. which our funds are unequal to provide; I think our schools come under the regulations of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor, and if so I should hope we shall be liberally considered. I have the honour to be, Sir, your obedient humble servant, “Power Tuam,” dated at the palace, Tuam, addressed to me, as secretary. I, of course, laid that letter before the committee, and the committee holding it quite necessary that they should distinctly understand the constitution, principles and regulations of that Society, in order to enable them to judge whether they could consistently comply with the application from this very respectable quarter, I was directed to address a letter to the following effect to his Grace, dated Kildare-place, 27th January 1820:—“My Lord, “I have had the honour of receiving your letter of the 12th instant, containing an application to the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland for aid to the schools of the Hibernian Society, and I am directed by the committee to inform your Grace that they have hitherto delayed answering your letter, in the hope of being able to procure copies of the different reports and documents that have been published by the Hibernian Society since its formation, as the committee are desirous of having such documents before them previous to coming to a final determination upon the subject of your Grace’s letter; having failed to procure those papers in Dublin, your Grace would confer a favour on the committee by procuring those documents for them, and I am directed to assure your Lordship, that the committee feel extremely anxious to comply, as far as the regulations of the Society will permit, with any application that may be made by your Grace. I have the honour to be, &c. J. D. Jackson, Secretary;” addressed to “His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, Palace.” His Grace replied to that by a letter, dated 29th January 1820, to the following effect:—“Palace of Tuam. Sir, I feel much obliged by the very kind expressions conveyed to me by you and the committee for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, and shall immediately give directions that copies of the different reports and documents which have been published by the London Hibernian Society since its foundation, shall be sent to you. I have the honour to be, Sir, your faithful servant, Power Tuam. To J. D. Jackson, Esq.” Some time elapsed, and on the 7th February 1820, his Grace wrote me another letter to the following effect:—“Sir, The agent to the London Hibernian Society has sent to London for a complete set of the Society’s reports; in the mean time I beg that the inclosed original address may be laid before the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor, together with a copy of the regulations of the schools and the report of Mr. Stevens. I have those several documents here, which we have preserved since that time. Our schools are in great need of desks, forms, slates and pencils; could we obtain relief from the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor for some of the former for our principal schools, and ten thousand slates, and a due proportion of pencils, the service to our pauper population “would

" would be incalculable. I shall beg of you to lay this letter, as well as its inclosures, before the committee for promoting the Education of the Poor; and I have the honour to be, Sir, &c. Power Tuam." It is right to apprise the Commissioners, that we never did receive from his Grace, from that time to this, the copies of the reports we required, nor any further information respecting the Society than what was contained in those documents, and that being the case, of course we never did make any grant to the Society, of which his Grace was one of the chief officers (vice president); we should of course have been happy, if having ascertained that their principles coincided with ours, to have assisted in a case that appeared one of great urgency, and especially we should have been happy to have had such a respectable person as his Grace to confide in, but we did not feel ourselves at liberty to make a grant to that Society without first ascertaining that its principles and acts from its beginning had been such as were consistent with those upon which our Society was established.

Did the documents that were then furnished to you create an impression that there might be an objection to granting aid to the Society?—No, not the documents furnished to us; but we had been given to understand, that there was matter to be found in the reports which it was essential we should see, in order to form our opinion as to the Society; hence it was that we abstained from giving aid to the Society, and we never have had any further communication with the societies alluded to in the question than I have stated. I suppose the Society in London did not choose to furnish the documents to us; however one thing is certain, that we never got them. I thought it my duty in point of correctness, having discovered these documents, to bring them forward and state them to the Commissioners.

Appendix, N° 203.

Examination of Samuel Bewley, Esq. on his solemn Affirmation;
Friday, 3d December 1824.

ARE you a member of the Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland?—I am.

Were you a member of that Society before they received any aid from Parliament?—I have been a member from its first establishment; I was one of the original movers in it.

Did it then bear the same designation it does now?—I think there was never any variation in its title.

When was that Society originally formed?—The 2d December 1811.

Of what number of members did the Society consist at its first establishment?—I believe the Society consisted of every person that subscribed, and to the best of my recollection a guinea per annum or a donation of ten guineas constituted a member, but the exact number I cannot charge my memory with.

State, as nearly as you can, how long the Society existed before you received any aid from Parliament?—The first parliamentary grant was in the session of 1814–15.

What was the object of the Society upon its first institution?—The object was to promote the education of the poor of Ireland.

Was its object to promote the education of the poor without religious distinctions?—Decidedly.

Was it formed upon the idea that no society in existence in Ireland had succeeded in effecting that object?—I am not aware of any society having been formed for that object; previously there were local associations possibly for particular districts or particular schools.

Did it appear to you that there existed at that period any society that had succeeded in affording extensive education to the lower classes of all religious denominations?—I am not aware of any society undertaking it.

Did the Society petition Parliament for aid?—Certainly, in the session of 1814–15, but not before.

Will you describe, as accurately as you can, the conditions upon which they obtained it?—I do not know that I can speak upon the subject in any other words than the grant of the House of Commons, and that was without limitation, to aid the objects of the Society, as stated in the petition, which was, that the schools should be open for all, upon the basis of a general Scripture education and proper instruction, and inculcating good order and habits of cleanliness and decency; I believe the grant was completely unshackled with any conditions, only it was given in conformity to the principles I have stated.

Which principle was fully developed in the petition to Parliament?—Yes.

Was the grant given at once by a vote of the House upon the petition, or was the petition referred to a committee?—I believe it was a grant of the House at once, by the recommendation of the government, without any reference to a committee; this I speak from general recollection, not from any document.

As well as you recollect, was it specified in the petition that your object was to give a scriptural education?—I have no doubt of it.

Was it an established rule, from the first, that the Scriptures should be read?—It was; that was the foundation of it, that we should not interfere with the religious tenets of any, but that the schools should not be devoid of religious instruction, and it was believed that the only religious instruction that could be given, without interfering with the views of some or other of the different denominations existing in Ireland, was reading the Scriptures without any comment or observation.

Examination of Samuel Bewley,
Esq.
3 Dec. 1824.

Was it a rule from the first commencement of the Society, that no catechism should be taught in the schools?—It was.

Was it a rule from the first that persons of all religious denominations should be admissible as masters, directors, superintendents and scholars?—It was.

Have those rules been acted upon from the first establishment of the Society until the present time?—They have; they were never varied; those three fundamental principles of the Society have been strictly adhered to ever since its establishment.

Do you mean by that, that the Society has never consented to a breach of the rules, and has endeavoured to correct whatever breaches might arise?—Yes; I speak of the Society itself; if schools should be found in deviation, they would be brought to conform, or refused further aid.

Have any of those rules, though not abandoned, been recently, on any occasion, modified or relaxed?—There has never been any attempt at it in any way.

Has the Society ever been content with permitting the reading of extracts from the Scriptures instead of the New Testament entire?—Never as a substitute for it,—as an auxiliary, they have no objection to it.

Has not the Society experienced much greater resistance from persons of the Roman Catholic religion of late years than it did in the early part of its existence?—That there has been opposition I admit, but not, I believe, to lessen the number of schools under the care of the Society, wherein all classes are admitted; there has been opposition from individuals, but still there are many other individuals of the Roman Catholic religion cordially co-operating.

Has there not lately been considerable exertion on the part of the Roman Catholic priesthood, to take the Roman Catholic children from the schools?—I rather think there has in some few instances, but I am not aware that there have been many schools discontinued.

Did those attempts at preventing the Roman Catholics attending your schools commence shortly after their establishment?—I rather think, for many years before the establishment of the Society, there were individuals of that persuasion that had objections, more perhaps in number than any other denomination; there were objections, some upon one ground and some upon another, to the schools, but those objections, I do hope and do trust, have to a considerable extent subsided; still there are individuals who object.

Was there any school conducted upon these principles previous to the existence of the Kildare-place Society?—There was.

Is that school still in existence?—Yes, it is the school in School-street in this city.

Has it continued in operation from its first commencement to the present time?—It has continued in operation for a period long before the formation of the Education Society upon these principles; it was originally founded by the curate of the parish in which it was situated, Richard Powell; it was founded in the year 1786; at that period, although open for all denominations of children, there were some distinctions, but in the course of a few years there were several members of the society I belonged to became active managers of that school, and gradually all those peculiar attentions to one denomination over another were done away, and it was established decidedly and distinctly upon those three principles I have mentioned, and it has been from that period, which I think is thirty-five years, so continued, without any variation, and with great satisfaction and success; here is an extract from the report of that school in the year 1813, in which it is stated: “ But above all, the committee are desirous of calling the attention of the public to the advantageous results from the conduct steadily observed, for a very considerable number of years, respecting moral and religious instruction. It may be understood, from what has been already stated, that no distinction is made on account of religious opinion in managers, instructors or scholars, and from this harmonizing system the committee have, with great satisfaction, observed the most advantageous consequences; scholars of different religious opinions harmoniously studying together, and teachers, some of whose religious sentiments might appear much opposed to each other, cordially labouring together for the good of the rising generation. It may be asked, what particular conduct has been pursued; the answer is—avoiding carefully giving offence to any steady conduct; to discourage bad and to encourage good morals; the reading of the Scriptures, not only in the schools, but leaving them in the hands of the scholars qualified to make use of them out of school hours, and thus laying the foundation of religious instruction from that book which all denominations of christians admit their respective tenets to be tried by, and leaving to the parents or friends any particular or sectarian instruction they may think necessary.” I think it is of some importance to bring forward in the present instance, that that plan has been steadily followed, to my knowledge, I think, thirty-five years, and the report I have read, I think, corroborates this opinion, which is for the year 1813.

Are you aware that many of the schools under the management of the Society for the Education of the Poor are also in connection with other societies?—I believe there are several, but the proportion I am not aware of; there must be several.

Do you not believe that the rules of some of those societies are incompatible with the strict interpretation of the rules of your Society?—I am not aware what the rules of those societies are—some are represented to be so; but it seemed to be our object to embrace all schools that would admit our principles, believing our principles to be those that would be most advantageous for the community in Ireland, and therefore we rather wished to draw all schools into our principles than to cast them off because they received aid from other societies.

Do you know the rules of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I am aware of them

559
Examination of Samuel Bewley,
Esq.

them upon general grounds, and I am aware that there is a distinction in those rules, that if they give aid of a certain description, the master must be a Protestant; but if they find a master a Protestant in the school, they may aid that school; this, I apprehend, to be the distinction; now it has so happened, that some of the schools connected with us have received aid from that Association; the master happening to be a Protestant, though if the master was changed it would not receive aid from it.

Is it not a rule of the Association that the children shall be taught the catechism in the school by the school master?—I am not aware of their rules sufficiently, but it may be so.

If among the rules of the Association, one was found which made it necessary for the children to be taught the church catechism in the school, should you think that rule incompatible with the rules of your Society?—Most certainly, if the manager of the school acted upon what is stated to be the principle of that society, the school could not receive aid from us, and would get none; whether that society really acts upon those rules, or the managers of the schools make false representations to either of the societies, I cannot tell; but it must be one or the other.

Do you think it desirable that the schools of two societies should be in connection, in which the rules of one or the other must be relaxed in the school?—I do not think it would be expedient.

Entertaining that opinion, if an application was made for assistance from the Kildare-place Society, to a school that was known to be in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice, what course should you think it desirable to follow?—The course pursued would be, if they answered our queries correctly, and they were found to be conformable to our rules, that they faithfully adhered to those principles, we would not inquire as to the cause of the deviations from the rules of the other society, that would involve us in judging of other people's business, whether they have acted correctly or whether the rules were relaxed; some of us may think that those rules are not acted up to by that society.

Should you consider that your inspectors would have the same authority in a school that received aid from two societies, as they would in one which relied solely upon the support derived from you?—I think they might; I do not consider that the inspector has any other object but inquiry and recommendation, if beyond that it becomes necessary, the proceedings should be by an order from the committee.

Are you aware that in one school which is connected both with the Association and with the Kildare-place Society, that it is the practice on one day in the week to break up the school as early as twelve o'clock, either to retain or call back the Protestant children, and to instruct them during the remainder of the morning, in the church of England catechism?—I cannot say I am aware of such a case.—[Here the witness observed, that he was unable to speak particularly to subjects of this nature, not being a regular attendant of the correspondence sub-committee, but that there are other members of that sub-committee, who will be competent to give the information required.]—I think the separation of any denomination of the scholars from the rest in the school, would be unadvisable and inconsistent; but the school-house might be used at any other hour for the instruction in catechism, by any of the denominations of Christians that would be attending there; that would not be considered as a deviation, we do not look at the school-house, which in some instances has been applied to other purposes, probably for a chapel; but the school is understood to be held in such and such hours; and if during those hours the regulations of the Society are faithfully adhered to, we do not think we are called upon to inquire what is done in the school-house at any other hour; sometimes it may be a meeting-house and sometimes a chapel.

Do you entertain any doubt that the practice of teaching the catechism of the church of England, under such a regulation as you have described, would create objections on the part of Roman Catholics?—I think it is probable they would have absented; and if we could have school-houses totally separated from all other uses, it would be more desirable; but as we do not give school-houses in all instances to the full extent they are requisite, some of them are held in places appropriated to religious worship at other times. We would be fearful of going beyond declaring the school-hours, without regard to the school-house, lest we should go into those questions that would be foreign from our purpose.

If a schoolmaster, being a Roman Catholic, was desirous of teaching the catechism of his church to children of the Roman Catholic persuasion, at a certain hour, during which the school was not generally assembled, would it be held to be such a deviation from the rules of the Kildare-place Society as to induce them to withhold the payment to the master?—By no means; it would be precisely the same whether the master was a Roman Catholic or Protestant.

Has any instance come to your knowledge?—I could not give an instance; but my impression is, that the number of instances is far greater amongst Roman Catholics than among the Protestants.

Would it be inconsistent with the rules of the Society, that on successive days, after the dismissal of the school, the children of the different persuasions should be taught the catechism by any body competent to do it?—The Society do not interfere as to what use is made of the school-house after the school-hours.

Are you aware that many of the schools are in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—I believe a considerable number.

Do you think that that is advantageous or otherwise?—I think it would be preferable that schools, receiving aid from us, should not receive it from others; but the avowed principles of that Society are declared to be the same as the principles we have adopted; and therefore, as we have not hitherto been prepared to come to a resolution of giving salaries to the masters, it is an inducement to schools to receive aid from that Society, because they give salaries to the masters. If we gave salaries, we could at once then say, we will give you the required aid; but if we give this aid, you must not be receiving aid from other societies.

Examination of

Is it not thought by persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion, that the practice of the Hibernian Schools interferes in a greater degree with their religious opinions, than the rules of the Kildare-place Society?—I rather think it is; the practice of the agents of that society seems to have created greater opposition than ours. The rules and regulations of the society are declared to be similar to ours; but the practice of some of the agents, whether known or unknown to the society, it is not for me to say, has been understood to be different.

Is it not a regulation of the Kildare-place Society, that the Testament should not be read generally as a class book, but that it should be used only by the higher class of readers?—Yes, it is the recommendation of the Kildare-street Society that it should be read only by those who have attained a suitable proficiency.

Is it not their wish, that the Testament should be kept apart from, and not be tossed and tumbled about with the rest of the books?—I believe it is a point they have not given any general opinion upon; but many of the Society would prefer the children having the Testaments in their own hands to take them home with them, if the regulation of the schools would allow of it; and that was the principle in School-street school. But the Society have never interfered with that point; they do not wish to interfere with the regulations of individual schools more than sufficient to bring them within the principles of the Society; all the rest is regulation for the managers of the different schools.

Is it not a necessary condition with the Hibernian schools, that the children should take the Testament home with them?—I am not aware; I believe they require them to commit a portion of the Scriptures to memory; but whether that is done in school hours or at home, I have no knowledge.

Do you know that the rules of the Hibernian Society force the children to read the Scriptures entirely to the exclusion of other books?—I am not aware that it is; the schools that have been in connection with both societies, I believe have, generally speaking, the particular books that are recommended by the Education Society, as well as the Scriptures;—that would not be approved by our Society. But if such was the regulation, it would not exclude the schools from receiving aid; the practice of the Society would be, to endeavour to draw them into a better regulation.

Are you acquainted with the spelling book used in the London Hibernian Schools?—I am not; I was not aware that they had any particular spelling book.

Are the schoolmasters permitted to give any explanation whatever of the meaning of the Scriptures?—Not unless it was as to the grammatical construction of a sentence; and even that, I believe, many of the Society consider would be better avoided, because it might lead to abuse.

Is there any distinct rule upon the subject, that the masters know how to follow?—I believe the general rule is, that there is to be no comment upon the Scriptures; that is understood by all.

Is it so understood by masters, as to prevent them giving any grammatical explanation of the meaning of the words?—I cannot answer that all the masters would understand it so; but I believe it would be the wish of the Society there should be no instruction given, even as to the grammatical construction of a sentence; because it would be liable, as I said, to misconception and abuse; and for that they did endeavour to provide, or have it in contemplation to provide a remedy, by giving the comment on the grammatical construction of a sentence from another book, but they have not got it yet perfected; but it has been in contemplation a long time to remove the apprehended necessity of giving a grammatical construction upon the language of the Scriptures; it is the intention to have a question book corresponding with them, in addition to the Dublin spelling book, to render any question upon the Scriptures unnecessary.

Would you conceive it fair, that a teacher should ask a child the meaning of the word "hypocrite," in reading the Scriptures?—I think I would not; I would wish it not to be done in reading the Scriptures, because it might lead to something else.

Might he ask the meaning of the word "wilderness?"—He might; but I would prefer him not doing it at all, but ask the meaning from any other book.

The question is, whether you think the committee would consider it a deviation from their rules, if they found that a schoolmaster had asked a boy the meaning of the word "wilderness?"—No, I do not; but I should wish, as one, to discourage it. I do not consider it departing from the spirit of the rule, but I should discourage it, because I think it might lead to a suspicion of attempting to give a comment of another nature, or of allowing opinions of another nature to be given; I should advise the master to ask such question from another book.

Is this rule established to prevent all interference with religious opinions, or do you think it a desirable rule in itself?—It is because of the various religious denominations; that it would be an interference, really, or suspected to be so with religious opinions.

If the inhabitants of this country were all of one religious denomination, should you think the children would be better instructed in the meaning of the Scriptures, by admitting of comment and explanation, than in abstaining from it?—Decidedly so.

If

If there were no Roman Catholics in this country, and its inhabitants consisted of Protestants of different denominations, should you think it necessary to abstain from all observation or explanation of the Scriptures?—I believe I may say nearly the same, probably not quite. All the Protestants, I am apprehensive, would not agree in their comments.

Have you made it your duty to pay attention to the accounts of the Society?—I have; at the commencement they were principally under my management and superintendence; latterly some others of the committee have, to a considerable degree, taken it off my hands.

Do you know what is the annual amount of the subscriptions received by the Society, or nearly?—The last year's subscriptions and donations were about 350*l*.

Is that the total amount of money subscribed in aid of the schools under the management and direction of the Society for the Education of the Poor?—No; the subscriptions for local schools do not come into our accounts, though they aid those schools; and it is rather the wish of the Society to induce the subscriptions in the country to be devoted to the local schools than to come into the general fund; the object of subscriptions to the general fund is rather to qualify as members of the Society, for the purpose of voting and attending meetings.

Do you know what is the total amount of subscriptions for the local schools in the country?—I do not know that it would be an unfair calculation to take the aggregate of the subscriptions to be fully equal to the grants from the Society for building, &c.; they amounted last year to 6,526*l*. 14*s*. 4*d*. and there were gratuities to teachers, 3,300*l*.

Do you mean that the local subscriptions are equal to the sums given by the Society towards building, and the sums paid to the schoolmasters, or only one?—I should think we might take it to include them both.

Into whose hands is the money granted by Parliament paid?—It is transferred, by order from the treasury, to the credit and account of the Society, in the Bank of Ireland.

By whom is it drawn from that account?—By the committee; the drafts are signed in committee by three members.

In what way are the payments made; are they made in drafts, or are they made in money?—For the large sums there are generally particular drafts. All drafts, whether large or small, are given into the registrar's hands, and he gives the drafts for the large sums to those they were designed for; and, where there are a number of small items, particularly grants to schools, they are put in one draft, and he gets the particular notes for them that match with the grants to be sent into the country.

Is there at any period of the year a larger balance in the hands of the registrar than that which appears to be in his hands at the close of last year?—At no period of the year is there any considerable balance in his hands; there is nothing allowed to be in the registrar's hands but what appears to be wanting. The mode in practice is, a list is returned by the registrar of what is wanted for current expenses, and those sums are totted up, and the registrar gets one draft for them, as well as drafts for particular payments, as I have before stated; and in the monthly accounts those receipts are produced.

Referring to the account of the year 1822, I see the largest charge was for paper; was that paper for the books to be printed upon?—That is for printing paper for printing books upon, but the greater part of that sum is repaid by the sale of the books.

Is there more money expended in the book department than the school department?—Not now.

What proportion of the expense of printing and publishing the books is repaid by the purchasers?—Any thing that is paid for school requisites is repaid; there are no school requisites sold at a loss; it is in the cheap book department the loss is principally. What is sold wholesale, the loss is at present about 50 per cent; those that are sold in the bound form, there is very little loss upon.

How does that distinction arise?—The object was, in those cheap books, to supplant that pernicious kind of books found to be in circulation in Ireland; and it was considered the better way to do this was to induce the wholesale buyers, who were the fountain that supplied the bad books, to change their mode of work, and buy from us, allowing them adequate profits to sell them at the same price that we did, and the same price the pernicious books were sold at.

What course did you take in order to carry that object into effect?—We sold the books in quires, at a very low price, to induce the dealers to co-operate with us, instead of being our opponents; and in order to do that we sold the bound books so as to allow them an adequate profit.

Was it your object to afford them a greater profit in dealing with you, than they had derived from their past modes of dealing?—To give them, if any thing, beyond their former profits, to compensate them for any inconvenience there would be in throwing them out of their former trades.

Had you any means of ascertaining what their former profits had been?—I do not know that we had any thing more than a general idea; we had no evidence.

Have the Society succeeded in putting that class of books out of the market?—To a very considerable extent. The result of the latest enquiries we have made on that point was, that to the southward we found no instance of those pernicious books being reprinted; that those on sale were remains of old editions that were printed, probably, before we began; at Belfast they have continued to print some of them of a very bad kind; in Dublin I believe there are none printed.

Examination of Samuel Bewley,
Esq.
3 Dec. 1824.

Was not Dublin a great source from whence the country was supplied?—It certainly was.

Have you any means of knowing whether the individuals who used to carry on the trade in Dublin, have since desisted from it?—I think the principal was Jones, in Thames-street; he has, I understand, ceased business.

Did not he deal with you?—No, he never dealt with us. He has, I believe, given up business entirely; the trade got into new channels.

Are those books sold wholesale to any person who applies, or only to particular individuals?—To any one who applies; the salesman has no right to refuse selling to any one who applies. There was a person who happened to demand a larger quantity than was supposed to be for home consumption, and it produced an explanation between him and me, and he said he had the money in his pocket, and would not be catechised; but upon stating what the object was, he desisted from buying, and relinquished the exportation of them.

Have you reason to believe that any were exported to England in considerable quantities, or abroad?—It appeared, probably two or three years ago, that considerable quantities were sent; I do not think there are any large quantities now sending. To counteract that temptation, the price was advanced in quires 50 per cent. We had sold them for 4*l.* a thousand, and raised the price to 6*l.*; that is just about one-half of the price they stand us in.

What course do you pursue when it is known to you that the persons desirous of purchasing the bound books are about to take them to England?—We do not interfere with them; the bound books pay nearly the cost; at the dozen price they pay full price.

Have you ever known applications made for the purchase of bound books, in order to take them to England, and to what extent?—They must be principally, if not wholly, for private use, or for the circulation of particular schools; but in this way it must be to a very inconsiderable extent.

Would the Society sustain any loss by any such transaction?—The books bought in a bound form, bound in sheep, at the dozen price, fully pays the cost, which is, I believe, the mode in which they have been generally sent out; I am not aware there is any exportation to such an amount as would at all justify the risk of losing the object we have of turning out the pernicious books; I am not aware of any thing to an alarming extent; that there will be some sent I have no doubt, for there is not such a selection to be had in England; there is no such selection I believe in any part of the world as we have for the use of children and young people.

Who are your principal customers for the bound books?—I rather think the greatest quantity of bound books go at present in grants to schools.

Are many of them purchased by persons who sell them again?—I do not think there are any purchased in the bound form, to any material extent, by those who sell again; they choose their own binding; they choose to bind as they like.

Are the books you print distributed widely over the country?—I believe they are very general over all parts of Ireland.

Are they to be found in the small bookseller's shops in the country towns?—I believe they are in many places; probably not in all,

Do you know whether the hawkers and pedlars carry them for sale about the country?—They do, no doubt, to a certain extent; vast quantities have been sold in Dublin by boys carrying them about the streets, three for ten-pence, and four for ten-pence.

Do not the country hawkers and pedlars become purchasers to a considerable extent?—I believe they do not; I think they buy them from people who buy them in quires; the great bulk not sold in quires are disposed of in grants.

In what way are the payments made to schoolmasters in the country?—It is remitted by the registrar sending half notes, on the receipt of which being acknowledged the second half is sent down by the registrar.

Is the registrar the person who always makes payments on account of the Society?—Always.

In what way are the registrars accounts examined and checked?—They are examined monthly; he has credit for the regular bills and vouchers that he has produced, which must be previously ordered and sanctioned before he pays.

By whom is the order made previously to his receiving his sanction?—The mode is, that there is an order book laid before the general committee monthly, for all wants, which being sanctioned by the general committee, the articles mentioned therein are to be provided by the proper persons; besides which, there are grants recommended by the correspondence committee to schools and salaries; and in addition, there is considerable expenditure in the book department, and all accounts in that department are certified by the book committee, and when certified by them to the general committee, orders are made by the general committee for their payment.

Is the whole detail of the accounts examined by the account committee before they are transmitted to the commissioners of imprest accounts?—They are all accurately examined before the registrar gets credit for them monthly, and then the aggregate of those monthly accounts forms the aggregate of the payments for the year; and then the accounts that are made out in the form required by these commissioners must agree with that total, so that it is impossible for a single farthing error to be in it; the amount must agree under the form by which it is checked.

Have any sums ever been disallowed to the Society by the commissioners of imprest accounts?—Nothing, except some very small fractions; I rather think a few halfpence;
I only

I only speak from recollection; but there has been no disallowance upon principle; there were some errors in calculation.

To what amount might those errors amount?—I doubt if the whole was 20 s.; all subscriptions, and all receipts of money, are lodged by the proper officers at John David Latouche & Co. (the treasurers); we have sometimes had to get advances from them, and sometimes they have money in hand; it is afterwards drawn out from them and lodged in the Bank of Ireland; we never pay by draft on John David Latouche & Co. always by draft on the Bank of Ireland; when there is an accumulation by lodgements, on account of sales and subscriptions as I have mentioned, sums are drawn from them and lodged in the Bank of Ireland.

Appendix, N° 204.

Further Examination of Samuel Bewley, Esq.; Monday, 24th January 1825.

ON the former day, when you were examined, you stated that the sums disallowed to the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, by the commissioners of accounts, were very trifling, but you were not able to ascertain the precise amount; have you since ascertained it?—Yes; I directed one of the clerks to make me out an account of all disallowances, which I have here, and the manner in which they were accounted for; there appears to have been in the account ending the 5th of January 1817, a disallowance of sixpence, overpaid, being an error in calculation, to Williams the builder; and 20s. overpaid, likewise an error in calculation in the attorney's bill, Emanuel Orpen; those sums were refunded by the parties prior to the annual meeting of the Society, in 1818, and therefore not noticed in the account then presented, which is annexed to the Sixth Report.

Samuel Bewley,
Esq.
24 Jan. 1825.

State the next sum that was disallowed to the Society?—The next sum is 1 s. 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. in the account for the year ending the 5th of January 1818, an error in calculation likewise, to Williams the builder; and in the account for the following year, there was one shilling overpaid to Booth the book-binder; and in the account for the year ending 5th of January 1820, 3 l. 2 s. 4 d. which appeared to have been paid to Draper the stationer, for the same articles at the conclusion of one account and at the commencement of another.

Were those errors rectified?—Those three sums of disallowances were repaid, and the Society have been debited therewith, in the account annexed to the Ninth Annual Report.

State any sums that may have been disallowed to the Society in the years account next subsequent to the last mentioned?—I do not find that there have been any disallowances since.

Is it your evidence that there have been no disallowances for the years ending 5th January 1821, 1822, 1823 and 1824?—Yes; that is my belief, grounded on the report of the clerk whom I directed to examine the accounts, and I have no recollection of any.

Is he a clerk in whom you place confidence?—Yes; he is the second in the office.

Have you ever attended before the Commissioners upon passing the accounts?—Yes.

Can you recollect in what years you have so attended?—I cannot, critically; I believe I attended all the early years.

Have you that degree of knowledge of the accounts of the Society, that if there had been any disallowances to the amount of a few pounds in the last few years, you must have known it?—Yes; it could not have been without my knowledge, from my having the general superintendence of the accounts, being one of the committee of accounts, and I usually signed and examined them.

Is there any member on the committee that gives them more attention than yourself?—James Martin Pike has for the two years preceding the last, passed the accounts, and he has rather taken that department off my shoulders; James Doyle appears to have passed the accounts for the year ending 5th January 1824.

When you have been before the commissioners of accounts, have they expressed any opinion to you, or in your hearing, as to the manner in which the accounts of the Society were kept?—I do not recollect any opinion expressed by them, verbally; they give a certificate upon the roll returned, to the effect that the accounts are just and true, or "this account is correctly stated and vouched."

Are you enabled to state to the Commissioners, at what expense to the Society you conduct the book department; or in other words, how much the Society has lost upon that branch of its business which relates to the dispersing of cheap books and school requisites through Ireland?—From the questions put to me relative to the mode of conducting that department of the Society's business, when I was last examined, I caused an investigation from the books of the Society to be made by the proper officer, and which I have now before me, by which it appears that the total loss for seven years on the sale of cheap books, was 4,537 l. 10 s. 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. and there is no loss on the sale of school requisites.

Do you mean that that was the average loss upon each of those years, or the total aggregate loss during the seven years?—The total aggregate loss.

How much was the average loss in each year?—£.648. 4 s. 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

The Commissioners have collected from the last report, not yet printed, but which was made a few days ago, at the public reading of which some of the Commissioners were present, that the amount of cheap books distributed in the last year, was about 170,000?—I believe it was.

Examination of Samuel Bewley,
Esq.
24 Jan. 1825.

Do you yourself consider, that that was a sufficient quantity to send into Ireland, considering the number and extent of the schools that are to be supplied generally, throughout the country?—I think it was not so much as I apprehend the wants of Ireland might require, but it appears to be as far as we have been able to effect by the sales, wholesale and retail, and dealers, by distribution of the books gratuitously, for lending libraries attached to schools under the patronage of the Society, and also to lending libraries attached to schools not under the regulations of the Society, as well as to lending libraries not attached to any school; but there are some districts of Ireland that I believe we have not obtained as complete possession of the market in point of sale, as would be desirable.

Could you form any sort of general estimate in your mind of what number of books you would think it desirable should belong to any particular school at any given period, we will say to a school of the average extent of those connected with the Society?—We have a regular scale, according to the number of children reported, to give either one or two sets, according to the number of scholars; if the number of scholars exceeds one hundred, the number of books is frequently increased to four sets. I think four sets would be about two hundred and fifty books; that is the largest number we give to any one school, except where there are males and females, and in such cases there may be the like number to each.

Should you think a supply of 100 books more or less than a fair average to all the schools that you find throughout the country?—I should think it rather under the average given.

Should you consider that a yearly supply, that it would be necessary to renew it every year, or that the supply being once made would last for two or what number of years?—Not every year, it ought to last about two or three years, but that is a mere opinion.

Are you aware what may be about the total number of schools of all descriptions in Ireland?—I am not.

Informing you that it has been found some what to exceed 10,000, do you not think upon the plain principles of calculation, that your present issue of cheap books is altogether inadequate to supply schools to that extent?—Certainly, the number in that case would appear to be deficient.

Do you not think it would be desirable that the Society should submit to rather a greater loss upon this branch of their business, in order to take more complete possession of the book market?—I do not draw that conclusion, because the Society give gratuitously to all schools conducted upon its principles, and not only to those schools, but to any association that may be formed, whether attached to schools or not, provided there is security given that the books shall be fairly lent and taken care of for that purpose.

Do you find that schools connected with other Societies do, in point of fact, very frequently apply to you for such grants?—Yes, repeatedly.

Have you ever known any charter schools make such an application to you?—No, I am not aware of any such.

To what do you attribute that remarkable omission?—I cannot tell, except that they possess funds and can purchase them if they like them. I do not know that they have them.

Do you know whether they have purchased any?—I have no knowledge of any being purchased by the Society who have the care of those schools.

Would you, according to the practice of the Kildare-place Society, give a present of a lending library to any charter school that applied for it?—I should think, according to the practice of the Society, we must give them if applied for.

Have you been applied to for lending libraries on behalf of many schools connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I am not able to answer that question; we have attached to us some schools belonging to that Society, and the probability is, that on application for a lending library, the applicant would not mention whether or not the school was under the patronage of that Society; the grants for lending libraries being completely unshackled, whether the library is attached to a school, to an hospital, or an individual anywhere, if the library is engaged to be preserved for the purpose of lending, the grant is made.

Have you any knowledge whether the schools belonging to the Hibernian Society, like or dislike one of your circulating libraries coming among them?—I have no knowledge of the point, but I cannot apprehend any dislike to it.

Have you ever heard that there are any individuals connected with the management of that Society, who dislike the various and miscellaneous information contained in the library books, and think it better that the children should not only have the Scriptures but the Scriptures only?—I have not heard of any denomination or association having an opinion disapproving of our cheap books, and they have obtained the decided approbation of almost every one whose sentiments I have heard expressed on them.

In order to maintain the great circulation of cheap books to which you allude, is not it necessary to have a great stock of them on hand at all times?—Yes.

Is your stock on hand greater than you consider fairly necessary to conduct with facility this branch of the business?—I do not consider it so.

Is it sufficiently large?—I think it is a fair average; we are at present printing some large editions which, when they come in, will enlarge the value of our stock, which will gradually be sinking till we enlarge it again; but I do not think that the value we have had for the last two or three years more than an average stock in the book department.

What do you conceive to be the present value of the saleable stock you have on hand, that that you conceive necessary to conduct the business?—The stock for the last year is not ascertained, but I apprehend it is something above the amount I have long held to be the value that would be essential, which is about 10,000 l. it may be nearly 12,000 l.

585
Examination of
Samuel Bewley,

About what number of copies of cheap books may you have on hand at present, both in a bound and unbound state; the question does not seek for any extreme accuracy, but we wish for your own present impression on the subject?—I should think our stock would be about five hundred thousand.

What was the number of schools bonâ fide in existence, and in full operation on the 5th of January 1824, that were connected with the Society?—We took it in our Report at 1,000, and I have no doubt it has been made out accurately by the clerks.

What numbers were added in connection with the Society between the 5th of January 1824, and the 5th of January 1825?—About 490.

Are we to understand that there are at present in actual connection with the Society 1,490 existing schools?—I think you may.

The same Report of the Society states, that in those 1,490 schools, there are actually at the least 100,000 pupils, you will observe that will give an average of 67 to each of those schools, is it your present impression that 67 is really a fair average in attendance upon your schools, making all due allowances for the reductions that some of them have most certainly sustained?—I stated in my last examination, that not being a constant attender of the correspondence sub-committee, I was not able to give that exact information upon the business of that department that some other members would be, and this is referring to the same subjects; I have not the matter upon which that calculation was made before me. I do not attend that sub-committee except very occasionally.

Is it your general impression resulting from the constant attention you have given to the business of the Society, that generally speaking 67 would not be rather a high average for the attendance upon your schools?—I should be desirous of having the question put in that form, and a blank left for the answer, and I will refer to the documents necessary to enable me to answer it.

[The witness requested that a blank might be left for his answer, and stated that he would have an examination made and give in the result; he subsequently stated from the best inquiry he could make, that 67 was not too high an average.]

Is there a considerable pressure of applications upon you at present, for admission into the masters training school?—There is.

Are you able at present to admit all applicants?—There is a vacation at the close of the summer, and the number applying for admission then accumulates until it opens again, the opening has been about three months since, those that so accumulated have not been all admitted, yet in order to keep up the number the house was able to accommodate complete, as some did not come up punctually, others were written for and both coming up caused a redundance that we were unable to accommodate in the house, until vacancies were made for them by the discharge of some whose instruction was completed.

Is there any considerable pressure of applications for admission into the mistress's training school?—There is a considerable number on the list for admission, but I am not aware of a press of applications—the orders for admission that were made for the six or eight months that the school has been in contemplation of opening, have not all been able to be complied with as yet, and will not for some months to come.

Do you consider upon the whole you have at present sufficient accommodation for masters and mistresses, according to the degree of application that for the future you expect?—I am perfectly satisfied we have not.

Is it in your contemplation to increase either the one or the other or both?—It is in contemplation to increase the accommodation for both, and it is in progress for the masters.

According to your present means of accommodation, how many masters and mistresses do you consider yourselves able to send forth into society in the course of a twelvemonth?—About 240 masters and 150 mistresses.

To what extent should you think it desirable that those numbers should be increased?—The view I take of the increase is not to have a greater average in the course of a year, but that in no instance there should be a necessity for letting any young man be out of the premises for a single night, much less a young woman; at one time we might have twenty or thirty more than the average, and at another time there might be less.

Should you think it a desirable plan for the education of school masters to establish a seminary in which they should be kept and boarded for three, four or five years together with a view to their better instruction?—I should doubt the propriety of it.

What evil should you expect to follow from it?—I think the masters so trained, would not have the same effect and influence upon the population of the country where they would go to teach, as those whose habits and manners would be in unison with the habits and manners of the country.

Do you mean that they would be likely to forget those manners?—I mean that they might be made too great gentlemen, and not have the same agreeable influence as those with whom the population were acquainted, they would be looked upon as a different race of beings, as foreigners.

What would you think of a plan of taking children from the Foundling Hospital, or the Charter Schools, who had never seen any thing of the manners and habits of the world at all, and shutting them up for five or six years in a boarding institution, with the professed object of training them for masters, how do you think they would answer in the country when sent down to it?—I should be afraid of the experiment, having as far as my recollection can serve me, the most satisfactory evidence of the expedience of a master that is trained for a school coming from the country, where he has a perfect knowledge of the circumstances and situation of the people.

Can you imagine human beings much more ignorant of the local circumstances of any particular district than the masters trained in the manner suggested in the last question?—Certainly not; but it is a knowledge of the circumstances of the peasantry of the country whose children he would have to educate, that I would think likely to be productive of beneficial results.

Have you had any opportunities of forming any opinion as to the practical effects upon society of the charter school system of instruction, and the sort of estimation in which persons are held who have been so educated, and the manner in which they turn out?—I may say I have not; I have had little intercourse or knowledge with, or how, the charter schools have been conducted, only on the broad public basis upon which they have been managed, or how the children have turned out, I have had very little intercourse with the working people, my avocations have not led me among them.

Have you always supplied the books on proper application to you, or have you been, from the state of your funds, at any time unable to give the requisite supply?—No, such application has ever been refused on the principle of want of funds; the lending library, except to the Society's schools, is rather a recent branch of the Society's operations.

Are you acquainted with the general principles that regulate the book trade in the city of Dublin?—I do not know that I have any thing more than a general idea.

Can you inform the Commissioners of the usual abatement in reference to the retail price that the publisher makes to a bookseller upon supplying him with his work; we will put the case for instance of Mrs. Hannah Moore's tracts, we will suppose a bookseller in Dublin desirous of purchasing such a quantity from Mrs. Hannah Moore's publisher, as would at the usual retail selling price produce 100*l.* how much will he according to the usual practices of the trade pay to the publisher?—I have understood that the usual allowance was 25 per cent off the retail price, this is to be in the bound form, I know nothing of the price in quires.

We are speaking of them in the bound form?—This is in the bound form, or half-bound.

We will suppose that one bookseller comes for instance and makes such a purchase from Mrs. Hannah Moore's publisher, and afterwards a customer comes into the shop of another bookseller, Mr. Milliken for instance, who happens not to be supplied with that work, and that Mr. Milliken sends for that book to Mr. Cumming, what do you conceive is the abatement that Mr. Cumming would make to Mr. Milliken, according to the usual course of the trade?—I have not evidence of it, but my belief is ten per cent, or twelve and a half.

Then if a purchaser went into Mr. Cumming's shop, Mr. Cumming would have a profit of twenty-five per cent; but if a purchaser goes into Mr. Milliken's shop Mr. Cumming has a profit of only 12½ per cent?—Yes, I understand so; upon the subject of the cheap books I would beg leave to read to the Commissioners an extract from a letter I have received from a member of the British and Foreign School Society, who is also a member of the Society of Friends, of the name of Robert Forster: "I do greatly admire those little publications, and almost envy the Irish poor the privilege of such valuable reading whilst our own population remain unsupplied; had I time I think I could, with a little assistance, form an association in London for this special purpose, your books are so generally admired."

Appendix, N° 205.

Examination of Richard Benson Warren, Esquire, on Oath;
Tuesday, 28th December 1824.

R. B. Warren,
Esq.
28 Dec. 1824.

YOU are one of the committee of the Kildare-place Society?—I am.

Have you been a member of that Society from its first institution?—Very nearly; it was formed on the 2d of December 1811. I lost my father just before that time, and that detained me in the country; but I came up in a few weeks, and have been a member ever since.

Do you attend the meetings of the committee regularly?—I do, as regularly as my professional avocations permit.

Were the rules of the Society already established when you became a member?—No, they were not; there was merely a short statement of the leading principles of the Society, published in about a dozen lines; nothing more.

Was it the object of the Society to provide a general system of education for Ireland?—Yes, that was the object in contemplation.

Was it intended that those rules should be so framed as to be equally acceptable to persons of all religious persuasions?—It was intended to have the rules so framed as to make them as little objectionable as possible, considering the peculiar circumstances of this country; but I do not believe that any of the founders contemplated the practicability of establishing a system which should prove altogether unobjectionable.

Have the rules ever been under consideration since they were first established, with a view to their alteration or revision?—No, never, so far as respects the leading principles of the Society; these principles were not thrown into the form of rules for some time, and there was a good deal of consideration bestowed upon them when they were to be reduced into form; but from that period there never was the least discussion upon the subject among the

the members of the committee, nor even at that time was there any discussion as to the propriety of adhering to the rules, it was merely the mode of putting them forward to the public, in order to have them as clear as possible; that was the subject of consideration.

Were you a member of the Society when money was first granted in aid by Parliament?—Yes; I have been a member from about six weeks after the Society was formed.

Did you understand there was any specific condition annexed to that grant?—No; nothing further than what might be implied from our having set forth our principles very explicitly, and having obtained the grant upon the assurance which we gave that we would abide by them; but I am not aware of any kind of treaty upon the subject; or of any engagement further than what we may be presumed to have given, when we stated that the Society was formed upon certain principles; and that we had adhered to them, and were firmly determined to continue to adhere to them.

Are you aware of any report of a committee of the House of Commons, upon the first application for assistance?—I never heard of any.

Have you any reason to think, that if the Society saw ground to recommend that the condition of reading the Scriptures should not be in all cases enforced, that they would feel themselves guilty of a breach of the conditions upon which they had accepted the grant?—I am quite sure they would; I do not think there are three members on our committee who would continue to act, if the rule as to the reading the Scriptures were to be abandoned or relaxed. If the Institution had been supported exclusively by parliamentary grants, the committee might not perhaps think that they were violating any engagement if they were to depart from this rule, with the sanction of Parliament; but the Society has received donations, subscriptions and bequests, from individuals; and although such contributions are inconsiderable in amount when compared with the parliamentary grants, yet they are very considerable, with reference to the individuals from whom they have been received; and the committee having accepted those contributions, upon the pledge which they had given to the public of adhering to the fundamental principle of the Society; they would feel that they had forfeited their pledge if they did not insist upon the Scriptures being read in all their schools.

Are the persons to whom you consider the Society pledged, those who have subscribed for schools in the country, or the general subscribers?—The general subscribers and donors to the Society.

Do you mean to include both, or only those that subscribe to the general principles of the Society?—Only the latter, because from the others we have taken no money; we have given them aid, but have got nothing from them, and are not pledged to them.

In cases where you have given aid to individuals for building a school, and where you contribute in part to the salary, and to the support of the master, do you conceive that the regulation of the school is still in the hands of the individuals you have assisted, or in the hands of the Society?—We never contribute to the salaries of masters; but where we make a grant to a school, we still consider it entirely under the controul of the local managers, provided they adhere to the fundamental principles of the Society. We are desirous to interfere as little as possible with the details of the management, as we conceive individuals will carry forward schools much better and with more zeal by being permitted to have them under their own controul, and to carry into execution whatever plans of improvement their own experience or intelligence may suggest; for this reason we are unwilling to interfere (even when solicited) in minor matters.

If any modification whatever of the rules upon which the Kildare-place Society now acts was to be made, do you think that it could only be admitted into the schools in the country with the consent of the individuals who have received the assistance of the Society?—Where leases have been obtained of the ground on which school-houses have been built, with the aid of the Society, I conceive the committee of the Kildare-place Society have complete controul over the schools, to the extent of enforcing their three fundamental principles; but that is the only controul the committee have over such schools; and where there are no leases, I do not think the committee have any means of enforcing the observance of their regulations, except by withholding future aid from such schools. The individuals who are the managers of such schools in the country may at once break off all connexion with the Society, and say, "we think it expedient, and that it will better suit the circumstances of the country to carry on the school upon a different plan, and we will therefore reject your regulations."

Where leases have not been granted, have you any authority over the school, except withdrawing the salary of the master, and any books you might supply?—We grant no salaries, and have no authority over such schools, except as I have already stated.

Is there any doubt that a modification of the rules could take place if the Society wished it, with the consent of the individuals who are the patrons of the schools?—No doubt such modifications might take place in such case as to any individual school, if the patron consented, and the managers of the Education Society agreed to such modification, there would be no difficulty in that case.

What do you consider to be the principal rules of the Kildare-place Society?—The first is, that the Scriptures shall be read in the schools without note or comment, written or oral, and that it shall be read bonâ fide by all the children who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading. The second is, that there shall be no catechisms or books of religious controversy, or any work circulating peculiar religious opinions read in the schools; and the third is, that all classes of professing Christians shall be admissible as managers, masters, teachers and pupils, and that they shall be eligible to all the offices connected with the schools; these are the only rules that the Society requires to be adhered to by managers of schools in connection with the Institution.

R. B. Warren,
Esq.

Does the first rule apply to the Old as well as the New Testament?—No; there has been no edition of the Rhemish or Douay translation of the Old Testament without notes, and as it was very desirable to consult the feelings of the great majority of the people, who would naturally wish to read the version approved of by their own clergy, the committee thought it sufficient if the New Testament alone were used in the schools; as if they had required that both the Old and the New Testament should be read, it would have precluded them from conceding what appeared to be quite reasonable to those of the Roman Catholic persuasion.

Is it held necessary, in order to obtain a just compliance with this rule, that the children should read out of the New Testament itself, or would the rule be satisfied if they read extracts?—Extracts would not be sufficient; the Testament itself must be read.

Would the reading of the Scriptures on one day in the week be held a compliance with the rule?—I think it would not be considered a compliance.

Has any question arisen, whether two days or three would be sufficient?—I am not aware of any case of that kind.

Is it understood that only the head class should read them, or rather the class consisting of such children as are able to read easily?—It is considered desirable that those only should read the Testament who have made a considerable proficiency in reading; that they should not use it as a book to learn to read in, but that having learned to read in the ordinary way, so as to be able to understand pretty well what they read, they should then read the Scriptures with reverence as the revealed word of God.

Is it thought necessary they should read the Testament through, or does the master select the parts?—It is entirely at the discretion of the manager or master, provided there is no reason to suppose that there is any desire to evade the rule, or any unfair object in view. If it were found that the same single chapter was read throughout the whole year, that would be considered a breach of the rule; or if some particular doctrinal parts alone were read, that would be also deemed a breach of the rule; though precise limits cannot be assigned as to the portions to be read, yet no manager or master of a school can misunderstand the rule, which required that the Scriptures shall be bonâ fide and substantially read in every school.

Are the members well acquainted with the practice in the different schools?—I think they are better acquainted with it from information from their officers, than from individual experience; of course every member is acquainted with some few schools, but speaking generally of schools in the country, our information is derived from our inspectors, managers and correspondents.

Do you believe that the practice, with regard to reading the Scriptures, is tolerably uniform, or that it varies very much in extent?—I think it varies very much indeed.

Does the objection that has been made on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, appear to be more strongly urged now than in the earlier periods of the existence of the Society?—Certainly; I think the progress of their opposition, as far as I can trace it, may be thus described. When the Society was first established, we had very little either of direct opposition or assistance on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy. As we advanced we met with decided opposition, to the full as much in effect in particular districts as now; but on the other hand as we advanced, we acquired friends particularly among the parochial Roman Catholic clergy. I think those friends were increasing in a greater proportion than our opponents, up to the period of the parliamentary discussions of the last session; and from the time it was generally supposed there would be a parliamentary commission, the opposition has been exercised with a degree of rigour and effect far greater than at any former period. At the same time, if I were asked to name the moment when I thought we had the greater number of truly honest friends among the parochial Roman Catholic clergy it would be at this moment. I mean those who are zealously and honestly acting with us from a conviction of the utility of our system, and who strictly abide by our rules; I know of some instances, in which they have come forward themselves to express their approbation of the institution, even within a very short period. I can conceive individuals acting upon a principle that they do not altogether approve, but which, under circumstances, they may think it better to adhere to; and I believe that several have co-operated with us upon that principle; but when I used the words, "honestly acting" upon our principles, I meant to refer to those who have a belief that our principles are unobjectionable in themselves and suited to the country; and I am convinced that we have now more of that class than we ever had before. Mr. Donelan mentioned to me, that when lately inspecting a school a few miles from Cork, three Roman Catholic clergymen came into the school unsolicited; he concluded they came to signify their disapprobation, but he told me they expressed themselves in the warmest terms of approval, both of the Society and of that particular school, and I have heard of other similar instances in other places.

Have many instances come within your own immediate cognizance?—No; for I have not been in the habit of leaving Dublin for some time past, having ceased to go circuit for the last few years.

Do you entertain any doubt that the attendance of the Roman Catholic children has been of late very much diminished?—It undoubtedly has been of late very much diminished.

As the system at present operates, do you think there is a fair ground of expectation that a general system of education for the lower orders of Roman Catholics in this country can can ever be provided as the system is now conducted?—I have the strongest conviction on my mind that our system will, at no very distant period indeed, be adopted throughout the country, unless it shall be checked by parliamentary regulations, or by the withdrawing the parliamentary grant.

Do you think the resistance of the Roman Catholic clergy will be discontinued, or that it will fail in its effect?—I think it will be discontinued, or if not, that it will become altogether unavailable for the purposes for which it has been excited.

What leads you to think that it is likely to be discontinued?—My own feeling on the subject is derived from a great variety of circumstances, many of them too minute to mention. The conviction upon my mind has been in a great degree produced by my experience of the nature and effects of this opposition; I have known full as decided opposition in particular districts in almost every year since the formation of the Society, as that which has been lately excited in general throughout the country, and with comparatively few exceptions indeed it has been only temporary; it has almost invariably produced the most sudden and decisive effect in withdrawing almost every child from the schools, but I have been frequently more surprised at the short period that has elapsed between the time when the children have been withdrawn from the school and their return, than I have been at the instantaneous removal of them by the interference of the Roman Catholic clergy. I also found my opinion a good deal upon this, that I think we have heretofore succeeded wherever our schools have been established for any reasonable length of time. In such cases I believe I may say that we have invariably satisfied the people that we have no undue object in view, and I am persuaded that, in every part of the country where our schools have been established for some considerable time, and where there are resident gentry who have been conscientious in attending to our rules, the poor would now most willingly and cheerfully send their children to our schools, if not prevented by their clergy. In those quarters, therefore, we have the poor with us, and I anticipate they will be so universally, if we are permitted to go on; I am satisfied they were originally suspicious of our objects, and unhappily they had too much reason to be so, because, prior to 1811, there was (as far as my experience extends) very little interference for their education, except in connection with societies that either had or were supposed to have proselytism in view; but I think the people are in general now satisfied that our conduct is strictly conformable to the principles we profess, and that we have no object in view but that which we openly avow. I am also strengthened in my opinion upon this subject, from knowing that many of the Roman Catholic parochial clergy are favourable to our system, and consider it one that they can conscientiously support; and from my belief that many others of them are rather indifferent about it. I do not think they have in general the same feeling of opposition to the schools that the superior clergy have; I know in many instances that they appear quite satisfied when the orders are issued from the superior clergy, to issue their orders to their flocks and to take no further trouble in the business; consequently, after a week or ten days the opposition ceases to produce any effect, and the children who have been withdrawn again return in a few weeks; I am therefore disposed to think, that the interference of the superior orders of the clergy upon this subject is not sufficient to combine the continued and active efforts of all the parochial clergy. I have very carefully looked over the returns of Mr. Malachy Daly, who is one of our Roman Catholic inspectors, and I find there are many instances in which he reports to us, that although the Roman Catholic bishops had forbidden the children to go to our schools, yet that the parochial clergy were either favourable or had not interfered—in some instances he says, “The parish priest has a good feeling towards the school:” in one instance he states, “the opposition has died away:” in another that the parish priest was “present at the inspection of the school and approved of it:” and in very many he states, “there has been no opposition.” And these returns have confirmed my belief, that in many cases the Roman Catholic parochial clergy are not hostile to us.

Are those opinions formed chiefly from information from your inspectors?—Not entirely; but I felt much strengthened in the opinions I had previously formed, upon looking over Mr. Daly's reports.

If a system could be devised that would be cordially supported by the Roman Catholic priesthood, have you any doubt that under those circumstances the attendance of the Roman Catholic children would be very largely increased?—I have no doubt it would.

Do you believe that the circumstances under which those children would then attend the schools would be more favourable to the formation of a good character in their minds, than those under which they now attend the schools?—There can be no question upon the subject, supposing the system to be in itself equally good, and that it had the concurrence of their own clergy.

Is there not at present a good deal of deceit and trick and evasion in the attendance of a good many children in the schools?—I am satisfied there is.

Does not that extend to the parents?—I think it does.

Is not the master frequently placed in a very difficult situation between the priest and the parents of the children and the patron of the school?—He is often placed in very trying circumstances.

You have mentioned in one of your answers that there were other societies which had proselytising in view which were in operation before the Kildare-place Society; can you state what societies you allude to?—I alluded to the London Hibernian Society particularly, and also to the Capel-street Association. I believe the schools that were formerly supported by the clergy of the established church were almost exclusively Association schools; they avow their object to be to promote the principles of the established church: and I also apprehend that the schools formerly supported by the resident gentry were for the most part Hibernian schools.

Are not many of the schools of the Kildare-place Society in connection with one or other of those societies?—Yes, a great many.

Do you think that at all inconsistent with the general principles of the Kildare-place Society?—I do not think it inconsistent, but very inexpedient.

If it is the object of either of those societies to interfere with the religious opinions of individuals taught in the schools, must it not be inconsistent with the principles of your Society?—I think not; I admit, that if we were to make grants to those societies, there would be a gross inconsistency between our principles and our practice, but I see no inconsistency in assisting individual schools, although they may be in connection with one or other of those societies. I consider the two institutions alluded to separately; the Hibernian Society state their object to be to establish schools exactly upon the principles of our Society; my own opinion is, that they only tolerate such schools, and that their real object is to go much further, and that the persons in their employment sometimes use indirect means for that purpose; whether I am right or wrong upon this point, it is a very general supposition throughout the country, and if we were to grant aid to that society (which we have universally refused to do) we should be acting an unworthy part; but although such is the object (as I believe) of many of the members of that society, yet they require no pledge from the individual managers of the schools in connection with them; that would render it inconsistent for the most conscientious person to pledge himself to us strictly to adhere to our rules, and to keep inviolate such engagement; the managers of that society say to a schoolmaster in the country, “we will give you a certain salary if you have a certain number of children in attendance, and if you take care that they read the Scriptures;” I believe they require nothing more than that from the gentlemen in the country who become the managers of their schools; at the same time I apprehend their object would be to go further if they could, but they are satisfied with going so far if they cannot go further; now with respect to the Association for discountenancing Vice, suppose a gentleman, who has a school in the country in connection with that Association, were to say, that he would pledge himself to adhere to our rules; I apprehend there is no contract between him and that society which would prevent his keeping his engagement with us, and consequently, if he adhere to his promise, the school will be conducted conformably to our system, and I believe, that in many cases, great good would be done by our thus affording aid to schools in connection with the Hibernian Society, especially as our principles would be adhered to if the individual to whom the grant is made attends to his pledge, and all that underhand work which I apprehend sometimes goes forward in the Hibernian schools, would in such cases be done away with; I understand, from Mr. Donelan, that this has actually taken place in such of the schools connected with the Hibernian Society in the county of Cork, as have received aid from us; he very lately told me he found those schools were conducted upon the strictest principles of our Society, and that he did not find any deviation from them; at the same time I am satisfied that where our schools receive aid from other societies, it leaves a great opening for improper conduct, and that it would be very expedient to disconnect our schools from all other societies whatsoever.

Are not those schools that receive aid from the London Hibernian Society, and who also receive aid from you, virtually placed under the controul and direction of that society?—I do not consider they are under the controul or direction of that society, except so far as it requires that a certain number of the children shall read the Scriptures.

Are not the children required to get passages of Scripture by heart?—I do not know that they are so required by the rules of that society, but they may be by the practice pursued in their schools.

Are you aware, that by the rules the children are required to get certain portions of the Scripture by heart, and that, according to the practice, those portions are pointed out by their inspectors?—I am aware that they encourage the children to get portions by heart, but I do not know that the society make it one of their rules; and I would observe, as to this practice of learning the Scriptures by heart, that although it goes beyond our rules, I do not think it at all inconsistent with them.

Is it not understood to be the wish of the Kildare-place Association (whether that wish amounts to a rule or not you will tell us) that those children only who have attained some proficiency in reading should have the Scriptures put into their hands?—It is a recommendation from our committee, but it does not amount to a rule; we have put it into print, and sent it round to the schools as a recommendation.

It is not contrary to your rules that the Scriptures should be used as a mere book to learn to spell from?—Not contrary to our rules, but we recommend that it should not be so used.

Do you think it desirable that the Society for the Education of the Poor should encourage or discourage a connection with the Hibernian Society?—Certainly; in my opinion it is desirable to discourage it.

Do you not think that the instructions issued to the inspectors of your Society in September last, were calculated rather to afford facilities than otherwise for the union?—In my last answer I only stated my own individual opinion; I did not mean to say that the committee have at any time come to any resolution upon the subject, or taken steps to discourage such union; but if we can obtain funds from Parliament sufficient to enable us officially to assist schools, without being in connection with any other society, I think we ought to break off the connection between our schools and other societies, and that in such case it would be well to issue an order forthwith to the masters and managers of the schools, informing them that they must make their choice, and either continue in connection with the Hibernian Society, or any other society from whom they may obtain aid, or with us exclusively; my own opinion is, that the connection between our schools and the Hibernian Society is very inexpedient; I know, however, that many of our most valuable members thought, that by aiding those schools, it would lead to their adopting a better plan, and according to Mr. Donelan's report which I just alluded to, experience has shewn that such members were correct in the judgment they had formed, to a certain extent at least.

Do you know whether the rule with regard to catechisms is complied with in the full spirit in which that rule was drawn?—I believe it is in general; but I do not mean to say there are not instances where it is not observed, as I believe there is scarcely an inspection where there are not some instances pointed out of an infringement of that rule; but in every such case, the committee take immediate steps to prevent the recurrence of such deviation.

Are you aware, that it is not held to be a deviation to teach the catechism after school hours, breaking up the school at a certain time?—Yes; and the practice is permitted, with very great regret, by the committee, but they do not know how they can avoid it; it is permitted to all classes, though it may, and I believe does happen, that the church of England catechism is more frequently so taught than the Roman Catholic, in consequence of the schools being oftener under the management of Protestants than of Roman Catholics; but I know of instances where, after the school has been broken up, the Roman Catholics have been detained for the purpose of being taught their catechism; in the north, I have been informed, that there is a school which is broken up at an early hour on a certain day in each week; it is held in the Roman Catholic chapel, and the Protestant children (if there should be any) are sent away, and then the Roman Catholic clergyman, who cannot spare time for the purpose on any other day in the week, comes and teaches the Roman Catholic children their catechism; I am satisfied it is a very inexpedient thing to have catechism taught in the same school house if it could be avoided, and we have always suggested, that a different room should be had, if possible, for the purpose; but that there should be no condition made, that the attending the one should be a passport to the other.

You think it desirable that the catechisms should be taught, provided the children could be taught them separately, without interfering with their religion?—I think it would be desirable to have the Protestant children so taught their catechisms.

Is there any regulation with regard to permission to the schoolmaster to teach the catechism?—I do not know that the case has ever been put to us by a schoolmaster; it has never been objected to, and I am sure it often occurs in practice.

Is it not a rule of the Association for discountenancing Vice, that in all their schools the catechism of the established church shall be taught?—I am not aware that they have any such rules, but I know they are desirous that the catechism of the established church should be taught to the children of members of that church; from some conversation I had with one of the Commissioners of this Board, I was induced to look over a copy of their queries which was published before the year 1820, and which I have had a long time in my possession, and certainly this paper is calculated to mislead, if the Association have a rule of that kind; in the heading to these queries, the nature of the aid afforded by the Association is pointed out, and certain conditions are specified as "indispensable," in order to obtain aid for building; but there is nothing in it that would make a person applying for aid, of any kind, suppose he was to be under any restriction of the nature alluded to, as there is not one word, either in the heading or the queries, as to the teaching the catechism; I know that many individuals who receive aid from the Association, conceive that they are perfectly at liberty to apply to us, and it appears to me, that although that society is especially designed to promote the principles of the church of England, yet that it tolerates schools where the catechism is not taught; and I do not find, in any of their publications, any rule requiring the catechism to be taught in the school, although I know, that in Mr. Elrington's sermon, it is stated that the Association require the catechism to be so taught; the first Report the Association ever published was, I believe, in the year 1820; and the only printed information which the public previously had, as to their rules, was, I believe, through this set of queries.

Are you aware, that Mr. Elrington, in his sermon preached by him, and published as part of the Report of the Association in 1822, distinctly states as follows:—"The Association requires, that every school shall be under the special direction of the clergyman of the parish; to him they look for its superintendence, and from him alone do they receive any application for its improvement: and further still, they require that the catechism of our church shall be taught in the school to all who are willing to learn?"—I am aware of that statement; but I believe that when they afford aid to individuals applying from the country, they require no pledge to that effect; and that those applying for such aid, are, for the most part, at least, ignorant of any such being expected.

Are you aware, that in the Appendix N^o 7, to their general Report in 1822, the conditions on which salaries to masters and mistresses shall be granted are particularly set forth; and that amongst those it is stated, that the masters or mistresses must be members of the established church?—Yes, I am aware of that; but that publication was in the year 1822; I had a communication some months ago with a member of the committee of the Association, in which he expressed a desire that we should not assist any school connected with them; my reply was, "We are unwilling to enter into discussions respecting the objects or rules of any association of which we are not members;" our wish is to deal merely with individuals; but it is in your power to prevent what you object to, by not giving aid to any person who will not pledge himself to abide by your rules; and then if your rules are inconsistent with ours, he cannot pledge himself to abide by our rules; but if you do not require such an engagement from him, he may say to us, "I have received aid from the Association, but I am under no pledge to them; and if you will assist my school, I will adhere to your rules;" in which case we cannot refuse the aid he requires, if it appears in other respects proper to be granted.

Have you seen the rules of the Association, which appear to have been entered into on the 3d of April 1823, and which have been published by the Association during the present year, the third and fourth of which rules are as follow:—"The school must not receive annual pecuniary aid from any other public institution. The masters or mistresses must be members of the established church?"—I have not seen those rules; in the communication I had with the individual alluded to in my last answer, he gave me a copy of the Report of the Association for 1822, with Mr. Elrington's sermon, which I read over, and it did not contain the rule now spoken of, as to receiving aid from any other public institution; and I was not aware of any such rule; I conceived I had got the latest information from the gentleman I have alluded to; this was some months ago.

Is it not a rule in the Kildare-place Society's schools, that no explanation should be given of the Scriptures?—No explanation that can at all touch upon doctrinal questions, nothing in fact that would not be considered merely a grammatical explanation.

Do you think that is a rule desirable in itself, or is it merely a necessary compromise, to secure the attendance of children of different religious persuasions that they shall not have any explanation given contrary to the doctrines of their own peculiar church?—So far as this rule is restrictive of explanation, it has been adopted merely as a necessary compromise for the purpose you have mentioned; and as to the permission to give explanation merely grammatical, I cannot avoid entertaining doubts of its expediency, as it is liable to great abuse; there are difficulties to be encountered in either rejecting or adopting it; with a conscientious person who would abide by our rules, it would be most desirable to give permission to explain grammatically the meaning of particular words, as we are anxious to give every facility to the understanding of the Scriptures consistently with our principles and good faith; but at the same time it affords so much opportunity for evasion to any individual not inclined to act consistently with our rules, that I have always thought there was great danger in it.

If you were to establish schools for the instruction of Protestants of the church of England only, would you permit the explanation of the Scriptures?—Certainly.

Would you permit the teaching of the catechism?—Yes.

Would you make it necessary that the Scriptures should be explained and commented upon?—No, I would not make it necessary, because it might so happen that there could not be any person procured who would be equal to the task; but if I were establishing a system of education for a country where all were of one religion, I should think it most desirable to provide for the Scriptures being explained, where a competent person could be procured for the purpose, but I would not reject an application for aid, because such person could not be procured.

With regard to the religious instruction of the Roman Catholic children, in what way do you think that could be best given, assuming that they should receive religious instruction in the doctrines of their religion?—I should think the proper foundation of instruction in their religion, as well as that of Protestants, should be the Scriptures, and so far it might be carried on conjointly with the education of persons of other religious persuasions to the extent of merely reading the Scriptures, and thus becoming in some measure acquainted with them; but I think it should be left to their own clergy to give them such instruction out of school hours, as they might think right in order to inculcate their own peculiar opinions.

Does it strike you that any difficulty would arise in carrying any system of that kind into effect from the difference of the two versions?—Not so much as one might anticipate; it struck me at one time that it would be likely to create some unpleasant differences; but it has not done so; we have rarely had an instance of it, and the objection has been found to exist more in theory than practice; I have heard of instances of Roman Catholic clergymen preferring our version to their own, and many Protestant clergymen do not object to the Rhemish version; and I am satisfied from experience, that the difference between the two versions has not produced the ill consequences one might have expected.

Would it not be impossible to call upon the church of England to sanction any other than the authorized version?—As far as I can form an opinion upon that point, I should think the church of England would not sanction any other than the authorized version.

Would it not be impossible to call upon the Roman Catholic clergy to sanction any other than the Douay version?—Certainly; I think the Roman Catholic clergy would not sanction any other than the Douay or Rhemish version.

Would it not be extremely difficult for children to stand up in a class and read according to the system of class promotion, taking places in versions that differed?—Yes; but I believe it does not often happen that the two versions are read in that way in our schools.

If a system was to be devised in which it was necessary the children should read in class publicly,

Publicly, how would you get over that difficulty?—I should certainly, as an individual, approve of a plan that would not be agreeable to some Protestants; that is, that the Rhemish version should be read by the Protestants as well as the Roman Catholics, omitting the parts in which there are material differences between the two versions. I have looked over the Rhemish translation of the New Testament with some care, and have a memorandum of the observations I made on it at the time, and I am satisfied it is a bonâ fide translation from the Latin Vulgate, although it appears to me to have some very gross mistakes in it, with respect to the word “penance” and repentance; and there is also one remarkable difference between the versions in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The difference I allude to must, I think, have been occasioned by an oversight in the translators or transcribers of the Vulgate; I mean the 21st verse of the 11 chapter, where the words are “Jacob adored the top of his rod,” being an exact translation of the Vulgate. “Jacob adoravit fastigium virgæ ejus.” I think this passage, taking it in its literal meaning, is so gross an error, that it could never have been intended. As to the other material difference, the Vulgate has in some instances adopted the translation of the Greek to be found in the authorized version, whilst in others it has been rejected; as for instance, in Mark, chap. 1. v. 15. the Greek word μετανοείτε is translated in the Vulgate “pœnitentiam,” and in the Rhemish “repent;” whilst in the corresponding passage in Matthew, chap. 4. v. 17. the same Greek word “μετανοείτε,” is translated in the Vulgate “pœnitentiam agite,” and in the Rhemish “do penance.” In like manner the Greek word “μετανοείτε,” in the Acts, chap. 3. v. 19. is translated in the Vulgate “pœnitentiam,” and in the Rhemish “repent;” whilst in the Acts, chap. 2. v. 38. the same Greek word “μετανοείτε,” is translated in the Vulgate “pœnitentiam agite,” and in the Rhemish, “do penance.” So to the Greek word “μετανοίαν,” in the Acts, chap. 5. v. 31; and again in the 11 chap. v. 18; and also in the 2d Epistle to Timothy, chap. 2. v. 25. is translated in the Vulgate “pœnitentiam,” and in the Rhemish “repentance;” whilst the same Greek word “μετανοίαν,” and Latin translation of it “pœnitentiam,” is frequently in other places translated “penance” in the Rhemish version.

Are you aware that the Roman Catholics do not acknowledge that the Vulgate is a translation from the Greek?—No; I never heard that they denied the Vulgate to be a translation from the Greek, though I am aware that it has been alleged there are manuscripts of the Vulgate of greater antiquity than any manuscripts of the Greek now existing. But even if the Vulgate were an original, it would seem difficult to account for St. Mark stating that our Saviour preached, saying “pœnitementini,” which in the Rhemish version is translated “repent;” whilst St. Matthew, in the corresponding passage states, that our Saviour preached, saying “pœnitentiam agite,” which in the Rhemish version is translated “do penance.”

Does it strike you that any mode of publicly reading the Scriptures in the school could be adopted which was not in class, and that would admit of the separation of the Protestant and Roman Catholic children?—I think that would be better than to exclude the Scriptures; but it is not a desirable thing to have a separation made between the children.

Would it be necessary to raise that question upon this point; if religious instruction must be given to all, it is evident that a division must take place some where; would it be material whether it took place in reading the Scriptures, or in learning the catechism, provided the Scriptures were generally read?—I think it would make the greatest possible difference; there is very little variance between the two translations of the Scriptures, but a striking difference between the catechisms. And although the separation of Protestants and Roman Catholics in the school would be in some respects objectionable, yet I think it would have the happiest effect to have the two versions thus read in the school, if you could command the attention of the children to the reading of the opposite version, as they would then find there is very little variation between them, and that they are both translations of the same original.

Are you acquainted with the publication which consists of a selection from the Scriptures, which was printed with the sanction of the late Dr. Troy?—Yes.

Do you know upon what principle that was arranged as to the versions?—I am aware of it from what I have heard from the individuals who produced it to our committee; it was in print before we heard of it, and we were told it was prepared under the superintendence of Mr. Parnell and some Roman Catholic clergymen, and that it was presented to Dr. Troy, and that he sanctioned it.

The question alluded to the principle followed as to the two versions; is it substantially according to the authorized version?—The foundation of the book was a work of Mrs. Trimmer's; she naturally took it from the authorized version, and as the object in contemplation was merely to have a work that would be unobjectionable to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, and her work being taken as the foundation, the compilers would not unnecessarily change a phrase, merely because it was found in the authorized version, and differed somewhat from the Rhemish version; but I understood that every passage objected to by the Roman Catholic clergymen was excluded.

Are you aware that in point of fact, the parts on which the main difference exists are retained, and retained according to the authorized version?—I am not aware that there is any substantial matter retained that I could suppose would be objected to, except the word “repent;” and as that occurs in so many instances in their own version, I do not think it was any great concession in the Roman Catholic clergymen to admit it; whereas it would have been a sacrifice of principle on the part of Protestants to admit the word “penance.”

adopted?—I do not believe there is; I would observe, however, with respect to this solution, that although the Roman Catholic children would undoubtedly find in it certain passages commanding them to repent, yet, as they would also find the same command in the Rhemish version, and find that it proceeded from the lips of our Saviour, and that Saint Peter preached the same doctrine, I do not conceive the introduction of it into the extracts is that species of concession on the part of Roman Catholics, which it would have been if the Roman Catholic translation of the New Testament were to be produced, and that wherever the word “penance” occurred it was to be struck out, and the word “repentance” or “repent” introduced. As it is manifest, therefore, that the introduction of the words “repentance” and “repent” into the selection is not the introduction of a new doctrine not to be found in the Rhemish version and the New Testament, it cannot, I think, be considered that Mr. Parnell was asking, or the Roman Catholic clergy giving up any thing, in suffering the publication to go forth in its present shape.

Are you aware that the extracts are not from that part where the phrase “repent” is used, but that they are taken from parts in which it is not so used?—Yes; I am aware that there are passages where the word is, in the Rhemish version of the New Testament, “penance,” and where it is in the extracts “repentance;” but a child would not be able to compare the corresponding passages so as to perceive the difference.

If selections were to be prepared for general reading in schools to be attended both by Roman Catholic and Protestant children, in aid of the New Testament, in what way would it be most desirable to get over the difficulty arising from the two versions?—I do not think there could be any serious difficulty in making the selection from the two versions of the Scriptures, where they substantially agree; it would, I think, be a valuable book, not to be considered in any respect as a substitute for the Scriptures, but as a useful school book. There are so many very important parts of Scripture in which the two versions agree, there would be no difficulty in arranging such a work. I not only think there are abundant parts of the Rhemish and authorized versions of the New Testament in which they substantially agree, but it appears to me that in some instances the Vulgate and Rhemish versions contain readings, which, although (according to Griesbach,) are not the best entitled to be received as genuine, appear to me to be more of a Protestant character than the corresponding passage in the authorized version; there is a remarkable instance of this in the last chapter of the Revelation, 14th verse.

Do you think it would be possible to prepare what is called a Harmony of the Gospels, upon the same principles?—I think so.

Can you say what system you think it would be most desirable to pursue, with a view to carry into effect a system of general education in this country?—I really do not anticipate any permanent difficulty in carrying on a general system of education upon the plan of the Kildare-place Society. I do not think that the opposition can be permanent; and I do not see any rational objection to it. There is undoubtedly the strongest possible opposition to it at the present moment; but, so far from being discouraged by it, all my former notions are strengthened. The Roman Catholic clergy have had every possible inducement to put forth all their power, and it is plain they have done so, as there has been a simultaneous effort throughout the country. There is probably not a single parish where the direction has not been given to throw every obstacle in the way of the children attending our schools, and yet I find that in many instances the priests have not complied with the order; and that, in many other instances where they have complied with it, the children are already returning to the schools. I do not believe a single week has elapsed during the last three months, in which we have not received letters stating that the children are returning to our schools; now, if the power of the Roman Catholic clergy on this subject is merely that species of influence that cannot be continued to be exerted for a few months while the Commissioners are sitting here, and while the Roman Catholic clergy have every inducement to persevere in their exertions, I do not think it is being too sanguine to expect, that if the people shall be satisfied that the object and practice of the Society are fair and open; that the children are advancing in our schools, and not learning matters that they think improper; that the opposition on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy will subside altogether, or become unavailing.

Looking at the system pursued in the schools supported by the Kildare-place Society, with a view to religious education, do you not think the religious instruction given to the children in general very imperfect?—Extremely so; and considering the circumstances of the country, it cannot be otherwise; but I think it of inestimable value to make them in any degree acquainted with the Scriptures. I do not think we can expect any very decidedly religious effect to be produced upon children when they are prevented from having any explanation given them; but I am satisfied that great advantage will arise from making them know that the book in which they read is the word of God; that when, in future life, they are suffering under illness or affliction, or any other chastening dispensation of the Almighty, they may be enabled to take up that book, in which they will be sure to find consolation, instead of being afraid to look into it. I think it also of greater value that they should be aware that the book upon which they are so often obliged to take their oath, is the word of God. I am perfectly satisfied they are not acquainted with that fact; if they were, I do not think perjury would be so frequent as it is. I know of many instances in which the lower classes have mistaken other books for the Scriptures; and a friend of mine who was lately at Loughrea told me, that a poor man in that neighbourhood told him he thought the Bible was written by Luther for the use of the Protestants. I do not merely mean, that if they were acquainted with the doctrines of the Scriptures, they would not be be guilty of perjury; but that if they were well satisfied that the book was the word of God himself, they would not be guilty of perjury so often as they are. I recollect a circumstance occurring to my father, who was a magistrate of the county of Cork; the parish priest told him, "If you are doubtful of the veracity of any witness you are about to swear, I will tell you how to get the truth from him;" and he gave my father a leaden image of Saint John, which was fixed to a New Testament; and said, "when you wish to take an oath of any man, make him swear on this book, and tell him whose image this is." And I recollect a particular witness my father was about to swear, who appeared very willing to take his oath in the ordinary way; but when my father presented to him the book with the image, and told him what it was, the man's answer was (though he had been before most flippant in his offer to swear upon a book he knew nothing about), "No, no, master; I will not face him with a lie." Now, I cannot but imagine, that if the poor man had known that the book on which he was first going to swear, was truly the word of God, he would have had as much reverence for it as for the image.

Do you not believe that Roman Catholics are aware, that damnation would be the consequence of perjury?—Yes; but I think they would as soon swear upon what is presented to them as the Testament, as upon this pencil in my hand. There would, undoubtedly, be an additional reverence excited by their knowledge of the book being the revealed word of God; but I do not mean that they are not aware of the consequences of perjury; I am sure that is inculcated upon them by their clergy.

Do you think, that an acquaintance with the Sacred Volume on the part of the Roman Catholics, can be obtained in any other way than the increasing of the reading of it publicly in the schools?—I do not think it can be secured in any other way. I form that opinion in great measure from what I believe, from information, to be the fact; that in the Roman Catholic schools for the poor, when they can accompany the Bible with comments of any description they please, and also with their catechism, and where they can explain controversial texts according to their own doctrines, the Bible is rarely to be found. If, therefore, even in those cases, the Roman Catholic hierarchy do not think it necessary or expedient to give the poor the Scriptures, I do not see how it can be expected that they would give them under any other circumstances.

As you would not object to the Roman Catholic children reading the Douay version of the Testament, would you object to their reading it with notes explanatory of their own doctrines?—I would, certainly; because although the Roman Catholic children, separately reading their own version without notes, would be a mark of difference, and on that account a thing not to be desired; yet I think that by and bye it might lead to good, as it would be found by those children who would compare the different versions, that there was scarcely any difference between the two; but if the Roman Catholic translation were to be introduced with notes and comments, it would excite all those angry feelings produced by discussions on controversial points, and that at a period when they would take the deepest root.

Is not the danger of contention equally raised by teaching their peculiar doctrines separately?—I do not think it is; because the children would in such case hear and learn their own doctrines only; and although they would know that the other children were learning something else, they would not know what it was; and being taught at different times, I do not think the children would be likely to have a habit of comparing, and saying "I have learnt so and so in my catechism, what did you learn?" But if they were in the same school, and heard matters offensive to each other, it would naturally produce an unpleasant feeling that would not be excited by separate teaching.

Provided the children are necessarily made acquainted with the New Testament, does it strike you there is much objection to such a work as the Harmony of the Gospels?—I can see no objection to it, if it were not to supersede the Scriptures; it was upon that principle that Dr. Troy's selection was adopted by the Kildare-place Society: they did not seek for it, but they thought that being a work sanctioned by both parties, it was likely to be useful as a school book.

Might not such a work be arranged in such a way as to communicate to the children reading it, the existence of such a work as the New Testament?—It might impress upon the minds of the children that there was such a work, but it would not enable a person grown up, to say of any particular book, "this is the Bible, and I will read it for myself."

It would aid them?—Yes; it would let them know there was such a work.

In communicating religious instruction to children in Ireland, supposing them to be separated for that purpose, do you think it desirable to enter largely into controversial points with them, or to avoid them?—Certainly to avoid them.

Are you aware that it is held by many persons at present as necessary to strengthen them in the different doctrines upon which they are likely to be assailed; for instance, to explain the doctrines held upon particular points by the Roman Catholics?—Yes, I dare say it is; it is very likely to be so in the charter schools and other associations of that kind. I certainly think it not desirable at all; my wish would be, that there should be a desire to impress upon the minds of both persuasions, those common principles upon which they agree, and which are so valuable and so numerous, that there would be no difficulty in selecting them.

Do you entertain any doubt that it would be extremely desirable to abstain from teaching them any thing likely to excite the contempt or hatred of persons of another religious persuasion?—It is so difficult to answer as to what might be likely to excite, that I think children should never be instructed in this country without an anxious desire to avoid every thing that would excite the feelings you have described; but there may be truths necessary to teach them, which may, by some unforeseen event, or at some period, excite an angry feeling. I am quite satisfied, however, that there ought to be the greatest anxiety to avoid exciting such feeling.

What is your feeling upon this point, should you have any conscientious scruple in aiding or supporting a school in which the religious doctrines were taught, of a sect with which you were not in communion?—That would altogether depend on what the errors (as they appear to me) were, which were so taught; I should most heartily concur with many individuals who differ from me in many points, but there are points upon which we might differ, as to which I should consider I was unworthy of the religion I profess, if I gave any support to the teaching of doctrines such as I allude to.

Would you think yourself bound in conscience not to give any support or encouragement whatever to any system of instruction which included the means of giving to Roman Catholic children instruction in their own religious tenets, it being always supposed it was confined to such children?—I certainly would not give any support to such a system, if it extended to the teaching of all the Roman Catholic tenets.

In any system of instruction for Roman Catholic children, in what way would it be possible to make any distinction?—I would afford every facility to the ministers of that religion to teach their own doctrines, but I do not think I should be expected to aid in the teaching what I conscientiously believe to be vital errors.

Then would you consider it consistent for the same master to teach the tenets of the Protestant religion and those of the Roman Catholic?—I do not think any man could conscientiously do both.

Would you countenance a school in any way in which a provision was made for instructing the Roman Catholic children in their catechism?—I would not directly aid it, but I would not interfere to prevent it; if I were to afford aid to it, I should be inculcating what I conceive to be very destructive errors; that is the ground of my feeling upon the subject, but I would not interfere either directly or indirectly with others, who holding different opinions might conscientiously support such a school.

Are we to understand, you would not feel yourself bound to withhold your aid from a school in which opportunities were occasionally afforded, and which you know would be made available for instructing the Roman Catholic children by others, and not by you, nor directly upon any money given by you, in the principles of their religion?—No, I would not object to such a school at all, merely from understanding that the Roman Catholic tenets would be taught in it, but not in consequence of any aid I gave.

Supposing the case possible to be this, that the public money administered by the hands of the Kildare-place Society was to be in part applied towards providing or supporting an individual who should give that instruction, should you conceive yourself conscientiously bound not to assist in the distribution of such a fund?—If that were to be the duty of such individual, I do not conceive I should be at liberty to act at all in the business.

Would you make this distinction, if an individual was appointed, who might, and who you necessarily knew, if he might, would so act, do you think that case would be distinguishable from one where a person was appointed for the express purpose?—I think there would be a most material difference between the two cases; as a matter of mere conscience, both Protestants and Roman Catholics might agree upon this, that the Scriptures should be read, but that no comments should be made, and that no catechism should be introduced, and that no matter of religious controversy should be permitted; if the master happened to be a Protestant, it might be understood by both Protestants and Roman Catholics, that the master would occupy his leisure hours in teaching the Protestant catechism, and I think a Roman Catholic might assist that school conscientiously, the master not being supported or aided out of the school fund for so doing; but it being merely understood that he would do so without any obligation on him so to do; and supposing he happened to be a Roman Catholic, I would willingly contribute to it, “I would say, you are a Roman Catholic, I do not interfere with your duties out of the school; your duty here will be to see that the Scriptures are conscientiously read in such portions as shall be agreed upon by the manager of the school, but you are at perfect liberty to teach what you like out of school hours.”

Would you allow him to do it in the school house?—I should not object to it, if it did not interfere with the school.

Nevertheless would not it be affording a direct and practical facility for his administering that instruction if you had contributed to the erection of that school?—Yes, but it would be a school-house that would not be required at the time for any other purpose.

You would not feel it a point of conscience to withdraw, if you knew he would administer that instruction in the school-house?—I should not.

Would you feel it your duty to contribute to a school where a portion of the salary was provided to enable him to teach the tenets of different religions?—I think he could not conscientiously teach both.

Suppose the case of a very large school containing children of two persuasions, and two masters were to be appointed to that school, one a Protestant and the other a Roman Catholic, and that they were paid for administering the system of common instruction to children of both persuasions, but that you knew, in point of fact, or had grounds of conjecture so strong as would amount to a knowledge, that each of them would employ a portion of his extra time in that school-house, to administer that supplemental religious instruction

struction to which, upon one side, you could not assent, how would you feel under such circumstances?—I would not object to it provided it was a voluntary act on their part, and that they were not paid for it or bound to do it; I should say, “You are only paid for your time while in the school, you may employ your leisure hours as you please.”

Would you object then (to put an extreme case) that the arrangement was this, that the school-house on a certain day, or a portion of it, was given up to the clergy of a persuasion opposite to your own, and if you were to suppose, as you well might, that they would make an arrangement with the master of the same persuasion with themselves, that he should avail himself of such an opportunity for instructing the children in their peculiar tenets, should you object to that?—I do not think I would object, if it did not interfere with the objects of the school, and if no extra expense were occasioned by it.

Would you conceive, in point of conscience, you could consent to children being trained up without any knowledge of religion at all, but that you could not consent to their being trained up with the knowledge of the Roman Catholic religion?—I could not consent to their being trained up without any knowledge of religion.

Do you conceive the children do attain a knowledge of the Scriptures by reading the Testament merely?—I have stated, that in my opinion, whilst children they are likely to learn very little of the real nature of religion, supposing they do not receive instructions out of school, because, looking at the volatility and inattention of children, it is not to be expected they will pay that attention which is requisite till they grow up a little, but I calculate that many of those children will be taught out of school hours, and that there are others who will in the school attend to the Scriptures themselves, but above all, that as they grow up, they will turn for consolation to that book which, in childhood, they had become familiar with, so as not to be afraid to open it.

Do you think there are many members of the managing committee of the Kildare-place Society, that as a matter of conscientious feeling, would take the distinction you have done between actively administering, and passively permitting religious instruction in a faith they considered to be erroneous?—I cannot venture to give an opinion upon that point, it would be mere conjecture, I have never discussed the subject with any of them.

The college at Maynooth is established and supported by public funds, for the purpose of giving instruction to clergymen of the Roman Catholic church, should you think it inconsistent with your duty to be a director or a manager in any way of that institution?—I do not know whether I should consider it inconsistent with my duty to be a manager, but I should think it inconsistent to be a contributor.

Should you think yourself contributing in any improper way, if you gave your personal trouble and superintendence, provided you did not contribute to the fund?—I would not give my superintendence to it, unless I held a situation that made it a duty upon me to do so; my feelings would not lead me voluntarily to undertake it.

Should you feel any scruple in contributing your assistance in the character of an agent of the state?—No, I should not, if I were to be merely a superintendent.

Would you, in the course of such superintendence, feel it to be your duty to see that the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion were faithfully taught in that place?—If it were part of my duty, and I undertook to perform it, all other feelings should subside, and I would endeavour to see that was performed which I undertook.

Then we are to understand, if the duty were cast upon you, you would execute it, but it is not a duty you would voluntarily assume?—It might be so, but I am not acquainted with the rules of that college, they may have some rules that might make me think I should not hold a situation that would be accompanied by such a charge.

Suppose the state to establish an institution for teaching as well the Roman Catholic as the Protestant, his particular religion, would you object to being an officer of the state, to see that that duty was well performed?—Undoubtedly I would object to it.

Supposing that the state were to determine, as they have, in the instance of the college of Maynooth, provided at the public expense for the education of the Roman Catholic clergy, that so they would by some new institution, provide equally at the expense of the state for the education of the Roman Catholic peasantry in the principles of the Roman Catholic religion, would you feel not at liberty, as a matter of conscience, to act in any way as a commissioner or other officer for carrying such a system into effect, if the government were to request you so to do?—I certainly would not feel myself at liberty as a matter of conscience to act as such commissioner; I should not feel myself at liberty to be actively concerned in the propagation of doctrines I conceive to be vitally erroneous, and which appear to me to lead to the most unhappy results; whether my opinion be right or wrong upon this point, I do not think I should act conscientiously if I were actively to interfere in the propagation of such doctrines, although I should be merely ministerial in so doing.

Should you consider yourself as acting in the propagation of those doctrines if you undertook only to give instruction in their religion to those persons who profess that religion steadfastly though ignorantly, and who would remain ignorant but for the instruction you might be the means of giving?—That would be assuming that those individuals would remain ignorant; my hope is, they would not.

By that, do you mean that they would change their religion?—No, I do not mean that; but I should hope that other means would be devised to prevent their remaining ignorant; if the Scriptures are read by them I do not think they can remain ignorant. I would not be understood to say that I had rather they were ignorant than that they should be taught in the Roman Catholic religion; but I would not feel myself at liberty to be active

R. B. Warren,
Esq.
28 Dec. 1824.

in the propagation of those doctrines I consider vitally erroneous; but if the question were put, whether I would prefer the poor being altogether ignorant to their being taught in the Roman Catholic religion, no one could suppose I would say that they ought not to be instructed in those doctrines that contain so much that is valuable.

You would not be active in it?—No; but I do not mean to say, that a state of ignorance is at all to be preferred to that state of education effected by the teaching of the Roman Catholic doctrines.

I wish the question to be considered between having an uneducated Roman Catholic and an educated Roman Catholic?—I would resolve that question upon this principle; I do not think myself entitled to do what I consider evil, that good may come from it; and I think it would be doing evil to propagate doctrines I believe to be vitally erroneous, although by so doing I might be considered as choosing a lesser ill to prevent a greater.

If those principles were conscientiously followed up by persons of all religious persuasions, in such a state as this, must it not necessarily end in either a system that shall not have a religious education provided for at all, or a divided system of education?—No; because I think there is so much to agree upon, if we were really anxious so to do, that we might to a great extent act conjointly together, and it might be left to the clergy to teach their respective flocks their peculiar tenets.

We are clearly to understand that you do not object to the Roman Catholic clergy instructing their flocks in their particular tenets?—Certainly, I would not object; and so far from it, I would not even indirectly interfere to prevent it; I think every facility ought to be afforded to them for that purpose, but the object could not be aided by me as an individual.

Would you consider it conscientious in you in any degree to countenance or approve of a school, which school consisted in part of means both for the instruction of Roman Catholics and Protestants separately in their respective creeds?—I should consider it conscientious to countenance and approve of it to the intent of feeling and expressing respect for those who were desirous of teaching doctrines they believe to be true; but as I said before, I should not afford direct aid to it.

Are we to understand from your preceding examination, that you would not feel at liberty to interfere in any way in teaching the Roman Catholic catechism?—Certainly.

Would you feel precluded in striking out of the Roman Catholic catechism certain controversial passages that might appear to you to be otherwise objectionable?—I could not object to do so; I do not object to the Roman Catholic doctrines by wholesale, and if those were to be struck out which I conceive to be vital errors, I would willingly co-operate for the purpose.

Suppose a number of Roman Catholics proposed to a number of Protestants that they should jointly subscribe and establish a school in which there should be two masters, one of whom should at stated periods, being a Protestant, teach the children of Protestants, and give them such other religious instructions in the Protestant religion as might be deemed necessary; and another a Roman Catholic, who should give similar instructions to Roman Catholics, would you consider it improper to subscribe to such a school?—I should consider it improper so to do, because I should consider it subscribing directly to the teaching those tenets which I believe to be so injurious; and although I could not in any manner interfere to prevent individuals of the Roman Catholic persuasion teaching what they believed to be the truth, yet I would not debar myself of the right of expressing my conscientious opinions respecting such doctrines; and if a person of the Roman Catholic persuasion were to come to me and say, "I have doubts upon my mind, will you give me your opinion upon such a point?" I do not know how I could tell him he was in error, if I were at the same moment directly aiding the teaching of the very same Roman Catholic doctrines upon which he entertained doubts, and which I considered vitally erroneous.

Suppose there was a school established by Roman Catholics, at the head of which there was a Roman Catholic master paid by them, consisting exclusively of Roman Catholics, and that there was another school consisting exclusively of Protestants, supported by Protestants, and at the head of which there was a Protestant, and that it was proposed to unite the two schools, the masters thenceforth teaching literature in common, and teaching separately, as before, religion; would you, if a subscriber to the Protestant school, object to such a union?—I would object to it if the conditions were, that there should be no religious instruction in common, but that it should be the duty of each master to teach his own particular persuasion their peculiar tenets out of school hours, and that he should be paid for so doing.

Suppose there was no distinct provision for payment, but that it was understood to be his duty thenceforth to give separate instruction?—If he was bound to do so, I would object; if it were voluntary on his part, I would not.

Supposing there was a school thus constituted, one that should consist of both Protestant and Roman Catholic children, and that they should be taught in the first four days in the week both by a Protestant and Roman Catholic master in all matters that could with propriety be taught together, that on the fifth day of the week the school-room was to be left to the disposal of the Protestant clergyman, and on the sixth day at the disposal of the Roman Catholic clergyman, would you object to contributing to a school under those conditions?—Certainly, I would not object.

Would you object, if you considered it as a matter, though not positively enjoined, yet in the highest degree probable, amounting almost to a matter of course, that the Roman Catholic

Catholic schoolmaster should upon the sixth day give some assistance to the Roman Catholic clergyman?—I would not object, if that high degree of probability arose from the opinion I should form of the individual, either from his anxiety to teach his own peculiar tenets, or a desire to oblige his Roman Catholic neighbours or friends; but I would object if that probability arose from his thinking he should lose his situation if he did not perform that duty.

Are you acquainted with the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—Not at all; I know that some grants have been made in some few instances, in which they have also applied to us.

Are you aware, that the commissioners of that fund have made grants for erecting schools, which are exclusively in the hands of Roman Catholic clergy, and devoted solely to the instruction of Roman Catholic children, as well in literary education as education in the tenets of their church; assuming that to be so, could you have acted as a commissioner of that fund?—No, I could not.

If you were a Member of Parliament, would you think yourself bound in conscience not to vote in support of the grant to the College of Maynooth?—I should think myself bound not to vote in support of it; but I should not feel myself called on to put forth my opinion upon this subject in opposition to that of others.

Your objection to Maynooth College is rather in the abstract than with reference to the particular system there?—Yes, certainly, I do not know the particular system pursued in that college, but I suppose it is to teach the tenets of the Roman Catholic church.

R. B. Warren,
Esq.

Appendix, N° 206.

Examination of the Rev. Charles Bardin, on Oath; Thursday, 2d December 1824.

ARE you a clergyman of the established church?—Yes, I am curate of St. Mary's parish, in this city.

You discharge some duty connected with the Society for the Education of the Poor?—Yes, that of literary assistant.

Are your services gratuitous?—No, I receive 150*l.* a year.

Describe as correctly as you can the general duties entrusted to your charge?—The preparation of the books published by the Education Society.

Will you describe a little more particularly what course you pursue in preparing books?—Sometimes the kind of books wished for is suggested by the committee, and I am directed to prepare it; when I suggest the book myself, if the plan is approved of, I compile or compose it according, as the case may be; sometimes abridge it from another work, and submit it to the book sub-committee; when thus prepared, it is referred to one of the members of the committee, who gives it an attentive reading, and returns it with his observations; if I agree with him in the corrections suggested by him, I make them accordingly, and if not, I state the reasons of my dissent, and the committee decide upon them. When thus corrected, the book is referred to another member of the committee, who sees the corrections suggested, and the manner in which they have been attended to; indeed, it often comes back to me three or four times, circulating through the members till it meets their approbation; two of them at least must sign the recommendation to the general committee.

Is it your object to select such books as may be entertaining, as well as instructive?—Yes; our object is to publish moral works, and to blend as much instruction with them as possible.

Is it an object with you to take care there shall be nothing in them that shall offend against the peculiar religious impressions of the different denominations of Christians?—That is my idea, and it is also the opinion of the committee; I feel it my duty not to introduce any thing that would interfere with the religious opinions of any.

Have those selections from the Scriptures, which have been printed among the cheap books of the Society, been prepared by yourself, or have you adopted any selections made by other persons?—[The History of Joseph was handed to the witness.]—I found the History of Joseph already prepared, and in a subsequent edition I added to it a selection from the history of the patriarchs, and the history of the creation, as a fit introduction to that of Joseph; I extracted the history of the creation and of the patriarchs from the Scriptures without change.

There was no verse or word made the subject of alteration in making the selection?—No, not that I am aware of.

Was there a word altered or inserted?—No, not with my knowledge; it was not intended.

The Commissioners observe one other book of selections from the Scriptures, particular passages from the Psalms and Proverbs, did you prepare that book?—No, I did not.

Are we to understand it was prepared by a gentleman who officiated antecedent to your appointment?—No, I believe it was prepared by a member of the committee.

Is it not an object that the committee have in view, that there shall be no book introduced into their list that is objectionable to those of the Roman Catholic persuasion?—Certainly.

Has it ever been an object with them to provide books written by Roman Catholics, and so to prepare them as not to be objectionable?—No, I am not aware that they ever take into consideration, whether their selections are from the writings of Roman Catholics or Protestants; in fact, they take their materials wherever they find them suited to their purpose.

Examination of
Rev.
Charles Bardin,
2 Dec. 1824.

Describe the successive examinations through which a publication must pass, independent of your care in revising it, and preparing it before it can be given to the public?—Every book must be perused, and have the approval of two members of the sub-committee, at least before it can be recommended to the general committee, for their sanction to its publication; I have already explained the stages through which it passes, before it receives this recommendation to the general committee; I could mention several books, which have each gone through every member of the committee successively, before the opinions suggested by the various tastes and judgments of the members could be reconciled. When the corrections made by me, according to their suggestions, have been approved of, the work is recommended for publication, and referred to the general committee at their next meeting, and remains upon their table a month for the inspection of the members; after that period, if no objection be made by them, the book committee conceives itself at liberty to give it into the hands of the printer for publication.

Have objections been made to any of the books published by the Society, on account of their containing doctrines which have been found or said to be objectionable on account of their religious tenets?—There was an objection made to one book, called the Travels of Mungo.

State what that objection was, and by whom made?—It was made by a Roman Catholic priest in Waterford, named Fitzpatrick; the passage objected to stated, in page 32 of the edition printed in 1819, “the little dog’s great horror at the church being made a sanctuary for murderers in Rome,” and though it did not appear to be one that called very loudly for correction, it was attended to; indeed, a new edition had been ordered, and the printer had advanced beyond the sheet in which the passage was found; we nevertheless printed a fly leaf, leaving out the obnoxious part.

Is that the only case where an objection has been made?—It is the only objection that has been made by Roman Catholics.

Did you ever hear of any objection from Protestants?—I should recollect myself; another objection was made the other day to a passage in the History of the Widow Reilly; it was offered by some individual who called at the Society’s house, but I do not know whether he stated his name. The passage animadverted upon the practice of waking the dead, so prevalent among the lower orders in this country. It stated, that the deceased person was beyond the reach of the living, and no longer in want of their help; and this individual thought himself called upon to say, that it militated against the doctrines of the Roman Catholics, for that the dead were not beyond the reach of the living, inasmuch as the prayers of the living might benefit them; we thought it to be sure a groundless objection, but no new edition of the work has been printed as yet.

I would put before you an extract from the Old Testament found in the London Hibernian Spelling-book, and ask you, whether, if that book was under the consideration of the Kildare-street Society, it would be thought objectionable or not to introduce into a spelling-book the extract containing the Commandments in the same form in which they are used in the Protestant Catechism?—[The book was handed to the witness.]—Our committee would, I think, object to its introduction in a spelling-book. We have a book now printing, which is Mrs. Trimmer’s selections from the Old Testament, which contains, amongst others, extracts from the 20th chapter of Exodus and the Ten Commandments from the authorized version; but the thing is different in a spelling book, into which the committee perhaps would not choose to introduce such an extract; it would at all events admit of discussion among the members of our committee.

If the Roman Catholics teach the Commandments in a form which, for reasons which are understood by them, appears to be desirable, must it not necessarily follow, that they would object to their being put before them in a form that they would consider as Protestant, and as one in which they do not prefer the Commandments to be taught to the children of their own persuasion?—I should suppose so.

Does not that come very near an interference with their mode of religious instruction?—If they take their selection from their own Testament, they will find the same ten Commandments as in the Protestant version, although not exactly the same words; and that is all I can say.

Are not the Commandments given in a different form in the Roman Catholic catechism?—I am aware they are.

Can you hand in a list of the different cheap books the Society publish?—Yes, I can.

[The same was handed in.]

How many new works do you usually edit in the course of a year?—About five.

What is the total number at present?—Fifty-two, containing five sheets, besides nine varieties of two sheet books.

What number do you print in an edition?—Ten thousand at present; we have, however, printed of Æsop’s Fables 15,000, in consequence of a greater demand for that book.

Do you find that there is a considerable variety in the preference given by the public to one of your books or another?—I think so.

Are you able to state the actual number that has been sold of different books?—Yes, I am: of Elizabeth, 65,000 copies have been printed since the year 1817; of Scriptural Extracts, comprizing the History of Joseph, &c. 35,000, from November 1816; of the Psalms and Proverbs, only 20,000, since December 1819.

Mention Æsop’s Fables?—Since April 1817, 60,000.

Now mention any of the older ones, of which there have been comparatively few sold?—

I think

*Examination of
Rev.
Charles Bardin,
2 Dec. 1824.*

I think the History of Isaac Jenkins and the History of the Brothers are the least popular of our publications.

How many of those have you sold?—Twenty thousand of each since the latter end of 1816, or the beginning of 1817; the stories are good, and I think deserve to be popular; but there are some didactic essays at the end of the books which make them unpopular; one is, Advice to Servants; another, an Essay on Saving Banks. Books of voyages, I should say, are in general popular; books of natural history are not so popular as they ought to be.

The books of rural economy, and tracts for the improvement of a peasant's life?—Perhaps they have not had a fair trial as yet. About the middle of 1821, we published the Cottage Fireside, which contains a number of useful hints to the poor; of this book, 20,000 copies have been printed; perhaps 15,000 sold; for whenever the stock on hand of an edition comes down to 5,000 copies, we begin to print another edition.

How many of Robinson Crusoe?—Thirty-five thousand from 1817.

Have any other Societies published books that are also published by yourselves?—No, I am not aware of any.

We observe some books of the nature of natural philosophy; such as Sturm's Reflections, and Views of Creation, and so on; do you consider them popular?—Sturm's Reflections are not popular, and the Views of Creation have not had a fair trial; they are not yet sufficiently known.

How many have been sold of the latter?—Seven thousand five hundred.

Since what period?—The beginning of 1822. On the 20th of December 1821, the Views of Creation were ordered to be published; 30,000 copies of Captain Cook's Voyages have been printed since April 1820; the Shipwrecks of the Alceste and the Medusa are amongst the most popular.

Have you taken considerable care to expunge any passages from those works that could by possibility be considered as objectionable matter, upon the score of religious peculiarity or immorality, or upon any other ground of objection?—Certainly; it is one of the objects for which I am employed.

In what way are the expenses of the publication defrayed?—The works are printed by contract, the printer sending in a proposal at the commencement of the year, in which he engages to print at a certain rate during the continuance of that year; when the book has been printed, and the work delivered to the salesman, as appears by his receipt accompanying the bill, and showing that the edition has been deposited in the store, the order is made for the payment, provided the salesman reports that the book has been printed in a workmanlike manner.

Have the contracts been made in such a manner as to be beneficial to the Society?—Particularly so.

Have the same individuals always been the contractors?—No, it is open for competition.

How many printers are actually engaged in printing for the Society usually?—There are perhaps 20 or 25 who have their contracts in before the Society, and according to the goodness of their work they obtain the preference.

Do the printers undertake to supply the paper, or is the paper provided by the Society?—It is provided by the Society, by a separate contract with a paper manufacturer.

Is that an open contract?—It is.

Is the binding executed by contract?—Yes, by contract also.

Is it a contract open to a competition?—Certainly; sometimes the materials are bought for the binder, as, for instance, when the book is to be bound in linen, the latter is bought by the piece.

Has there been, in point of fact, a very active competition in printing and binding?—For printing certainly; the binding is done by people of an inferior class, who take it home to their own rooms, and therefore the competition cannot be expected to be very extensive among them, executing as they do only 500 or a 1,000 at a time.

Do the Society sustain much loss in the disposal of the books?—Yes.

Are there any other books distributed, except those contained in the public list of the Society?—There are none; school requisites, such as the reading book and spelling book are not found in this published list; this is merely a list of the cheap publications.

Has the Dublin Reading Book been popular?—Very much so.

How many of it have been printed, and within what period?—Ten thousand were printed during the year 1822; a second edition of 50,000, printed in 1823, is now on sale.

How many spelling books have been printed, and in what period?—Fifty thousand were printed at the close of 1819; a second edition of the same number is now in the press.

Have you ever heard of an objection to the Dublin Reading Book on the part of any persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion?—No, nor can I conceive any.

Is there any passage in the Dublin Reading Book that you should conceive likely to be made the subject of such an objection?—No, I conceive not; I should mention that the circulation of the spelling book has been so great as to cause the Society to print an addition in stereotype.

Are the tablets which are seen in the schools supported by the Kildare-place Society printed there?—Yes, they are.

Have they been prepared under your inspection?—No.

Whence were they obtained?—They were selected by the members of the book committee, or one of them; I believe Mr. Bewley had the management of it; he considers the spelling book as his own particular work.

Are not the annual catechetical examinations of the Association for discountenancing Vice held in St. Mary's church?—Yes.

Examination of
Rev.
Charles Bardin,
2 Dec. 1824.

You are curate of that church?—Yes.

Describe the nature of those examinations?—Previous to the examination a selection is made in the different charity schools in and about Dublin, by the superintendents, of the best answerers among the children, in the proportion of one in four; these, therefore, come forward, representing four times that number of scholars in their own schools; these are all formed into three classes, so that although there may be no more than between three and four hundred in the church during the two days, they represent four times as many children in their respective schools.

By whom is the examination conducted?—By a clergyman of the established church.

By how many clergymen, and how are they selected?—They are all members of the Association.

About what number may attend?—The children are divided into about thirty classes, each consisting of ten children.

Are those examinations annual?—Yes.

What may be the number and quality of the premiums distributed?—When the candidates are apprentices, the three best answering in each class receive premiums to the value of 30s. 20s. and 15s. because their course of examination is more extensive; for the three best answerers in each class of children from the charity schools there are also three different premiums, but of inferior value.

Have you been present at several of those examinations?—Yes, I have examined myself.

Is the examination confined to any particular catechism?—We expect they shall answer in the church catechism.

Are there any particular explanations of the church catechism in which they are examined?—No, I am not aware of any.

Would a child be more likely to fail in obtaining a premium from the circumstance of not having read Stopford's or Mann's catechisms?—I think not, because I do not approve myself of teaching the catechisms from books; I prefer making my questions arise out of their answers, and have always found it more improving than to make it a matter of memory.

Is the examination conducted in St. Mary's church founded in any degree upon the principle of explaining the Scriptures?—Yes, we examine them in the Scriptures, and expect them to understand their meaning.

Which do you examine them upon principally, the Scriptures or the catechism, and the explanation of it?—It is free to the examiner to take any course he pleases, but I should attach equal importance to both.

Are the children so mixed that the examiner cannot know to what particular schools the individuals belong to whom they may assign the premiums?—Yes, they are, except so far as their dress may lead them to form a judgment.

Is there a considerable degree of competition and emulation between them?—Yes, and they answer in general admirably well.

Is there the same degree of emulation among the teachers of parochial and other schools?—Yes, generally; the Association give a premium to the schoolmaster who returns the greatest numbers of successful candidates; the schoolmaster of St. Mary's school obtained a premium last time.

How many schools contribute pupils and candidates upon the occasion of the examinations?—All the charitable establishments in and about Dublin.

Do you observe that the children of any particular schools are more generally successful than others?—I should think that the children which Dr. Murray sends in are generally more successful and better prepared.

From what institution does he send in that class?—It is called Kevin-street charter school.

Can you say whether the children that attend from the other charter schools, for instance, Santry, Clontarf, Celbridge and Baggot-street, are more or less successful than the children who come from the Dublin parochial charity boarding schools?—No, I should think not; I should think our parochial boarding schools are fully as successful as they are, perhaps more so.

How would you rank the children of the Foundling Hospital in point of success?—I have satisfied myself the answering is not inferior to that of others.

Do the children from the Hibernian military school in the Phoenix Park attend at the examinations?—No, they are examined in their own school.

Do the children from the Marine hospital school, under Sir John Rogerson's Quay, attend?—They do.

Do you consider the children of the Bethesda school more or less successful than the others?—I do not consider them more successful.

Is there any particular parochial school in Dublin that you consider decidedly more successful than the others?—St. Mary's was the most successful the last time; the next to St. Mary's was Anne's parochial school.

Do you conceive this catechetical examination to be a valuable part of the system of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Eminently useful.

Do you find that the number of children who attend is progressively increasing?—Not from the charitable establishments, because the numbers are permanent; they do not vary; but the number of children of the higher classes who receive premiums from the Association is increasing very much.

Do

Do the children of the higher classes attend those examinations?—Not on that particular day; but each parish now has a particular day set apart for examinations, under the Association, the clergymen of the parishes call in their clerical friends to assist them, and their number is indeed rapidly increasing; they are of course children who do not belong to any charitable establishment.

How many children may attend in your church?—We have about 600 of the upper class upon our list.

Is not that system rather of recent introduction?—I think the general use of it is recent; but it has been the practice in my own church as long as I have been acquainted with it.

Is that system general throughout the whole of Dublin?—Yes, I believe so; the Archbishop of Dublin makes it a very important point.

Are premiums given by the Association to children of that rank and description?—Yes, and the answering is certainly excellent; it is attended with the very best effects; the children of the upper class are very zealous and very attentive; and I should say, that their improvement in religious knowledge is very marked since the system of catechetical examination has been introduced.

Have you observed whether any children educated at the Kildare-place school, have attended at the catechetical examinations?—No, I have not.

Have you observed whether any children have attended who have learnt reading and writing in schools in which the catechism is necessarily excluded, and in which the Scripture is taught without observation or comment?—There were some children who came to me to have their names entered from a school called Hatch-street school; I do not know the regulations of it.

Your mode of catechetical instruction of the better class, is not by catechism, but by a sort of lecture?—Yes; I make use of Bishop Mant's catechism as a sort of text book.

Do you refer to that and enlarge upon it?—Yes, and out of their own answers endeavour to lead them on to a due understanding upon the subject.

What number of children are in St. Mary's parish school?—Forty; twenty boys and twenty girls.

At what age are they admitted?—From eight to ten.

How long do they continue?—About five years would be the average time?—We should not, however, send a child out prematurely because that time had elapsed.

Is it a Protestant school?—Strictly so.

Are none but the children of Protestants admitted?—None; it is a fundamental regulation—both their parents must be Protestants.

What system of instruction is pursued in the school?—No particular system, neither Bell's nor Lancaster's, the number is so small, that the master and mistress can give them their undivided attention.

Are the boys and girls taught together?—No, they have separate houses, in fact, although under the same roof.

Will you state in what way the day is divided into instruction and work?—The boys are understood to be at business, with necessary intermission for exercise and meals, from 7 o'clock in the morning in winter, and from 6 in summer; they read one hour and spell another hour, and read the Scriptures another hour; after dinner, at 2 o'clock, they go to business again; in summer they take their walk in the evening; the girls write twice a week, and cypher two other days; they work at their needle every day, and also attend to reading and spelling.

Have there been any complaints in the school of undue severity of punishment of the master upon the boys?—Never.

Is the inspection by yourself, or any other individuals, frequent?—The clergy visit at all times; the governors and governesses have a monthly meeting, when every thing connected with the regulation of the school comes before them; the governesses attend weekly, in turns, so that there are generally two ladies who visit the girls' school in the course of the day, to see how things are going on.

Is it supported wholly by subscription?—By subscriptions, and a charity sermon; we have also been left some legacies occasionally.

If the total expenses of the establishment were divided among the children, how much would fall to the share of each?—Including all expenses, such as house rent and master's salary, about 13*l.* per year.

Is the value of the girl's work carried to the account of the institution, or is it the perquisite of the mistress; or do the girls get any share of it?—The girls receive no proportion; the value is carried to the account of the institution, and the governesses make a certain allowance to the mistress out of it yearly.

What salary have the master and mistress?—Fifty pounds a year between them, and ten pounds a year gratuity for good conduct.

Are they boarded and lodged?—Yes, they live in the house, and give their undivided time to their duty.

How often in the week are the children allowed meat?—Twice a week; they have soup twice a week; the remaining days potatoes and milk.

Do you know what quantity of clothing they are supplied with in the course of a year?—We give them clothing as often as they want it; the clothing of the boys lasts a long time; indeed to save their better clothes, they wear within doors what is called sloop clothing.

Examination of
Rev.
Charles Bardin,
2 Dec. 1824.

Is there no fixed allowance?—No, there is not.

Is it supplied by contract?—Yes, with the governors.

Is there any difficulty in disposing of the children?—I think not; we have plenty of applicants for apprentices at our school.

Do they take them without gratuity?—I think they would; but we happen to have a fund which enables us to give a small apprentice fee of 40s. or so with each child; it was a legacy left us for that purpose.

Is it given with the children when they are apprenticed, or are there any conditions annexed that make it desirable to withhold a part of it?—We have not acted upon it yet, but we shall be dividing it shortly; I should mention, that each child apprenticed from a parochial school in Dublin, is entitled to 10*l.* apprentice fee; I believe the Archdeacon of Dublin has the management of that fund; it is called Love's charity.

Out of what fund is that paid?—A legacy left by a benevolent man named Love, to give apprentice fees to Protestant children; it is given to the master in different instalments, provided the clergyman of the parish certifies that his conduct to the boy has been correct; there is another fund for Protestant children apprenticed to Protestant masters; but it is not a condition that they should belong to any parochial institution in Dublin; I think it amounts to 10*l.*

Under whose direction is that fund, and from whence does it arise?—It is like the other, a legacy. Mr. Lewis, the curate of St. Peter, is one of the persons who has the management of one fund, and the Archdeacon of Dublin the other. I have often given certificates for it.

Do I understand you to say, that hitherto you have not given any premium yourselves with the children bound out from your school?—We have not as yet.

Have all the children obtained premiums from one or the other of the two sources you have alluded to?—All the boys; it is not for girls. The masters have obtained it, and they know they are entitled to receive 10*l.* at certain periods of the service.

Should you have any difficulty in disposing of the children, if there was not that sum to be obtained?—That would depend a great deal upon the efficiency of the schoolmaster, and the manner in which the children are prepared. I can conceive a very dull boy, whom it would be very difficult to apprentice.

Is it always made a subject of personal examination?—The person wishing for an apprentice makes an application to the governors, upon which a very close scrutiny is made into his moral character and conduct; if we are satisfied, we shew him the boy fit to be apprenticed, or the lady the girl. If they do not think proper to take them, we give them no choice.

Do you apprentice them to services or trades?—We apprentice the boys to trades always, and the girls to service.

Do they generally serve out their apprenticeships?—With very few exceptions, their conduct is good.

For the most part do you think they turn out well?—I think so; I am satisfied of it, so far as my own observation goes. I thought it desirable sometime ago to call upon all that had been apprenticed out of the school within the last seven years; and I found them, with very few exceptions, well behaved, well conducted young men. They all partook of the sacrament last Christmas, which is the best criterion.

Do you bear in mind what proportion you were able to discover and hear of?—Out of about seven or eight and twenty, I discovered twenty; perhaps more.

Were they boys?—Yes, almost all boys; the girls form a separate consideration. It is hard to come across the girls after a certain time.

Do you think they turn out as well as the boys?—I should say, on the whole I am afraid not so well.

How many instances have come to your knowledge, in which the girls have left their places, and turned out ill?—A few; not many, compared with the numbers whom we have sent out, and are actually living at their services.

Have you been led to form a favourable opinion of the effect of that description of education, in which the children are separated from their friends and parents?—It would be desirable, in many cases, to leave them with their parents; but our's are orphans, at least we always give the preference to orphans. An orphan of both parents has a superior claim to any other; an orphan whose father is dead, has the next claim; and an orphan whose mother is dead, the third. The children of servants come in last, and their chance of admission is very small indeed; I think it is desirable it should be so. I should not like to hold out encouragement to that unthrifty class, by affording them any facility in the disposal of their children.

Are there any children admitted who have both parents alive, who are not the children of servants?—Yes, if a tradesman of good character falls into declining health, although both parents may be living, we always are anxious to admit his child; but there is a very strict scrutiny into his circumstances and character. The number of applicants, however, is so very great, we are obliged to make a selection of the greatest objects.

What is the total number of cheap moral books that have been sold and distributed by the Education Society from the first commencing of that branch of their business, from the close of 1817, to the present time?—Nine hundred and nineteen thousand and eighty-nine*; that

* Mr. Bardin has subsequently desired to state, "According to a more accurate return than I was furnished with at the time of my examination before the Commissioners, the number of cheap books printed appears to be about 1,450,000; and the number of those actually sold and put into circulation about 950,000."

that is the number actually sold and distributed. We began our sales on the 5th of November 1817.

Do you occasionally superintend the parochial free school, in St. Mary's parish?—Yes.

Describe the extent of it, and the means by which it is supported?—The school-house opened on the 1st of September 1823. We built the house by subscription, and obtained a grant of 200*l.* from the Lord Lieutenant for the purpose, in three separate grants; the first was 100*l.* the second 60*l.* and the third 40*l.* There are two schools, one for boys and the other for girls.

Is the master a Protestant?—Yes; and the mistress also.

What is he paid?—Thirty pounds a year, and he has apartments in the house. The mistress has the same salary, but no apartments.

Are the children admitted free of expense?—They are required to pay a penny a week; but it is more to gratify their parents than from any advantage derived from it. If their poverty is great, the penny is not demanded; but some of the lower class would rather pay it.

Is that sum regularly paid by a large proportion of the children?—No.

From what source have the books been supplied?—Our own resources.

Does the school derive aid from any of the societies established here?—We get a grant of books, to form a lending library, from the Society in Kildare-place.

Is the school attended by persons of all religious denominations?—It is.

Is it fully attended?—There are more on the books than the rooms will hold; there are less, however, in daily attendance.

Would it accommodate many more than do attend?—I think not above 40.

What system of instruction is pursued in the school?—The monitorial system, the Kildare-place system.

Can you state the number of children that attend?—The school-rooms are calculated to hold 100 boys and 100 girls, and sometimes the number in each will amount to 90; in one instance they amounted to more than 100 in the girls school, but the children were rather crowded. Sometimes the attendance in each is down to 70.

What is the practice of the school as to reading the Scriptures?—The Scriptures are read in the school without note or comment.

Which version?—The authorized version.

The authorized version only?—Yes, that only.

Is it read as a class book indiscriminately?—No, only by the readers and those who read pretty well; at the same time, however, that I say the Douay version is not used, I should have no objection to give it without notes to Roman Catholics, if it would be an inducement to them to attend.

Do they read the New and Old Testament both?—No; we do not happen to have the Old Testament in the school.

Do the children read the New Testament through?—No; the four Gospels and the Acts; but there is no regulation that they shall not go on through it if their understandings are sufficiently matured for it.

Are there any selections of the Scriptures used in the school?—Yes; Mrs. Trimmer's selections; Dr. Troy's selections as they are called.

Do many Roman Catholics attend?—Yes; more Roman Catholics than Protestants.

Has great exertion been used in that parish to prevent the children of the Roman Catholic persuasion from attending?—I understand so.

To what do you attribute the failure of the attempt to prevent the Roman Catholics attending the school?—Because the school is exceedingly well conducted and arranged; in some instances the children have been induced to remain away, but I have no fear that they will not return, provided we take no notice of their absence or of the hostility of the Roman Catholic clergy. The school is well conducted, and situated in a populous quarter where there is much want of education; there is also no unfair attempt to tamper with the children.

When had you first reason to believe an attempt was making to keep the children away from the school?—I believe I heard of it after the blank forms went out from this place.

Did you never hear of it before?—I did, at the opening of the school, but it quietly subsided, perhaps because not successful; I have lately heard of very decided attempts to withdraw the children.

Has there been a very marked difference in the attendance since the period you mention?—I cannot say there has; the number has diminished, but not materially.

Was the attempt to prevent the children from attending so marked, that on any particular day you missed a great number of them?—No; I have heard that the Roman Catholic clergymen of the parish have declared that they will come and make a clearance, but I do not regard those things, I think they have too much good sense to attempt such a measure; but that the school has excited their jealousy I cannot doubt.

Is the Scripture commented upon at all when it is read in the school?—No, it is not.

Is any catechism taught in the school?—No, none. At one o'clock each Monday, school breaks up; we have publicly declared, and we have acted up to it conscientiously, that nothing shall be done to excite the reasonable jealousies of an opposite class; at one o'clock we dismiss the children; it is our own school, and it was built with our own fund, and we think it a good opportunity of collecting our Protestant children together; the Roman Catholics depart and the Protestant children remain, and then we teach them the church church catechism, and it excites no jealousy on the part of the Catholics themselves whatever, it may on the part of their clergy.

Do you conceive, that the Roman Catholic children have been withdrawn in any considerable numbers since the papers you have alluded to were circulated by this commission?—No, I do not think they have, though the effort was made. I heard of various evening meetings in the Roman Catholic chapels of the parish in which the children were questioned very closely as to the school they attended, and ours was called the Minister's School; and if I may offer an opinion, I am not surprised in the present state of things, that they should betray some jealousy of a school which is managed by Protestant clergymen.

Was there any condition annexed to the grant made by the Lord Lieutenant's Commissioners?—That it should be for all denominations; we got the last grant in consequence of the exertions we had made to raise so large a sum as 560 l.

Was it required that a bishop or any ecclesiastic should be a party to the lease of the land upon which the school was to be erected?—It was.

Will you state the particulars of the condition in that respect?—We have not got the lease of the land from Lord Blessington, but I have his agent's written promise that he will sign the necessary deed when it shall be prepared.

In what way is the lease to be drawn?—In such a way as shall secure the property to the parish for the purpose of a school.

Do the commissioners require any particular regulation, or impose any particular condition in the lease upon granting the money?—Had it been in the country, and if the fee of the land was granted it would have been, but Lord Blessington has not the fee, and therefore the usual conditions cannot be complied with.

Has any condition been imposed by the commissioners in granting the money?—None, except that the ground shall be leased or vested in the rector of the parish, and, if necessary, the churchwardens, in fact in whatever way it may be best secured to the parish as a free school.

Is there a Roman Catholic free school in the parish of St. Mary's?—There are two for boys, and one for girls, to my own knowledge.

Have they existed for any time?—I fancy so; the girl's school is a very good one indeed; in the boy's school the accommodation is very bad in every respect, but chiefly from want of books and proper means of ventilation.

Does the rector of the parish contribute any thing to the support of the free school you have been describing?—Ten pounds a year.

Does he contribute any thing towards the charity boarding school?—Yes; ten pounds a year.

Are the children at the free school mostly taught the church catechism, as set forth in the Book of Common Prayer, or any exposition of that catechism?—Mant's Step in the Temple is the one upon which they are examined.

Is there any other in which they are examined?—The church catechism broken into short questions.

Do you use Stopford's?—No, we do not.

Or Lewis's?—Some of the children have Lewis's catechism, but we do not use it.

Or Mann's?—Some of them had Mann's until Mant's was used; we used to have Mann's; I think Mant's less difficult.

Are there any passages in Mant's Step in the Temple that bear upon the controverted points between the Roman Catholics and Protestants?—No, I think not.

Appendix, N° 207.

Examination of Mr. John Veevers, on Oath; Wednesday, 24th November 1824.

Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

WHAT situation do you hold under the Society for Education in Kildare-place?—Superintendent of the male and female schools.

How long have you held that situation?—Since June 1813.

What salary have you?—£.300. a-year, at present.

Has it at any time been less than it is at present?—Yes.

What was it at first?—£.200. a-year.

When was it increased?—In the year 1820.

Was any increased duty put upon you at the time your salary was increased?—It was in consequence of an increase in the training department.

Are you also provided with a house?—With apartments.

Free of expense?—Yes; with coals and candles.

Does that constitute the whole of your emoluments under the Society?—Yes.

Is it your duty to superintend the schools for the children, as well as the training schools?—It is.

Describe how much of your time is occupied in discharging the duties of your office?—I consider that the whole of my time is occupied in the discharge of the duties of my office.

At what time does it begin?—The school commences always at ten in the morning, and continues every day in the week except Saturday, until three o'clock, on which day it closes at one; during the school hours the teachers are engaged in the school, but afterwards they are at liberty until four o'clock; at half past four they dine, and at this season of

of the year they do not leave the establishment after dinner; at six o'clock their evening exercises commence, and continue from that till eight; it is my duty not only to arrange the exercises for them and keep them employed, but to see them executed.

You are actually employed from ten till three, and from six to eight?—The Society have never stated to me the precise time, but I find the whole of my time is occupied in the discharge of my duties.

Do you superintend the girls school as well as the boys?—Yes.

What number of pupils are upon the roll of the boys school?—About 480; I am not certain as to the exact number.

What number upon the roll of the girls?—About 360.

Has it at any time been more?—Considerably more; it depends upon the season of the year, and likewise the termination of the quarter; we balance the lists at the end of each quarter, and strike off those who have been absent a certain time; at present it is about the middle of the quarter.

At what period was the number upon the roll the greatest?—In the summer of 1820 or 1821; I am not positive which.

Do you recollect what the number amounted to then?—About 500 in the boys, and upwards of 400 in the girls; I state it in round numbers.

Is the institution entirely gratuitous?—Each child pays one penny a week.

Is that sum regularly paid?—With few exceptions.

By whom is it received?—In the first place by the monitor or teacher of each class, and then it is transferred to the master, who checks their accounts, and at the end of each week the amount in each school is handed to me; and at the termination of the quarter I lodge it with the treasurer.

Is it applied to the general purposes of the institution, or restored to the children in clothing or rewards?—The general purposes of the institution.

In your opinion does it operate as a discouragement to their parents?—It operates as an encouragement, I think.

You think there is a feeling that prevents people sending their children to schools entirely free?—I do; I have heard sentiments of that kind expressed by them.

A feeling of pride, that prevents them sending their children to schools where they do not pay any thing?—Yes.

Do you think you would have the same individuals in the school if it was gratuitous?—Perhaps not.

Describe the ranks and classes of life out of which those children mostly proceed?—Labourers children; some of them are the children of paupers, and there are others who are assisting in shops, and a considerable number of children whose parents are servants.

Are some shopkeepers?—Some, but not many are shopkeepers; we have had instances of persons who have come and volunteered to pay a sum greater than what we charged, but which of course they were not permitted to do. I did not consider myself at liberty to make any alteration from the rule laid down by the Society.

To what age do they continue to receive your instruction?—Seldom above fourteen; we have some instances above.

Do the girls continue longer than the boys?—I think they are much the same.

Have you any means of ascertaining the religion of the children?—No.

Is it known to you generally?—It is not.

Have you no opportunities of noticing that they go away on particular days to chapel?—Except it be then, we cannot ascertain correctly, it being one of the regulations that we should make no distinction whatever, and we never ask.

Can you say, generally, that there are many Roman Catholics in the school at present?—I believe there are; but I have no means of ascertaining.

Did you not make a statement to the clergyman of the parish of the number of the children you had in the school?—Yes.

Did you not, upon that occasion, state the number of Roman Catholics?—I believe I gave the same answer then that I have now; he asked me the question, and I believe I stated I could not tell, and he asked me if that was the answer to the question, and I said it was the only answer I could give.

What parish is it in?—St. Anne's.

Could you form any guess, that you would think would approximate to the truth?—In conversations with Mr. M'Guinness, the master of the school, who is a Roman Catholic, this subject has been mentioned at different times; I at one period thought three-fifths were Roman Catholics, but that is some time since.

Do you think the number of Roman Catholics has diminished since then?—I do not think it has.

Have you heard whether any exertions have been made by the priests to prevent attendance at this particular school?—I have heard the children say they were not allowed to attend the school.

Have you observed that any particular children have ceased to attend, and had reason to believe that they have discontinued their attendance, in consequence of the interference of the Roman Catholic priest?—I recollect one instance, in which a child stated, that he was not allowed to attend.

Did that child cease to attend?—He did for a time.

What number of classes do you divide the children into?—Eight reading classes.

Examination of
Mr.

John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

What number of masters and ushers are constantly employed in the instruction of the children?—One master, with the aid of monitors, provided from the children.

What is the first class taught?—The first class consists of those children learning the alphabet.

Do they write in sand?—Yes, they trace the letters in sand.

When they are perfect in the alphabet, are they transferred to the second class?—Yes, which consists of children learning syllables, and words consisting of two letters.

Describe their progress through the successive classes?—The third consists of children learning words and syllables of three letters, and the fourth those learning words of four letters, and the more difficult monosyllables; the next consists of those learning lessons formed of dissyllables, and the sixth of lessons formed of trisyllables; the seventh of trisyllables and polysyllables, and the eighth is a selection from the most advanced or seventh class; there is also a division with respect to writing; they are classed according to their stages in writing, and likewise in arithmetic; there are different periods of the day allotted for those exercises; the children are changed from one stage to the other at certain periods of the day; they are dismissed from their reading classes to the writing classes, and continue the allotted time at writing, and from that to arithmetic.

In the early classes, do they read from tablets?—The four junior classes are engaged in learning their lesson when employed at reading from tablets, except one day in the week, and the highest class of the four then have books given them, as a preparatory exercise, prior to their joining the second division of the school or the fifth class.

What is that preparatory exercise?—The use of books.

What is the first book in which they read?—It is a book published by the Society, called the Dublin Spelling Book, and consists of lessons similar to those on the tablets.

Are those lessons extracts from the Scriptures?—They contain some extracts from the Scriptures, but they are all to be found, and were compiled originally from books that have been in use for the last century in various schools in the country, with the addition of the Pennsylvania spelling-book.

In what class do they begin the study of arithmetic?—When they enter the second division of the school, or the fifth class, or as soon as they have become acquainted with monosyllables.

In what class do they begin to read out of any book of more difficulty or importance than the spelling-book?—In the sixth.

What do they read in the sixth class?—Lessons from a reading book, published by the Society.

In what class do they begin to read in the Testament?—In the seventh.

How often in the week do they read in the Testament?—That class read the Testament three days a week; the orders are occasionally changed, when we give new reading lessons; some times we have reduced it to two.

Do the eighth class read in the Testament daily?—Every other day; on the days on which the eighth class do not read it, the seventh class read it.

What rule is there for reading the Testament; do they read all parts alike?—The regulation we have hitherto adopted, has been to commence with Matthew, and to proceed through the Testament.

Do they read the Revelations?—No.

Do they read in the Old Testament?—We have never used it.

Is there any rule for its exclusion?—No.

Is any book read in the school which gives the children any knowledge of the contents of the Old Testament?—None whatever.

Are the Scriptures in any manner explained to the children in the school?—Never.

If in reading the New Testament, you had any reason to doubt the child did not understand the meaning of the commonest word he read, should you feel yourself at liberty, according to the rules of the school, to ask him whether he understood that word?—Of a word, we should give the grammatical explanation, and when a word has been mispronounced, we have corrected the child; but there has been no explanation as to the meaning of the words.

Suppose you found the word "hypocrite," and you thought the child did not understand what it was, should you explain it to him?—Never, when reading the Testament.

Would you give an explanation of the word "wilderness," for example?—It has not been usual with us to ask any questions as to the meaning of words from the Scripture; in case they have not read a word with fluency, we have made them pause, in order to pronounce it well, but I do not recollect a case where we have explained any word in the Testament.

Do you conceive the regulations of the Society exclude the giving explanations of such words as "hypocrite" and "wilderness"?—I believe not.

Is it the custom, when the children are reading other works than the Scriptures, to question them in the meaning of the words, and explain them to them?—It is.

Is the difference in the course you pursue with regard to the Scriptures, with a view to avoid the possibility of giving any thing like controversial interpretations upon the meaning of particular passages?—Yes.

Is it your opinion that the more advanced boys in the school understand tolerably the meaning of the New Testament in reading it?—I am of opinion that they do not.

The question does not refer, of course, merely to the doctrinal parts of the New Testament; but do you conceive they understand the ordinary parts of the New Testament?—I think they do not.

589
Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Do they manifest any curiosity upon the subject, any wish to be better informed about it?—
I do not recollect an instance of it.

Do you use the two versions, the authorized version and the Douay version, in the school?—None but the authorized version.

Why do you not use the Douay version?—I have never received any instructions to procure it; and when we want Testaments, we usually procure them from the Bible Society in Sackville-street.

Was there ever any suggestion made on the part of the parents of the children, expressing a wish that there should be some copies of the Douay version in the school?—None, that has come to my knowledge.

If any such wish was expressed, what would be the decision of the committee upon it?—They would order them to be procured.

Is the Douay version one of the books printed or circulated by the Society?—No, nor the authorized version.

Can you account for the omission, on the part of the Society, to supply either the one or the other?—The Society have not supplied them; they published some years ago a Testament, in which the headings of the chapters were omitted, but they never gave them in grants to schools, leaving it to the option of the different schools in the country to select which version they pleased.

Which version did the Society print?—It was the authorized version.

What became of that edition?—I believe it was disposed of to the Bible Society.

Do you know why the Kildare-street Society ceased to dispose of it in their own shop?—I am not aware of the reason.

The master of the school is a Roman Catholic?—He is.

Has he ever suggested it would be advisable to have some copies of the Roman Catholic version?—Never, to my knowledge.

If you had Testaments of the two versions, and it was made known through the school that any child that wished might read from the Douay version, do you think that any applications would be made for them?—I am of opinion there would not; great confusion would arise in the school by any regulation of that kind. I have found considerable inconvenience from getting different versions, the Cambridge, Oxford and Edinburgh versions, in consequence of some of the classes having obtained those books; and when required to refer to a chapter, there has been a slight difference, perhaps, in the omission of the word "the" or "and," and not being exactly the same copy; there have been disputes in the class that the child was reading incorrectly, and corrected by another, which has given rise to disputes about places.

Have you had occasion to observe, that these different versions of the Scriptures, published at the different authorized places, vary materially?—Not materially.

It is a fact, then, that there are various readings amongst the authorized versions?—They are not all exactly the same.

You conceive the difficulty would be increased by multiplying the number?—Yes; I was most anxious, when I found this, to get the version we had in the first instance.

Do you think, if you were provided with the two versions in which the chapters, verses and pages were arranged similarly, that there would be any serious practical inconvenience in allowing the children to read them; the Protestants out of the authorized version, and the Roman Catholics out of the Douay version, in alternate verses?—There could not be any difficulty in that, provided they were printed alike.

Is there any other ground of confusion or objection that occurs to your mind, except that which would arise from the application of the principle of the places of the children in the class being ascertained by one child correcting another when it made a mistake?—Except that which would arise from the distinction the books would create, and there would be certainly many difficulties found to arise from the children saying, "I am a Protestant," or "I am a Roman Catholic," which the books would give rise to.

Do you believe that the children in Kildare-street do not know of each other practically, who are Roman Catholics and who are Protestants?—I believe they do not.

Are you familiar with the Douay version?—I once compared the Gospel of Matthew, when the Douay version, without note, was first published, to discover the difference, and I saw but little, chiefly in some words, such as "desert" for "wilderness."

There is a difference in the part, which gives the Lord's Prayer?—Yes, there is.

Are the children forced to commit to memory any part of the New Testament?—They are not.

Are the Testaments kept with the other books in the school, or separate from them?—On a separate shelf.

Are they locked up?—Yes, they are; and the children have not access to them, except when engaged in reading them.

Are they occasionally subject to be irreverently used or trampled upon or abused?—No.

Do the children read them in class in such a manner as the other children in the school can hear them, or do they stand separate?—They stand separate.

Is there any thing in the nature of prayer or public exhortation in the school?—No.

Do you as superintendent, or the master, or any body as usher, read aloud to the children in the school?—No.

Has any improved method of teaching arithmetic been lately introduced into the school?—Yes.

Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Can you describe it?—About three years ago we introduced Pestalozzi's improved system of arithmetic.

Has it been practised with success?—Considerable success.

Do the boys continue sufficiently long under your instruction, as to be able to comprehend it?—The majority of the boys in arithmetic, are acquainted with it in its different stages.

What length of time does it take to learn it?—That depends in a great measure upon the previous knowledge of the boy, and his age.

In what length of time have your most proficient pupils learnt it?—The most proficient have been engaged in it since we introduced it into the school, and many are able to work compound fractions by it mentally with the greatest ease.

What number in the school are now capable of doing that?—Perhaps thirty.

Do you find that they prefer that to the ordinary operations?—The children are much more pleased with it when they have obtained a certain degree of proficiency.

Do you think it exercises the understanding more?—Yes, it also gives them considerable pleasure from the advantages they feel; the pupils being thereby able to comprehend rules in arithmetic which they previously did not understand.

Do you think that they also feel that it gives them a superiority over other boys instructed in a different manner?—I have no doubt of it.

Are they liable to forget the process?—No; it is not unlikely they might forget the exact routine which they follow, but they would not forget how to solve any question that might be given to them.

Have you any collection of books to which the children can have access for their own private study or reading?—There is a circulating library in the school, which consists of the works published by the Society; these books the children borrow, selecting which they please from a catalogue suspended in the room.

Do you observe that the children acquire a taste for reading?—Considerable; we have a great number of instances of a disposition to read.

Are the children permitted to take those books home?—They are.

Do you find that they return them with sufficient regularity, or are they much liable to be lost?—We have lost but few considering the great circulation they have undergone.

Do they take good care of them?—Very much so; many of the books have been in the library five years, and have been circulated through 40 or 50 families.

Do you find that this enjoyment of reading is confined to a few boys, or is it pretty general?—We make it a kind of privilege; every boy in the school has not access to the library, it is only the two most advanced classes, and the sixth class, if the master approves of the application.

Are there any boys in the two head classes who forego the privilege of having these books?—Yes; and the excuse is, that they have not time; that they are engaged at home.

Do you believe that the reason is a just one, or that they have no taste for reading?—I think it arises from a want of taste; there may be some, certainly, who have not sufficient leisure to read, or it may arise from want of convenience at home.

Have you any books of religious instruction in the library?—None that are denominated religious.

Would it be possible to have books of religious instruction that might be selected by the Protestants, and which the Roman Catholics would not necessarily think fit to take with them, or would it lead to distinctions you think objectionable?—I do not think it would lead to distinctions, when the children may select such as they please from a catalogue in the school.

Have you not one book in this library containing extracts from the Old Testament, giving an account of the creation, the fall of Adam, the deluge, and the history of Joseph?—There are books containing that in the library.

Have you not another consisting wholly of extracts from the Psalms and Proverbs, in the very language of the Holy Scriptures?—Yes, there is.

Is not that in the library?—It is.

Have you not also a book containing a view of natural religion, extracted chiefly from the works of Paley?—We have, called "Views of Creation."

Have you not also a contraction of "Sturms Reflections on the Wisdom and Providence of God?"—We have.

Have you ever heard of any objection being urged against these books?—Never.

From any part of Ireland?—Never.

Are additions made to the lending library from time to time?—As the works are published by the Society, they are added to the library, and then we have considerable applications from the elder boys.

Have there been additions made from time to time to the books published by them?—Yes.

What is the usual extent of the edition of one of those works when printed?—From 10,000 to 15,000.

Have you any means of knowing whether any of those works have been more popular than others, and whether there has been a much greater demand for some than others?—Yes, only from the sales.

Can you state which has been the most sought after?—I believe "Elizabeth, or the Exiles of Siberia," and "Æsop's Fables."

Have

591
Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Have you any means of knowing the relative popularity of that work to which we have just directed your attention, consisting of the extracts from the Holy Scriptures, giving an account of the creation, and so on?—I have not.

Have the Kildare-street Society ever published any book in the Irish language?—Yes, a primer.

Do you know the history of the publication of the Irish books?—I do not.

What modes of punishment do you have recourse to?—We have as little punishment as possible; we have never had any thing more than using a cane slapping the boys on the hand, and that chiefly for absenting themselves from school; we have had repeated instances of parents bringing their children and soliciting that they should be punished for offences not committed in the school; it is a constant occurrence, it is one of the great annoyances that most teachers are subject to.

Is the common mode of flogging not had recourse to on any occasion?—It has never in that school, I can speak positively upon that.

Is it found practically that you can keep the children sufficiently in order without it?—I have very often occasion to regret the buzz there is in the school, but I have never had occasion to complain of the want of order.

Have you ever had occasion to expel a boy for misconduct?—No.

Do you know how long it takes upon an average to teach a boy to read?—A great deal depends upon the age, I should think a boy of nine years of age would be taught to read extremely well in twelve months; if younger, I should think it would require a longer period, but if older, we have many instances in a much shorter period.

Do the regulations for the management of the girls school, differ materially from those for the boys school?—No, they do not, they are the same.

As to teaching the girls to work, how does the rule operate?—There is not the same attention paid to arithmetic in the girls school as the boys; a great portion of the time that is devoted to work in the female school, is appropriated in the male school to arithmetic. In the boys school, there is reading, writing and arithmetic taught, and in the female school, there is taught reading, writing, arithmetic and working.

Have you any mode of judging whether the education pursued, produces a permanent and beneficial effect upon the character of the children?—I have every reason to conclude that the system adopted has been of considerable service to the children; one instance in particular I can state, a gentleman who had a warehouse, told me he sent a boy to the school who was the son of one of his workmen, and that the boy prior to his coming to the school had so misconducted himself, that he was glad to get rid of him, he was an annoyance rather than an advantage to the warehouse; and on returning to the warehouse at the request of the father, after having attended the school six months, he said he was a complete pattern of order, and he found him a most valuable servant, that every thing he had in his charge was placed in the most regular order, and they were able to obtain any thing at a moment's notice.

Have you any reason to think that it tends to make the children dissatisfied with the low condition of life in which they are placed, or to indispose them to continue in humble employment as labourers?—I do not think it does.

What instruction do the girls receive in work?—They are taught the various stages of needle work and knitting; they have also occasionally wrought some fancy works; there is a book published by the Society, which shews the routine observed in teaching to work; there have been many applications for girls who have been instructed in the school from different persons in business in the city; I have reason to conclude that the children attending the school, have attained, in consequence of the neat manner in which they execute their work, a character among those people; we have had a considerable number of applications from them for apprentices.

Do you find that the girls come from the same class of society as the boys?—Yes, nearly the same.

Have you reason to think they are of a higher or lower class?—No.

Do you find that they acquire habits of order and neatness in the school, and that they learn how to keep their own clothing in good order?—I have no doubt of the good effect.

Is it evident in their appearance?—Yes, quite so; I have repeatedly observed, in a very short period, a total change in the appearance of a child.

What rules have you as to the inspection of the cleanliness of the children, and what means of enforcing it?—They are daily examined as to their cleanliness, and occasionally they exhibit their hands, and a person goes round to inspect them; but we have not found that so necessary latterly as formerly.

Is there any rule as to cutting their hair?—We have no rule laid down, but we have endeavoured to induce them to get their hair cut, and lately we introduced a person to do it, and we have had more applications than he could execute.

You give no premiums with the children as apprentices?—No; the applications were to the mistress; in consequence of the character the children of the school had obtained, they have said, we have heard of the good conduct of such a girl, and we want a girl similar to her; can you recommend one to us?

Have you had frequent applications of this sort?—Yes; within the last year we have had a great number of such applications.

More than your school will supply?—Yes, double the number; I have experienced considerable annoyance from the applications made to me from persons to recommend boys; I have said, I will not have any thing to say to it, and unless we know the individual, we

Examination of
Mr.
John Veivers,
24 Nov. 1824.

are not anxious by any means to undertake it; we had rather the parents should manage it, and then there could be no complaint.

Have you any means of tracing the girls, so as to know whether they turn out well or otherwise?—It never came to my knowledge that there was one who did not conduct herself properly.

Has it come to your knowledge that many have conducted themselves properly?—Yes, many.

Would you be likely to hear of it, if they had not?—I should.

What is done with the girls work?—We cannot get a sufficient quantity of work executed for the demand we have for the book exhibiting specimens of the manner in which the work is taught.

Is there any profit made from the work of the girls?—None whatever; the expense of the material is charged upon the article that is sold, and also the sum paid to the child for working it.

Do I understand you to say, that whatever advantage arises from the value of the work, the girl has herself?—No; the amount of the article the Society defrays; then, whatever is paid to the girl for the work is added to it, which is the price of the article.

Does any part of the value received for the work after it is completed remain with the Society, or with the officers of the Society?—None; if, for instance, a shirt is ordered, the linen is cut off, and whatever quantity it takes is charged to the account of the individual; in addition to that, there is a sum for thread and materials, and whatever child makes the shirt, there is a certain sum paid her, according to a graduated scale of the description of the work, the amount of which is charged to the individual purchasing the shirt, and the girl is paid in tickets; these tickets the child retains; and when she has obtained a sufficient sum to enable her to purchase any article of apparel, shoes, or any thing else, she comes forward with those tickets, and we give her whatever article she may require, to the amount of her tickets.

Is the estimated value of the work in the scale you have described the full and fair market value of such work, or is it lower?—It is lower.

Much lower?—Considerably lower than what would be charged by a milliner, who took in work for that purpose.

Why has the scale been made lower than the market value?—In order I believe to cause work to be sent to the school, rather than any other reason; we have latterly been able to give the children sufficient employment by furnishing specimens for the work books; we have not been able to complete the orders we have had for those books.

Describe the books?—Sampler books; they contain specimens of work of different descriptions that are circulated throughout the country.

Is spinning a part of the employment of the school?—No; we introduced a spinning wheel some time since, but we found it was not applicable to children in a city; they are not inclined to learn spinning, as they cannot make any thing by it; the use of the needle is of much more value to them.

Are any premiums given in the school?—Yes.

On what occasions?—In the female school there is annually given in clothing the interest of 1,200 l. the bequest of the late Mr. Lefevre.

What rule of distribution do you follow?—To the most necessitous of the attending scholars.

Is it given in clothing?—Yes, in clothing.

By whom is it distributed?—It has hitherto been distributed by those ladies who are visitors to the school.

Describe exactly the course that has been taken on occasion of those applications for apprentices you have referred to?—When the individuals have applied for apprentices, we have introduced them generally to the child, and recommended them to apply to the parents; they in consequence have waited upon the parents, and concluded whatever engagement has been made.

Have you brought such matters before the directing committee of the Society?—We have never thought it necessary.

Whom do you mean by "we"?—The master and mistress of the schools and myself.

Are we to understand that your part is merely to point out the girl or boy whom you conceive would make a desirable apprentice?—Yes.

Have you ever mentioned to the committee the fact of such applications being made?—I have.

Have they ever made any regulations with respect to it?—None whatever.

Do you hold out any particular inducement to obtain the attendance of children in the male schools?—None whatever.

Their coming is perfectly voluntary?—Quite so.

Is any observation made to the parents of children that withdraw?—Never; when we have received a notice that a child has withdrawn, when they have been absent some time, we have occasionally sent to know the cause of their absence, or whether they intended to return, and whatever message we have received we have acted accordingly; if a child is withdrawn at the usual period, we have struck the name from the list; if they said they would return, it has been continued, and the cause assigned for absence marked against their names.

Have you ever endeavoured to augment the number of children that frequent the school?—Never.

593
Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Is there any premium of clothes connected with the institution?—In the female school only; since the school was held in St. Stephen's Green, the gentlemen have occasionally subscribed at Christmas a few pounds, seldom exceeding six pounds, for the purpose of giving to those who appeared naked, a few articles of apparel.

Do you conceive that habit has operated as an encouragement to procure children?—No; on the contrary I have advised it should be discontinued, as I thought it affected some individuals who did not deserve it; some of those whose apparel was in a very bad state at the time it was given were absent, and whose attendance had been perhaps good, and merited it; and there were others, when they expected this clothing would be given, assumed or put on their worst apparel, in order to excite compassion from the distributors.

What was the greatest number of children that obtained the benefit of that distribution in any one year?—Not exceeding thirty.

It is your opinion that the institution would go on better without that practice?—Yes, in the boys school.

Why not the girls?—That is under different circumstances; it is a casual sum given to the boys; and in the girls school it is an annual sum, managed by the visiting ladies.

What number of girls may have shared, in any one year, in that distribution?—To the amount of fifty.

Should you propose to discontinue it in the girls school?—I have not seen the same inconvenience arising from it in the girls school.

Do the girls go as apprentices to trades, or as servants?—Generally to milliners, shop-keepers and servants.

Have there been applications for boys as apprentices, as well as girls?—Yes, a considerable number.

In what line of life are the boys to go?—To trades.

Not as servants?—But few instances as servants.

Will you specify the trades?—Tailors, shoemakers, printers, &c.

Do you conceive, that the parents of those children ultimately were to give a fee to the tradesman taking their child as an apprentice?—No.

Are they bound apprentices in Dublin?—Yes, chiefly.

Have you not an establishment for training schoolmasters?—Yes.

How long has it been in existence?—It commenced in 1814.

What number have you admitted at any one time?—We had in attendance between 60 and 70, during the spring of the present year; but we have but accommodation for 50.

Are they boarded and lodged?—Yes.

What length of time do they remain with you?—Upon an average two months.

Is it optional with them what time they will remain?—It is not.

What is the longest time you will keep any of them?—There are some individuals who have remained as long as three months.

Who decides upon the time they shall remain?—It depends upon their application, and being acquainted with the system pursued in the school; they are examined prior to leaving the establishment, and certified accordingly.

Who examines as to that proficiency?—That is my duty.

Have you ever met with any who could not qualify themselves for a certificate, and who were dismissed without having obtained one?—Yes.

In that case, how long did that individual remain?—Three months.

Who took upon himself the responsibility of dismissing him?—It is my duty to examine the individuals, and afterwards to report to the committee, and they decide upon the case.

Did the individual fail in obtaining a certificate from want of attention, or want of faculties?—I think from inability.

By whom is the selection made of the persons that are sent up to be trained?—By the patrons of the school to which they are to be appointed.

Are they always appointed to any school before they are sent up?—They are appointed to a school before they arrive; the Society do not nominate masters to the schools in the country.

Are there not very frequent applications made to you to recommend masters for country schools?—Yes.

Is it in your power to recommend masters?—When I have been acquainted with an individual I thought qualified for the situation, I have recommended him.

Have you had any individuals who were competent for that in the model school?—There are seldom any individuals in attendance but who are engaged.

But the recommendation in that case is your personal act?—Yes; the committee have nothing to do with it.

The committee never do recommend?—Never.

Are there frequent applications to them for masters?—Yes, and the usual course is to refer those applications to me.

Are those schoolmasters maintained at the expense of the Society during the time of their instruction?—They are not only maintained at the expense of the Society, during the time they are in attendance in the training school, but their travelling expenses are defrayed.

What is the average cost of a schoolmaster trained by the Society?—About 7*l*.

How is that made up, will you explain?—Maintenance during the time they are in attendance, and the travelling expenses to and from Dublin.

Is there any rule prohibiting the admission of masters who wish to be trained, but who have

Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

have not been nominated to a particular school?—It is not usual for us to admit them unless they are actually nominated, as we have not had room to accommodate them; our school is generally full.

Have applications been made to you to train young persons as schoolmasters, who have not been named to a school?—Yes, frequently.

Have you ever refused, upon the ground of their not being nominated?—We have.

Have you any means of knowing whether the persons who are sent to be trained as masters, are Roman Catholics or Protestants?—Yes.

Is it stated, as to each, of what religion they are before they are sent?—No, it is not; but it is usual for me to inquire what religious persuasions they are of.

Have you many Presbyterians sent to be trained as schoolmasters?—Yes, a considerable number.

What number have you trained of different persuasions?—The number trained up to the present date is 801.

How many could you train in one year at present?—About 300.

Have you always applications in advance?—The number of applications at present is not so great as it has been.

To what has that been owing?—We have admitted so many; the school during the last month was closed, for the purpose of refitting at least that part of it that is devoted to the purpose of training masters.

In what year was the training school opened?—The beginning of the year 1814; the number of candidates exceeds eighty at the present moment, waiting for admission into the training school for masters.

Do you find, that they really qualify themselves for the situation during the time that they are with you, or does it sometimes happen that they go away before they are qualified?—It sometimes happens, that it is impossible for us to make any thing of them.

What do you do with them?—After the usual routine, they leave the establishment; it is not merely the understanding the system of instruction, that enables a teacher to carry it forward in the country; there is a considerable difference between the understanding the system, and the capability of reducing it to practice.

Will you describe the nature of the certificates you give them on leaving you?—There are three gradations, the one being “fully competent,” the other “competent,” and the other “having had an opportunity of being made acquainted with it.”

Is there not some danger of the people in the country mistaking what is in fact the lowest degree in the certificate for being a very good one?—Yes; and in consequence of that, I have endeavoured to rectify it by a certificate, now engraving, that will be more explicit; in the heading will be the first, second or third class.

[The witness was directed to furnish copies of the certificates that are given to the different masters.]

Do you find that the selection of those persons for the situation of schoolmasters has been made with reference to their merits, or has it been merely from favour?—I rather think it is more with respect to merit; I have not positively known any case where it has been mere favouritism.

How far are they instructed generally when they come to you?—The majority of them are but indifferent readers and indifferent writers, but the whole of them have a very good knowledge of arithmetic; that is superior to what, as far as my knowledge goes, the same class of persons in England possess.

Have you any opportunity of knowing what class of schools they have usually been instructed in?—That depends in a great measure upon the district; a considerable number of the teachers who come from the country not situated near towns, have been educated at hedge schools; others have been educated in respectable schools in the towns or cities of the districts in which they resided; in the country districts the schools have greatly improved in the last few years.

Do you find that the improved state of the knowledge of the persons that come to you is the result of improvement in the schools?—Yes, for they are undoubtedly a much better description of persons, and better qualified too, than they were a few years ago.

Do you mean that their attainments are greater, or that their rank and condition in life are better, or both?—Both.

With reference to the degree of instruction they receive and their knowledge of arithmetic, how do you class that to the different districts you have described?—Does the question mean, whether it was mountainous or low lands?

Does it appear that there is the same system of instruction in different parts of the country, or is writing or arithmetic more an object in one part than others?—In the north, particularly Antrim and Down, writing is an object with them, and it is almost totally neglected in the south.

Have you any mode of accounting for that?—No, except that that is the result of my observations of the individuals who have attended the schools.

Have you had occasion to observe a difference in the instruction of those who have been educated in the Roman Catholic schools and those educated in the Protestant schools?—No, I have not; I think the majority of the masters from the south and west have been educated by Roman Catholic masters, but in the north they are chiefly Protestants.

Have you any opportunity of knowing what are the feelings and impressions of the young persons who come in as teachers, with regard to the system of the Kildare-street education,

595
Examination of
Mr.
John Veivers,

education, or the system of the scriptural education generally, or any of those points?—I think the teachers have no objection to the Scriptures; I never heard them express any.

Have you had the means of knowing whether those who came from the south and west ever saw the Scriptures till they came to learn to be masters?—No.

Would you know it, if it was the fact; would you be likely to hear it?—I doubt whether they would inform me of it.

Do they in point of fact read the Scriptures to any considerable extent during the two months they are in Kildare-street?—It is quite at their own option.

Are they never called upon to do it at all?—Never, except when they have been officiating as the teachers of a class where the Scriptures have been read; they hear the children read, and officiate as teachers, but they are never called upon to read.

What opportunity have they of reading the Scriptures in case their inclination should carry them that way?—Of an evening, from eight till ten o'clock.

Your superintendence, I understand, to be limited from six to eight?—Yes, for business.

Do you mean from eight to ten they have the time to themselves?—They are engaged in either reading or writing memoranda of the different studies through which they have been exercised in the evening, and the greater part of them are employed in making those minutes; many of them get a very competent knowledge of Pestalozzi's system of arithmetic, and it requires a good deal of application independent of the exercise; the greater part of their leisure, both morning and evening, is engaged in making those extracts from Pestalozzi's works.

Have you observed whether from eight to ten, many of them do read the Scriptures or not?—In the evening, during the week, but seldom; there are a number of works supplied for their use, and each follows his own inclination.

You say, "during the week;" do you mean to intimate there is any regulation as to Sunday?—There is no regulation for reading the Scriptures; the only rule that has been laid down is, that they should appear dressed on Sunday at breakfast; that each should attend their respective places of worship, and that they should conduct themselves in a manner becoming the day; in the evening they have occasionally read alternately a portion of the Scriptures, and sometimes they have selected a Roman Catholic and at others a Protestant; this has emanated from themselves; they read a chapter each at the close of the day.

Has that been their own proposition?—Yes.

How did you happen to know of it?—They came to me to ask whether I should have any objection.

From what class of men did that emanate, the Roman Catholics or Protestants?—Both; they were of both persuasions who spoke to me to know if I would have any objection; I said certainly not, whatever was agreeable to themselves I should have no objection to.

When was that proposition made?—Last winter.

Did it prevail before last winter?—Not to any extent; sometimes there was a majority of Presbyterians, and I believe it is usual with them to introduce it; that was prior to last winter.

Has it been your habit to superintend that exercise?—Never.

Is there any person belonging to the institution present when they read the Scriptures together?—Never.

Are they furnished with copies of the Douay version?—No; I have observed copies of the Douay version with themselves, which they have purchased.

Are they furnished with copies of the authorized version?—They are on the shelves.

Does this course of study and habit of life produce any apparent effect upon their minds, and habits and manner?—I have witnessed it in the country, and I have also heard individuals state it.

Describe the nature of the change?—That they were much more regular in their habits and manner, and more efficient in their business.

Had you occasion to observe that there is on either side a distrust of the persons of the different persuasions?—No; on the contrary, they live in the most perfect harmony.

Have you ever known of theological disputations among them?—Yes; occasionally some observations have been reported to me that they were discussing what was deemed a religious point, and I have spoken to them upon the subject, and told them I could not permit any thing of the kind.

You mean a point of controversy between Roman Catholics and Protestants?—Not always; it sometimes occurred between a Presbyterian and a member of the Established church, more frequently than between the Roman Catholic and Protestant.

Did you feel it to be your duty upon such occasions actively to interfere and prevent those disputations?—Yes, certainly.

Have such things ever been attempted in your presence?—Never; and I never recollect more than two instances in which it appeared the discussion had exceeded a few observations.

Have you known of any person having changed his profession of religion while in the institution training as a master?—Never.

If such a change had occurred, should you have heard of it?—Certainly.

Are you able to say, whether they leave the institution with feelings of regard and affection to it, or otherwise?—I have many reasons to know that they have left it with very strong feelings of regard.

Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Have you any means of knowing whether they invariably approach the institution on their first acquaintance with it, exactly in the same feeling and spirit?—Many of them have expressed sentiments to me that they did approach it with a degree of caution; that the conversation they had had with individuals upon the subject had produced in their minds a prejudice.

Have those individuals been Roman Catholics?—Chiefly.

Any others?—Not that I recollect.

Have you ever known any that have left it with feelings of dissatisfaction or disgust?—No.

Should you have known it, if it had been the case?—I think I should.

Have you ever known of any instance of any act of immoral conduct in the institution?—No, never.

You have said it was a regulation that each of those persons should attend their respective places of divine worship, explain that a little more fully?—On the Sunday morning it is usual for them to proceed to whatever place of worship they choose to attend, and I have occasionally addressed them in this manner, “I hope you were at your place of worship to-day;” and they have said, they were; and I have reason to believe that they all attend their respective places of worship, except those who may happen to be invalids.

Do you mean there are no individual instances of young men choosing to idle about the town rather than go to their places of worship?—In some instances; but a few.

Have you felt it your duty to inquire after such individuals?—I have spoken to them about it.

Should you then think in general they attend?—Yes, I should.

Have you any means of knowing what places of worship they attend?—Not at present; I had some years ago a book in which they inserted on the Monday morning the place of worship they had attended on the Sunday, but I found it gave rise to what I thought some unpleasant feeling among some of the men, and I discontinued it; some of them made the observation, I was too strict and too severe, they looked upon it as an unpleasant thing.

Have you observed a predilection among any of them for the places belonging to the Wesleyan Methodists?—No.

If any such had existed, should you have known it?—I think I should.

Have you known any of them attend the chapels of the Independents; the chapel in York-street, or Ebenezer chapel, or the chapel in Dominick-street, or Zion chapel?—I have heard them say they have been there.

Were those persons Presbyterians or members of the established church?—Chiefly Presbyterians.

Have you known any members of the established church go to Presbyterian places of worship?—Yes, curiosity frequently induces them to attend those places of worship when they first come to town.

Has the same curiosity led the Protestants to go into the Roman Catholic places of worship?—Not to my knowledge.

Have you ever heard that the Roman Catholics, actuated by the same spirit of curiosity, go into the Protestant places of worship?—I have known them attend at St. Patrick's cathedral.

Have you known many who have attended there?—No, not many.

What was the inducement do you think?—I think the anthem.

Was any suggestion ever made by you, or any body connected with the institution as to the particular preacher or particular places of worship, it would be advisable for them to attend?—Never.

Do you know a part of the town called Whitefriars-street?—Yes, I do.

Is there any Methodist meeting-house there?—There is.

Do you mean a Wesleyan meeting-house?—Yes, I believe they are Methodists.

Did you ever know any of the young men attend at that place?—I have, certainly, heard of some of them attending there.

Regularly?—No.

From motives of curiosity, or because they belonged to the connection?—From motives of curiosity, I understood.

Was there any particular preacher in that chapel likely to attract new comers?—No.

Do you recollect the preacher?—I apprehend it must be at the Conference, there is a good deal of curiosity at that period; the preachers assemble in Dublin, and then there are a number of public preachers.

Have you ever found persons of the established church having attended their own place of worship in the morning, have attended other places of worship in the afternoon?—Yes.

Have you found them generally attend their own places of worship in the morning, and frequently attend other places of worship in the afternoon, such as Whitefriars meeting-house?—There are some cases where they have attended both, but I would not say generally.

What rules have you as to the diet of the training masters, and in what way are the persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion permitted to abstain from meat?—The regulations are these; we have meat on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, fish on Wednesday, meat on Thursday, and fish on Friday and Saturday, or eggs as a substitute; Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday, are considered fast days.

597
Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Do the Protestants and Catholics eat alike?—Yes.

Was that arrangement made for the particular purpose of accommodating the Roman Catholics?—Yes.

Have you any means of knowing the degree of estimation in which those masters are held in the country after returning from the institution?—In the course of visiting the schools in the country, I have had repeated conversations with different individuals connected with the schools, and they have very generally expressed sentiments of respect for the individual, stating the advantage he had derived from attending the institution.

Have you acted as an inspector of the Society?—Yes.

Do you ever go out on inspection?—I was out last year.

Do you consider yourself at present as being one of the inspectors of the Society?—No, I acted as an inspector during a portion of the years 1818, 1819, 1820, 1822, 1823, chiefly before the inspection was established, as the committee thought proper to direct.

Have you ever had an opportunity of observing whether the people in the country have at all considered your certificates in the nature of a degree or diploma?—I have had occasion to observe, that they esteemed it and respected it as a mark of qualification.

Have you ever known an instance of a gentleman in the country having carried off one of your masters to make him a private tutor in his own family?—Yes, I have.

Have you known it to occur in more than one instance?—Yes, I think there are more instances than one or two, I cannot call to mind the particular cases.

State a little more fully the regulations with respect to the degree of liberty of going out from the walls of the institution allowed to these masters?—They are at liberty from the time they rise in the morning at this season of the year until half past eight; they are then in and continue in the establishment 'till half past three; they are at liberty from half past three until half past four, when the bell rings for dinner, and from that they are not allowed (from October until March) outside the premises, unless under special circumstances, and that very seldom.

Has it ever happened that any of them have returned intoxicated to the house?—There have been two or three instances.

What have you done in such cases?—They have been expelled.

Has it ever happened that they have become embroiled in quarrels in the streets?—I never knew but one instance.

Describe what passed upon that occasion?—The individual was expelled.

Have you ever known of any other immoral conduct amongst those training masters than what has been adverted to in the last two questions?—No.

No immorality of any other description you had occasion to advert to?—No.

Have you ever heard any complaint of their conduct in Dublin, proceeding from other persons?—No.

Have you ever had occasion to complain of a spirit of turbulence or insubordination among them?—Never.

Has there ever been any species of punishment inflicted or adopted towards them?—Yes.

Describe the nature of it?—Confinement to the premises.

What length of time?—For a few days.

For what species of offence would that punishment be inflicted?—For irregularity of hours. I have considered myself at liberty to adopt it; and told the individual that he was suspended from the liberty of going out for two or three days, as the case might be.

Has the individual upon such occasion submitted willingly to that species of punishment?—Always; it has not occurred in many cases.

Would the individuals, who might fall under your displeasure for any such offences, esteem it a great punishment to be expelled?—I believe in every case.

Of the 800 masters of which you have spoken, how many have been expelled?—Either four or five; I am not certain which; I think it is but four.

Have any ever eloped?—One.

Describe the nature of that elopement?—He left the establishment without assigning any cause, and returned to the North soon afterwards. I was subsequently informed it was owing to some intelligence he had received respecting his brother, who had arrived from America.

Have you ever had a charter school boy among the candidates to become a master?—Either one or two cases; I believe two cases.

Do you know how those two turned out; did you find them well instructed?—I found them very indifferently qualified.

What kind of a certificate did they obtain from you?—The lowest class.

Do you know for what schools they were intended?—I cannot immediately recollect, without reference to the books.

Have you ever any boys that had been trained in the Foundling Hospital amongst your candidate masters?—Not one, to my knowledge.

Who recommended those two charter school boys to you?—I do not recollect.

Could you ascertain it by reference to papers?—I could.

Is there any particular provision in the Kildare-street institution as to the training of mistresses?—Yes.

Will you describe any difference that exists in principle, between that branch of the institution, and the one you have described for the training of the masters?—The principle I conceive to be the same.

Who fills, with respect to the female model school, the same situation you fill as to the boys?—Jane Edkins,

Examination of
Mr.
John Veivers,
24 Nov. 1824.

Do you know what she was in life prior to her appointment?—I believe she had officiated as governess in a private family.

Do you consider her qualified for the situation she holds?—Yes.

Do you know whether the Society took any particular means of ascertaining or improving her qualifications?—Yes.

State what they were?—Upon engaging her, they caused her to visit the different establishments for education in Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Norwich, London, Bath, and Bristol, for the purpose of obtaining information on the subject.

In what time did she make the tour?—The months of June, July, and August, 1824.

Are we to understand, that this branch of the institution is but just commenced?—Yes.

What number of mistresses have been actually trained hitherto?—Up to the present day there are eight in the establishment; and there are coming up, between this and the 15th of next month, 22, making a total of 30.

For how many have you accommodation in that branch of the institution?—Thirty-six; which we expect to fill early in January.

We omitted to ask you the ages of the young men you have described as training for masters?—The ages recommended by the Society are from 18 to 35; we have some cases where we have exceeded that; and it is one of the points I have never been able to get any correct information upon.

What should you say was their average age?—I should think 26.

What do you conceive yourself to be the most desirable age at which the training masters should be sent?—From 18 to 24. I have observed in the country schools that the men of that age are more efficient.

Cæteris paribus, which should you prefer training, a young man of 19, or one of 23?—Nineteen.

You have intimated in a former answer you had some sort of controul over the female branch of the establishment?—Yes; I have the general superintendence of both establishments; the Society in making the recent regulations considered it necessary; they have lately directed me to devote my attention to that department, and I am now making arrangements for the purpose, in order to facilitate the acquiring of the system which we are establishing for the instruction of schoolmistresses.

What is the name of the schoolmistress, who fills in the female school, the situation corresponding to that which Mr M'Guinness holds in the boys school?—Julia Campbell.

Is she a Protestant?—No, a Roman Catholic.

Are we to understand that both the master in the male school, and the mistress in the female school are Roman Catholics?—Yes.

Is there any rule of that kind in the institution?—No I believe not; it arose upon the selection.

Of what profession are you?—A Protestant of the established church.

Do you yourself suppose there was any particular reason for having the master and mistress of the schools Roman Catholics?—None whatever.

Do you really suppose it resulted from accident?—It was accidental; the predecessor of Mrs. Campbell was a Protestant.

Who was her predecessor?—Mrs. M'Loughlin.

How long has Mrs. Campbell been in her situation?—Since the year 1821.

How came Mrs. M'Loughlin to cease to hold her situation?—She withdrew from the establishment.

Was there any particular reason for it?—I believe none.

What are the allowances of Mr. M'Guinness, the schoolmaster?—He had 100*l.* a year, with apartments and coals and candles; but it has been found necessary, in consequence of extending the accommodation for the masters, to remove him from the establishment, and he has 35*l.* in lieu of house and candles.

What are the allowances of Julia Campbell?—The first year 60*l.* the second 70*l.* and the third 80*l.*

Is she married or not?—She is, and in consequence of the inconvenience that was experienced from her residing at a distance from the institution, the Society have recently given her the accommodation of unfurnished apartments.

What are Miss Edkins's allowances?—One hundred pounds a year, and furnished apartments.

Has she coals and candles?—Yes.

Has she any diet?—No.

Does not she partake of the diet of the schoolmistress whom she superintends?—No.

Could you furnish to us a list of all the masters that have ever passed through the training schools, distinguishing their different religions?—I doubt whether we should be able to do it without reference to the individuals themselves in the country; as they are entered in our books only Protestants or Roman Catholics.

Are the benefits of this branch of the institution perfectly open to Protestants of all persuasions, whatever they may be?—They are.

Was any difficulty ever thrown in the way of any person applying for admission on account of his religion?—Never.

Supposing a person, who was in point of fact a deist, should apply for admission, would that circumstance, if known, operate to exclude him?—I cannot say what the committee might do upon it; but I imagine it would be my duty to ask him what religious persuasion he was of.

599
Examination of
Mr.
John Veevers,
24 Nov. 1824.

In putting the question, has it ever happened that you have found the person was a Socinian?—No; they generally say they are Protestants.

If he says "Protestant," do you enter into particulars as to whether he is a member of the church of England, or an Independent, or a Presbyterian?—Never.

Have you had any member of the Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, pass through the training school?—Yes.

How many?—I think two cases; from my knowledge of the country, and the individuals who recommend them, I can generally tell whether they are Presbyterians or members of the established church.

Do you require a recommendation in every case?—Yes.

From what person?—The patron of the school.

Do you require any certificate from the minister as to the religion of the person seeking admission?—No.

In point of fact, do you know whether you have had any persons calling themselves Protestants, who were Unitarians or Socinians?—I do not know that we have.

Do you happen to know whether you have ever had individuals in the training department who were in connexion with the Wesleyan Methodists?—I recollect the cases of three individuals who were from Youghall, in the county of Cork; they were connected with the Wesleyan Methodists; upon inquiring where they had been, they stated they had been attending the Wesleyan chapel.

Appendix, N° 208.

Examination of Matthew Donelan, Esquire, on Oath;
Wednesday, December 8th, 1824.

Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

HOW long have you been one of the inspectors of the Kildare-place Society?—I was appointed in February 1823; I am not exactly certain as to the precise time, but about that period.

Have you the same salary as the other inspectors?—Yes.

What number of inspections have you been upon?—Two.

What districts have you inspected?—The first inspection I began with the county Kildare, and Queen's County, and travelled down to the western part of the country through Connaught, and ended in coming round by Sligo, then up to Kinnegad, and home to Dublin.

Where were you upon your second inspection?—In the southern part of the country principally. I started in the county of Kildare, and came round to the county Wicklow; I am now come up from Arklow.

Were you in the county of Kerry as well as Cork?—No.

Tipperary?—I went through part of Tipperary.

Carlow?—Yes.

Kilkenny?—Yes.

What number of schools did you comprehend in your inspection?—I cannot tell that accurately, without looking at my travelling book; I should think about 210.

Did you inspect all the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society in the district you visited, or were any omitted?—All given to me were inspected; sometimes a county is divided between two inspectors, one may go to one part, and another to another. In the county of Cork, Mr. Griffith inspected, I believe, some of the schools; but I cannot be positive upon that point.

Did you inspect any other schools upon your tour than those which were in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I inspected schools that were jointly in connection with the Kildare-place Society, the London Hibernian Society, the Capel-street Association, and the Baptist Society.

Did you inspect any not in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, not above two or three.

Have you made a report on the state of each school, as it appeared to you upon inspection?—Yes, generally speaking I have; I have, however, inspected some schools, of which I have the minutes, but have not yet transmitted the reports.

Did you take with you any memorandum respecting the different schools, which enabled you to judge of what state you were to expect to find them in, as to the amount of attendance?—I was supplied with memoranda as to the number found in attendance by the former inspector, and the suggestions he left, but no other memorandum.

Had you ever yourself seen any considerable number of schools in those districts before you visited them upon that inspection?—Never.

Were they all new to you?—Perfectly.

Are they for the most part schools that have been some time in operation, or lately established?—Generally speaking, they have been in operation some time.

Were a large portion of them in operation before they came in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I believe they were, but I cannot speak with certainty as to that.

Did you find the attendance of the schools as numerous as you had reason to expect from the account you had heard?—No, very much below my expectations indeed.

How was that accounted for?—I accounted for it by the opposition given by the Roman Catholic clergy; and this opposition, though not exactly created, was in some degree called into action by the establishment of this present commission; and there appeared to

Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

me to be an obvious reason it should have this effect. The object of the Roman Catholic clergy was to overturn the Kildare-place Society, and to prove that our system was totally inefficient for the circumstances of Ireland. They therefore used every exertion to render the attendance at our schools as small as possible.

What was the assigned objection to the regulations of the Kildare-place schools?—The reading the Scriptures without note or comment was the great and leading objection advanced by the Roman Catholic clergy; but there was also another objection which I conceive exists in the minds of some Roman Catholics, which is the interference of the Protestants in the education of the Roman Catholic population.

Do you mean the interference of Protestants in the education of Roman Catholics generally, or only their religious education?—I conceive that most of the Roman Catholic clergy have a particular objection to the interference of Protestants in the religious education of their flocks; but I also conceive that some of them would object to a school established for mere literary education, if placed under the superintendence of a Protestant patron, inasmuch as it might afford an opportunity of tampering with the religion of those children who might attend.

Do you hold that to be an objection entertained sincerely by the Roman Catholic priesthood, or do you believe it to be a pretext?—My opinion is, that they entertain honest and conscientious objections to the reading of the Scriptures without note or comment. Some few also object to allowing the Roman Catholic children to go to schools where Protestants have the superintendence, lest it might afford an opportunity of proselytising, but that is confined to very few clergymen, it is more among laymen.

Suppose in those schools the Scriptures were not read, would there be any objection to permitting their children to go?—I think there would.

State the grounds for that opinion?—One reason is, from a conversation I had with Doctor Plunket, the Roman Catholic Bishop of Elphin. I argued with him upon the principles of the Kildare-place Society, and he used this expression: even supposing their principles were consistent with catholicity, I should be apprehensive of the interference of Protestant patrons; and Mr. Warden French, of Galway, used this expression, “Mr. Donelan, I agree with you, there is nothing essentially hostile to the faith of the Catholic church in reading the Scriptures as modified by your Society, but we want confidence in its members.” I have known the observation made by a Roman Catholic barrister, with whom I have been recently speaking on the subject, saying, there was no objection to reading the Scriptures as modified by the Education Society, but he dreaded the over-zeal of Protestant patrons. That opinion is further corroborated in my own mind, seeing there has been an improper use made of the rules of the Kildare-place Society as a cloak on some few occasions for proselytism.

Did that appear to you to have occurred in many schools that you inspected in your last tour?—No; on my last tour there were very few deviations that I should call anti-catholic; but on my first tour in the western part of the country, where the intentions of the Society were not known, the deviations were frequent.

Describe the deviations?—Sometimes the introduction of the Protestant catechism, and sometimes the introduction of certain tracts, written in a very high spirit of religious animosity, and highly controversial; I can produce an instance which I now recollect; on one occasion I attended the correspondence sub-committee, and in seven reports then furnished by me, and perused by Mr. Fox, there were in each of them deviations of this kind.

State the county where this happened?—In Westmeath, in the neighbourhood of Mullingar.

In what schools?—I cannot speak from memory; it appears upon my reports.

Did you find any similar instance on your last tour of inspection?—Yes; I found an instance in which I conceived there was a practice that must be particularly objected to by Roman Catholics; that was in Shannon Vale, in the county of Cork, under a Miss Sadler; but the deviations there were not tracts, but the master was in the habit of reading aloud extracts from the Protestant Prayer Book, and also in the habit of opening the school with extempore prayer, which custom I conceive might be used for a very bad purpose; an ignorant master might, for instance, pray for the conversion of the Roman Catholics, or something offensive to some other sect.

Is not that practice a breach of the rules of the Kildare-place society?—It is, and I reported it accordingly.

Was that school in connection with any other society?—No.

Was the school in Westmeath in connection with any other society?—I rather imagine not, but I can not say at this moment.

Was the school at Shannon Vale a girls school?—A mixed school of boys and girls; with regard to another, which is under Mr. Cotter, of Castle Magner, I beg leave to make a few observations, first premising, that when I go into a school I endeavour to conceal who I am, that I may come upon the master unawares; I then proceed to look at the books, to ascertain if there is any thing improper in the hands of the children; among the boys there was nothing of that kind to be found in the school; in the girls school there were books of a most objectionable character; there was the velvet cushion, which is written in a very controversial spirit; I speak with regard to such deviations; I conceive there could not be possibly a greater deviation from our rules than that; I took up the book, and I happened to open it where the author treated in a strain of ridicule our sermon at the mass, and I took a memorandum of it; in the boys school I found no book at all of a controversial nature in the hands of the boys when I first entered, but on returning to it, I found in the hands of the boy next to the door, a book entitled, "Texts of Scripture against the Popish Errors;" I then remonstrated, saying it was not a fit book to be used in the school, and I reported it accordingly; it was as if the master thought it would please me to see such books used in the school.

By whom was the school at Castle Magner built?—I cannot positively say; I think by the Capel-street Society.

You have mentioned tracts; have you found any other instances in which tracts have been used in the school room by children, or have the tracts been distributed out of school?—I do not think I can recollect an instance of a tract being in the hands of a child in the school, but I have met with them in cupboards appropriated to the use of the school; those cupboards were sometimes open and sometimes locked; the masters generally urged in their defence, that they were not intended for the use of the school.

Did those cupboards occur in more than two instances; the school at Leitrim, and Carrick on Shannon?—They did at some of the schools in Westmeath.

Are you speaking of your last tour, or the tour preceding?—When I speak of Castle Magner, I speak of my last tour, and when of Westmeath, I speak of my first tour; but in the south the tracts are very rarely to be met with, it is more in the western part of Ireland.

Have you met with any tracts in any of the schools connected with the Kildare-place Society, and which had no connection with any other society?—I have; but I cannot tell of what particular kind; some of those schools in Westmeath are exclusively under the jurisdiction of the Kildare-place Society.

Are the tracts you have met with, printed and circulated by any society?—I believe they may be printed by the Tract Society, but I am not sure of it; they are circulated by individuals in the country, not by the Society itself.

Can you name any tracts you found on your last tour?—No, I cannot recollect any of them. In the school at Leitrim on my first tour, some of the books were I think "The similarity between the Doctrines of the Jews and the Roman Catholics;" "A proof that the Pope was Antichrist;" I have returned the names of the tracts to the Kildare-street Society.

Did the schoolmaster of that particular school satisfy you that no boy in the school had ever seen those tracts, nor was it intended they should?—No, he never satisfied me upon the point; the conviction upon my mind was then, and is still, that they were intended for the use of the school; and the reason why I think so is this, that the master had appropriated another place for the preservation of what belonged to himself; he had, for instance, an Euclid, and this as far as I recollect, was not kept in the school room. On discovering this, I made an observation, that that would have been a much more proper book for the use of the children than the other books, and if they were intended for the use of the master exclusively they ought to have been kept in his own house, and not found in an open desk in the school room.

Did they appear to have been much read?—No, they were almost quite new.

Did you question any of the boys?—The school was quite knocked up, there was no attendance of children; I found the tracts in the master's desk, and there were a considerable number of them in it.

A great number of the same tracts, or a great variety of them?—A number of different tracts.

Was the school at Leitrim in connexion with any other society?—I believe not; it is under Mr. La Touche, and not under any other society; in addition to the books I have mentioned, I now recollect there was another, entitled, "The Protestant."

Were those books supplied by any person who subscribed to the school?—They were supplied by a Protestant clergyman, and another gentleman whom I spoke to; but they said they were not intended for the use of the school.

Did you find any other deviations from the rules, than the admission of tracts into the school, upon your last tour?—Yes, of late the most frequent deviation I had to complain of was the non-reading of the Scriptures, and also one deviation that proceeds in a great measure from ignorance, that is, reading the selections from the Scriptures instead of the Testament itself.

Were there many schools in which neither the Scripture Lessons nor the Scriptures themselves were read?—Very few in which the Scriptures were not to be found; but the masters used to say the Scriptures were read, and I was convinced they were not; that they used to deceive us; in almost all the schools the Scriptures were to be found.

Did you examine the boys when you had reason to believe the Scriptures were not read?—Yes, my course was always this; knowing our system of inspection to be very imperfect, I endeavour to disguise in what capacity I visit the school; I then ask the master whether the Scriptures are read, what portions are read, by what class or classes, and when he had last read them; and if I suspect any deception, I bring up the boys one by one, and ask them the same questions apart from the master. I have found them differ in the most essential points, one saying he read in the Acts, and another in Matthew; one saying it was read in a class, and the other single, and all of them differing at the same time from the master; I moreover always take care to examine the books themselves, to see whether they have been used, and I sometimes have found that when the master has asserted the Scriptures were read, the leaves were sometimes sticking together, proving that they had never been opened.

Did that occur in many instances?—Indeed of late, since the present ferment originated in the county of Cork, it has existed to a considerable extent, because the masters were willing to act a double part, anxious on the one hand to please the patron of the school, and receive the gratuity bestowed by our Society, and afraid on the other hand to incur the displeasure of the parish priest, by introducing the Scriptures into their schools, and deceive us.

Did you find this to be the case, as well in the schools where the masters were Protestants as Roman Catholics?—In one or two instances they might be Protestants, but the greater number were Roman Catholics, and on some occasions I did not state it to the committee on the face of my report, because, although I suspected it strongly, I could not prove it.

Did you find any attempt to clear the schools, where you had reason to expect that this collusion had taken place?—No, quite the contrary; the schools were always flourishing; under those circumstances there was always a great attendance at such schools, because the priest knowing from the master that the Scriptures were not read, did not oppose it.

Then you found several schools in Munster in connexion with the Kildare-place Society, in which there was a full attendance?—Yes, a considerable number, amongst the rest at Lismore, that is an admirable school; there is also a school under the member for the county of Waterford, Mr. Power of Clashmore.

Refer to your minutes, and tell us the names of those schools in which you found those collusions had taken place between the master and the priest, and where the rules of the Society had been practically disobeyed?—A list shall be prepared.

Was it your impression, that in the school of Lismore the rule was evaded?—No, there we had a positive proof it was not evaded, because the Scriptures were committed to memory.

Did you find a good attendance at that school at Lismore?—Yes, one of the largest attendances I have ever seen.

How do you account for there being so large an attendance at Lismore, if the Scriptures are committed to memory?—Perhaps to a singular instance of liberality on the part of the Roman Catholic clergyman of that parish, and the powerful influence of the patron of the school, who is the agent of the Duke of Devonshire, and that will have its weight with all classes of persons.

Is not the master rather of a superior class?—I think he is the best master I have ever met with.

Is he a Roman Catholic?—Yes, he is.

In the schools you have described where the Scriptures were not read, were the Scripture Lessons always read?—I cannot answer that.

Was not it a matter of inquiry?—No, that question is not put by the inspector; the question is, "are the Scripture Lessons in the school?" it is optional with the patron of the school whether he will read them or not; it was at first a very common practice to have a kind of compromise, that the selection should be read instead of the Scriptures, because they came forward purporting to have the sanction of Dr. Troy; of late there has been a misunderstanding between the Roman Catholic clergy and the Kildare-place Society upon this subject, and in consequence some objection to the use of them has been made; the Roman Catholics say, that Dr. Troy recanted his approbation before he died.

Do you know the book printed by the Kildare-place Society, that contains extracts from the Psalms and Proverbs?—I do.

Did you ever hear any objection to that?—Never.

Is it in frequent use?—No, it appeared to me to form more a part of the lending library, than a school book.

Why do you think that?—Because I have seldom met with it in the schools; I scarcely ever recollect above four or five instances, in which I found it used as a school book.

What other evasions have you found of the Kildare-place Society's rules besides those you have mentioned?—Latterly there has been a custom prevailing of opening the school with prayer, and that has, by a recent decision of the committee, been declared an evasion of their rules; it has become more general lately than it was before.

In about how many instances have you met with that?—In seven or eight instances, or perhaps more.

Can you specify one or two?—The school at Shannon Vale.

Do you know at whose desire the custom of opening the school with prayer was introduced?—The patron, I believe; the master could not do it of his own authority.

Was it the subject of inquiry?—Yes; inasmuch as the first query asked by the inspector is, "In what respect have there been deviations from the rules of the Society?" and as this has been determined to be a violation, I always ask the question, whether the school is opened or concluded by prayer.

What prayer was used in the school?—In general, the prayer is perfectly unexceptionable, such as could give offence to no Roman Catholic, or indeed any sect; sometimes it has been the Lord's Prayer.

With the doxology, or without?—Sometimes with it, but generally without it; in general it has been calling down the blessing of God upon the labours of the children, and I myself never saw the least objection to the words, or import of it, in the whole course of my experience.

Do you believe this practice has been discontinued wherever you found it?—Yes, because I have invariably reported it; and I have reason to believe, that whenever I have reported a deviation, the committee have taken some steps to put an end to it.

Have you ever had reason to believe that the steps taken failed?—I cannot say that, because because I have never gone round the same tour a second time; as soon as I have inspected the school, I generally lose sight of it altogether.

Is it the practice of the Society to specify, when the inspector is about to go on his tour, what deviations have been found in the schools by the preceding inspector, to ascertain whether they have been altered?—Yes; because in our travelling book is inserted what suggestions the former inspector left in the school, and he generally notices the deviations.

Have you, in either of your tours, observed that a deviation still continued that had been pointed out and objected to on the previous tour?—I have not, as far as I can now recollect; the masters have great power of deceiving us; we have for instance no check over them at all as to reading the Scriptures, save and except that kind of cross examination which is attended with some degree of inconvenience, as it sometimes exposes the inspector to personal disrespect. I have latterly been inclined not to adopt it, finding it exposed me to personal disrespect.

Would not that be an offence which the Society would notice?—Yes, certainly.

Perhaps the master is not aware at the time you speak of, that you are an inspector?—Yes, he is; an instance of this kind occurred at a school in the town of New Ross,—that is an establishment in a great measure under the management of two Roman Catholic clergymen, at the same time the Protestant clergyman takes a part. Seeing a full attendance at the school, I suspected the Scriptures were not read; I pursued this course of examination as to the children; the master asked me, “Pray do you doubt my word?” “Upon my word, my good man,” said I, “I do not doubt it; but I am to report, not upon your assertion, but upon my own knowledge;” and I persisted in this course; he then told me in effect, it was not the conduct of a gentleman, and added, he would dismiss the children, if I persisted. I have not reported it to the Society, because I conceived I was at liberty to pass it over in silence, as it was personal disrespect to me only.

Did you ascertain how the fact stood?—I ascertained, beyond all doubt, that the Scriptures were read there.

Did you understand in what manner they were read?—Yes, in a very peculiar manner; which was, I believe, that they used to select not only from the Scriptures, but also from the chapters; that I could not ascertain exactly, although I have a suspicion it was done so.

Did you ascertain that the mode was to read those verses which had been explained in the chapel on Sunday, and to continue reading those verses alone the whole of the week?—No, I believe this was not the case; at least the master denied it to me, and I had no power of proof, except to ask the children, the master and the patron; and if they say what is not the case, I cannot detect the deception.

Would that course be inconsistent with the rules of the Kildare-place Association?—I have my doubts upon it; they allow a selection, and do not say whether from the book or from a chapter; but I conceive it would be a deviation from the spirit, although within the letter of the law; and whenever I happened to ascertain it, I set my face against it.

Do you not conceive that, in selecting particular parts of chapters, the object may not be to select those parts that constitute the Gospel of the preceding or following Sunday?—I think, as a matter of opinion, it may be so sometimes; I have a suspicion that they do not even do so much, but that they select three or four verses of a chapter, and read them over and over again, so as to say that they do read the Scriptures; but I have no proof of this whatever, it is a mere suspicion.

Do not Roman Catholics who can read, and who are provided with Roman Catholic missals in English, always read the epistle and gospel for the Sunday and for holidays?—They do.

Then it would be not only not inconsistent with the practice, but strictly conformable to the uniform practice of the Roman Catholic church, that the laity, who can read, should read the epistles and gospels of the Sunday in English?—Certainly.

Is not the epistle and the gospel of the Sunday generally explained at the Roman Catholic chapels after mass?—It is frequently explained; I know it is the duty of the clergyman to do so.

In selecting those parts that constitute the gospel or the epistle, do you think they may be influenced by a wish that they should receive the comments upon, and an explanation of, the parts they read?—I have no doubt of it.

Which comment or explanation they would hear through the comments or explanation of or upon the epistle or gospel on the Sunday or holiday?—Yes, that is the way I have generally reconciled it to the Roman Catholic clergy. I have said, we do not object to the patron's selections from the Scriptures, or to the priest giving notes and comments out of school hours.

If similar comments were to be given upon the remaining part of the chapter, providing it did not contain any difficult or disputed doctrine, do you think any objection would be made to the children reading the other parts?—Upon principle, I conceive not, providing it did not contain any thing controversial, or beyond the capacity of the child; but that is a matter of opinion only. I cannot conceive upon principle they could.

Are you a Roman Catholic?—I am.

Have you had an opportunity of talking to priests in the country upon the subject of their opinion of the schools?—Yes, upon my first tour, where I was in some degree known, and I may say, respected, I made it my business to have communication with them; but in the southern part of the country I became very unpopular, and finding I should do no good, I declined it; but in the western part I had unlimited communication with them.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

Did you find their objection was to permitting the Scripture to be read at all, or to the circumstances under which it was read?—The majority of the Roman Catholic clergy do not object to the reading of the Scriptures under proper restrictions and regulations; what they object to is, the indiscriminate use of them without note or comment, and the right of private interpretation. I found, in the different conversations I have had with the Roman Catholic clergymen, that one misconception prevailed among the most of them, which was, that the Testament was made a school book, and that we insisted upon the promiscuous reading of it from beginning to end; but when I explained that a power of selecting from the Scriptures was given to the patron, they said they were very much in error; and upon that explanation they often became converts to our principles. I could produce a very strong instance of that in Doctor M'Nichols, the Bishop of Achonry. I went on purpose to meet him at Mr. Strickland's; he had previously written against the Kildare-place Society, and our conversation ended in his saying, he had been in error; and he applied, I believe, for a considerable grant. Mr. Strickland answered the queries, Dr. M'Nichols sitting by his elbow; and when he came to the query, "Shall the Scriptures be read?" he turned to Dr. M'Nichols, and he worded the answer to that query in such a manner, that I believe assistance was granted.

Who is Doctor M'Nichols?—He is the Roman Catholic Bishop of Achonry; I have also a copy of a letter from Doctor Kelly, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, upon an occasion in which there was a negotiation between Lord Sligo and the Roman Catholics of Westport, instead of having two schools to have one general establishment for all denominations of Christians. Doctor Kelly was consulted, and he writes as follows; "The school shall be established upon the following terms;" and the first is, "that the Scriptures shall be read according to the late regulations of the Kildare-place Society;" laying a stress upon the word late, as if we had deviated from or softened down our regulations; he then lays down a number of rules amounting to five, for the regulation of this intended school.

Will you state what he meant by "the late regulations"?—An idea had gone abroad that our Society were very unbending, and very uncompromising at first; but that in order to meet the wishes of the Roman Catholics, they had lately softened down their original regulations.

Did they conceive that the regulations originally required that the whole of the Testament should be read indiscriminately?—Yes; I always found in discussing the subject with the Roman Catholic clergy, that they ran upon that misconception, that they always thought the Scriptures were read as a horn book; and it was upon a false supposition that Doctor M'Nichols did formerly write against the Society.

Which is it has changed, the Kildare-place Society their rules, or the Roman Catholic clergy their opinion?—I think the opinion of the Roman Catholic clergy has been set right, by understanding the true principles of the Kildare-place Society.

Did you understand by "the late regulations of the Kildare-place Society," Doctor Kelly meant regulations which were in truth original, but which he did not himself understand correctly?—No; I conceive he meant new regulations.

When he was speaking of late regulations, did he mean regulations which in point of fact were not late regulations, but which he conceived to be late regulations?—I conceive he meant regulations which were in point of fact late regulations.

Were those regulations which he considered to be late regulations, and to which he referred in the conversation you have mentioned, new regulations, or that part of the regulation of the Kildare-place Society that makes it necessary that the Scriptures shall be read?—I conceive the regulations termed by Doctor Kelly late regulations, were not new regulations in fact.

In point of fact, the regulation that admits of parts of the Testament being selected by the patron of the school for reading, was an original regulation of the Kildare-place Society; was it not?—Not an original regulation, es nomine, but a deduction from an original regulation; the original regulation was, that the Scriptures should be read, without saying the whole Scriptures; and the committee have, in their construction of that law, allowed a power of selecting to the patrons of the schools.

Was there ever a period at which the Kildare-place Society insisted on a contrary practice?—No; but it was in misconception conceived so.

Have the objections to the Scriptures being read in the schools by the elder children always arisen with the priests, or have they ever been urged by the parents of the children?—Never; if they were not to be influenced by the Roman Catholic clergy, the poor people would never object to it.

Do you think the poor people desire it?—I do not think they desire it or object to it; they do not know the value of it.

Do you find throughout the country a prevailing ignorance of both versions of the Scriptures?—Yes, the most lamentable instances in our own Kildare-place schools. I have had the precaution to ask some of the boys what the Testament was, after they had been reading it for some time, and they could not tell me; but I must add, that has been of rare occurrence.

Do you conceive that to be the result of no explanation being given?—I cannot say that positively; although I conceive it probable.

Do they not know it is the word of God?—No, they could not tell that, even when I put the answer in their mouths; and if the children of our schools are so ignorant with such advantages, I conclude their parents must be more so.

Do you think the peasantry could in most instances distinguish between a Testament and any other book of the same size, upon a religious subject, put into their hands?—Upon my word, I think they could scarcely do it, except where the exertions of the Bible Society have succeeded; but in many parts of Connaught, the peasant does not know what a Bible or a Testament is.

Speaking of the average of the parents of the Roman Catholic children who frequent the schools of the Kildare-place Society, do you think if the Evangelical Life of Christ, which is in appearance and size nearly the same as an ordinary New Testament, was put into their hands, along with the the New Testament, they would be able to say which were the Scriptures?—I can hardly form an opinion about that; but the ignorance is excessively great in some parts of the country.

Have you ever in the schools found the names of the Bible and Testament familiarly applied to books that were neither Bibles nor Testaments; for instance, to Gahan's Abridgement of the Bible, and Reeves's History of the Bible?—Never.

You never heard a book called the Christian Doctrine, called the Testament?—Never; but I have spoken to peasants as I have been riding along the road, and asked them if they had any objection to reading the Scriptures, and they have said not. I have then asked them if they knew what a Testament was, and they have said not; but even among our boys I have asked them the difference between the Bible and the New Testament, and they could not tell; there was almost always a confusion upon that point.

Do they generally understand that the Bible contains the word of God, the history of our Saviour, the history of the creation, and the redemption of the world?—I think we may say in general, they do not; they have some general notion of it; but it is a very vague idea. In some few instances you will meet with an utter ignorance of it altogether.

Have you not found in some places that they consider the Bible a Protestant and not a Roman Catholic book?—Indeed, latterly they have.

Is that an impression spreading throughout the country in consequence of the present contest?—Perhaps that impression which would be conveyed by the late discussions has been counteracted by the declarations and arguments on the other side; but the knowledge of the name of the Bible has become much more familiar with the common people than it was formerly, on account of these discussions, and on account of the Bible Society; they have now a more perfect knowledge of it.

But owing to the discussions, they have received it with a hostile feeling?—No doubt of it.

Do you think their curiosity to look into it has been excited by the discussions?—I believe it has.

Have you heard in the provincial towns whether the sales of Bibles at the depositaries have been increased in the last few months?—I have heard so; I have understood it in consequence of having attended meetings of the Bible Society.

Are you acquainted with the rules of the London Hibernian Society?—I am acquainted with them as far as a minute attention and consideration of their rules enables me to form an opinion.

Do the rules under which the Scriptures are read in the London Hibernian schools differ from the practice pursued under the Kildare-place Society's rules?—Not essentially, except that they require the Scriptures shall be committed to memory, and we leave that optional with the patron. They make it a school-book, we do not. We also differ in this, that our inspectors are more particular what children read the Bible than they are; my practice has been never to allow a child to read the Scriptures that cannot read with fluency. In the London Hibernian Society's schools, I have heard children read it who were utterly unfit for it.

In those schools is not the Testament the reading book of the school?—Yes, it is.

Is there any other reading book?—Yes; the London Hibernian Society's Spelling-book is used for that purpose.

If a Kildare-place school is in connexion with the London Hibernian Society, do the Hibernian Society's rules prevail to such a degree, that all books are excluded except their spelling-books and the Testament?—No, I do not conceive that to be the case; they do not exclude them. If the Kildare-place Society send down the Dublin Spelling and Reading-book, the London Hibernian Society have no objection to their being used; they are used in the southern parts of the country.

According to the rules of the London Hibernian Society, does not the inspector examine into, and is not the master paid according to the proficiency of the scholars in the several classes?—They are.

Is not the division of the classes into spelling-book reader's classes, and Testament reader's classes?—They are so divided, I believe.

If that is the case, how would it be possible to admit the use of other books in those classes?—I do not conceive that others are prohibited; I have heard them reading in the Dublin Spelling-book.

Does the examination as to the reading take place in the Testament?—Yes.

And the premium of the master depends upon the manner in which they read the Testament?—Yes, in a great measure it does.

Do you not infer from that, that to the Testament he will for his own sake generally confine their reading?—Certainly.

Is there any other version of the Testament admitted into the schools of the London Hibernian Society, than the authorized version?—Yes, the Douay version; if a comparison

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.

were made, it would be found, perhaps, that the Douay version of the Testament is more frequently to be met with than those of the authorized version. I speak of Munster entirely now.

Did you not find in the school at Lismore, that the Douay was the only version?—Yes, it was.

Have you had reason to believe that the schools of the London Hibernian Society, are more strongly objected to by the Roman Catholics than the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, and as a proof, I would refer to my reports of Clashmore and Cappoquin schools; I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the connection of the London Hibernian Society with the Kildare-place Society, has operated most strongly against the progress of the latter in Ireland; I have found in my discussions with Roman Catholics, that they visited upon the Kildare-place Society whatever was objectionable in the other society.

Do they in point of fact distinguish between the one and the other?—No, very few, except those that have had the benefit of a discussion with some persons connected with our Society.

What is there in the regulations of the London Hibernian Society which the Roman Catholics principally object to?—In the first place, they object to committing the Scriptures to memory, and to its being made a school book; in the second place, they object to their being constantly in the school, and to their being brought home to the cottages, so that the children can constantly read what parts they choose, by which practice the object for which so much care has been exercised by our Society to allow the patron a power of selection, is totally done away with; because a child can, from idle curiosity, read what he likes, and that is one practice to which I most decidedly object; but there is also another which I am not certain whether the Roman Catholic clergy are aware of, that is the system adopted by the London Hibernian Society, of employing what are called readers, whose office it is to travel round the country, to go into the cabins of the peasants, and assembling the family, to read what parts of the Scriptures they please, and give such notes and comments upon it as they think fit, and I have been informed that some of those persons at least have been converts from catholicity to the Protestant faith, and most of them illiterate and uninformed men.

Do the readers interfere at all with the schools?—They do not as far as I could see.

Are the readers also school inspectors?—No, they are not.

Are they occasional inspectors?—I believe they are cursory but not regular inspectors, but upon this subject I speak from hearsay. I have also been informed that the readers form no part of the school system of the London Hibernian Society; but the impression on my mind was and is, that it is a consequence of, and so blended with their system, that it formed an inseparable part of it; they justify themselves by saying we do not interfere with the schools during school hours. I have stated that this objection was never urged to me by the Roman Catholics, it has not been much known.

Have you seen the lending libraries of the Kildare-place Society, in schools connected with the London Hibernian Society?—I have; I speak of the Cork Hibernian Society here.

Do they encourage the children to study the books of those libraries?—No, I conceive they do not; their great object is scriptural education; the book they send home to the cottagers is the Testament, and the children are occupied during the whole night in committing to memory the tasks by which the master is to be paid when the inspector comes round, so that they have not time to read any thing else.

Are the different branches of education attended to in the London Hibernian schools, or do you find that the principal object is to teach the children the Scriptures?—That is their principal object.

Are the children in the London Hibernian schools taught writing and arithmetic?—Nominally they are taught both those branches, but I think they are uncommonly deficient in both.

If it was left to the taste and choice of the population of the southern parts of Ireland, would not arithmetic be a very great object with them?—Very great indeed, and they have a peculiar taste for it, not only for common arithmetic, but for mathematics, both of which are almost totally neglected by the London Hibernian Society, who also appear totally indifferent to what is so essential to a well ordered system of education; viz. the order and discipline of their schools.

Have you seen enough of the London Hibernian schools, to be able to judge of the general effect produced by them?—I conceive it is deficient in two very essential points; first, the non-attainment of proficiency in literary education; and secondly, I consider their great object is proselytism.

Does that observation apply to the Munster Hibernian Society?—No, it does not, because they only adopt a part of the system of the parent Society; they adopt their mode of inspection, and the practice of committing the Scriptures to memory, but they do not adopt that to which I most particularly object, viz. the office of readers. I consider the members of the Munster Hibernian committee, as upright and as perfectly fair in the management of their schools as men can be. I inspected all their schools in the county of Cork.

Are there any London Hibernian schools as contradistinguished from Munster Hibernian schools, in the province of Munster?—Not that I ever met with.

Are

607
Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

Are not all the schools connected with the Munster Hibernian Society connected also with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, I believe they are; but I am not certain.

Do you mean to except the Munster Hibernian schools from the suspicion of endeavouring to make proselytes?—I cannot charge my memory with a single deviation among the schools of the Munster Hibernian Society, that tended to proselytism.

To what class of schools do you apply the observation?—The London Hibernian Society; but the Munster Hibernian Society is only a branch of it, adopting part of the system of the parent society.

Then the schools under the parent society, as contradistinguished from those under the Munster Hibernian Society, are not in Munster?—They are not, I believe, but I am not certain; those in Munster are called the Society's schools.

We are to understand, that the Cork Society's schools are the same as the Munster Hibernian schools, but are not the same as the London Hibernian schools?—Yes, exactly; they were formerly called the Cork Hibernian Society.

Has not the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy been at least as great to the Munster Hibernian schools as to the London Hibernian schools?—It has been fully.

To what do you attribute that?—Before I went down to the southern part, nothing could be more flourishing than the Cork Hibernian schools; and I attribute the great opposition that exists in the south to a system of policy adopted by the Roman Catholic clergymen in that district of country, to prove to the commissioners that our system was imperfect; and secondly, to that kind of personal and political agitation that exists in that county in a peculiar degree.

Are not all the Munster Hibernian schools connected individually with the Kildare-place Society?—I believe they are all; but am not certain.

Is it your impression that there are many of the London Hibernian schools connected with the Kildare-place Society?—There is no doubt of it.

On what grounds do you entertain the opinion, that it is the object of the managers of the London Hibernian schools to make proselytes?—In the first place, I think in the formation and constitution of the Society, there is sufficient to alarm the suspicions of a Roman Catholic; the person at the head of that Society in Ireland, is extremely zealous indeed, and entertains opinions very hostile to the religion of Roman Catholics; I mean Mr. Blest, of Sligo; but I am well aware that this circumstance would not by itself warrant the assertion, that their object was that of proselytism; but the suspicion created by this fact is most strongly corroborated by the acts as well as the words of those connected with that society. In support of the latter, I would refer to the speeches of Capt. Gordon and Mr. Noel; in support of the former, to an instance that happened in Sligo. When in that town I inspected a school, and I was duped (as I frequently am); I reported to the Society that there was no deviation. I was afterwards told by a gentleman that notes and comments were given on the Scriptures in that school; in fact, that proselytism was going on. I returned to the school immediately, and found the fact to be such. I remonstrated, and a lady in the school said, that as long as the word of God was read, she would give notes and comments. I said, "Madam, surely you will not do so; as it is in violation of the rules of the Kildare-place Society;" she said, she certainly would. I then went to Mr. Blest, knowing that the regulations of his Society with regard to notes and comments went pari passu with ours. I called upon him, and begged for his aid and assistance to support the mutual rules of the two societies, and on that occasion I did not meet with any thing like a cordial co-operation from him; and as I found he would not act up to his own rules, I did form a bad opinion of the society. I further object to the class of persons employed as their inspectors; I should have confidence in them if I thought they did their duty, but my impression is, that they do not. And I form my opinion upon this ground; that in one of the schools I have examined recently, the Scriptures were not read. I brought the case before the Cork Society, and it was then proved that one of the London Hibernian inspectors said it would be quite sufficient if they read the extracts from the Scriptures in the spelling book, instead of the Testament itself. From that I draw this inference, that there is not that rigid adherence to their rules to warrant public confidence, especially as the inspectors are in that rank of life that I do not think they would be sufficiently independent to remonstrate with the patron upon any deviation that might take place, especially if they see the head of the establishment conniving at such deviations.

Are any of the inspectors converts from the Roman Catholic religion?—I cannot say that.

Have you met with any schoolmasters who were converts?—I have.

Are there any other instances than those in Sligo, where deviations have taken place?—Yes; I met another instance in a school near Whitehall, in the county of Cork, in which the inspector did not shew that obedience to their own rules, which a society that was sincere would do. I asked the master if he gave notes and comments on the Scriptures. At first he hesitated; he then said, he did not; but adding at the same time, that an inspector (Mr. Clarke) told him to give what notes and comments on the Scriptures he chose. I do not know whether my grounds are satisfactory or not, but I have a very strong conviction upon my mind that their object is proselytism, and that they cannot be depended upon.

Suppose the London Hibernian Society sought the services of gentlemen of your station in life as inspectors, would you act as inspector under that Society?—I would not act with them for any consideration; and I conceive it right to mention, that it has occurred to me as a conscientious difficulty, whether on account of that connection I could continue my service to the Kildare-place Society, of whose conduct I warmly approve.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

What do you mean by the connection between the Kildare-place Society and the London Hibernian Society?—I mean the two societies concurring to assist the same schools.

Do you think there is any connection between the two societies?—No, not at all; as to the inspectors, I wish to except a gentleman of the name of Pringle, of whom I have the highest opinion, and feel pleasure in bearing testimony to the very manly manner in which he has acted on an occasion where I had an opportunity of judging of his principles, and very praiseworthy firmness.

You have stated that you would not act under the London Hibernian Society, if they sought the assistance of gentlemen of your character and station in life?—I would not.

Then you would not act under the Kildare-place Society, if you were not convinced they had the intention only of giving education without proselytising?—Yes, that is my opinion, and as far as I have known, they have endeavoured to protect the Roman Catholics in every possible way consistent with their laws.

If any such object as proselytism was aimed at, could it escape your knowledge?—No, I think it could not in those schools I have inspected lately, but I have not only used my own personal observation, but I have been in the habit of applying to the Roman Catholic clergy for information on this subject, and I have never met with any thing like a proof of such an assertion; my mode of arguing with them has been this, “if a person has become a Protestant from a Roman Catholic, it is capable of proof like any thing else; I am the person before whom you ought now to institute the investigation, and I promise you the Kildare-place Society will put a stop to it;” and I have never heard an instance of it; I have heard since I have been here, of attempts at proselytism, but I do not regard them; with respect to the Kildare-place Society, when I say they do not want to proselytise, I speak of their acts, not their principles; it may be a question whether the introduction of the Scriptures may not have been adopted for the purpose of making the children throw off the subjection which they owe to their clergy, by making each person think for himself; but on this subject I wish to be understood as offering no decided opinion; all I assert is this, that the Kildare-street Society do nothing clandestine for the purposes of proselytism. And as a proof that they do not wish to interfere with the religion of the Roman Catholics, I beg leave to adduce one instance in which I met a very warm co-operation from the Kildare-place Society. Before I became an inspector they could not know that the custom of opening the school with a prayer was against the Roman Catholic doctrines, and the very instant I reported it as a custom existing in some schools, it was put a stop to.

Your uncle Lord Fingal, is a vice-president of the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, he is.

Do you conceive that he would continue in that office if he thought that the Kildare-place Society, directly or indirectly, aimed at proselytism?—Certainly not, and if he conceived that such was their object he would never permit me to hold the office I do, and many other of my relations would not consent to it upon any consideration.

Before you accepted of the office of inspector under the Kildare-place Society, had you any communication with any of the dignitaries of the Roman Catholic church?—I had a communication with Dr. Troy; my uncle, Mr. Bellew, had a similar conversation with him. I had a communication also with Dr. Curtis, as well as another uncle of mine, in the county of Louth, and Dr. Curtis gave a most unqualified approbation to my acceptance of the office.

Have you not reason to believe that the appointment was proposed to you for the specific purpose of giving a pledge to the Roman Catholics of the sincerity of the motives of the Kildare-place Society?—I have no doubt of it.

You have said that you conceived there were more objections entertained against the system of getting the New Testament by heart, than merely reading it?—Yes.

Upon what grounds do you conceive those objections rest?—I conceive personally there can be no just ground for it, but I know the objection is urged, and I have always remonstrated against it whenever I have heard of it.

Are you aware of what the grounds are, whether well or ill founded, upon which they entertain those objections?—No, I am not aware of the precise grounds.

You have said that the children may through idle curiosity look indiscriminately through the New Testament; is it your opinion they feel much curiosity upon the subject?—No, not any peculiar curiosity upon the subject, but they might take up the book with no particular object, and hit upon a portion that might be very controversial, and persist in reading it, and that is what the Roman Catholic clergy dread, from having the Testament used promiscuously as a school book.

What is the danger you apprehend from the children happening to read any passage in the New Testament?—I do not entertain any particular objection to it personally, except that there may be some passages so full of mystery, and so difficult to be understood, that the children could not understand them.

If a child is not likely to understand such difficult passages, do you think it could do the child any harm?—Yes, they might misconstrue it; and I think we are bound to guard against possible danger as well as actual danger; what a person reads, may pass by unheeded; but what is committed to memory may come again to the mind.

In any of those schools you have been speaking of, have you known the Old Testament read?—Yes, I have; but very few.

Generally speaking, it is the New Testament you mean when you speak of the Scriptures?—Yes.

Is it a regulation of the Kildare-place Society that the whole Bible shall be in the school?—No.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan.
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

Is it contrary to the regulations of the Kildare-place Society that the copies of the Scriptures read in the school should be carried home?—No, it is optional with the patron.

Have you known of any ascertained instances of children in the schools of the London Hibernian Society having changed their religion?—I know of an instance, not in the London Hibernian Society, if you speak of it as the parent society, but one which happened in a school in connection with the Cork Society. It took place in the Cove free-school, under the patronage of Mr. French, who begged of me to investigate the matter, which I did; and it is the result of my opinion, that there was no interference whatsoever with the religion of the girl. The facts were as follows: one of the children of the school, (a grown up girl), rather of a peculiar turn of mind, and very obstinate, went to the chapel on some Sunday, and the parish priest spoke of her, personally, before the congregation; she felt very much hurt at it, and on returning home she told her mother or some friends, that as long as she lived she never would go into the chapel again. The girl persisted in her determination, and ultimately became a Protestant.

What was her age?—I think fourteen. Mr. French begged of me to investigate the matter; I examined her in the closest manner possible, whether there was any undue influence used with her; whether her religion was tampered with, and she declared in the most solemn manner possible, it was in consequence of the language of the priest. I said, "have you since that time been convinced you are right. Supposing now you were on your death bed, would you still persevere in the faith you now profess," she said, "I would;" then, I said, "my good girl, has your conversion been really sincere;" and I again asked her, "are you sure that Mr. French or his wife, or any other person have never tampered with your religion," and she said, "certainly not."

Is that solitary instance you have known in the London Hibernian Society, or the Munster Hibernian schools?—This happened in a school in connection with the Munster Hibernian Society.

Did you ever hear of any other specific instances?—I have heard of others, but I cannot exactly recollect the names of the persons.

Were they in the Munster Hibernian schools, or in the London Hibernian schools?—The Munster Hibernian Society. Mr. French also produced, I think, two more instances of girls that had become Protestants; but it appeared to me to be from a conviction in their minds, and not from any undue influence exercised over them; those instances I now state, were in the same school at Cove.

Do you conceive that the reading the Scriptures without note or comment, is calculated in any degree to unsettle the minds of the Roman Catholic children with respect to their religion?—Personally I do not, especially under the regulations of the Kildare-place Society, which allow the patron the power of selecting what parts are to be read. The only danger, I think, of the Scriptures tending to that, is reading the controversial and obscure parts.

Suppose the selection should be of the controversial parts and made by a Protestant, what would the effect be then?—It might have a tendency to confuse the mind of a child that had not a very matured power of reflection.

Where the power of selection is left general, without any direction as to the manner in which it shall be exercised, may it not be as well exercised so as to introduce the objectionable passages, as to exclude objectionable passages?—Certainly; but this power of selection is given on behalf of the Roman Catholics and used by them, because the Protestant gentlemen do not object to any part of the Scriptures.

Is an opportunity of selection given in schools under Protestant patrons to Roman Catholic clergymen?—If the parish priest became a joint patron with the rector (of which the Kildare-street Society is particularly anxious) he would then have this power of selection, and I have never known an instance in which the Protestant rector has refused the co-operation of the parish priest.

Supposing a school is founded by a Protestant layman who chooses to say that the Scriptures shall there be read, would the Roman Catholic priest be entitled to your aid or assistance in saying, that only parts shall be read?—I should think not, unless he were a joint patron with that layman.

Have you known of any instance in which exertions have been made on behalf of the Roman Catholic priesthood to prevent any schoolmaster under the Kildare-place Society, being a Roman Catholic, continuing in his situation?—Yes; I have known them go to lengths that every enlightened Roman Catholic must deplore. I have met with a considerable number of instances which I could specify, if I had my travelling book; but I can mention one in the neighbourhood of a place called Ovans, under the patronage of Mr. Hawks, which now occurs to me; in that school the priest went so far as not only to speak against the master from the altar in the harshest terms possible, but also to curse any person who would give the master lodgings, and Mr. Hawks was obliged to domiciliate the master in his own house, and I conceived it my duty to write to the gentlemen of the Hibernian Society, expressing my high disapprobation of such conduct on the part of the priest.

How did the facts come to your knowledge?—As inspector of the society, and from the report of Mr. Hawks.

Had you any communication with the priest upon the subject?—No, I thought from the manner in which he had treated others, it would be imprudent in me to expose myself to the danger of something unpleasant.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

From whom did you hear it?—From Mr. Hawks, the patron, with whom the inspector always communicated.

Except from hearsay, have you any knowledge of the fact?—No, but he is a most respectable gentleman, and one whose veracity I could not doubt.

Are you aware that for such an act as that, the priest would be liable to an action?—Yes, I thought so, and there have been instances in which they have refused absolution to the master, and if he were married, refused to church the woman. I have also heard, that they have sometimes refused to baptize the children, which makes their power very great indeed.

Do you conceive that a Roman Catholic priest could refuse baptism to a child presented to him?—I think he could not do it with propriety, it is an exercise of power that does not belong to him.

Do you not conceive it would be an ecclesiastical offence in a Roman Catholic clergyman, to refuse baptism to an infant presented to him?—Not if he had the sanction of his bishop, it would then be his act not that of the priest.

Do you think a Roman Catholic priest would refuse baptism to a child because the father of it was a schoolmaster?—If the bishop gave directions on the subject, I think he might perhaps do it.

Could you believe the bishop would give such directions?—No, I do not; but I believe Doctor Murphy, of Cork, did give directions to his clergy to use every proper exertion in their power to prevent the dissemination of the principles of the Kildare-place and Cork Hibernian Societies.

Do you think such a direction would warrant any such proceedings on the part of the clergy?—I conceive it would not.

Does the master at the Ovan's school, still continue to teach there?—When I left Cork he did.

Have you known any instance in which a schoolmaster has discontinued teaching in consequence of the exertions of the priest?—I have known a considerable number of instances, amounting perhaps to ten.

Have you ever heard any instance in which a schoolmaster has objected to the mode of instruction himself, in consequence of Scripture education being necessary?—I have not.

Have you known of any instance in which a schoolmaster has been induced, by the use of violent means, to abandon a school, and transfer his services to any other school?—I have, especially for an additional salary.

Have you known any instances of that kind?—I have.

Have you known any instances in the vicinity of Cork, of a master being induced to transfer his services from a Kildare-place school, to a Roman Catholic school set up by a neighbouring Roman Catholic clergyman?—I have.

For a superior salary?—I believe for an inferior salary, to gain the approbation of the Roman Catholic clergy. I have now an instance in my mind of that kind at Mannan Bridge.

Have you known of any particular measures resorted to by the Roman Catholic clergy, with respect to the parents of children at your schools, in order to induce the parents to withdraw them?—Yes, they generally refuse to church the women, and refuse to give them absolution, and refuse to administer the dying consolations of our religion at the point of death.

Does that refusal extend only to the mother?—To the father and mother both.

When a person is said to be cursed from the altar, does it mean an announcement of the intention of refusing those rites?—A curse is something beyond that; what the poor people conceive of the curse of the priest is, that it will bring down the vengeance of heaven in every respect; the vulgar expression is, that they will have neither luck nor grace; cursing is an ulterior thing; if they refuse absolution to the parent, and the child of that parent still continues at the school, then they have recourse to the last resource, that of cursing.

Have you ever known of any case where it has proceeded so far?—Yes, I have, I was not in the chapel, but I have every reason to believe such a thing was done.

Do you mean by cursing, excommunication?—It does not amount to an excommunication. I now recollect that I was once present when the priest had recourse to cursing.

What was the offence?—A person living in a state of immoral connection and persisting in it. This practice of cursing gives a great power to the clergyman over the minds of the people.

Have you heard of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper being withheld, in consequence of their children being at those schools?—I have.

Did not such parents consider the sacrament of the Lord's Supper essential to their salvation?—No doubt of it.

According to the rites of the Roman Catholic church, could a person be admitted to the communion of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, without having previously confessed, and been absolved?—Yes, if he did feel his conscience burthened with the guilt of a grievous sin, or if he was in what is termed extremes.

Have you understood that, where absolution has been refused to persons, it has been upon the ground of declining to promise to take their children from those schools?—Yes, a great number of them; it is a common thing.

Have you any reason to know or believe, whether a query is particularly put in confession, whether they have children at any of the scriptural schools?—I could not tell that.

Have

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

Have you known of any instances in which exertions have been made, or influence used, by Protestant landlords, to compel parents to send their children to the Kildare-place schools?—In the southern part of the country it has not been done, but in the western it has been done in some instances.

State what came to your knowledge upon that subject?—I cannot specify the particular names of the schools, or what was precisely done; but I know that landlords have made use of bribes, and given ribbons and caps and gowns to children for the purpose of making them attend, and that they have gone even beyond that, using coercion to compel a tenant to do it, by driving the land, and rendering the payment of the rent as hard as possible to those who would refuse to comply with their wishes on this subject.

Were those facts communicated to you in such a way as to leave any doubt upon your mind?—No doubt of it; they have been done in some instances.

Have you known any instances in which the Roman Catholic clergy have taken Testaments out of the possession of the children, and their parents?—I have.

Have you ever known of any instances of Testaments, after they have been so taken, being burnt, or thrown into the river, or in any other way destroyed?—I have heard of it in a very vague way indeed.

Did you hear of it in such a manner as to induce you to believe it took place?—I have great doubt of it; but I know the priest has gone so far as to come into one of our schools, in the neighbourhood of Kinsale, and take the Testaments, the spelling and reading books out of it.

Did you visit many of the Kildare-place schools, which were in connexion also with the Baptist society?—Not above two or three; three would be the most.

Can you describe the character of the proceedings of that society?—That society, I think is free from the arguments I would use against the London Hibernian Society; the only thing that would create a suspicion on my mind is, that the inspectors of that society are themselves Baptist ministers, and it has come to my ears that, on inspection, they do give notes and comments, but I cannot speak decidedly upon it; I have no other reason for this opinion than hearsay.

Do you know whether any of their inspectors or schoolmasters are converts?—I cannot say I do.

Have you ever read any of their reports?—No.

Can you state whether the objections to the Baptist Society's schools, on the part of the Roman Catholic priesthood, are as strong as against the London Hibernian Society's schools?—They have not come so much into notoriety, but I should think upon principle the same objections would apply; they commit the Scriptures to memory, and insist upon the reading of them from beginning to end; I, however, never saw any deviation from their printed rules, or any attempt at proselytism.

Did you meet with many schools in connexion with the Association for discountenancing Vice, being also in connexion with the Kildare-place Society?—A great many indeed; there are many schools connected with both.

Will you describe the operation of those schools?—I think the only objection to the connexion is, that the master must be a Protestant by the rules of the Association, and by our rules all denominations of christians are eligible, without exception; I do not see any ill effect from the connexion.

Is it not a necessary condition of the establishment of the schools under the Association, that the catechism shall be taught?—Yes; but they do away with that difficulty by saying, they teach it out of school hours; I have always been of opinion, they could not be true to the principles of both societies, and when I have told them so, they have said, well, if we are not true to the Capel-street Association, we are true to you.

Are the schools of the Association particularly objected to by the Roman Catholic priests?—I do not think they are.

Less than the Hibernian schools?—Yes, generally so.

Do you think they are less objected to than the Kildare-place schools?—No, I think not.

What advantage results from the connexion with the Kildare-place and the Capel-street Association?—There is only one advantage, and, I think, that results from the defect in the system of the Kildare-place Society, viz. the smallness of the gratuity that they give to their masters; in order therefore to obviate this defect, and to pay the salary of the master, the person establishing a school is perhaps driven to apply to the Capel-street Association, who allow 15*l.* a year to the master, and thereby enable the patron to provide a fit and competent person for the situation.

Amongst the deviations from the rules of the Kildare-place Society, have you frequently found that of the catechisms being taught in the schools?—No, very seldom indeed; but our inspection in that respect is most imperfect. All the masters have to do, is to say that the catechism is taught out of school hours, and we cannot judge whether in our absence this be the case or not.

Do they not regulate the school hours according to their own will and pleasure?—Yes; the master or the patron always regulates the school hours. The Kildare-street Society never interferes with the external regulations of the school.

Do you not think that objection applies as much to the schools where the patrons are Roman Catholics, as where they are Protestants?—Certainly.

Is it much desired by the Roman Catholics that the catechism should be taught in the school?—Very much indeed; that has been a great objection to our schools, viz. the non-introduction of the catechism.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
8 Dec. 1824.

Does the same desire exist on the part of the Protestants?—No; in the Cork Society they forbid that the school shall be appropriated to that purpose, even after school hours; we do not go so far as that.

To what do you attribute the objection to catechetical instruction on the part of the Cork Hibernian Society?—I do not know the grounds of their objections; but they appeared to me to conceive that the only authentic source of religion is the Bible. As I thought it would be the means of conciliating the Roman Catholics, I made a proposition that the catechism should be taught after school hours, and Mr. Logan the secretary, told me it had been the subject of discussion, and it had met with considerable opposition, and he thought it better not to press it.

Have you many of your schools in connection with Erasmus Smith's fund?—A good number throughout Ireland; and it appears an extraordinary coalition, because by the rules of that institution also the master must be a Protestant.

Are there any other rules in that society that appear inconsistent with the rules of the Kildare-place Society?—Not in practice.

In practice, do they appear to have any rules at all?—No, as far as I could judge.

Do they do any thing but pay the master's salary?—That is all; they have no system of inspection.

Have you formed any opinion, from the observations you have made upon education in Ireland, as to what effect would be produced, if it was found necessary to have recourse to a system of divided education for the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, to provide separate education for each class?—It must fail of one great end, which is the promotion of the interchange of good feeling between Protestant and Roman Catholic children, a feeling that would make them forget those jealousies which unfortunately exist in the country, and tend so much to retard its prosperity; but by the separation alluded to, that desirable object must be frustrated.

Would there not be great danger of the jealousy that now exists being increased?—It would widen the separation; but that system would be perhaps more practicable than any other.

Have you reason to believe that the system of conjoint education does practically tend to soften the asperity that unfortunately exists?—It was calculated to do so; but although in theory it was so well calculated to attain this most desirable object, still in practice it has totally failed; and I conceive the attempt, instead of being productive of mutual good feeling between conflicting parties, has only added to party spirit. I have no doubt in the south it has had this effect.

Upon the occasion of those tours, did you visit many schools not connected with the Kildare-place Society?—No, very few indeed; and on my last tour, I thought the Roman Catholic clergy would look upon me with a degree of suspicion, and therefore I declined visiting their schools.

Did you visit many of the parish schools connected with the establishment?—I visited a number of parochial schools in connexion with the Kildare-place Society, which has been another strange coalition.

You have stated that the attendance in the schools is very much less than it had been; are you acquainted with the number given in the Appendix to the Report of the Kildare-place Society, which shews the number of scholars supposed to attend each school?—I know there is such a thing.

Can you inform us how much the present attendance falls short of the attendance there stated?—I should think, comparing the number I found with what was in the south on the former inspection, there is a diminution of one half.

Is not that observation confined to Munster alone?—Yes, it is.

Is it not probable, when the exertions of the present moment have abated, many that of the children will return?—Upon that subject I entertain a peculiar feeling; the leaning of my own mind is, that our system will be impracticable. I conceive that the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy is of a permanent nature; and the reasons why I conceive it to be so are these, that there is something of a conscientious feeling in their objection to the reading of the Scriptures; that there is something of personal irritation, and that they have committed themselves in their opposition in so pointed a manner, that nothing but great length of time will soften it down. They have, moreover, something like real danger to apprehend from the over zeal of certain individuals connected with our Society; I do not mean any one of the committee of Kildare-place, I speak of the patrons of schools in the country, that make a bad use of our principles, and pervert them to an object that was never intended by our Society. Some persons think, if the opposition be permanent, the peasantry of the country will act in disobedience of that power; I have no doubt as a Roman Catholic myself, from the information we have to act upon, that the peasantry will never be induced to break the bond which unites them to their clergy.

Are you aware that their opposition has not been successful in Ulster?—I am.

In what manner would you account for the Roman Catholic peasantry in Ulster not being led by those motives; does it not exhibit a practical proof, that it is possible the peasantry may take their own view of the matter?—In order to estimate the justness of the parallel now put to me, it will be necessary to know to what lengths the Roman Catholic clergy in Ulster have gone in their opposition to our system. They may be, for instance, more moderate, more liberal, or perhaps more inactive, than those in the south; but I am decidedly of opinion, that if the clergy in Ulster will have recourse to those powers with which their office invests them, the peasantry will never be induced to break the bond which unites

unites them to their pastors. The power of the Roman Catholic priesthood is, I may say, twofold, resulting both from that wholesome controul which a pastor should have over his flock, and also arising from a kind of blind obedience which the peasantry pay to the person of the priest. Armed with this twofold authority, he will always have a commanding influence over his flock.

Do you think the priests dislike that blind obedience?—I conceive some few individuals may be anxious to preserve it.

Do you think they are of opinion that the dissemination of education would diminish it?—I think such must be their opinion; but I also conceive that the majority are quite indifferent on the subject; for they must feel convinced, that while education tends to do away with the superstitious part of the people's obedience, it will only strengthen that which is wholesome and beneficial.

Do you not think it likely that the clergy are of opinion, as well as you, that that blind obedience would be lessened by a diffusion of education?—I should think so; it must have the effect of expanding and enlightening their minds, and superstition is quite inconsistent with enlightened knowledge.

Do you think that such portion of the Roman Catholic clergy who entertain that opinion are favourable to the diffusion of such education as would lessen that blind obedience?—No, I think not; but I have thought on this subject very maturely, and am convinced, that there is no body of men more anxious for education than they are, and I have been sorry to see the contrary charge made against them in public.

Do you conceive that the objections they make are objections rather to the particular system of education than to education in the abstract?—Clearly so; it is an objection to the mode, but not to education at large.

Is it your opinion that they are willing for such a system of education as would strengthen that blind obedience, but inimical to any that would produce a contrary result?—I do not think that has entered into their contemplation at all; they are always so sure of possessing sufficient controul over their own flock; they do not think about it. My opinion is, that that power will never be done away with, and I have seen the experiment tried in the county Cork, I have seen all the persuasion, all the influence of the landlord come in open collision with the parish priest, and my experience has been, that the power of the parish priest has been generally paramount.

Is it your impression that the Roman Catholic clergy in Ulster have exerted less influence over their flocks than the Roman Catholic clergy have done in Munster?—Yes, I have reason to believe so, and that might originate in this, that the Roman Catholic primate is friendly to the Society, and that may have had a considerable influence in the surrounding counties.

Appendix, N° 209.

Further Examination of Matthew Donelan, Esq.; Monday, 2d May 1825.

HAVE you been on a tour of inspection since you were last before the Commissioners?—I had not completed my tour of inspection when I was before the Commissioners on a former occasion.

In what part of the country?—Principally in the county of Wicklow.

Did you discover many deviations from the rules in the schools you inspected after you had been last before the Commissioners?—No, I did not discover many deviations, but I discovered one which was I think of a peculiar, and I will add, of a very dangerous nature in the school at Tinahely. After having inspected the school I had occasion to go back to it, to solicit the assistance of the master to procure for me a horse to proceed on my journey. On returning to the school, I found the master with all the children around him, teaching the church of England catechism, it being before the hour for breaking up. When I inspected the school, I asked him, whether he taught catechism, and he told me he taught it after the school hours; this was perfectly in accordance with our rules; but it appeared, that the moment I turned my back, he violated our laws; for when I remonstrated with him, he said he considered it was three o'clock; I then said, have you not got a watch, and upon his answering in the affirmative, I said, then take it out, and see what time it is; he took it out, and it was only half past two.

Was he teaching the catechism to any but church of England children?—He told me they were all of the church of England persuasion; I asked the various children what their religion was, all of them assured me that they were Protestants, but I do suspect (perhaps on very slight grounds indeed) that one or two, from the embarrassed manner in which they answered me, were not of that religion, and were ordered to say so, in order to save the master from the reprimand which they thought his conduct would bring down upon him.

Did you conceive they were Roman Catholics?—I did suspect it, from the embarrassed manner in which they answered me; but this is a mere suspicion, unsupported by any thing like proof.

Is the master at liberty, under the direction of the patron, to change the hours of school?—He is.

If the patron had directed that the school on that day should break up at two o'clock, would it have been a breach of rule, if the master should have broken up the school at that hour?—Certainly not.

Are not the rules then a dead letter?—I always so feel; and it has always been my habit to ask, as soon as I enter a school, at what hour does your school begin, and at what hour does it end, so as (as far as I can) to prevent an evasion of this kind.

Matthew Donelan,

Did you report this to the Society?—I did, and laid a very particular stress upon it, as I always do in cases of this kind.

By whom was the master of this school recommended?—I cannot say.

What gratuity had he received on any preceding year?—I think 5*l.*

Was he considered a good master?—I approved of him as a teacher; he was possessed of considerable talents and information.

Have the committee the power of superseding him?—No, they have not the absolute power of superseding him, but they have the power of withdrawing the gratuity from him, and all assistance from the school in case of his being continued as master contrary to their wishes.

What has been done?—He has received the same gratuity he had the last year; the only step they have taken, I believe, has been writing a letter to the patron, disapproving of the master's conduct.

Is not the 5*l.* a low class of gratuity?—It is; but it is the same he had the last year.

By whom have the gratuities been awarded?—They have been hitherto awarded by a committee, but latterly, I understand, it has been done by the office, and not by a committee.

What do you call the office?—I mean the persons under the immediate controul of Mr. Topham, the assistant secretary.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that the awarding the gratuities has not been at all under the consideration and controul of the committee?—I believe it is nominally under the controul of the committee, but that latterly they have been so overpowered by the multiplicity of business, that they have not been able to attend to it; I feel assured that if they had bestowed any serious consideration upon the subject, they would never have awarded some of the gratuities, as now appear in the list I hold in my hand, to some masters; this was furnished to me at my own request, previous to my leaving Dublin, conceiving there had been an injudicious awarding of the gratuities.

How many masters appear by that report, to have received gratuities against whom you reported, that they permitted deviations from the rules in the schools which they taught?—In the school at Villa, in the county of Tipperary, I reported that there was a deviation from the laws of the Society, inasmuch as I discovered books of a religious nature in it, but not containing, as far as I now recollect, any controversial matter, and there has been a gratuity of five pounds awarded to the master of that school.

State what the tracts are which did not contain controversy, but did contain religion?—I cannot state that without reference to my reports; they were not of a controversial nature, as far as I can speak with certainty upon a transaction that has happened many months.

Describe what they were; why do you call them tracts?—I cannot state at this length of time the precise names of them.

How did it appear that it was against the rules of the Kildare-place Society, that those books being not of a controversial but of a religious nature, should be in that school?—Because it is against the rules of the Kildare-street Society, that books of a controversial or religious nature should be in the school; we admit books merely moral but not religious.

Is your recollection sufficiently precise, to enable you to say these were not merely moral tracts but religious?—My recollection is distinctly, that they were religious; I have entered in my travelling book here (but I think that is incorrect) “no gratuity to master on account of deviations, in having controversial books in the school;” but I think they were not controversial, they were of a religious nature.

Were they of the same description as Methodist tracts?—I think of that nature.

What do you mean by the description of Methodist tracts?—If I can speak from a very vague recollection, they were some books edited or composed by Mrs. Hannah More; but I speak on a very vague recollection.

Were they different copies of the same tracts, or were there different tracts?—My recollection is, that they were different books, but not different copies of them.

Do you entertain any doubt that it was contrary to the rules of the Society to admit those books into that school?—I have no doubt it was a deviation, I have returned it as such.

Did the master know that that was a deviation?—I conceive it was his duty to know it, but I apprehend that the master was not aware that it was such.

Did you recommend to the committee not to grant a gratuity?—No, I never offer any recommendation on this subject, but I report the circumstances, and leave it to the judgment of the committee to determine whether that is a ground of objection or not.

Is not the 5*l.* a low scale of gratuity?—Yes, it is.

Is it not a proof that there is something the committee disapprove?—No, I do not think it is necessarily so.

Where the committee fully approve of a school, have you ever known them give so little?—Certainly, I have.

Was the qualification of the master such that he was entitled to more, if you had not found this deviation?—I think 5*l.* was a proper gratuity, even if there had existed no deviation from the laws of the Society.

Had he received a gratuity before?—No, he had never received any gratuity, as it appears by the book I hold in my hand, and it is very usual to begin with 3*l.* and to ascend gradually.

Do you think the lowness of the gratuity has no reference to a deviation from the rule?—Not the least reference whatever.

Is it the custom of the inspectors to recommend any deduction on account of a deviation, or to state the circumstance, and leave the inference to be drawn by the committee?—To leave the inference to be drawn by the committee, and I do not think that I ever recommended to the committee any particular gratuity save and except in the school at Lismore. Previous to my visit to that school, it had been the custom to give a greater gratuity to the masters than to mistresses; this I thought was highly prejudicial, as I conceived it had the effect of creating an idea abroad, that the education of females was altogether of minor importance in the eyes of the committee.

From whom did the tracts come?—It appeared to me that they came from the patron of the school, a lady.

It appears that there were eight schools in connection with the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, is this school one of them?—No, I never met with one of them.

Do you mean to state that the gratuities were awarded without the knowledge and approbation of the committee?—Certainly, I can say that the gratuities were awarded in a manner different from what they were the preceding year—then the inspectors were consulted in this case, I was not; but whether or not the reports made by their officers were laid before the committee, and the committee nominally gave their approbation of the gratuities, I cannot say.

May there not have been a real nomination by the committee, and a numerical drawing out by the office?—Yes, but I must give the committee credit for too much intelligence and knowledge, to suppose they made those awards uninfluenced by the opinion of others.

You conceive those awards to be such as no man of honour could have made?—I do not mean to say a man of honour could not have made those awards, but I think that men of intelligence, upon due consideration, might have made some of them, but not all.

Do you think they are such as the committee would have made, being aware of your reports?—Certainly not, if they bore in their recollection the nature of my report.

Were you not, in point of fact, out of town at the time the committee or any body else made those awards?—I was out of town at the time those awards were made.

Do not you think that circumstance a natural mode of accounting for your not having been consulted upon this?—Yes, and I have been told, and do believe, that this is the reason why it has devolved upon the office; for formerly they used to wait for the inspector's return, and the consequence then was, that it became a scene of hurry and confusion throughout the whole of the office, and to avoid this hurry, they began transmitting the gratuities on this occasion previous to our arrival in town.

Have you been always consulted on the subject of gratuities since you have been an inspector?—I have only gone two tours; and on the former tour I was consulted on the subject.

Do you know whether the other inspectors were consulted?—I know they were.

Before you go upon a tour of inspection, are you furnished with the lists of the schools in connection with the Society in the district you are going to?—Yes, I am.

Do you find those lists accurate?—I do not find them accurate in some respects.

In what respects?—Only as to names.

Do you find that they include all the schools in connection with the Society in the district?—Yes; as far as I can form an opinion, I conceive they are very accurate.

Did you ever find any schools in connection with the Society, in the districts you have gone to, that have been omitted in the lists?—No, I do not think I have.

Have you ever found any included in the lists, that were not in connection with the Society?—Yes; I have found that some schools which had declined connection were still included.

Has that happened on many occasions?—I should think on very few occasions indeed.

Have you been able to discover in that case how that must have happened?—No; but I do believe it was accidental.

In the report of the Society, dated the 21st of January 1825, it is stated, that the number of schools connected with the Society may fairly be stated at 1,490, in which there are situated in Ulster, about 640; in Leinster, about 320; in Connaught, about 230; and in Munster, about 300. Do you think that that statement of numbers is precisely accurate?—I should think, as far as it relates to that district of the country in which I have travelled, it is correct.

How do you then account for the number in each province being a decimal number, without any fraction; and that in Munster there is the precise number of 300?—I cannot account for that. I should conceive it is accidental; that it is a fortuitous coincidence of circumstances.

Do you know how the accounts are made up, and why a certain number is not stated?—Because they cannot trace exactly in their books the very precise and exact number of the schools.

Do the masters in all the schools in that list receive aid from the Society?—No, they do not, because we do not give a fixed salary to the master; we only grant a gratuity in proportion to the merit of the master: and many persons are disqualified from want of due proficiency in the children, or want of attention on their own parts.

Are any schools included in the list, in which it is known that the masters are wholly maintained by other funds than those which may be derived from the Kildare-place Society?—There are many instances of that kind.

Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.
2 May 1825.

In that case, what aid do the schools derive from the Kildare-place Society?—They may derive aid towards building, or in the shape of school requisites.

Do you believe that there are many schools in this list of 1,490, which derive only school requisites?—I am sure there are many.

Can you form an estimate as to the proportion?—I cannot.

Does it amount to a hundred?—I should think considerably more than a hundred.

Is not the grant of school requisites to the amount of ten or eleven pounds?—It may be 10*l.* or it may be a great deal less. I have seen requisites to the amount of five or six or seven pounds. It is generally remarked to us, by letters in the book I hold in my hand, there are requisites to the amount of 3*l.* 9*s.* 4*d.* 6*l.* 9*s.* 5*d.* and so on.

In those schools that receive only the small sums for school requisites, do you find that the authority of the Society is as great as where they maintain the school in a greater degree; and that the persons feel themselves equally bound to comply with the rules of the Society?—Certainly not.

In point of fact, do you find the deviations from the rules more frequent in those schools that receive a small proportion of aid, than where they receive greater assistance?—I never made that observation.

Is it not a fact, that the schools that receive aid, whether in school requisites or any other form, undertake to conform to the rules of the Kildare-place Society?—They must undertake to conform to our rules; and most of our inspectors take as much trouble with them as if they received 1,000*l.* of pecuniary aid.

Has not the master of every such school an equal chance of obtaining a gratuity, if he deserves it?—Yes, and may receive the highest gratuity.

Do you believe there are any schools included in this list, to which the grants of school requisites have not been gratuitous, but in which the value of the school requisites has been wholly or in part paid?—I should think not; I believe if the committee knew of that, it would not be permitted.

Do the schools receive the grants of school requisites annually?—They do, if they require them. One of the questions put to the inspectors is, what funds are there in the school, and what requisites will they require till the next inspector comes round. We report what is wanting; then if the committee approve of our report, they are delivered to a carrier, and transmitted to the school.

Have you any means of knowing whether the list of schools is greater or less than the real number in connection with the Society?—I believe the number of the schools is perfectly correct; but speaking from my own individual experience of what I have seen in the south of Ireland, I should conceive the return of the number of children has not been strictly accurate.

In what way are the lists made out which are returned to the Society as containing the number of children in attendance on the schools?—I understand the returns of the number of children educated last year in our schools, have been made up upon the state of the schools previous to the opposition. Seeing that the Kildare-place Society had returned a hundred thousand children as educated in their schools (which is a return of twenty-one thousand beyond the number educated last year), I conceived that there must be some mistake; for I had come to a conclusion, that in the south of Ireland there had been a diminution of one half. I also understood from Mr. Daly, my brother inspector, that he had returned from a very minute calculation, a diminution of one third. I had also communication with the other inspectors, and they never mentioned to me any thing like an increase. I was, therefore, at a loss to account for the increase of twenty-one thousand children returned in our last report. I waited upon Mr. Jackson, and told him that I conceived there was some mistake, and that I was quite aware it was perfectly unintentional on the part of the committee; but that I conceived the calculation was made upon a fallacious principle; and accordingly I found, on speaking to Mr. Jackson and Mr. Scott, that the calculation was made up from the number of children inrolled and existing in the schools previous to the opposition.

Do you mean that they took the number which were in the schools at the commencement of the year, and added to that number any children who joined the schools during the year, without deducting any who had withdrawn?—The way in which I believe it was done, is this; the inspectors are asked three distinct questions; how many children are on the books; how many in attendance, at the time of the inspection; and the average attendance. I conceive the Kildare-place Society have returned the numbers on the books; these may have been formed previously to the opposition; and although afterwards (in May perhaps), the children were withdrawn, they have still returned the number existing antecedent to that opposition.

How would that account for the increase?—Because they took the numbers as they appeared when the opposition did not exist, and did not allow for the number withdrawn by virtue of that opposition. In the south of Ireland, things were going on without the slightest interruption in the beginning of last year, therefore there may appear on the books of those schools an increased number attending the schools at that antecedent and tranquil period.

Suppose a school in January last, contained one hundred children, and into that school, between that and May, there came an additional number of twenty; and that there were withdrawn, owing to the opposition, ninety, would it appear that there had been an increase of twenty?—I conceive it would; and I can produce an instance which directly goes to support my opinion. In the school at Carrignavar which I inspected, there were one hundred and eighty-two on the books when I inspected it. I think there were fourteen present, and I returned an average attendance of forty. I inspected the school in June last.

Since

Examination of

Since that, I have recently seen Mr. M'Carthy, the patron, and I asked him whether the children had returned, they having been withdrawn in May last, and he told me they had not returned from the time I saw the school up to that period. Now the number returned by the Kildare-place Society was not fourteen, the absolute number present, nor the average attendance; but they have returned one hundred and eighty-two as educated in that school. I do acquit them of any thing like intentional deceit; they are quite incapable of any such thing; but I conceive it has directly the effect of misleading the public.

Where is Carrignavar?—It is close to Cork.

Did Mr. M'Carthy state that the children had returned generally in the county of Cork?—He stated, that he believed they had not returned generally; on my having mentioned to Mr. Jackson that such was my opinion, both he and Mr. Scott informed me also, that the children were returning generally; and as a proof of this, Mr. Jackson produced to me a document, a return from the Cork Hibernian Society, in which I think on twelve schools there was an increase of 126 children.

Is the Kildare-place Society at all in the habit of relying on the report of the Cork Hibernian Society?—They are sometimes in the habit of so doing; they look to their reports as a further and additional source of information to others they may already possess.

Do you mean that 126 have returned of children who had been withdrawn?—Yes; and Mr. Scott, whom I had a long conversation with, also told me that at a school I had inspected, called Hawlboline, they had a communication from the master and the patron of the school, in which they stated, that the children were generally returning.

Is Mr. M'Carthy a gentleman resident in Cork?—He is resident in the county of Cork.

Have you any document by which you would be enabled to state whether there is any and what difference between the number returned as belonging to the school, and the average number in attendance for any number of months prior to your inspection?—I have not; but if I am right in supposing that the number of children at the beginning of this year was the same as it was at the conclusion of the last year, I could make a calculation. I find in one school there were 166 on the books at the close of the last year, and when I inspected it, there were not 21 present, and not an average attendance of 30. I cannot tell, unless I saw the report, what is the number returned by the Kildare-place Society; but if they have returned 166, I think that is not a proper return; in the same manner, in Brickfield school, there were 103 last year on the books, and when I inspected it, there were not, I think, 25, with an average attendance of 30; and I suspect here, that on looking at the reports of the Kildare-place Society, it will appear, that there were 100 at least receiving the benefits of education in this last mentioned school.

Are any of those schools in connection with the Hibernian Society?—They are all in connection with the Cork Society.

Why do you suspect that the Kildare-place Society returned larger numbers than they ought?—Because I found they had returned on that erroneous principle at Carrignavar, and I should think that the same principle which guided them at Carrignavar, namely taking the number on the books, would guide them on this occasion also.

Are there quarterly returns made to the Societies of the number of children on the lists?—There are no quarterly returns made, as far as I can learn, to the Kildare-place Society; I believe they formerly used to get returns from the masters, and from the patrons, but I believe that lately they have been discontinued.

If a child attend at the school in the month of January and ceases to attend in February, and suppose another child attends in the month of May and for the month of May only, so that those two children had never attended that same school together, would their names appear in the list, and would they both be counted in the numeration of the schools?—That would depend upon the time at which the inspector visited the school; if it was previous to the inspector's report, they would be returned; but any child who comes into the school subsequent to the visit of the inspector would not be returned till the next year.

It may happen, that there are many children in attendance who are not returned at all?—Yes; there might be some come in after I visited the school; all prior to my visit were returned by me in one shape or another.

Is there any return made of the number in the schools, but by the inspectors?—I believe not, except on answering the queries previous to any person obtaining pecuniary aid; we return the numbers on the books, the number in attendance, and the average attendance.

The Society take credit for having 1,490 schools, in which they say there are about 100,000 scholars, that would give an average of 68 to each school; have you any grounds for forming an opinion, whether upon the whole of Ireland 68 is a greater average than is consistent with the fact?—I should conceive 68 is a very high average. When I travelled in the western part of Ireland, things were going on smoothly, the Roman Catholic clergymen did not oppose the system, and even under those circumstances 68 was a high average, but still more high for the south of Ireland, where the opposition was raging so violently; I should conceive, in the south of Ireland, and Cork especially, they did not average 35 when I was in that country.

Have you been in many schools where there were more than one hundred in attendance?—I think I was in five or six; I was present at a very large school at Craig, under a Roman Catholic clergyman, and another at Lismore.

How many were there at Lismore?—I cannot say, but they were very numerous.

Did you, on your late tour, visit any schools in the county of Tipperary, in connection with with Dr. Armstrong, as the partron?—No, I do not see any return of a school under his patronage.

Examination of

Did you visit any school in the county of Tipperary, in which there were upwards of one hundred children?—Certainly not; the highest school I see in my book is Clonmel; there were one hundred and seventy-eight on the books, and ninety-eight present, when inspected by my predecessor.

Have you any opportunity of knowing whether the children have returned to the schools in any other part of Ireland than those you have alluded to?—No; I have had communication with the other inspectors, and I never heard from them of their having met with an increase; but I must add, that I never put the question precisely to any of them, except Mr. Malachy Daly, who told me he found a decrease in part of the north.

Have you any reason to believe the opposition to the schools is at all relaxed on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy?—I conceive decidedly not; on the contrary, I have reason to suppose the reverse, for I have these facts to support my assertion; that when I travelled into the diocese of Kildare, Dr. Doyle, and his clergy, did approve, or at least tolerate the principle of the Kildare-place Society, and they have since withdrawn their approbation of it; and in the neighbourhood of Waterford, or rather near Dungarvan, I inspected a school of Mr. Humbles, and in looking over the visitor's book, I saw the approbation, and the very warm approbation, of two Roman Catholic clergymen, and I also discovered that the Roman Catholic Bishop of Waterford was a subscriber to that school, and that, too, knowing it to be a school in connection with the Kildare-place Society; but when I went to Waterford, immediately subsequent to the meeting which took place under Captain Gordon and Mr. Noel, Dr. Kelly was very much opposed to the principles of the Kildare-place Society.

It appears that there are ninety-five schools in connection with the Munster Hibernian School Society, and also with the Kildare-place Society; if the patrons and managers of those schools were called upon to decide to which of those two Societies they would continue to belong, on the supposition that they could not continue in connection with both, to what decision do you think they would come?—I think they would come to the determination of continuing to belong to the Kildare-place Society.

Although that led to their forfeiting their connection with the Munster Hibernian Society?—Yes.

Do you think the Cork Society would prefer being affiliated to the Kildare-place Society, or to the London Hibernian Society, on the supposition of its not being permitted to them to continue in connection with both?—I think that would be a subject of the very greatest controversy amongst the members of the committee of the Cork Society; there are many members that would prefer the Kildare-place Society; but I know there are many of them that would prefer being connected with the London Hibernian Society.

Which way do you think it would be carried?—I cannot say; when I was in Cork, I mentioned to the members of that committee, that the name of the Munster Hibernian Society was much objected to by the Roman Catholic clergymen, inasmuch as they conceive them to be a branch of the London Hibernian Society; I proposed that they should drop the name of the Hibernian, and call themselves the Munster Society simply; I was present at the discussion, and one of the most influential men in the county of Cork declared, if they even dropped the name, he would cease to belong to the society; I could not form an opinion to which side the majority inclined.

There are 245 schools in connection with the London Hibernian Society, and the Kildare-place Society; if the patrons of those schools were called upon to decide to which of the two they would continue to belong, on the principle that they could not continue connected with both, what decision do you think they would come to?—I think, upon reflection, they would cling to the Kildare-place Society.

Do you mean in all cases?—In the majority of cases.

Do you speak of all parts of Ireland?—No.

From what parts of Ireland do you make this deduction?—I speak of Connaught and Munster; I think, if the connection is to be struck off between the Kildare-place Society and the London Hibernian Society, the latter must fall to the ground, either for want of funds, or children to attend their schools; and I think that the patrons of the various schools would adhere to that system that is most likely to be efficient and permanent from having the grant from Parliament.

You conceive it is a mere matter of money?—Yes, I conceive it is so in a great measure, and that there will be in a short time a complete merging of the London Hibernian Society in that of the Kildare-place Society; the latter will always be paramount, from having at its command such ample funds.

There are 30 schools in connection with the Baptist Society and also the Kildare-place Society; which do you think the patrons of those schools would prefer belonging to?—I cannot speak of that; for I met with only four Baptist schools in the course of my progress.

Do you know any of the schools which are in connection with the Wesleyan Society?—I never met with any.

There is one school in connection with the Kildare-place Society and also with the Moravians, do you know where that is situated?—I do not.

If the Kildare-place Society were called upon to return a list of the average attendance of the children in different schools, could they make such a return?—They could, because every inspector

69
Examination of
Matthew Donelan,
Esq.

inspector returns the average number in his reports, and by looking to these reports, such a return could easily be made out.

Could they also return the number of children found in the schools by the respective visitors?—Yes, they could; but with reference to the returns of the average number in each school, we sometimes are at a very great loss to make accurate returns, owing to the want of system on the part of the masters; they frequently do not keep regular accounts, which obliges us to depend on their mere unsupported assertion, upon a point where it is their interest to exaggerate, in order to convey an idea to us and the committee, that they have a school flourishing, at least in number; the numbers present never can admit of any doubt, for we can count them ourselves.

Are there many schools connected with the Society, that support a master and an usher, or two masters?—I should think not many.

What number of children in attendance, would require the attendance of a master and an usher?—I conceive, to do justice to all the children, the number of eighty certainly requires two, but a great deal would depend upon the turn of mind of the master; if he was a man of system, and of method, he might do a great deal more, particularly if he introduced the improved system of teaching as recommended by our Society.

Is it found in the county of Cork, that monitors can be used with advantage?—With the greatest possible advantage, if they are well regulated and well managed, but the great difficulty and the great abuse to which that system of monitors is liable is, that very frequently there are persons appointed monitors who are not competent to the task of instruction.

Do not the country people object to the system of monitors?—Yes, most strongly, on this ground; first, because they conceive that one child is incompetent to teach another; and secondly, that the person who teaches another, can derive no instruction himself; they think his time is occupied exclusively with teaching.

Would a school that is not taught by monitors, that amounted to one hundred children, require the assistance of a master and usher, or two masters?—Certainly.

How many do you think is the utmost that one master could successfully teach without the assistance of monitors?—I do not think a person can do justice to more than fifty.

With the assistance of monitors, would one master be able to manage five hundred children?—I doubt that; because there are some branches to which monitors would be incompetent, for instance arithmetic; it would therefore require the instruction of a master for that branch of learning.

Supposing a school attended by boys in sufficient numbers to require the superintendence of more than one master, in what way would it be best to arrange the matter, should they have co-ordinate authority, or be in the situation of master and usher?—I should conceive as master and usher.

Describe in what manner you think their duties would be most efficiently executed?—I conceive the most effectual way would be by a division of labour; that the master should devote his attention to the higher branches of education, such as arithmetic, writing, and instruction of persons destined to be monitors, and that the usher should teach the lower classes of children in reading and spelling, and perhaps the elementary parts of arithmetic.

Do you think that persons in this situation, to act under strict rules and sufficient superintendence, could go on harmoniously together, though they might differ in religion?—I myself should entertain an opinion that such an arrangement might perhaps create collision.

In what way would that collision arise?—In occasional ebullitions of party spirit, perhaps sometimes of a religious dislike to each other.

Do you think that would arise if the children were not taught the doctrines of their several religions in the schools of general instruction?—I think there might still be danger of it.

Do you think if any description of schools were established that received the cordial support of the Roman Catholic body, they would, in most parts of Ireland, be very fully attended?—I am sure numerously; I hardly could have conceived the desire for education to be so great in every quarter, as it has shewn itself latterly.

If, for instance, in each parish one school was erected in whatever appeared to be the most convenient spot for attendance, do you think that in almost all cases the attendance would exceed one hundred?—I have no doubt that in many cases the attendance would exceed hundreds. I am sure there would be three hundred in some parts of Connaught.

Are there many parishes in which, if the most favourable situation were chosen, the attendance would be less than one hundred?—I think that in any parish where a school was established in perfect accordance with the principles of every religious sect, the attendance would be greater than one hundred.

Do you know a book called "The Impartial History of Ireland?"—I never saw it.

You went the western tour in the year 1823?—I did.

Did you find the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society, much opposed by the Roman Catholic clergy?—They were almost uniformly opposed previous to my having gone to the west of Ireland; but I think as soon as the Roman Catholic clergy understood fairly the principles of the Kildare-place Society, the opposition was much diminished, and my success in explaining the laws of the Kildare-place Society, exceeded my most sanguine expectations.

What was the error under which the priests laboured with respect to the rules of the Kildare-place

Examination of

Kildare-place Society?—It appeared to me, that the error under which they laboured was principally this, that they considered the Scriptures were made a school book, and that the Society insisted on the indiscriminate reading of it from the beginning to the end; but when I explained to them that it was not to be made a school book from which children were to be taught to read or to spell, but was only to be read by those children who had attained a suitable proficiency in reading, and to be read with proper respect and solemnity, and that we allowed the patron to select what portions he conceived suited to the capacities of the children, they have on many occasions desisted from their opposition.

Were the occasions on which they desisted from their opposition, those on which the Roman Catholic clergy were themselves the patrons of the schools?—I should think not; for if the patrons of those schools were Roman Catholic clergymen, they could not, of course, have disapproved of our principles.

Were they cases in which the masters were Roman Catholics?—I cannot say that, for I never ask any question of the kind; but I conceive that Roman Catholic clergymen would object, and have on many occasions decidedly objected, to intrusting the reading of the Scriptures to a Protestant master.

Do you conceive that any cases with respect to which their opposition was relaxed, were cases in which Roman Catholics were the masters?—I would, arguing from probabilities, say that some of them must have been Roman Catholics, though I do not know it from my own knowledge.

Would the explanation tend to satisfy them, unless the masters were Roman Catholics?—I think in general they would not consent to it.

Was there as much violence and opposition at that time in the west of Ireland, as you found last year in the south?—No, although the opposition was extremely violent, it did not rage to the excess of that which prevailed in the south.

Did you complain of the opposition in the west, or speak of it as having been extremely violent?—I did.

That was in the year 1823?—Yes, but each day as I was advancing on my tour, I conceived that that violence was abating by the Roman Catholic clergy understanding the true principles of the Kildare-place Society.

Do you mean by allowing the patron to point out the particular parts of the Testament to be read, and not allowing the Testament to be read as a school book?—Yes, and seeing (which gave them great confidence) a Roman Catholic coming down to inspect for the Society.

Have not the Society issued some instructions to their inspectors since that period, with respect to the use of the Testament as a school book, and on other points?—They have.

According to those instructions, is it not allowable to use the Testament as a common school book, out of which children may be taught to read or spell?—According to that, it is not only allowable, but it remains optional with the patron of the school whether he will use it as such or not; the committee of the Kildare-place Society adding, that they do not recommend it should be used for this purpose.

Did not one of the inspectors report the practice in some particular school?—He did; it was Mr. Malachy Daly.

Was he not reprimanded for so doing?—I do not know that he was, exactly, reprimanded, but the committee expressed their disapprobation at his having interfered with the internal regulations of the school.

Then the principles of the Kildare-place Society, with respect to the use of the Testament, may be so applied, as to render the school incompatible with the feelings or discipline of the Roman Catholic church?—Yes, I conceive they may be so applied as to interfere with the discipline of the Roman Catholic church; but it does not follow, ex necessitate, that such should be the case. The Roman Catholic clergy consider it highly unadvisable that the Testament should be used as a school-book.

The instructions rather recommend than disapprove of the practice of committing the Testament to memory, do they not?—The Kildare-place Society disapprove of the practice of making it a school-book, but do not disapprove of committing it to memory.

The words of the instructions are these: "Some think the only or best proof of the Scriptures having been read, or effectually read in schools, is to be obtained by obliging the students to commit certain portions of them to memory; this, however, the Society does not require, although many of its members approve of the practice?"—With regard to committing the Scriptures to memory, I know they do rather approve of it, as being the surest evidence of their having been read; but I think it remains to be considered whether the committing the Scriptures to memory, does by itself constitute it a school book or not.

The committee in its instructions state, "that the children shall be made acquainted with the principles of the Christian religion by the reading of the Holy Scriptures;" do you consider it consistent with the doctrine or discipline of the Roman Catholic church to hold, that children are to be made acquainted with the principles of the Christian religion through the Testament, independent of instructions derived from their pastors?—I conceive it is incompatible with the discipline of the Roman Catholic church to maintain that the Scriptures by themselves, independent of note or comment, unaccompanied by the instructions of their pastors or articles of faith, are a guide to salvation.

Do you know whether those instructions have called forth any particular observations from the Roman Catholic hierarchy?—I cannot speak from knowledge that they have.

Do you conceive that the efforts of the London Hibernian Society, place the Roman Catholic Catholic religion in any real danger in Ireland?—No; if I understand by the question the religion at large, I certainly do conceive that it stands on too solid a basis to be shaken, much less overthrown, by efforts of that kind; but if it refers to the endangering the religion of individuals, I am very sure it has had that effect.

To what extent do you understand it has gone?—I was told by a Protestant clergyman lately, that in his parish there were 100 converts made by that Society; but this I state merely from report.

Do you believe that report or not?—I believe it; I have no reason to doubt it; he is a man of veracity.

What is the parish?—It is in the north of Ireland.

Did you understand those instances of conversion to be of children or of adults?—Of adults, I understood; but I did not ask the question.

Do you not think that a system, which might by possibility effect the conversion of a hundred in one parish might become extremely dangerous to the Roman Catholic religion through the country?—No, because I conceive that very often those alleged transitions are not sincere conversions of the heart; I may perhaps be wrong, but I have known instances where a person has said that he had become a convert to the Protestant faith, under the London Hibernian Society, who has afterwards returned again to the Roman Catholic church.

Have you known many instances of conversion from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant faith?—I have known very few instances of the kind; one however I now recollect. After I had inspected a school in the county of Westmeath, the master followed me out, I was obliged to ask him what religion he was, he said, "Sir, I was a Roman Catholic, but I am now become a Protestant from reading the Scriptures." Another took place in our model school in Dublin; an assistant in a school in the Queen's County had come up to town for the purpose of being trained, when he returned to his own county he professed himself a Protestant, but I am sure there was no interference directly or indirectly with him while at the model school.

To what do you attribute his change of sentiment?—I have no reason to doubt its being a sincere conversion in that instance, nor in the instance I have before stated.

Do you conceive that in those instances, it is the reading of the Scriptures which is the proximate cause of the change of opinion?—It is generally the alleged cause in those cases.

Are you acquainted in a general way with the county of Galway?—Very generally.

Do you know of any conversions there?—No.

Are you acquainted with Mayo?—Yes.

Do you know of any conversions there?—No.

Are you acquainted with Sligo?—Yes, but I do not know Sligo very well; I was never there but once in my life.

In the last report of the Kildare-place Society it is stated, "your committee are happy to learn from the reports of your inspectors and other correspondence, that in several instances in which the opposition to the schools was at first successful in withdrawing the children from attendance at your schools, they have already very generally returned to them, or are doing so every day where the schools have been kept perseveringly open;" do your reports contain any thing which leads to that conclusion?—Quite the reverse; if I were to speak from my own personal knowledge, I should say, that directly the reverse of that was the fact.

Have you had any conversation with any of your brother inspectors, so as to know what is the result of the information they have acquired on this subject?—I had an intimate communication with Mr. Malachy Daly, and he is of the same opinion with me; viz. that the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy will be ultimately triumphant.

Was not the opposition principally in the south?—I believe it was tolerably general; but it prevailed most in the south.

During the last months of the last year?—Yes.

You went on the southern tour?—I did.

Are you acquainted much with the general state of education amongst the poor in Connaught?—Not very particularly; I know something of it.

Do you think there is at present a deficiency of schools in that part of Ireland?—No; I think the number may perhaps be sufficient; but I am equally confident that they do not carry into effect the beneficial results to be derived from education, because they want convenient school-houses, proper school requisites, and I think also competent masters; I think every parish perhaps has one or two occasional, or as they are called, hedge schools.

Are not those in general pay schools?—I believe they are almost entirely.

Do you conceive that any considerable number of the youth of the Roman Catholic persuasion of the lower orders in Connaught are now destitute of education?—Not of education altogether; I think more or less they partake of some degree of education; but in a very bad and imperfect degree, so much so perhaps as to render it a nullity, owing to the want of a well regulated system of education in many of the schools, and the want of funds to support them in a proper manner.

Do you think any number of Protestants are destitute of education?—I conceive every Protestant in the south of Ireland has very adequate means of receiving a very good and a well regulated education.

What is your opinion generally as to the disposition of the Roman Catholic clergy with respect to education?—I do conscientiously believe that almost every Roman Catholic clergyman clergyman is sincerely an advocate for education in the abstract; and that what they object to, is to the terms and conditions on which that education is to be conveyed to the people at large. They conceive that at present, education is conducted in a manner hostile to their religion.

Do you conceive they would be desirous to afford general religious instruction to the people?—I am sure they would be most anxious for it, because it is a duty which they owe both to man and to God. To God they owe this duty, as the guides and spiritual directors of those committed to their charge, and they owe it to men inasmuch as it must tend to promote the welfare and general morality of their country.

What degree of religious instruction would they afford to the children, if it were left under their own controul?—I think they would give religious instruction as generally as was consistent with the faith and discipline of their church; and I know there was a proposition made by the Roman Catholics to substitute the Evangelical Life of our Saviour, for the Testament itself; this was very properly rejected by the Kildare-place Society, as there are passages in the notes which are exceptionable to Protestants.

Was it not their proposal that it should be used without any notes?—Yes, it was, upon recollection, as is now stated.

Have you known any Roman Catholic schools entirely under the superintendence of Catholics, in which the Scriptures have been introduced?—I have; and when I was at Donoughmore near Cork, three Roman Catholic clergymen waited upon me, and one of them used this expression, that he wished a Testament was to be found in the cabin of every peasant.

Is not that gentleman very singular in his opinions?—Yes, he certainly is.

Is it not perfectly known that they disapprove the general use of the Testament in schools?—Yes, without notes or comment; and as a school book they disapprove of it.

You stated when you were here on a former day, that the lower orders of the people were generally ignorant that the Bible existed?—Some of them.

Do you conceive any objection is made on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy to persons of information reading the Testament?—Decidedly not, but on the contrary; with regard to the well informed part of their community, they recommend it very strongly under certain restrictions.

You mentioned on a former day, that the Roman Catholic clergy had recourse to very violent acts in opposing the schools in connexion with the Kildare-place Society; such as cursing people, refusing to church women after child-birth, and refusing the rites of the church; have many instances of that conduct come to your own knowledge?—No; I must say, that no instance of the kind has come to my own personal knowledge; and I never, to my recollection, stated any such fact to the Commissioners. I stated that I had been told of it; sometimes by the patrons, sometimes by the masters, and sometimes jointly by both; but I again repeat, that I did not know instances of this kind myself.

Have many such instances been mentioned to you?—No; few instances have been mentioned to me that were well authenticated even by the report of others. If I am to believe the vague and perhaps unthinking reports of the world, I should be inclined perhaps to think it were general.

Can you remember how many instances you have heard?—I should conceive I did not hear of such facts, that I could say were very well authenticated in more than six or seven instances; and I beg leave to say, that in every church and in every persuasion there will be found persons who are indiscreet; persons who will be enthusiasts.

Would you attribute it to the Roman Catholic clergy as a general practice?—Certainly not.

If the children refused to withdraw themselves from the schools on a first warning, what measures would they have recourse to?—I conceive that the respectable part of them would have only recourse to persuasion and exhortation; pointing out to the people, as their pastors, the danger to which they exposed themselves in continuing at those schools.

You yourself attend Roman Catholic places of worship?—I do.

Have you ever heard Roman Catholic priests curse parents for sending their children to the schools?—Never.

Have you ever witnessed the practice of any acts of violence against persons for sending their children to the schools?—Never, except in the way of exhortation; but that certainly done in the strongest manner they can possibly do. I stated one instance on a former occasion, I believe, in which a Roman Catholic prelate had spoken of me personally while in the chapel; but that was merely disapproving of my holding the office I do at present.

Appendix, N° 210.

Examination of William Vicars Griffith, Esquire, on Oath;
Thursday, 20th January 1825.

W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

YOU are one of the inspectors engaged in the service of the Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland?—I am.

How long have you held that situation?—I do not recollect the precise period, but it must be about three years, as I have made three inspections.

Through

Through what parts of Ireland did those inspections lie?—First through the south, a very extended tour; next through the north-west, and lastly through the south-west.

When did you complete the last tour of inspection?—On the 16th of this month.

How long were you engaged in it?—From the 1st of June till the 16th of January.

Mention the counties you passed through in the course of that inspection?—Kildare, King's County, part of Tipperary, Clare, Galway, Limerick, Kerry, part of Kilkenny, Queen's County, a very small part of Cork, a small part of Kilkenny and Galway.

You mean that the other parts of those counties fell to the lot of other inspectors?—I do.

What number of schools did you visit altogether in the course of your last tour?—I cannot say the precise number; there are some houses including male and female schools, and I was obliged to report of those in duplicate, but on my list there were 231 schools in connection with the Society; and besides those I should think I visited about 50 not in connection, making altogether about 280.

Had you ever visited any of those schools connected with the Society before?—I had.

How many of the 231 had you ever visited before?—I cannot form a correct opinion.

Had you visited 50 or 100 of them before?—I should think at least 100.

Did it strike you that such of them as you had visited before were in a more or less flourishing condition upon the occasion of this second visit than on the preceding visit?—Certainly less flourishing in point of number.

In point of discipline and appearance were they more or less flourishing?—They were improved; and if there had been a larger number in attendance, this would have been more striking. The school-room, and the appearance of order, were in most instances greater than I observed before.

Have you any memoranda that enable you to say what number of children altogether were in the 231 schools you visited?—I have abstracts from my reports, which I could refer to very easily.

[The witness afterwards stated that the average attendance in each school was 39.]

Were there a greater number upon the rolls of the schools than you found in actual attendance?—Always a greater number; in some places there were no rolls, but still I made a point to inquire minutely as to the number that should be on the roll, if there was one, so that between the information I acquired in that way, and my reference to the actual rolls, there was always a greater number than in actual attendance, except in one or two cases where my visit was expected, and there was a crowd collected, but I think that only occurred in one or two instances, and I discouraged it.

You have made three tours of inspection, the first in 1822, the next in 1823, and the other in 1824?—Yes, extending a little beyond 1824.

Will you repeat again for our information, through what part of Ireland the tour of 1823 extended?—I went first to Kildare, Meath, Cavan; I believe Fermanagh, Donegal, Tyrone, Londonderry, Antrim, a small part of Armagh and Monaghan.

Describe your tour in the year 1822?—Kildare, Queen's County, King's County, Clare, Limerick, Kerry, Cork, Tipperary, Kilkenny, Wexford, Carlow and Wicklow, was part of my route, but I had not time to finish it.

In the course of your tour in the year 1822, had you occasion to observe any or much opposition to the principles of the Society?—There was some opposition.

Can you now recollect in what counties principally it existed?—On that tour, as the counties are arranged, I think the opposition commenced in Clare; I believe the first of any decided opposition was in that county.

That was in the year 1822?—Yes; it is impossible at this distance of time that I should recollect accurately.

Was the opposition in Clare considerable at that time?—Rather so.

Was it general, or confined to particular schools?—It was more confined to particular schools than general.

Were there any schools in Clare connected with the Society in 1822, in which there was no opposition given to the principle?—I should think there must have been; but if I had been aware of these questions, I should have brought memoranda which would have enabled me to answer them with precision.

We are only asking your general recollection upon these points?—In Clare, the opposition was greater to schools that were not in connection with our Society, but in connection with other Societies.

Do you mean the London Hibernian Society?—I mean more particularly the Baptist Society.

Were there many Baptist schools in Clare?—I could not say how many there were in that year, but they are considerable now.

What were there in the proceedings of that society that called forth that opposition?—It may be invidious in me to say so, but I think it was much owing to the conduct of their inspectors.

What was there in the conduct of those inspectors, that appeared to you to be calculated to give rise to that opposition?—I understood them to be persons of very decided religious opinions, opinions generally considered very much opposed to Roman Catholics; and in many cases I have been given to understand (although I have no actual knowledge of it myself), that they preached and endeavoured to make converts. Passing through the country of the people, I do not remember to have heard of any instances of their tampering with the children, but I have heard of their adopting a line of argument in their address to the people that might have that effect.

Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq
20 Jan. 1825.

Do you think that the Roman Catholic clergy drew a distinction between the Kildare-place Society's schools and the Baptist Society's schools?—Yes, they drew a strong line of distinction when the societies were not confounded.

The question was not, whether the distinction was not always known to them, but whether the Kildare-place Society may not have suffered from being connected with those societies?—I have been always of opinion that they have been injured by that circumstance.

Do you know whether any of the Baptist Society's schools are in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes; they are in the county of Clare.

Do you think that has tended to bring the Kildare-place Society into bad repute?—Yes.

Would you wish to see those schools put to their option to belong to one or the other of those societies, but not both?—Anxiously; and it is my decided impression, it would be for the benefit of the country generally.

Which would the schools prefer?—The Kildare-place Society's schools, if the society were able to meet the wants of their schools, which I conceive they are not.

In what respect are they not able to meet the wants of their schools?—In respect of salary.

Is it your impression that the Baptist Society pay better than the Kildare-place Society?—It is.

What amount of income have you known the master of a Baptist school to be able to realize?—I believe I have seen 16*l.* a year, and perhaps more, as salary.

It is given according to the number of children he is able to produce that are able to pass examination?—The salary, I think, in the Baptist Society, is often given independently of that circumstance; the general rule is according to the number and proficiency.

Is not the general rule this, that the master should receive 1*s.* a quarter for each child present on each inspection?—I believe it is.

Can you inform us, whether the London Hibernian Society is as unpopular in the county of Clare at present as the Baptist Society?—Not so unpopular, but next to it in that respect.

Do you think the distinction is taken with sufficient accuracy between the two societies, or are they confounded together?—I conceive there is a distinction, but that it is not a clear one.

Can you inform us, whether the London Hibernian schools are more unpopular in Clare at present than they were in 1822?—I think they are; at the same time, in saying unpopular, I should like to explain myself; they are unpopular with the Roman Catholic clergy, but I have observed in going through the country the schools are not unpopular with the people, and I have made very extensive inquiries on the subject.

Do not the Roman Catholic clergy caution the people against those schools?—Unremittently.

Do not they inform them they were highly dangerous to their final salvation?—They do.

How do you account for the peasantry not considering those schools dangerous?—From their experience of them.

Is it your opinion, that neither the Baptist Society's schools nor the London Hibernian schools are liable to fair objections on the part of the people?—I think there have not been actual instances of proselytism in their schools, but still I think there may be a strong tendency to it amongst their officers, and that idea creates a greater feeling of alarm amongst the Roman Catholic clergy than any thing could do, short of the actual attempt to produce conversion.

Are you aware there is an institution of Scripture readers belonging to the London Hibernian society?—I am not quite sure it belongs to the Hibernian Society; I know there is a class of Scripture readers, and I think it must do infinite harm to the education of the country.

Do you know whether the same persons do not act as cursory inspectors to the schools?—I apprehend not usually.

The business of those Scripture readers, we have understood, is confined to the adults; is that your impression?—It is.

Do you think that, even at present, the schools of the London Hibernian Society are not unpopular with the peasantry?—I think they are not.

Is it your impression, that if the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy were to be considerably relaxed, that the peasantry would send back their children to those schools?—At once.

Do they do it notwithstanding the opposition at present?—There are some instances of it, notwithstanding every opposition; but I do not think there are many just now.

In what manner can you account for the parents in those particular instances standing out against the disapprobation of their clergy; were there any particular inducing motives?—None that I know of.

Any prospect of reward, or threat of being distrained?—I have heard of such proceedings, but never knew an instance of them; I speak independently of all considerations of that sort, and wish my evidence to go to this point, that if the people were let alone by all persons whatever for and against the schools, they would most willingly and anxiously resort to them.

Are you acquainted with that class of Roman Catholic free schools in which the plan is to raise subscriptions by collections at the chapel and in other manners, and to take a school-house, to pay the master a fixed salary, and to administer education perfectly gratuitously to the children?—I have seen such schools.

What

225
Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

What is your opinion, supposing the schools to remain as they are and the peasantry were left to themselves, would the peasantry in Clare prefer sending their children to those schools, or to the London Hibernian schools?—To the London Hibernian schools.

In what way can you account for that?—From the better progress of the children.

Do you think the children are better taught in the schools of the Society than in those free schools?—I should think they are.

Are there many of those Roman Catholic free schools in the county of Clare at present?—I believe they are numerous; but I have not visited them as a matter of duty.

Can you state whether there were as many of them in 1822, when you first knew the county, as at present?—I believe they are increasing; and that they have increased within the last three or six months, I have no doubt.

Have you any doubt that the operations of the London Hibernian Society have had this effect, amongst others, giving rise to those free schools, on the principles of rivalry?—None.

It being a necessary step, in order to subtract the children from the London Hibernian Society's schools?—Yes.

Have you had any opportunity of observing whether the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy is more effectual where they have the alternative of a Roman Catholic free school to offer to the children, or where they have no such option to afford?—I cannot speak very correctly upon that point.

What should you consider the average number of attendants of Roman Catholic children at present in the schools of the Kildare-place Society, in the county of Clare, in each school; ten, twenty or thirty, or what other number would you say, speaking from general impression?—The average may be 15.

Have you any impression upon your mind, as to what may be the average number of Roman Catholics at present in the schools of the London Hibernian Society, in the county of Clare, as contradistinguished from the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—I have not.

Is it generally greater or less in the schools of the London Hibernian Society than in the Kildare-place Society?—I consider it a great misfortune that the Kildare-place Society is so much mixed up with other societies.

Do you mean, that all the London Hibernian Society's schools in Clare, are also the Kildare-place Society's schools?—Almost in every instance.

You would wish to see a perfect distinction between the London Hibernian Society's schools and the Kildare-place Society's schools?—Entirely.

If that distinction were to take place, do you think the time is open to restore the Kildare-place schools to a greater share of popularity among the Roman Catholic clergy than they have hitherto enjoyed?—Yes, many of them have told me so; and expressed their willingness to come under the Kildare-place Society, if that Society was singly employed in the management of their schools.

Have such opinions occurred on your last tour?—There was one instance where I explained the principles of the Kildare-place Society to a Roman Catholic clergyman: my explanation excited so much astonishment, that he could scarcely believe it; and said, if the principles of the Society were really such as I had described them, that he should have no hesitation to apply to it, and to put all his schools under its protection.

Do you believe there is a very general mistake among the Roman Catholic clergy in the south of Ireland, of what the principles of the Kildare-place Society are?—I do.

How can you account for that, as the reports are circulated annually, in which its principles are expressed?—From the number of co-operating societies that exist, they are confounded.

Do you consider the opposition to the Kildare-place Society greater in Clare or in Kerry?—I think it is equally great in these counties.

Do you think it is as great as possible in both?—I think it is.

Does the same observation apply to Limerick and Cork?—Limerick appears to be more free from it. A greater number of Roman Catholic clergymen in Limerick give their decided sanction to the schools at this time than in the other places which have been adverted to.

What are their names?—The Rev. John Ryan, of the parish of Turagh. I visited his schools, and found them conducted upon the principles of the London Hibernian Society; they are in connection with our Society also. I found the principles of the London Hibernian Society exactly acted upon.

Did he support those schools?—No; the Hibernian Society, in consideration of his coming forward as he did, dispensed with the local contribution.

Did he approve of the schools when you saw him?—Highly so.

How many were in connection with them?—A male and female school, in one place; they were numerously attended. Those schools were in different rooms; but besides them, there were two distinct schools in the neighbourhood of a similar kind.

Do you think, in the county of Cork, the opposition is as great at present as in Kerry and Clare?—I cannot speak of that; I think there were only six schools of ours in Cork which I visited.

Did you visit the Count De Salis's school in the county of Limerick?—I did.

Can you recollect the date of your visit?—Not more than three weeks ago; I could very easily refer to it.

Can you account for there being no school open there?—It was the Christmas season; but independently of that, the school is opposed by both the priests. I called upon Mr. Dixon of Limerick, who told me the reading of the Testament had been given up.

Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

Do you conceive that the Roman Catholic children are actually in attendance at present upon the Count De Salis's school?—I should think they are.

Do you think they used their own Testament?—No; Mr. Dixon told me they did not.

Do you consider that school still in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—It may be considered in a state of suspension, until the committee come to a determination upon the case. There has been no decided step taken by the Society with regard to it as yet. I do not think I have reported on it.

Have you any impression on your mind, whether the opposition on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy in Clare and Kerry, and other parts of the south of Ireland you visited, is as strong and active as it was four months ago?—I think it is.

Quite?—Yes.

Do you think it is equally successful?—Generally speaking, it is successful; but I think there are exceptions to its success, and I have heard that the parents of Roman Catholic children attending the schools, begin to talk of sending back their children, notwithstanding the opposition.

Do you know whether they have begun to do it in any instances?—Yes; I visited a school near Kilmallock, a Palatine school, and the master assured me, when I asked him whether in any of the numerous assemblage present there were Roman Catholics, that a proportion of them were so; and on pursuing my inquiries upon the subject still further, he said many of them had never left the school, and could not be induced by any opposition to leave it; and that others who had left it, returned.

Do you know any other instances of returns to schools than those you have mentioned?—I have not a distinct recollection of any other school, but I have an impression, and a very lively one, that when the opposition is mitigated, the children flock in immediately.

The question is, whether in any instances where the opposition is continued, any children have gone back to the school who had been withdrawn from it?—I have mentioned one, and if I could recollect other instances, I could adduce them; there are such, I have no doubt.

Are we to collect that it is your impression that upon the whole, in the southern counties of which we have been speaking, there are at present, upon the average, ten or fifteen Roman Catholic children in the habit of attending, notwithstanding the opposition that is going forward?—That average would be a very low one; the instances are so few in which the children are not obliged to stay away by the Roman Catholic clergy, that I might go very far wide of the fact in attempting any average.

Is it your impression, there are several schools in which there are as many as twenty Roman Catholic children in attendance, notwithstanding that opposition?—I think there are.

Do you think there are yet a more considerable number in which there may be fifteen?—The more considerable number of schools are those where there are a lesser number of children of that sort.

Can you state to the Commissioners, either from your own knowledge, or having heard it in such a way that you have no doubt of the truth of it in your own mind, what are the particular measures resorted to by the Roman Catholic clergy?—All the measures I have heard of, are of extreme violence, denouncing the people, and stating from the altar that if they read the Bible, or took it into their houses, they should be damned, and that the devil was in the Bible. I do not speak of those cases from my own knowledge, but from a strong conviction on my mind, owing to the authority from which I had them.

From what kind of authority did you hear those statements; we do not ask for names?—From gentlemen of high respectability in the county, and sometimes the masters.

Were any of those gentlemen Roman Catholics?—No.

Did you ever hear from a Roman Catholic, that a Roman Catholic priest had said the devil was in the Bible?—No, not a Roman Catholic, but I have from a Protestant; and I could mention a case of the kind, very minutely.

Do so?—On one occasion, not very far from Limerick, a priest opposed the school a good deal, a gentleman anxious about it, asked him what his opposition was owing to? and he replied that it was owing to the introduction of the Bible; he then asked him "Do you know who wrote the Bible?" and as well as I remember, the expression was exactly what I am going to mention, or tantamount to it, that the devil wrote the Bible.

Do you mean that the devil wrote the Protestant Bible?—No; the Bible generally.

Do you believe yourself that any Roman Catholic priest ever said that the devil wrote the Bible?—I understood the expression to have been tantamount to this, that his opinion was, that the devil wrote the Bible, or that the Pope said the devil wrote it; I thought the circumstance so remarkable, especially as it had been mentioned by a gentleman of respectability in the immediate neighbourhood, that I asked his authority, which he gave me; and being in Limerick some time after, I went to the gentleman, and asked him if such a thing occurred, when he said it did; and nearly or altogether as I had been informed in the first instance.

The Pope has in a very recent bull termed the Protestant translation of the Bible, as being in effect the Gospel of the devil, and not the doctrines of our Saviour; could it be in reference to that bull that that particular expression may have been used?—It may have been; I think I heard it first about two months ago.

Are you aware that every Roman Catholic priest is obliged to read a portion of the Bible every day of his life?—No.

Are you aware that the Gospels form part of the mass for every day?—No.

Can you state the opinions of people in the county of Limerick, particularly with respect to the Bible?—I think the people are very anxious to read it.

What

What do the people think of it, what kind of book do they suppose it to be, who do they think wrote it?—Except where they are permitted to read it, I have understood them to have a very indistinct idea of every thing concerning it.

Where they are not permitted to read it, do they know it is the word of God, or do they consider it a human production?—I could not answer that.

Had you ever any conversation with any of the peasantry about the Bible?—I have no distinct recollection of any such conversations; I have often asked them about the schools, going through the country, but as an officer of the Kildare-place Society, I have considered every thing like an allusion to religious subjects to be so dangerous a topic, I have never ventured upon it at all with the peasantry; I have shunned it sedulously, lest it might be supposed I had the object in prospect and at heart which is generally attributed to our Society.

Have you ever known or heard of any particular measures being adopted by the Roman Catholic clergy, such as denouncing the people from the altar to induce them to withdraw their children from the schools?—I have heard the people speak of it in many cases, that the priests had announced their determination not to visit them when they were dying, or administer the sacrament to them; and I have known instances when it has been put to the proof that they have actually refused the sacrament. One case occurred in the county of Limerick a short time since; a man of the name of O'Callaghan, a schoolmaster, who had proceeded with the school in opposition to the priests, fell into a very ill state, some say owing to the unpleasant circumstances in which he was placed by some procedure like excommunication, and that it hastened his death, and when he was dying, the priest refused him the communion.

Do you know whether he sent for the Protestant clergyman under those circumstances?—No, I do not think he did, it is so necessary to speak guardedly just now, I am very cautious in mentioning the circumstances.

Do you know whether he finally died without receiving the rites of the church?—I believe he was ultimately visited either by the priest of the next parish, or the clergyman who refused to go to him at first; and I rather think by the former. Of this I cannot speak positively, but that a refusal took place at one stage of the business, I have no doubt.

Are you aware, that according to the rules of the Roman Catholic church, a person even under excommunication, may receive the sacrament when in extremity?—I am not aware of that, but I most firmly believe it has been refused; a gentleman told me (in the county of Kerry) of a similar instance, where one of his tenants sent his children to a school of his, notwithstanding the opposition of the priest, and when the man found that he was in a dying state, he first sent himself to the priest, and then informed this gentleman that the priest would not come to him. He treated it as a thing that was impossible, and wrote to the priest expressing himself to the effect, that he supposed he must have been misinformed in that particular, but the priest wrote to him in reply, that he was not, and that he had not only refused, but would persevere in the refusal to visit, or go and see him in his capacity as a minister of religion.

Are you aware whether the present intense opposition to the schools of the Kildare-place Society, had its commencement at any particular time in the last year?—I think it had not its commencement exactly then, because there has been more or less of it for a long time, but I think the opposition augmented so as to become formidable, probably about the time of the appointment of this commission.

Upon the occasion of this last tour, did you find that the opposition in the Queen's County and Kildare, was as vivid as you have described it to be in Munster?—By no means, and I attribute that very much to the comparative absence of either of the societies I have mentioned; and I would here allude to a particular case in which I am very much interested, and which I mentioned to one of the Commissioners before, I mean the Montrath school. I was instrumental in establishing that school. The principles of the Education Society are strictly acted upon; the Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen have always given it their warm support, and the people have come to it with the greatest confidence. Dr. Doyle, R. C. B. Kildare, came there and examined the children in the Douay Testament, and left an observation of the strongest kind on the books, approving of the manner in which the schools had been conducted, and some short time after the Protestant bishop of the diocese, Dr. Elrington, visited it, and left his approval of the conduct of the schools couched in as strong terms as it could be.

When you were engaged in your tour in the north-west of Ireland, did you find any considerable opposition to the principles of the Society?—No considerable opposition.

Did you find any, or was there some and not much?—I cannot say there was no opposition, but the character of it was so harmless, and there was so little of it in any shape, that I should say it scarcely deserved the name of an opposition at all.

Have you any strong impression on your own mind of what will be the final result of the present state of things continuing; supposing the Kildare-place Society to persevere in its present course, do you think the Roman Catholic clergy will give way or continue their opposition, and if they do continue their opposition, do you think the children will stay away or return, and if so, in what proportion?—I am of opinion, that if the Kildare-place Society was suffered to go on, and disengaged from every other society, that it would ultimately win over the full confidence of the priests, and I have a perfect persuasion, placing myself in the situation of a Roman Catholic, that it ought to have that effect. I am satisfied it would be very fortunate, if the schools of the Society were not only more disengaged from other societies, but also from the absolute controul of local managers, as it appears to me a great deal of the existing prejudice is owing to the indiscretion and over zeal of some of them.

Are those local managers to whom you advert principally laymen or clergymen?—I think principally laymen.

What kind of over zeal do you refer to?—Perhaps I should have rather said men whose characters would warrant the Roman Catholics in attributing to them over zeal.

Do you mean that the over zeal of the persons to whom you have referred, has actually led them, so far as you have heard or believe, to deviate from the rules of the Society?—Yes, in some instances.

Have you noted such for correction when they have occurred?—Always.

Can you speak generally to the fact of whether they have been corrected upon your pointing them out?—The Society has always endeavoured to correct them.

Have you ever known of an instance in which the Society did not use its best exertions to correct any deviation from its rules?—I recollect no such instance.

Have you ever known of any proceeding on the part of the Society that would lead you to suppose they are not perfectly sincere in their expressed determination and wish to abide by their rules?—Certainly not.

Have you ever known an instance of a child in any of the schools of the Kildare-place Society renouncing the Roman Catholic religion and becoming a Protestant?—I do recollect hearing of such an instance, I think, in the King's County; but it was the case of a gentleman who had had a natural child, and being afterwards married and settled in the neighbourhood, he became the manager of a school, sent this child to it, and wished it to be brought up according to his own persuasion.

Was the gentleman a Protestant?—Yes.

Do you not suppose it may have been the father and not the school that operated that change of religion?—I should think so. That such was the case may be inferred almost to demonstration from the circumstance of his not having interfered in this particular with any other child.

Is that the only instance?—Yes.

Have you found many schools of the Kildare-place Society connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—With some, but not many.

Do you object as much to that union as to the other?—Yes. Though I respect this society more when distinct from us and confined to its proper sphere of action.

Do you find that the Roman Catholics consider that union a circumstance of suspicion?—I should think they would; but not of so disagreeable a kind as the connection with the Hibernian or Baptist Societies.

Do they not know that the Association is conducted by members of the established church?—They do.

Do the people object to Erasmus Smith's schools?—Not in general.

Are you aware of any reason why they should object to them?—They are almost exclusively under the management of Protestants, and are Protestant institutions essentially.

And the master must be a Protestant?—Yes, the master must be a Protestant; there is this distinction to be made, however, that where money is given towards building, the manager of the school is pledged in perpetuity to the principles of Erasmus Smith's board; but where there is only a salary, the master need not be a Protestant in that school, any longer than he thinks proper, although it may follow that the salary would be withdrawn upon the appointment of a Roman Catholic.

Have you ever succeeded in discovering any other rules of Erasmus Smith's schools than that the master must be a Protestant?—I think it is a rule that the catechism should be taught; but I do not think that is insisted upon in the schools.

Should you advise the Kildare-street Society to reject the union with Erasmus Smith's schools as well as the others?—I would rather have the Kildare-place Society stand disconnected with every other; it would get on much better if such were the case; but it would be a material injury to the Association schools and Erasmus Smith's schools, should we be precluded from assisting them; they have no funds for furniture, or school requisites, in either of those societies.

Have you known of many instances of the Roman Catholic clergy having schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society; you have mentioned two or three, have you known of others?—Yes.

Was that a practice more frequent a year or two ago than at present?—Yes; I can mention a case in point, that came under my observation a few days ago in the county of Tipperary, close to Borrosoleigh. There was a Roman Catholic clergyman who had two schools in joint connection with the Hibernian Society and the Kildare-place Society, and he has, within these three months, given up both those schools; and the schools are now totally discontinued. I know of another instance that it may be important to mention; the Roman Catholic clergyman, who had been at Montrath, when I set about the establishment of the school there, and who sanctioned me in every proceeding, and was thereby a principal cause of its success, left the place and went to another parish; and he had no sooner settled himself there, than he applied to the Kildare-place Society for aid, and has now three or four schools conducted upon their principles. He did that from the experience of them in Montrath.

Did you visit the school of Ennistymond in the county of Clare?—I did.

Was that school connected by the Roman Catholic clergyman with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes.

What

629
Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

What was his name?—Dr. O'Loughlin.

Had he obtained money from the Society?—Yes; between money, books, and school requisites, he received about 80*l*.

Did you find the rules of the Kildare-place Society adhered to in that school?—Not at all.

Mention what deviations you observed?—The Scriptures, without note and comment, were not read; and books inculcating particular religious opinions were used.

What books were those?—The Evangelical Life of Christ with the notes, and other books; and at the desire of two of the Commissioners I reported it.

Can you recollect the names of any other schools?—No, I do not; but I could supply them.

Who was teaching in that school to which you have referred?—Two persons.

Who were they, or what was their character?—They were understood to be Jesuits; I was told they were so; but on inquiry from one of the Roman Catholic clergymen, he said they were not, but belonged to some religious order; and they wore the habit of the order when I saw them.

Did they wear the habit of the order in the school?—I presume they did.

Do you know what they were teaching?—They were conducting the common routine of the school.

Do you mean, they were accidentally teaching that day, or were they the regular school-masters?—They had the exclusive conduct of the school as masters.

Do you know whether the school had formally renounced its connection with the Kildare-place Society previously?—I believe it had.

Do you know whether they have taken any measures for the repayment of the money obtained from the Kildare-place Society?—No, I heard of no measure of that kind. The applicant, Mr. O'Loughlin, told me the furniture was there for the Society, and might be taken away; but that was a sort of thing they would not resort to, and he was aware that the Society would never dream of it.

Did he avow to you, he considered the connection at an end?—Yes, and objected at one time to answer the routine questions I put to him, as an officer of the Society; he said, he acknowledged no right in me to ask those questions; but as I had mentioned that the commissioners wished me to see the school, he would (considering me as their agent) answer the questions. I said, I did not come as their agent, nor did I pretend to palm myself upon him as acting under their authority at all; but I required information from him on the part of the Kildare-place Society. When going into the school, I asked him if the Testament was read, and the other rules of the Society adhered to; and he begged I would not allude to that subject before the people who might be in the school.

Did he express any reason for it?—No; but when I felt it my duty to proceed as usual in those inquiries, he expressed some impatience that I should have done so, notwithstanding the request he made to me.

Did his deportment convey to you any impression, as to what his motive was in making that singular request; did he fear it would irritate the people, or produce any other effect?—I should rather suppose it was, because he was ashamed of the transaction.

Do you think yourself, it would have irritated them, or excited any commotion among them, or induced any danger to yourself or any other person?—No, we have no sense of danger in the country; the people have always treated us with the utmost kindness.

Have the peasantry ever appeared to suspect your motives in coming among them?—Quite the contrary.

Do they know pretty generally the nature of your business?—Yes, and often come into the schools while I am employed in them.

Can you say whether the name of the Kildare-place Society is unpopular with those persons at present?—I have no reason to think it is.

In what light do the people view the conduct of their clergy, in forbidding them to send their children to those schools?—They view it as a great hardship.

To what reason do they attribute it?—I am very cautious in attending to every thing I hear from persons who are opposed to the Roman Catholic clergy.

We do not wish you to give any opinion, except what you have derived from the Roman Catholics themselves?—I have already said how anxiously I avoid every thing like tampering with the people upon the subject; I do not remember any instance of the sort, having always considered it highly inexpedient.

Is it your impression, that such schools as are patronised by the Roman Catholic clergy still in connection with the Kildare-place Society, do at present faithfully observe their rules or not?—I believe they do.

Have you found many instances of deviation from the rules of the Kildare-place Institution in schools in connection with the Hibernian Society, or the Baptist Society?—No.

Do you recollect visiting Ennis?—I do.

Do you recollect the schools at Ennis in connection with the Kildare-place Society, and also with the Hibernian Society?—Yes.

Do you recollect having been present when one of the commissioners visited those schools?—I do.

Do you recollect, that in every one of those schools the rules of the Kildare-place Society appeared to have been violated?—I do not recollect that; upon referring to my memoranda, I might find that they were.

Do you recollect, that in each of those schools it was stated that persons occasionally attended;

Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq.

attended; in one a gentleman or gentlemen, and in the other, ladies, who explained the Scriptures to them?—Yes; I remember also, that it was there distinctly stated that the comment only extended to the moral principles; and I have a recollection that the commissioner put that question in a very particular way, and pressed it upon the conductors of the schools, and that he ascertained according to my recollection, that it extended only to the moral principle.

Do you consider it consistent with the rules of the Kildare-place Society, that ladies or gentlemen should attend to give their explanation of what they conceive to be the moral principle?—I think no comment upon the Scriptures is allowed which at all trenches upon the religious opinions of any of the children.

Do you conceive that persons are allowed to give comments at all?—What I understood by the moral principle, was asking questions upon the Scriptures, such as the Kildare-place Society approve of, having a grammatical object, or as the Society explain it in some of their publications, questions calculated to bring the minds of the children from sound to sense.

Do you recollect, whether in the instances alluded to, the explanations were not of the grammatical sense, but in connection with the moral principle?—I understood it was such a comment as I have described.

Have you deemed it necessary to make any report upon those schools?—Yes, I have.

As a violation of your rules?—No; I did not consider it to be one.

Do you recollect any other schools in which you found persons had been in the habit of attending, and giving those explanations?—I have known instances of it, but do not at this moment recollect particular cases; I have always made a point to report of them whenever there was an impression resting upon my mind that there had been a comment made that involved a breach of our principles, and it was always rectified by our Society, or at least produced from them invariably the strongest remonstrance they could make, and the most strenuous endeavours to correct the evil.

Do you know of any instances of persons belonging to the Hibernian Society, or missionaries in connection with them, or belonging to them, or belonging to or in connection with the Baptist Society preaching in any of the schools?—Yes, I know an instance of that, and I believe I conveyed my knowledge of it to the commissioners; I am not sure whether it was after school hours; I wish also to mention, that I wrote in the books of that school my decided disapprobation of the occurrence.

Did you understand that the children were in the school at the time this preaching took place?—Yes, such an impression is on my mind at present, otherwise I should not have felt myself so decidedly called upon to condemn it.

Do you now allude to the school at Scarriffe?—I do.

Do you recollect a similar instance occurring in the county of Clare, in a school under the direction of Major Colpoys?—I do remember having left that school in the year 1822, with the impression that the Baptist inspector had either preached upon or explained the Scriptures, and it may be well to mention, that Major Colpoys was extremely annoyed about it, and expressed himself in a manner towards me as an individual for making that report, that I thought unbecoming, and which he afterwards apologized for in a very handsome manner.

Which do you mean to convey; the idea that Major Colpoys was annoyed at the fact having occurred, or at your having discovered and reported the fact?—I did think the immediate cause of the annoyance was the exclusion of the master from a gratuity, in consequence of my observation.

The master did not get the salary, in consequence of your having noticed the fact?—I believe he did not, as I am pretty sure the Society abided by my report.

Have you ever found any tracts in any of the schools?—I do not recollect any; I could swear positively to their absence from the hands of the children; I cannot say they may not have been in the school.

Do you not conceive by allowing persons to attend at a school to give, what they call an explanation of the moral principle inculcated in the passage upon which they comment, an opportunity is given to them of in fact insinuating at least opinions or doctrines inconsistent with those of the Roman Catholic church?—I think it is injudicious that such observations should be made, as a rigid and exact distinction between the two kinds of comment cannot always be expected. It would be better that every occasion of excess should be removed.

Have those comments when made, been generally made by Protestants?—When made, it has been generally by Protestants.

Have they, so far as you have heard of the character of the persons, been made by Protestants rather distinguished by zeal in the way of conversion?—I shall not go so far as to say they were distinguished by zeal for conversion; but they were of that class of religionists that are generally supposed to be so.

Have you found that the Roman Catholic clergy where they could themselves establish schools, and where there were masters in whom they placed confidence, were willing to receive aid from the Kildare-place Institution?—I think they have been very often so.

Do you not conceive that in general, the objection of the Roman Catholic clergy has been to the local management of the school, or to a suspicion that the local management may not be right, rather than to the operations of the general principles of the Kildare-place Society?—I am decidedly of that opinion, and I think it would be one of the most fortunate circumstances for the progress of education in this country that could be devised, if the management and controul of the schools were thrown more upon public officers, and if they were more the schools of the state than at present.

Examination of
W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

Do the Roman Catholic clergy object to having particular parts of the Testament, to be chosen by themselves, read by the children, where the persons to whom they are read are Roman Catholics, and in whom they place confidence?—I have known instances of their not objecting; but I would say these were rather the exceptions; they generally do object to the Scriptures altogether, and I attribute that very much at this moment to the hostile feeling that has been industriously and successfully excited, and which prevents the present being a time at which they can be expected to lay aside their prejudices and act upon the calm and impartial dictates of their better judgment. I wish to lay an emphasis upon judgment.

Do you think that a feeling has been excited by the recent discussions?—I think there has; I should wish to observe, however, that I do not attribute the feeling merely to these discussions, but to the general collision of two violent and extreme parties upon both civil and religious subjects.

Have you heard of a Society formed for extending the principles of the reformation?—I only heard of it in the course of my last tour, and not more than twice or three times.

Do you not conceive that the existence of such a society is likely to produce resistance on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy at this moment?—Yes; all ultra societies may be fairly expected to have that effect.

That it is calculated to excite suspicion of the objects of the schools under the direction of Protestants in general?—Yes.

You have mentioned that you found schools in connection with the London Hibernian Society, frequently very much approved of by the Roman Catholics, and attended by their children?—Yes, I have.

Do you speak of the schools of the Hibernian Society not in connection with any other society, or the schools of the Hibernian Society in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I should say both.

What has been the general character and description of the Hibernian Society's schools not in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—In general they have had much of the character of hedge schools; and perhaps the only great distinction (which was certainly a very material one) was, that there was a good assortment of books and Testaments used; but with the exception of those two things, they have been very little removed from hedge schools, and I am quite certain that managers would not resort to the Hibernian Society so eagerly as they do, if we gave any thing like a commensurate salary; but it is quite absurd to suppose that our gratuity of three, five, or ten pounds, can support a family.

Have you found cases in which the Roman Catholic clergy originally entered warmly into the support of particular schools, and afterwards opposed those schools in consequence of the conduct of the Hibernian Society's teachers or missionaries?—I have; they met me very cordially when I went to them as an officer of the Kildare-place Society; they accompanied me to some of the schools; but I found afterwards, that the suspicions created by the connection with other societies had obliged them to take a very decided part indeed, against the schools; a Roman Catholic clergyman (Dean O'Shaughnessy), told me that he would not let an Hibernian inspector into his school, while he would be most happy to meet me and pay me every attention as an officer of the Society; but he would do every thing to oppose the Hibernian and Baptist Societies in the diocese of his uncle, over which he had a great controul, and of which he was dean; but that it still remained to see whether he might not recommend to the clergy that they should meet the the Kildare-place Society.

You have mentioned the case of Dean O'Shaughnessy, do you remember a similar case occurring at Scariffe?—I do; and adverted before to a similar case in the course of this examination; it was that of Mr. Roughan, who lives between Ennis and Kilrush, and is a very intelligent man—the clergy of the different persuasions had been engaged in a very warm and I might say, according to my idea of it, an unbecoming controversy; printed papers relating to the schools were mutually circulated through the country, when I met Mr. Roughan, and explained the principles of the Society to him; he said he had no idea they were such, and that if they were, he should have no objection to place a number of his schools under the protection of the Society.

Have you not found, that where other societies or associations became connected with schools in connection with your Society, that they very much took the management of the schools into their hands, adhering to your rules and principles, though adding others consistent with yours, but yet more likely to excite opposition in the minds of the Roman Catholics?—Yes, inasmuch as they went beyond them.

Your rules are satisfied so far as Scriptural reading is concerned, if select passages of the Scriptures are read from the volume itself?—Yes; so I have always understood.

It would be a compliance with that rule if the portions of Scripture which constitute the Epistle and Gospel for the Roman Catholic mass of the day were read?—I should think it would; but I do not know whether it would be consistent with the spirit of the Society that a reference should be had to the public service of any particular church; they wish to steer clear of all sects and parties, and go upon the common ground which they esteem the Testament to be, but without that reference, the reading of those passages would be a compliance.

Do you recollect the Roman Catholic clergyman of Gort having proposed that those passages should be read, and the Protestant clergyman saying he could not consent to it, because he must act under the directions of his bishop?—I am not sure that he proposed it, but I believe he assented to such a plan, and the Protestant clergyman disagreed; I have a recollection also at that time, of acting upon the same feelings I have for a long time entertained upon this subject, that it would be desirable to have a suitable medium, which

W. V. Griffith,
Esq.
20 Jan. 1825.

I think the state, or a board, or a committee would be, if they had a sufficient number of public officers to act in the country. I recommended that neither the Protestant clergyman nor the Roman Catholic clergyman should have the management of the school, but that Lord Gort, as the landlord, should interpose as the medium between both, and from being the most likely person to bring them together.

The Protestant clergyman there was the patron of the school?—Yes.

And he declared he could only act under the orders of his bishop?—He did.

And with that declaration cut short all attempts at arrangement?—For a time.

It was in consequence of that that you suggested that Lord Gort should be the patron?—Yes, as being more likely to bring the parties together.

You have mentioned that it would satisfy the rule of the Kildare-place Society, on the point of reading the Scriptures, if select passages were read in the school; is it not the principle of the Society to leave the selection of those, and the extent to which the Scriptures shall be read or not, to the local superintendent or schoolmaster?—It is; at the same time they do not consider it a compliance with their rule, unless it is read three times a week at least by the upper class; and so far from wishing it to be the primer, which is generally imputed to them, they consider it an injudicious thing to commit it into the hands of any but good readers, and I have always remonstrated with any schoolmaster or superintendent who gave it to any but the advanced class.

The question referred particularly to the quantum, the amount of passages of Scripture that should be read, rather than to the times?—That is left to the discretion of the local manager; and I have sometimes suggested to the Roman Catholic clergy, when they have objected that there was no note or comment, that they might, if the schools were under their own direction, appoint certain passages in the beginning of the week to be read in the course of it; and that they might take an opportunity at the end of the week, or on any day after school hours, to give their note and comment on those particular passages.

You have mentioned that you found cases where the superintendent expressed a jealousy of the Baptist or Hibernian Society having controul over schools which were also connected with the Kildare-place Society; did you understand that to be a general objection to the principles and rules of those Societies, or either of them, or that there were particular instances in which their rules had been violated by the schoolmaster?—I think the objection was more to what they understood the spirit of these societies to be.

Rather than to any infraction of the rules?—Yes; I really cannot bring to my mind any actual attempt at proselytism in those schools, but I allude to the feeling that is very common among the Roman Catholics, that there is a strong disposition of that kind among those societies.

You have stated that the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy to certain schools has at least been considerably increased, or has been in some degree owing more or less to the discussions that have taken place of late in different parts of the country at public meetings?—Yes, that is more comprehensive; I should rather have answered the former question in the way now proposed, whereby the meetings of the Roman Catholics and of the parties opposed to them, would be comprised.

Have you not at periods of your inspection, previous to those meetings to which you now refer, found that the plan of the schools connected with the Kildare-place Society was objected to in various degrees at different times, in so far, among other reasons, as the Scriptures were read in those schools?—Yes.

You do not mean to give an opinion that that opposition has been raised by those means?—No, but augmented.

From what period would you date that augmented opposition to the schools, during the time of your last tour?—I cannot exactly say the month; I should date it from the concurrent appointment of the Commissioners and the institution of the Roman Catholic Association.

Are you aware that several of the public meetings at which questions concerning the reading of the Scriptures have been discussed were periodical or annual meetings of the Societies, which have been held for several years past, particularly meetings of the Bible Societies?—I should say that that was more the case as it applies to Bible Societies; but I should have considered the other meetings to have been occasional rather than periodical, and perhaps to have involved some degree of novelty.

To which societies do you at present refer?—I refer to the progress of Captain Gordon and Mr. Noel, belonging to the Hibernian Society; those meetings may have taken place, and the circumstance of not having been heretofore so much opposed may have left me without any knowledge of their occurrence, but I should suppose they were not in the habit of holding meetings before on the same scale, or of equal publicity.

Did you find very considerable opposition to schools taking place previous to the month of August last?—I should think it was subsequent to the month of August that I got into Clare; but of that I have not a distinct recollection.

Appendix, N° 211.

Examination of Mr. Lewis Mills, on Oath; Thursday, 25th of November 1824.

ARE you in the employ of the Society for the education of the poor, commonly called the Kildare-street Society?—I am.

In what capacity?—As inspector of their schools.

How many inspectors do the Society employ?—Six at present.

How

133
Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
25 Nov. 1824.

How long have you been employed in their service?—I was appointed in 1819, and commenced my duties in the following May.

In what way are you remunerated for your services?—I have an allowance of 15s. a day paid me when out on actual inspection, and a salary of 60*l.* a year, together with an allowance of 10*l.* for the wear and tear of the vehicle I travel in.

Have you any other travelling expenses than the ten pounds?—There is an allowance for livery; while I remain in Dublin off duty, the allowance of 15s. a day ceases when I come to Dublin, and an allowance of a guinea a week for livery then commences.

Are the inspectors all paid alike?—They are.

What portion of the year are you out on inspection?—Upon the average, nine months in the year. I have been ten, approaching to eleven, I think I have entered on my eleventh month in one year.

Have you any duty to perform during the time you are in Dublin?—Since my appointment, I have regularly had either to visit the schools of the city, or assist in visiting them.

Describe your duties when you are on inspection?—I am generally in the school at eleven o'clock, if it is a large school, and ready to leave it at about two, provided there are a great number of children in it; I examine into the proficiency of all the classes in spelling, and reading, writing and arithmetic, and into the school accounts, and the conduct of the teacher. I have also to see if the school-house be in good repair or otherwise; and if the patron of the school lives near it, I generally contrive to call upon him for the purpose of receiving his report of the conduct of the master, and any other thing that relates to the management of the school he thinks proper to communicate. If any defect is apparent, I leave memorandums with the teachers to pay attention to that subject, and have it rectified.

In what way is the country divided between the different inspectors?—There is a tour allotted to each, which it is supposed will occupy him from the time of his setting out till it is supposed he will have to return at the close of the year.

Are the boundaries of this tour exactly defined, so as to prevent one inspector interfering with another?—They are; but the Society have never deemed it advisable for an inspector to keep himself strictly to his tour, because circumstances may occur where it is advisable for him to act otherwise; an inspector may meet with gentlemen in the country who are anxious that he should inspect schools not exactly in his tour, and then it is discretionary with the officers.

Does each inspector belong to a district, or are they changed?—They are changed annually.

In what district have you been lately employed?—The western tour, the province of Connaught.

Did the district allotted to you, comprehend the country that lies between the province of Connaught and Dublin?—It did.

What number of schools had you to visit?—I cannot exactly answer the question at this moment; I should suppose at least 176; but I visited and reported upon at least 230.

Are your reports in the form of answers to printed queries, or do you draw your reports according to your own will and pleasure?—They are replies to queries.

Is there any general head that would include general observations, if other matters struck you than those included in the queries?—Yes, the last query is of that kind.

One hundred and seventy were decidedly your own schools?—Yes, but there were many others that were assisted while I was on my tour, and many that were not on the list and were afterwards connected with the Society.

Of what description are the school accounts that it is your duty to inspect?—They are called class lists, daily report, register and library accounts. I should observe, that all these accounts are not in every school, they are only used in general in such as are conducted on the improved system of teaching.

Are your visits unexpected?—They are.

In what way are you able to prevent the masters acquiring a knowledge of the probability of your visit, in a few days?—They are very often aware of it, particularly if there are many schools situated in the neighbourhood of the town I am in; it is impossible to prevent it, but as far as I can I do.

Do you believe the schoolmasters are in the habit of communicating with one another that the inspector is arrived, and is likely to proceed in such a direction?—I have no doubt there are many instances of that nature; but it has not occurred so often to my knowledge, as to induce me to say it is a general practice.

Are you able to counteract the preparation they are likely to make to deceive you in the appearance of the school and attendance of the children?—Yes, in a great degree.

Are you in the habit of examining the children themselves, to ascertain what the attendance is?—I have not frequently put such questions, because I was unwilling to ask such before the teacher of the school; but in some cases I have done it, where I had every reason to believe the conduct of the teacher was improper; but in answer to the question as to the means I should take to prevent it if I had any doubt of the master's honesty, I should make myself acquainted from the resident manager of the school as to his conduct, and should be guided by his report.

Has every school a resident manager, who takes such pains with it as to inform himself fully of the attendance of the master and the pupils?—Almost every one has; there is not one in a hundred where there is not a resident manager.

Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
25 Nov. 1824.

Is the improved system pursued in the great majority of the schools?—It is in those assisted by the Society.

Is there not in the country a prevailing prejudice against the employment of the boys as monitors?—I have heard it frequently urged, but I would not take upon me to say it is general; in every new school there are very strong objections to the practice.

Is it a prejudice that wears away?—Indeed it is; the parents in a very short time find that the circumstance of making monitors teach classes, tends to improve them more than any thing else.

Does your tour of inspection afford you opportunities of becoming acquainted with the management of schools that are not in connection with the Kildare-street Society?—It does; wherever I can visit a school that is going on in the country I do, provided my time will not be much infringed upon, but I consider it my first duty to visit the schools of the Society.

Have you visited lately the schools of the Society for discountenancing Vice, the schools of Erasmus Smith's foundation, or the schools of the London Hibernian Society, or the Baptist Society?—I visited some of the Association, one of the board of Erasmus Smith, a good many of the Hibernian Society, and but five of the Baptist Society.

Is there a feeling of jealousy between those different classes of schools, which gives rise to any objection to your visiting, or is it a thing sought for on their part?—I should think it would not be taken ill my visiting any school; there was never an objection taken.

Are you in the habit of visiting the schools established by the Roman Catholics?—I am; I visit them regularly, when I can do so.

Do they entertain any jealousy of your inspection?—Not the slightest to my going in and visiting the school; I have never taken upon me to examine into the books, or into the proficiency of the children in any of the monk's schools to my knowledge, except one in Cork, one in Carrick on Suir, and one at Mount Bellew.

Are the school-houses for the most part erected partly at the expense of the Society?—They are.

In whom is the property of the house vested?—It is generally vested in trustees; it is made over to trustees.

Do you know the condition of the trust?—To be conducted on the principles of the Society.

It is made over in fee?—I am not aware.

Are there any instances of schools being established and carried on in rooms that are not the property of the Society?—Many; in such cases we make grants for school furniture.

Is there any rule as to the arrangement of the room, do you make it necessary they should put the benches across the room?—We recommend them to fit it up so as that the improved system can be carried on with convenience, but in some cases they get the furniture made before we have an opportunity of communicating with them, the consequence is, that they sometimes make them double desks, which is attended with inconvenience, for the teacher never has a full view of the scholars.

Are the masters appointed by the Society, or by the patron of the school?—By the patron.

What payment is made to the master by the Society?—A gratuity.

Is it always of the same amount?—It is not; it depends upon the state of the school at the time of the visit, and the proficiency of the children.

What is the largest amount given?—Ten pounds.

What is the lowest?—We have given so low as three, and sometimes so low as two pounds, but I cannot speak decidedly upon that point as to the amount.

If the Society give so small a share of the necessary salary to the master as 10*l.* can they feel they have much jurisdiction over the school?—The only jurisdiction they assume is, having the principles of the Society adhered to. We do not for trifling inattention cut any man off entirely, but we think it right to give him a lower sum, and the official letter that conveys that gratuity, recommends him to additional exertion, and expresses a hope that at the next visit of the inspector, he will be found more deserving.

Will you describe the most prevalent arrangement for providing for a school with reference to its whole establishment, both school-house and payment to the master, the expenses of providing books and all other necessities for the use of the school?—The Society gives perhaps a grant towards building, and when the shell of the house is finished, another grant for fitting it up with desks and forms; they generally grant 30*l.* towards building, and 20*l.* towards fitting up, they have given more than that sometimes, but that is the general grant where there is a slated house.

What sort of sum would it cost to build such a house?—We have very frequently given 50*l.* where there has not been 50*l.* collected by subscription, and perhaps not 30*l.* or 20*l.* but then the committee were regulated in their decision by the local situation of the neighbourhood, and where the people came forward and gave labour and materials for the house; after the house was erected, if there were any gentry in the neighbourhood, they subscribe perhaps a pound or a guinea a year each family, and if there is a grant of land annexed to the house, and a room for the resident teacher, they find many willing enough to undertake the duty for the benefit of the house and land, the payment of the children, and the chance of a gratuity.

What grant of land is found sufficient for the use of the master?—I think an acre is generally given; the Society recommends the managers not to grant more than two, to avoid making the man a farmer.

235
Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
25 Nov. 1824.

Do you find for the most part that the masters are equal to their situation?—Of late schoolmasters are a very improved class of people; several are still to be met with very incompetent to the duty.

Are they found useful in the neighbourhood, and able to assist the people in trifling things?—Several of them; many of them are; there are some very superior men, who are very useful in the country.

What is the customary salary of the schoolmasters?—In a respectable school, the salary is generally 30*l.* a year.

Is the whole of the remuneration to the master provided by the Society and subscriptions?—From those sources, with occasional payments of scholars, but they are very trifling, from the circumstance that when a public institution assists any of those schools, the people cannot be persuaded they are not free schools.

Is there any objection on the part of the people to send their children to free schools?—In some part of the country there is, but generally speaking, there is no objection made; it is so managed in the schools of the Society in general, that those who are able to pay, do pay; there are very few cases in which they are excluded from want of means.

What is the usual pay of a day scholar at one of those schools?—A penny a week.

In what way are the books provided?—By the Society.

Freely, or is there any purchase?—They are given free by the Society.

Is it so invariably?—Not invariably, there are some exceptions; the managers of the school sometimes purchase books, but the Society is always willing to supply schools in connection with them with books and slates; they do not grant paper upon every application, but always grant a supply in the first instance.

Do they in all cases supply exactly the same books?—Yes, they do of late; I believe the Scripture Lessons have not been added in some grants, as they were objected to.

Are the lending libraries common in the schools?—They are.

In what way are they provided?—The Society grants them free; there is a lending library sent to every school in the first grant; when the Society grant books and school requisites, they uniformly grant a lending library.

Are you able to trace accurately the progress of the improvement of the children?—My notions of that are regulated in the way I shall just state to you; if I find the classes in the school competent to read with fluency and propriety, and understand the stops, and can analyse and explain the meaning of easy sentences, and can read and write on paper well, I consider the scholar's proficiency good.

Are you able from time to time to ascertain the progress the children have made?—I have no means of knowing it, but my recollection of the state of the school, but I go a good deal upon the amount of the gratuity given to the master upon the preceding inspection, and I find in general, that I can form a tolerably accurate opinion of the state of the school from recollection of it. In any case of doubt, I can ascertain the scholar's attendance from the school accounts, and then judge what their proficiency should have been.

Do you find for the most part, the children are well taught, and that they are able to read and write and analyse the meaning of easy sentences?—I think in those respects, the schools of the Society have an advantage over any other schools in the country.

Are the children taken away from the schools very young?—From 10 to 15 or 16.

Do they remain long enough in the school for the instruction they receive to produce much influence upon their characters?—I think it would be a great advantage to children, were they to remain longer at the well regulated schools of the country. I confess I can scarcely form an accurate opinion as to their moral character afterwards; I should hope it is greatly improved even by their attendance for that time, but the circumstances of their parents render it absolutely necessary for them to leave the school as soon as they can work. I am, however, firmly persuaded, that a change for the better takes place in the children attending the Society's schools, even in the course of a month subsequent to their establishment.

Do the girls remain longer at the schools than the boys?—Pretty much about the same time.

Which do you think receive the most benefit from the instruction?—The girls, where there is a well-regulated female school.

Are the girls and boys taught together in many schools?—Yes.

Do they mix together in the same classes?—They do, in some instances.

Do they sit together upon the same benches?—We always recommend a separation of the sexes, as far as can be accomplished; even in schools without furniture, to keep the girls from the boys.

Are the girls taught to work in any of the schools?—They are, nearly in every well regulated school throughout the country, in some cases by the visiting ladies, and in other cases by the schoolmistress.

In your visits to the other schools, besides those belonging to the Society, are you in the habit of examining the children as to their proficiency?—Not generally; I have not examined them in the same kind of way that I have examined them in the schools belonging to the Society, because there I feel myself bound to examine each class, but in the other schools not immediately connected with the Society I do not do it, as my time would not admit of it. I generally look at the books and the writing of the children, and endeavour to form an opinion of the masters capability.

How do you form your opinion of the relative efficiency of the Society's schools, contrasted trusted with any other schools?—I think the improvement is attributable to the circumstance of having the master trained, and having the school regularly supplied with books and school requisites, and being regularly inspected by the gentry of the country.

Examination of

Is not that the case with other societies?—There is no other society so exact upon these points as the Education Society.

Are not the Hibernian Society's schools well supplied with books?—They are not so well supplied as the schools of the Society.

What books do the London Hibernian Society supply to their schools?—Spelling books and Testaments, none others.

What examination do you make into the proficiency of the children in scriptural knowledge?—No further than hearing them read.

Are any questions whatever put to the children with a view to ascertain if they know the meaning of what they have read in the Scriptures?—As the Society allows of no comment upon the Scriptures in the schools, I have reason to think there are none made by any person.

Do you believe that the children are much impressed with the study of the Scriptures in the way in which they read them?—In every well regulated school I think they are.

Even though no explanation whatever is given?—I think so.

Do you think their minds are able to comprehend the meaning of what they read without the assistance of any explanation whatever?—I think so, because in every well regulated school there are no portions of Scriptures given them to read but such as they are likely to comprehend.

Do they read the Gospels through, without selection?—They do.

What other portions of the Scriptures do they read?—I think the Gospels are very generally read throughout the schools of the country, the Acts of the Apostles, and in many cases the Epistles.

Are the Revelations read in any cases?—I have no doubt they may be.

Do they ever read in the Old Testament as well as the New?—In some cases.

How many classes read in the Testament?—Perhaps the senior class read the Bible, the next class to that in point of merit, the Testament.

In all the schools are the Bibles and Testaments kept locked up, so that the children have not access to them until the reading hours commence?—No, I think not.

Is there any rule of the Society to that effect?—Not that I am aware of; there is in every large school a school press, and the school requisites are kept there; there are drawers with divisions in them to keep the spelling books and Testaments in.

On how many days in the week is the Testament read?—In some schools every day.

Is there any general rule upon that subject?—The Society would reckon it a deviation from their principles, if the Scriptures were not read on three days in the week at least.

Is the authorized version in use throughout the schools, or is the Douay version in use at all?—The authorized version is very generally used; because in many schools assisted by the Society there does not seem to be much anxiety about what versions of the Scriptures they read.

Is it known in the schools which children are Protestants and which are Roman Catholics?—Having regard to the schools of the Education Society, I think they are not distinguished from each other; I believe the schoolmasters are themselves unconscious of who are Protestants or Roman Catholics, except their knowledge of the neighbourhood may afford them that information.

Do the children know it of each other?—They cannot know it from any thing that occurs in the school.

Has the attendance of the Catholics in the schools of the Society been less frequent of late?—Since the institution of this commission they have.

To what is that difference owing?—I cannot take it upon me to say what is the cause of it in every respect; I can only state the fact.

Have the priests interfered to prevent the attendance of the children in the schools of the Kildare-street Society?—In very many cases they have.

When did you first know of any instance of the interference of the priests to prevent the Roman Catholic children attending the Kildare-street schools?—In the present year, in August last, at which period there was a more determined opposition than before.

Did you know of no instance of it before August last?—Repeated instances; but I have now in view the answer I gave respecting this commission, and also respecting the circumstance of more opposition having been made by the Catholic priests since its existence.

Without reference to this commission, state when you first knew an instance of the interference of a priest to prevent the attendance of Roman Catholic children at the schools of the Society?—I heard complaints made upon that subject in the first school I visited in 1820.

Has that interference continued from time to time ever since your appointment?—It has.

Are we to understand you to mean that its commencement was not connected with the appointment of this commission, but at that time became more operative?—Yes, it has.

Have they succeeded in their objects to a greater extent than formerly?—I think they have.

Have you reason to believe that the attendance of Roman Catholics in the schools has been less frequent since the appointment of this commission than it was before?—I have.

What reason have you for entertaining that opinion?—I think the Roman Catholic clergy throughout throughout the country imagine that when the proceedings of the Commissioners were operative, that they would have funds to establish schools for themselves, and to effect that, they were desirous of making it apparent, as far as they could, that the schools upon the principles of the Education Societies were not well attended.

Had they shown much opposition to the schools before the appointment of this commission?—The opposition to the schools in which the Scriptures were read, was very general throughout the country; but I think it was decreasing prior to that.

At what particular periods of the year did you find the thinning of your schools in former times, except Easter and Christmas?—I have often heard it assigned as a reason why the schools were not so well attended, that the children were obliged to attend to their clergymen, and perhaps learn catechism at those particular periods; there is one part of the year that confessions are held throughout the country, the children are prepared for those confessions, and they are absent themselves for some time before that; their attendance at the schools is further influenced by the harvest and other seasons of labour.

Are there any of the schools with which the priests have not interfered at all?—There are.

Have you been able to ascertain the reason in those particular cases why the interference has not taken place?—In many cases I apprehend it is owing to the popularity of the individual who establishes them, and in some cases it is owing to their being placed exclusively in the hands of a Roman Catholic; if the manager of the school happened to be upon good terms with the Roman Catholic clergyman, the matter may in all probability be accommodated.

In what way is that accommodation effected?—From the intimacy of the individuals, as in such cases the Roman Catholic clergyman is not afraid of the practice of the school.

If the reading of the Scriptures is continued to be enforced in that school, in what way are the priests induced to forego their objection to it?—In such cases, I apprehend the Roman Catholic clergyman is satisfied that the religious opinions of the children of his flock are not interfered with.

Do they hold the reading of the Scriptures without explanation, without note and comment, as in itself an interference with their religious principles?—In my intercourse with them that has been frequently said, but I found so many instances in which it has been practised, and is practised with their knowledge, that I am inclined to believe what I have also frequently heard asserted, that each parish priest possesses power to a certain extent in his parish of countenancing or opposing the school.

Have you had reason to believe that any objection exists on the part of the parents of the Roman Catholic children to their reading the Scriptures in the Kildare-place schools?—Generally speaking, certainly not.

Do you find that the objection of the priest is much less where the master is a Roman Catholic?—In general I think it is, though there are many instances in which Protestants are teachers and the schools are not opposed; but in general I incline to the opinion that where a Roman Catholic master is attached to the school it has the best chance of being popular.

Do you know of any instance of a school in which the Scriptures are read, according to the system of the Kildare-place Society, in which the priest avows he has no objection to the Roman Catholic children attending?—I know many cases in which the schools are exclusively under the controul of the Roman Catholic clergy, and where the Scriptures are read.

Are there any other instances than in those of the schools that are immediately under the management of the Roman Catholic clergy?—Very many, in which the priest does not object to the attendance of the children.

Can you specify any particular schools?—The school at Westport.

Under whose management is that school?—It is under the management of a committee, and it is conducted in conformity with the principles which Dr. Kelly, the Roman Catholic archbishop has laid down in his letter.

To what letter do you allude?—The letter addressed to the secretary of the school.

Are there any peculiar regulations which distinguish the management of that school from the other Kildare-place schools?—There are not; and in the same letter Dr. Kelly offered to give Lord Sligo the appointment of all the teachers in the schools he was about to establish on his own property.

Are the teachers Roman Catholics?—The teacher of Westport school is a Roman Catholic.

What number of children are there in that school?—One hundred and fifty boys, I dare say.

What proportion of them are Roman Catholics?—I fancy they are all Roman Catholics, for there is an Association school in the same town, a parish school, and the Protestants attend that.

Do you apprehend that the circumstance of there being no Protestants to attend makes any difference in this case?—Not the slightest; in that case Testaments of the authorized version would be provided for them.

What version of the Testament is read in that school?—The Rhemish.

Without note or comment?—Yes.

On what days?—On three days in a week.

Do they read from the Testament itself, or any book of selections?—From the Testament itself; it is read by all scholars who have obtained a suitable proficiency in reading.

What number does that comprehend in the whole?—I dare say thirty in that school.

Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
25 Nov. 1824.

Do they read it aloud in the school in the hearing of the other children?—They do.
Is there any particular provision made for keeping the Testaments separate from the other school-books?—The Testaments, if I recollect right, are kept in the school press with the rest of the books.

Is there not also a girls school at Westport, under the same regulations?—Yes; and conducted in the same manner.

How many does it consist of?—I should think one hundred and fifty girls belong to that school.

Do you know by whom the children at this school are taught the Roman Catholic catechism?—By the teacher of the school.

What arrangement is made for the catechetical instruction of the children?—I think he teaches the catechism after school hours; the regular hour for dismissing the children is three o'clock, and I believe at a little after three he commences teaching the catechism; but it is understood by all the scholars that the ordinary business of the school is then completed.

Do all the children of the school learn the catechism, or are any too young to be taught?—I cannot take upon me to answer that, because I did not inquire particularly into the circumstance; many of them are too young to learn it off books.

Do you happen to know whether any person attends during the time of the catechetical instruction, to give explanation upon the parts of the Scriptures they have read in the week?—I have no reason to think there is.

Have you any reason to believe that the master himself explains after the school hours on Saturday to the children the Scriptures they have read in the week?—I have no reason to believe that he does.

Are there any other peculiarities in the management of the school at Westport that tend to render it satisfactory to the Roman Catholics that you can describe to us?—I do not know any other reason; the school is countenanced by all the Roman Catholic clergy, and visited regularly by them.

Do you know whether there is any objection on the part of the Protestants to send their children there?—I do not think there is any objection; but there is another well-conducted school in the town under the Association, conducted by a Protestant master, and the Protestant children go there, and I think one reason is because they are taught catechism after school hours.

If there was a Protestant master in this school, do you think the Roman Catholics would favour it as they now do?—I do not think that they would support it to the same extent as they now do.

How long has this school been in connection with Kildare-place, and the system observed?—The school has been in connection to my knowledge with the Society since the year 1820.

Have you visited it before?—I was sent down to visit it especially in that year.

And you have seen it at different times since?—Once since.

On your last tour?—Yes.

Was the school going on in 1820?—Yes.

Were the Scriptures being read then?—The Scripture lessons were being read instead of the Testament, and I was sent down to correct it.

Did you see Bishop Kelly?—No; at the time that visit was paid, I was instructed by the committee of the Society not to make inquiries of any one, but to report to them the state of the school as I found it.

Can you tell what parts of the Scriptures are read at this school at Westport?—There are no particular portions marked out.

Practically, do you know what portions are read?—I think it is entirely left to the master.

Appendix, N° 212.

Further Examination of Mr. Lewis Mills; Friday, November 26th, 1824.

Mr.
Lewis Mills,
26 Nov. 1824.

ARE you now prepared to give us information with respect to any other schools that had not been cleared or interfered with by the Roman Catholic priests on your last inspection?—I think I can; Granard school in the county of Longford.

What reason have you for believing or knowing that no attempt had been made to remove the Roman Catholic children from that school?—I think the Roman Catholic clergyman is satisfied that the religious opinions of his flock are not interfered with.

What reason have you for knowing that is the fact?—I had been speaking with the Roman Catholic clergyman previous to the opening of the school under the present teacher, and I explained to him the rules and regulations of the Society; it is under the management of a Protestant teacher assisted by a salary from Erasmus Smith's board; the Roman Catholic children attend, and there is no objection made to their doing so; I have not met with the priest since that period, and have had no conversation with him thereupon; but I have, to strengthen me in the opinion I first advanced, the circumstance of the children not having been withdrawn.

Is the attendance of the Roman Catholic children as large now as it was during any period of the school?—It is increased.

What number of Roman Catholic children attend the school?—I cannot say.

How

1239
Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
26 Nov. 1824.

How many attend it altogether?—About 100.

When did you see it?—I visited it in April last.

How had it been going on before your visit?—I do not know much of it under the former teacher, it has but lately adopted the Society's rules.

To what other schools can you refer?—To the two last I visited, Sidegate and Moate, both in the county of Westmeath.

What reason have you to believe there has been no interference, on the part of the priests, with the Roman Catholic children attending those schools?—Both of those schools are nearly as full as they can be, and I judge from the accounts of the school, and the testimony of the teacher.

Are the masters in those schools Roman Catholics or Protestants?—The master of Sidegate school I have reason to think is a Protestant, the other is a Roman Catholic.

Do you happen to know whether the children in either of the schools are taught the catechism after the school is dismissed, by any individual belonging to the establishment?—I have reason to believe the catechism is not taught in any shape.

Do you entertain any doubt that there are many Roman Catholic children in attendance?—I have not any doubt of it.

When did you visit them?—I visited both in the early part of last week.

Did the master tell you there had been any attempt to remove the Roman Catholic children?—In the case of Moate school, attempts were made, and very strong ones too.

Had they been in any degree successful?—Not to any very considerable extent.

Did the master tell you how many children had left him in consequence of the attempt?—I do not know that; I did not ask the question.

Could you tell by the inspection of the roll how many children had gone?—Not well, because the rolls only answered for that quarter.

How do you account for the priest not having emptied the school by his opposition; could any particular reason be assigned for it?—It occurs to me that the reason of it was, that the people of the country had perfect confidence in the managers of the school; there are a considerable number of respectable persons, Quakers and others, connected with it, and they pay it a great deal of attention, and I believe the people are satisfied that they would not interfere with the religious principles of the children.

Why did the priest interfere?—Before the establishment of the school, he used every means in his power to prevent it; he attended a meeting of the school committee, and remonstrated with them upon the inexpediency of putting the Scriptures into the hands of the children; the committee of the school thought differently from him, and went on with the establishment.

Were the committee Roman Catholics or Protestants?—There is a Roman Catholic on the committee.

Can you account for the priests having failed in their attempt to remove the children from this school, when they have succeeded in others?—I believe that this case is like many others in the country, that the people there could not be persuaded that the object was to interfere with their religion.

Have you not met with many cases in which the parents of the children have been perfectly satisfied there was no intention to interfere with the religion of the children; but nevertheless, at the mandate of the priests have removed their children from the school?—I have met with many such cases.

Are the rules of instruction of the Kildare-place Society strictly adhered to in every school to which they contribute?—I think they are not.

Have you met with many instances in which there have been deviations from them?—A good many.

Can you describe what they are?—Generally in not having the Scriptures read; in some cases they have been provided immediately after the inspection, the reason of their not being provided before, perhaps was the difficulty of getting them in the country, those that would prefer Rhemish Testaments, could only get them in Dublin, generally speaking.

Did you find any schools on your last inspection, in which the Scriptures were not read?—In a good many cases.

Could you state how many?—Not at present.

In those schools were any of the Scripture Lessons read?—In a great many they were read.

Was it the practice in any of the schools for the master to read the Scriptures to the children, although they did not read them themselves?—In some few instances that has been the case.

Did you find that the Roman Catholic children were permitted to attend the schools where nothing but the Scripture Lessons were read?—Not in general.

Is the objection as strong to the Scripture Lessons as the Testament?—Generally speaking, I think it is.

In what other respects have you found the rules of the Society not complied with?—In some schools I have found catechisms taught during school hours; but I think the deviations I have met with were chiefly on the score of either the Scriptures or the catechism; they are our two leading principles.

In the schools in which you have found the catechisms taught, have they been taught to all the children of all persuasions, or has it been only the church of England catechism?—I found the Protestant and Roman Catholic catechisms taught in many schools; but they were taught after school hours.

Do you find that practice is satisfactory to the parents of the children, or otherwise?—I think it is satisfactory.

Examination of
Mr.
Lewis Mills,
26 Nov. 1824.

Has that practice been adopted in consequence of applications from the parents of the children where you found it to prevail?—I should think so, and the expostulations of the respective clergymen.

Did you find the attendance of the Roman Catholic children better in those schools where the catechism was taught, than in those where the rules of the Society were strictly complied with?—In every school connected with the Society almost, there is a provision of some kind made for teaching the catechism; if they are not taught after school hours there is a day set apart in the week for catechetical instruction; but the practice that prevails most is teaching it after school hours; and in the district I have just returned from, which is chiefly inhabited by a Roman Catholic population, the Roman Catholic catechism is generally taught.

Do you find where the Roman Catholic catechism is so taught, the people are prevented going by the Roman Catholic clergyman?—I have met with very many cases in which that provision was made for the teaching of the catechism, but because the Scriptures were read in the school, they would not be allowed to attend it.

In those cases where the catechism is taught after school, do the children go with the concurrence of the priests?—I should think they do in such case.

Do you know any cases in which the catechism is taught after school, where the children are prevented from attending by the Roman Catholic clergyman, and if so, mention them?—I do not recollect any case at this moment that I could adduce in point.

Have you visited the Castlebar schools?—I have.

Are there any schools at Castlebar under the patronage of any of the Roman Catholic clergy?—There are.

Are those schools well attended?—They are.

Are the rules of your Society observed in those schools?—They were not observed at the time I visited.

In what respect were they departed from?—The Scriptures were not read by all competent to read them properly, and the catechism was taught during school hours.

At what time did you visit Castlebar school?—I should think in August.

Was the Testament read by any class in the school?—I understood not at all.

Did they assign any reason to you at that time why the Testament had not been read; did they state they had not a Douay version of the Testament, but that they expected some copies of it?—They did not, because I understood from Mr. Gibbons, the Roman Catholic clergyman of the parish, that a dozen Testaments had been provided by his predecessor for the express purpose of complying with the regulation of the Society.

But none of them were produced?—Not at the time I was there.

Do you speak of both the schools?—Yes, both boys and girls schools.

Are you aware whether any correspondence has taken place between the Roman Catholic clergyman of Castlebar, and your Society, subsequently to your visit?—I am not.

Will you inquire whether there has?—I will. If the Commissioners will refer to another report of mine upon the Castlebar school, they will find from it, that the rules of the Society were complied with in the boys school subsequent to my first visit.

Appendix, N° 213.

Examination of Robert Daly, Esquire, on Oath;
Saturday, 11th December 1824.

Robert Daly,
Esq.
11 Dec. 1824.

ARE you one of the inspectors acting under the Society for the education of the poor of Ireland?—I am.

How long have you held that situation?—Since the 3d of May 1823; I was appointed on that day, and commenced the duty the succeeding July.

Are your salary and allowances the same as the other inspectors?—They are.

Are your duties the same?—They are.

How many tours have you been?—On two; the north-east and the due north tours.

When did your last inspection commence?—On the 5th of April.

When did you return from it?—On the 4th of December, but at that time I had not completed my tour.

How many schools did you visit?—I cannot exactly say, my papers being in the country; but I have transmitted reports to the Society of all I visited; I visited several schools not in connection with the Society, independently of those upon my original list.

Can you say how many are in connection with the Society?—There were at the commencement of my present tour, 208, but during my progress there were several added; the schools included in it were divided as follow: Meath, 19; Cavan, 2; Monaghan, 17; Tyrone, 44; Londonderry, 62; Antrim, 58; Donegal, 6; all of which I visited except 10; namely, 7 in the county of Monaghan, and 3 in Tyrone.

Did you carry with you any account of the schools, as they had appeared on the preceding inspection?—I did; my returns contained the number of scholars in attendance, and upon the books when visited in the preceding year, and whether deviations from the Society's principles had occurred or not; also, a copy of the instructions left with the teacher by the former inspector.

Did you find the existing state of each school nearly to correspond with the account of its state on its previous inspection?—Frequently on the northern tour I found that the schools had been very much improved, and proper attention paid to the memorandums left by the preceding preceding inspector; the schools in some parts of the north are very generally held in houses of an inferior description, and this retards their improvement.

What is that owing to?—Owing to the difficulty of obtaining leases of such term as would induce the Society to contribute any part of their funds towards building.

How is it the Society have been induced to make grants in cases where there is no sufficient house?—They have made grants of school requisites and furniture which are removable, namely, benches or forms; in this way the Society gives a great deal of assistance in Antrim, indeed there would be very few schools in that part of the district, if assistance of this description were withheld.

Do the largest portion of the masters receive gratuities from the Society?—Yes, the greater number of them do.

Were there many that did not?—On my late tour very few, and on my present, not more than ten that will not be entitled to a gratuity of some kind.

On what account did they not receive it?—Deviations from the regulations of the Society.

Do I understand you to say, that although some schools had received nothing for building, that the whole 208 were so far under the jurisdiction of the Society as to entitle the masters to a gratuity, and also to enable the schools to receive the assistance of books and school requisites?—Certainly; it is not necessary that assistance should be given towards building to bring the school into connection with the Society; a compliance with its regulations entitles them to a grant of school requisites, and a gratuity to the masters, according to their merit.

Did you find the attendance at the schools as full as you had reason to expect?—I did, except in some parts of Antrim, where the schools were badly attended, but this I attribute to my inspection having taken place during the harvest.

Were the rules of the Society complied with in all instances except ten?—I cannot be positive as to the exact number, but I think they were; there might be some trifling deviations, which on reference to the managers were rectified, such as having the Scriptures read but once or twice in the week, or perhaps having them made a preparatory book for the junior classes.

Did you find any instances in which the Scriptures were not read at all?—No, I did not.

Did you find any instances in which the Scripture Lessons were substituted?—But very few, and it arose from misconception on the part of the managers, because the Society do not give Testaments, and the managers imagined they were not to use any book that the Society did not give.

Were many of the schools in connection with the Hibernian Society?—A good many near Dungiven in the county of Derry, and a few in the county of Antrim.

Are many in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I cannot mention the number that are in connection with that Society without a reference to my papers, which are at present in the country.

Can you recollect any particular schools, both in connection with the Kildare-place Society and the Society for discountenancing Vice?—The school at Tamlet, county Tyrone, under the Rev. Richard Stewart.

Can you recollect how they contrived to comply with the condition of the Association which makes it requisite that the catechism shall be taught, and also with the regulation of the Kildare-place Society, that it shall not be taught?—After school hours they teach it.

In the school-room?—Yes; the Society have no objection to proper persons of any religious persuasion giving religious instruction, if it be after school hours; the regular hours in the country schools are generally from nine to six in summer, and then after the school hours the master is permitted to catechise those children whose parents allow them to remain for that purpose.

Suppose the master received directions from the patron of the school to break up the school at three instead of continuing it at six, would it be possible for him to teach the catechism to the children?—Yes, to one particular sect of children, or to all; he may teach any catechism after school hours, the Society not exercising any control after that time.

Are the school hours regulated by the Society?—No, by the patron of the school; but I always recommended the breaking up of the school at any certain hour most convenient, and afterwards that the children of one sect should be instructed in catechisms, and that a similar arrangement should be made for the catechetical instruction of the other sect.

Is this a common practice?—I think it is; it is a plan I have generally suggested to the patrons of the school, for if the masters in the country do not teach catechisms, particularly in the Presbyterian districts, they would have no scholars.

Does that go into the master's salary, or does he get any thing extra for it?—He gets nothing extra from the Society for it, as they leave it optional with the patron of the school, either to give religious instruction or withhold it.

Are there schools in the district which you visited in which the catechism is not taught after school hours?—I believe in almost all of them it is taught after school hours on Saturdays.

Is the Roman Catholic catechism taught as well?—Yes, all catechisms are taught.

The master receiving no additional salary for such teaching?—No.

Does the master teach the different catechisms himself, or does he appoint any monitor to do it?—As far as I could learn, catechetical instruction is always given either by the patron or master, and never entrusted to a monitor.

Examination of Robert Daly,
Esq.
11 Dec. 1824.

If the master is a Presbyterian, does he teach the Roman Catholic catechism?—Yes, generally speaking, he does.

Do you notice in your report the nature of the arrangements made in each case to give catechetical instruction?—I have in some instances noticed it.

Has any notice been taken of it by the board?—No, nothing more than a recommendation to adhere strictly to the rules; namely, not to teach it in the school hours.

Did you ever find that the clergymen of the different persuasions came to teach the catechism after school hours?—Very seldom; I should think their instruction in this way is communicated on Sundays.

Are any of the schools you visited in connection with the Baptist Society?—No, I cannot say that there are any; there are some that have a good number of Baptists concerned with them, but whether they are in connection with the Baptist Society I cannot say; the Mullingar school is principally Baptist.

After the discovery of the fact that a school received aid both from the Society for the Education of the Poor, and the Association for discountenancing Vice, was aid from the Kildare-place Society discontinued?—I cannot immediately call to memory any schools in which aid has been discontinued for being in connection with the Association; but I have reported any that I have found under that Society.

What has been done in consequence of that report?—I cannot exactly recollect; but as well as my memory serves, some of those on my last tour have been struck off, in consequence of not complying with the regulations of the Society.

Can you remember any particular school that was so struck off?—I think the Hill Hall school, in the county of Down, was struck off the list, as it received assistance from the funds of Erasmus Smith.

Do you consider Erasmus Smith's the same thing as the Association?—Yes, because the master must be a Protestant.

Did you find that there had been any attempt on the part of the Roman Catholic priests to prevent the children attending the school?—Dungiven was the only place where there was any open opposition; the Reverend Mr. Ross had a very well attended school, so much so that it was his intention to enlarge the school-house, but another school has been established, and the Roman Catholic children withdrawn from that in connection with the Society.

Do you consider that the schools you saw were fully attended?—They were, except in harvest time, as I before observed, when it cannot be expected to find them well attended.

Had no attempts been made to prevent the Roman Catholic children attending those schools that were in connection with the London Hibernian Society, as well as the Kildare-place Society?—Not that I could hear.

Are many of the masters Roman Catholics?—Yes, there are a good number, but I do not know how many; I never inquire into the religion of any of the masters.

Did you ever hear that any attempts had been made to prevent a master who was a Roman Catholic from holding the situation?—No; it being perfectly optional with the patron to appoint any person he pleases master.

Did you hear that any of the Roman Catholic priests had interfered?—No, I did not.

What judgment have you formed of the proficiency of the scholars?—Those children who regularly attended the school, were very considerably improved, both in appearance and manners, and the proficiency they had made in reading, writing, and arithmetic, was very satisfactory; and certainly the anxiety of the lower order of farmers in the north for education, is very great; they have been known to form themselves into local committees, and to visit the school, and when a new house is to be erected, such as are unable to contribute pecuniary aid towards the building, will give work.

Have you used your best exertions to compel the observance of the rules of the Society?—I have.

Have you observed any considerable deviations from those rules in the course of your tours?—No, not any considerable deviations.

Have you, in any instance, heard of complaints proceeding either from the parents or the Protestant clergyman or the Roman Catholic clergyman, or any other person, of undue attempts to interfere with the religion of the children?—No; I met with very few Roman Catholic clergymen, except such as were the correspondents of the schools.

Did it come to your ears that there did exist any complaint in the neighbourhood of any of the schools, of any such attempt at undue interference with the religion of any of the children?—No, I never heard it.

If you had heard any such, what would you have done?—After having visited the school, I should have called upon the patron, and represented it to have been a deviation, and that his school would be struck off the Society's books, if the practice were continued.

Would you have reported it to the Society?—Instantly.

Are we to understand that you never had occasion to make any such report?—Never.

Have you any doubt upon your mind of the course the Society would pursue in the event of any such interference?—I rather imagine they would first communicate with the patron on the deviation from their rules; and if from his answers, they were not satisfied that such deviations should not again occur, the school would cease to receive any further assistance. The only instance of opposition which I met on my last tour was at Drumcar, in the county of Louth; a difference having arisen between the patron Mr. M'Clintock and the Rev. Mr. Rogers, P. P. all the Roman Catholic children were withdrawn, and the latter gentleman inserted in the public prints the following paragraph:—"Mr. Daly, one of the Kildare-

" street

* street inspectors, will not deny having desired to see either Lady Elizabeth or Mr. M'Clintock, on account of something he did not approve of in the school." I think it right to say my reason for having called on Lady Elizabeth M'Clintock was merely to suggest an alteration of the school furniture, but I had no reason whatever to conclude that the rules of the Society were in the slightest degree infringed; on the contrary, my report entitled the master to a considerable gratuity.

Were you aware, when you were in the school of Drumcar, there was any complaint against the master, or any dissatisfaction expressed by the Roman Catholics from attempts to proselytise?—No; I heard formerly that comments were given upon the Scriptures, but latterly this practice was abandoned, when it was explained that the Society did not approve of it.

Did you inquire into the fact whether such comment had been used in the school?—Yes, and I found it had been formerly the case.

At what distance of time?—When it was first taken into connection with the Society.

How long was that previous to your visit?—About two years.

Are we to understand that for some time previous to your visit this comment had been discontinued?—Yes.

Can you say for what length of time this comment had been discontinued?—I should think since the visit of the preceding inspection, which was about a year previous to my visit.

Had you opportunities of forming any opinion in the course of your two northern tours, whether the system pursued by the Kildare-place Society is generally acceptable or otherwise to the Presbyterians?—I think it is, except to one sect, who wish to have the catechism taught; the Covenanters wish to have it made use of as a school book; but, in general, the Presbyterians adhere very strictly to the rules.

Are the Covenanters a numerous portion of the peasantry in the north of Ireland?—Not very numerous.

Do you not think it might satisfy their wishes upon the subject to have Saturday, or some part of it, set apart for that purpose?—I should think it would, and I suggested this arrangement to them; and it was very generally approved of, except by the lower orders.

Was it their clergyman that complained?—No, not their clergyman.

In the course of your tours, did you visit the schools of other societies not connected with the Kildare-place Society, the Association schools, or Erasmus Smith's schools?
—I visited their schools when I had time, whether in connection with the Society or not; those schools that could not receive general assistance from the Society, on account of non-compliance with their rules, were entitled to a grant of small histories to form a lending library.

Did you visit many of Erasmus Smith's schools not connected with the Society?—Yes.

Do you think, generally speaking, those schools are more or less efficient than the schools of the Society?—Less efficient; the master is paid a salary, and is not made to depend sufficiently on his own exertions.

Is there any system of inspection pursued with Erasmus Smith's schools?—Not to my knowledge.

Did it occur to you to make any observation of the manner in which they were supplied with school books and requisites; are there a sufficient quantity of those things in the schools?—I do not think there are; the children bring whatever books they please.

Speaking of them, upon the average, do you think they are as numerously attended as the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—No, I do not think they are.

Putting out of consideration the house and the buildings, do you think that in other respects Erasmus Smith's schools are materially superior to the common ordinary schools of the neighbourhood kept by private individuals?—They are much superior to the common schools of the neighbourhood; one of the best schools of Erasmus Smith's I visited was at Lisson, county Tyrone. Generally speaking, there is too much sacrificed for the appearance of the place where those schools are held.

Putting out of consideration that school, do you think they are even as good as those private schools, the success of which depends upon the exertion of the masters?—I think they are as good.

Has it ever occurred to you to see an instance of Erasmus Smith's schools thinly attended where gratuitous instruction was dispensed to those who would come, and in the immediate vicinity of a hedge school, numerously attended, where children were obliged to pay for their education?—I have not seen many of Erasmus Smith's schools; there were very few on my tour.

Have you visited many schools of the Association for discountenancing Vice?—I have been in a great many of them.

In about how many should you think you have been upon your two tours?—I should think probably 30.

Speaking of them as a class, not dwelling upon any particular schools that may be exceptions, either for good or evil, but the general average, do you consider them in general as effective as the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—I do not.

Do you consider them more or less efficient than Erasmus Smith's schools?—I think they are more so, being under the inspection of the clergyman of the parish, who can remove the master for any misconduct.

We understand it is in theory, the duty of the clergyman to exercise a superintendence over those schools; have you any grounds for forming any opinion, or have you any impression

Examination of Robert Daly,
Esq.
11 Dec. 1824.

impression upon your mind as to how the duty is performed?—I think the clergymen exert themselves more with the Association schools than Erasmus Smith's schools, and in consequence of that they are better.

Do you consider there is frequent and efficient inspection exerted generally over the schools of the Association by the clergyman, who, it is understood, ought to perform that duty?—If the school is near his residence, perhaps he does; some clergymen will exert themselves, and others not.

Have you any grounds for forming an opinion, as to whether the Roman Catholics, in the course of your tours, felt more or less objection to the schools of the Association, than they did to the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—I think it is latterly more against the Education Society, that they appear to object, on account of having the Scriptures introduced.

Are not the Scriptures read equally in the schools of the Association?—Yes; and the master must be of the established religion, and the catechism is taught, but still it is the Education Society they object to.

Can you account for that?—No, I cannot.

Do you think it may result from this, that they have reason to consider that the operations of the Kildare-place Society are more effectual, and more widely extended than the operations of the other Society, and is therefore likely to create a greater pressure?—I cannot account for it otherwise, except that they find that the schools are more effective.

Were you in many Sunday schools in the north of Ireland?—Yes, many.

Did they appear to be well and effectively administered?—Yes; in general the religious instruction of the children is reserved for the Sunday schools.

They are taught entirely by gratuitous teachers?—Yes.

What do you consider may be the number of gratuitous teachers attending a Sunday school in the north of Ireland?—About six teachers.

In what rank of life are they generally?—In general the better description of farmers, they are very anxious for education; the clergyman of the parish also visits them.

The system of Sunday school teaching is almost universal, is it not, in the county of Down?—Yes; they seem more anxious to establish Sunday schools than any other, and to get houses built for them; they consider them of the greatest service, for in places where the children used to assemble for amusement on Sunday, the Sunday schools have been the means of giving them better employment.

Have you ever seen any part of Ireland more civilized than the county of Down?—No.

Or where the laws are more respected?—No.

Do the Roman Catholic children attend, in any considerable numbers, those Sunday schools?—I cannot say; I never make inquiry as to the religion of the children.

Do you conceive that the same children who attend the Sunday schools, also attend the week-day schools?—I think in general they do not. I think the Sunday schools are confined to those children who are employed in herding cattle, who cannot attend the day schools. There is another description of schools that have been of great service, the adult night school.

Who instructs in those schools?—They generally have a master.

Is he generally one of the masters in the vicinity?—Yes, he receives payment for it; the masters under the Education Society instruct in the night schools.

Are those schools pay or gratuitous?—Pay.

Are we to understand that there is a sufficient desire on the part of the adult population, to induce them to pay for night education?—Yes, in the north.

How many adult schools can you speak of?—I only saw one in the county of Donegal, but almost at every school they have a night school; there is one school that has been very lately established at Fawn, and it is likely to be of the greatest service. Mrs. Hawkshaw has established it at the little village of Fawn, it has been attended by nearly 50 adults, who go there at seven o'clock, and the school breaks up at nine. I have heard previous to the establishment of this school, the peasantry were accustomed to assemble and to riot.

Is religious instruction given in those schools?—None at all.

Are they generally males or females?—Generally males.

Are there any evening schools for females only?—No.

Did you never hear of males and females indiscriminately attending a night school?—No, I never heard of any.

Have you been in many schools connected with the London Hibernian Society?—Yes.

Have you been in many of those schools which were at the same time connected with the Kildare-place Society, and the Hibernian Society?—In a few instances, but they were always held in miserable cabins.

Are we to understand, that the union of such schools with the Kildare-place Society, had a tendency to improve the school houses?—Considerably, because being in connection with the Kildare-place Society, they have better houses, and are brought under the superintendence of the Society.

Do you consider, that such a connection operates in any other respect as an improvement of the London Hibernian schools?—Paper and other requisites are given to the school; the Society does not provide them with Testaments, but in the Hibernian schools, previous to their connection with the Society, the Testament is made so much a class book, that every thing else is sacrificed to it.

Does the same effect continue to be produced after a connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I do not wish to say, that the system of the London Hibernian Society, if it were were strictly adhered to, would not be very good. The Society insist upon the children committing a certain number of chapters to memory, but they also insist upon due attention being paid to writing and arithmetic.

645

Did you find a pretty general spirit of resistance, on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, to the London Hibernian Society?—A little about Dungiven.

When a London Hibernian school becomes connected with your Society, does it not receive from them a grant of miscellaneous books?—Yes.

Have you had occasion to observe, whether those miscellaneous books are used in the London Hibernian schools after they have received them?—In general, I would not recommend a grant of library books being given to them, on account of the miserable cabins in which the schools are in general held, they could not take care of them.

The question is, whether you have observed any dislike upon the part of the patrons or masters of the London Hibernian schools, to make use of those books after they had received them?—No, certainly not; they seemed anxious to get them.

Appendix, N° 214.

Examination of Malachy Daly, Esq. on Oath; Monday, 13th December 1824.

YOU are an inspector under the Society for the Education of the Poor in Kildare-place?—Yes.

How long have you held that situation?—I was appointed the 20th of December last.

Have you been on more than one tour of inspection?—No.

What direction did you travel in?—The north-west.

Can you state from recollection what number of schools you visited?—No, I cannot.

What part of Ireland did you visit?—I went from this to Trim; then Westmeath, and from thence into Cavan; the southern half of Tyrone; then into Donegal; the entire of Donegal, except the barony of Innishowen; then I came back through Fermanagh; then the southern half of Cavan; then Westmeath and Meath, and one school in the county of Kildare.

Were your visits confined to the schools that were supported in a greater or less degree by the Society for the Education of the Poor, or did you visit other schools?—I visited some by the direction of the Society, upon which I made a separate report, and I visited for my own amusement, without making any report upon them, some schools that came across me; Mr. Edgeworth's school, I believe, is the only one I so visited, and I visited some schools that I reported on, not in connection with the Society, which I was requested to visit by gentlemen in the country; I am not sure whether more than one or two.

Which of the Kildare-street inspectors had been through that district before you?—I think Mr. Griffith was the one that preceded me.

At what period did his visit take place?—It was last year.

Did you carry with you any memoranda from his reports?—Yes; there were given me upon my road book the particulars in which he found fault with the schools, in order that I should ascertain whether they were rectified.

From the situation in which you found them, had you reason to believe the schools had improved in the time that had elapsed between the visits?—Yes, I believe they had; there were not many of them that had observations attached to them; very few in proportion.

Did the observations apply merely to deviations from the rules of the Society?—Sometimes in that respect; sometimes deficiencies in practice, and a want of cleanliness in the children.

Had the deviations from the rules of the Society been corrected?—Yes, in most instances.

Are you sure there were some in which they had not been?—It is on my mind that there were, but I cannot point out an instance that I am certain of.

Did any instances or deviations occur?—Yes.

Have you noticed all those deviations in your report?—Yes, all of them.

Specifying the nature of the deviation?—Yes.

Had you any means of knowing what had been the attendance in the school at the time of Mr. Griffith's visit?—Yes, it was given me on my road book.

Did you find the attendance corresponding with the account given by him, or had any great change taken place?—I really cannot say that I have often compared them, for a great number of schools on my tour were new ones, that had not been visited by Mr. Griffith, and that did not occur to me in general; I do not know that it did occur to me to compare them at all; I never did it.

Was the attendance, speaking generally, greater or less than you expected?—In most instances less.

Was that owing to any particular circumstance?—Yes, chiefly to the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy.

In what part of the country did you find that opposition prevail to the greatest extent?—More or less every where; in the county of Donegal most, to the best of my recollection, and as I came on towards Dublin, in the county of Westmeath.

Had you any opportunity of ascertaining when that opposition commenced?—I do not know that I had; I have asked what the cause of the small attendance was, and was told the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy; I have asked, in some instances, is it long since

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
13 Dec. 1824.

since the opposition has been very great, and sometimes was answered, no; latterly it has become greater than formerly.

When the attendance of a school in which the Kildare-place system is carried on is small, does it not always impede the progress of the master?—In some instances the master has told me he would be obliged to give up the school.

Can you mention any instance in which the master expressed that opinion?—One at Kilcock, which I was directed to visit a few days ago.

Was that a school lately established?—I think it was in September.

Had they ever had a full attendance at that school?—It never had been inspected before; I am pretty sure it had not; the master told me it had not, but the patron had written to the Society, stating that the attendance of the school had been decreased from 90 to 35, and I was directed to visit the school, and I found the attendance had decreased to that number, and was still continuing to decrease as each quarter expired for which the parents had engaged.

Who was the patron?—The Reverend William Harding.

Did the children pay to the master any part of his salary?—Yes, he had no emolument except what he derived from the children; they paid from 3s. 3d. to 5s. 5d. per quarter.

Did he receive no pay from the Kildare-place Society?—No, it had been recently established.

Was it a parish school?—No, I do not think it was.

Was the master the parish clerk?—I do not think he was.

Was it in connection with any other Society?—I believe not.

Had they got their books from the Kildare-place Society?—They had received some books from that Society.

What cause was assigned by the priest for his interference?—The cause assigned by the patron in his letter to the Society was, that the priest did not wish the Scriptures to be taught by a Protestant master; that was the reason given to me.

Was the master a member of the church of England?—I should think he was; I did not ask; I sometimes do not ask.

Had any catechism been taught in the school?—After school hours on Saturday only.

What catechism?—The church of England catechism only; and I made my report that there was no deviation from the rules of the Society.

You consider that no deviation?—No, certainly not; it is out of school hours; I call to mind another school, at a place called Kilmore, in the county of Westmeath; I saw it on my way to Kilcock; in this school the Roman Catholic children did not read the Scriptures according to the rules of the Society; I noticed that to the master as a deviation; he replied that it was in obedience to the direction of the parish priest they were not read; when I told the master they must be read according to the rules of the Society, he replied, "If I insist upon it, the scholars will desert me."

Did the Protestant children continue to read the Testament in that school?—Yes.

Were any catechisms taught in it?—I cannot charge my memory; I do not think there were.

Have you had reason to observe that the same efforts are made to clear a school where the master is a Roman Catholic?—I cannot say I have; I have met one instance in which there has been a very great reduction of a school near a village called Ballinnaght, in the county of Cavan; there were 102 upon the books, and 88 were withdrawn; there the master was a Roman Catholic.

What proportion of the 14 who remained were Roman Catholics?—Not any; the impression on my mind is that the master said so.

Had there been any attempt made to remove the master himself?—I did not hear that there had; the school-house was not completely finished, and the patron told me that the parish priest wished to see the inspector; I accordingly called upon him; he accompanied me to the school, and we found only eleven in attendance; he told me he withdrew the children by the direction of his bishop; I asked him what his objection was, and he said, "the only objection is the use of the Scriptures in the school without note or comment."

Did he mean to convey to you, that if they had been used with note or comment the children would not have been withdrawn?—No, he did not convey that; his answer was extremely precise; as precise as I have repeated it.

Did he say any thing of catechisms?—No.

Have you had opportunities of conversing with many Roman Catholic priests?—Not many; very few; I do not wish to come in collision with them; I was directed by the Society not to seek for opportunities to argue with them, but to give information when called upon.

Have you any reason to know whether the objection is to reading the Testament at all, or whether it is to the reading it without note or comment?—I think the reading it without note or comment is the sole objection; it will amount to that; with any Roman Catholic clergyman I have spoken to upon the subject I have brought it to that.

You are a Roman Catholic yourself?—I am.

As such you must be competent to form an opinion upon the subject, do you believe that any arrangement could be made for the admission of notes or comments that would satisfy the Roman Catholic priesthood?—Yes, there might be to satisfy them; but in my opinion it would be inexpedient to introduce the Scriptures with notes and comments among children of different persuasions while assembled together; the inexpediency would appear particularly evident where I have travelled.

Must

647
Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
13 Dec. 1824.

Must the notes and comments be necessarily controversial?—I think in general they are.

Is it on that account you think they would be inexpedient?—Yes, on that account I think they would be inexpedient.

Has it ever occurred to you to consider whether any arrangement could be made that would be satisfactory to the persons of different religious persuasions?—I think the arrangement that would produce most satisfaction, perhaps not unanimity, would be selections from the Scriptures, from which doctrinal chapters or verses might be excluded.

If an arrangement of that sort is to be made, how would you propose to meet the difficulty of there being two versions?—My opinion is, that moral extracts from either version, might be considered useful by any body of christians, but I am confident that if taken from the authorized version they would not be recognized by the Roman Catholic church, as selections from the genuine version of the Scriptures, and I would take the liberty of suggesting the propriety of excluding every thing of a religious nature during school hours, while children of different persuasions are assembled together, but arrangements might be made so as to ensure that religious instruction shall be given to the children of each persuasion, according to their respective tenets, when separated for that purpose.

Do you know a work called "Scriptural Lessons," which was printed by the permission of Doctor Troy?—I have seen it.

Have you found that the objections to that work have been as strong as to the Testament itself?—I have very seldom met with it, but it occurs to me, that I have heard some objection made to it.

Have you never heard this work was objected to by the Roman Catholic priests?—I think I have heard it, but I do not remember the instance; I have met with it very seldom.

In the case in which you mentioned that the Roman Catholic children were not compelled to read the Scriptures, was any objection made to their being in the school when they were read by the Protestant children?—I did not hear it.

Was the Douay version in that school?—No, it was not; there was the authorized version only.

Have you any reason to know whether the Roman Catholic priests would prefer the education of the Roman Catholics and Protestants being entirely separated, or whether, if the religious part of the question could be settled, they would be satisfied with their being educated together?—I have had so little opportunity of conversing with the Roman Catholic priests since I have had any thing to do with the Kildare-place Society, that I cannot say, but I should think they would have no objection to their being educated together in mere literary education, but that is a mere conjecture, I have not had any reason to know it to a certainty.

Have you seen many schools in your tour of inspection that have been devoted entirely to the education of Roman Catholics?—I cannot say, because I never ask, I am not in the habit of asking; it is not the spirit of our institution to make the distinction.

Are there many schools belonging to the Kildare-place Society, in the county of Donegal?—Yes, there are some commencing and some in being.

Is not the county of Donegal inhabited mostly by Roman Catholics?—Yes, in the retired parts.

Are the schools there well attended?—No.

Are they nearly empty?—No, I found a middling attendance, rather less than I usually met with; I understood there was an opposition, and that many had been withdrawn, but that there were still some Roman Catholics remaining; and there is a circumstance it is necessary for me to mention here,—when I first went to Donegal, I was told that a few Roman Catholics were continuing in the school although there had been opposition; I left the town of Donegal, and on my return through it I went to hear mass at a neighbouring chapel, and while I was there I heard the priest in a solemn manner declare, that he understood that some of the Roman Catholic children still attended the Society's schools, and that he would refuse every spiritual rite in his power to any persons who would send their children to the schools.

Do you know to what schools he alluded?—I think he said in the Society's schools, where the Scriptures were read without note or comment, but I think most of the schools there are in connection with both the Hibernian and Kildare-place Societies; I think he said in the Society's schools, I will not be positive as to his saying any thing about where the Scriptures were read.

Do you know whether the Societies are equally alike objectionable to the Roman Catholic priests, or whether some of them are more so than others?—No, I think the London Hibernian Society is much more objectionable.

Do you know why?—They object to the committing the Scriptures to memory, and they object to it on account of the spirit that is shewn by the persons who support it.

Have you seen many of the London Hibernian Schools that are in connection with the Kildare-place Society or any other society?—I do not know, I was not much in the habit of visiting schools not in connection with the Kildare-place Society, but some of them might have been previously in connection with the London Hibernian Society.

Do the inspectors of the London Hibernian Schools visit those in connection with the Kildare-place?—Yes they do, when they are in connection with both societies.

Have the inspectors of that society equal authority with yourself in those schools?—I understand so, the reward to the master is apportioned by them, they give so much a head for each child.

Are the rules and regulations of that society pasted up in the school?—In general they are.

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
13 Dec. 1824.

Is the master paid according to the proficiency of the scholars, as ascertained by the inspector?—Yes, I understand so.

Are not the Scriptures read by much younger persons in those schools?—Yes, they are made to learn them by heart the moment they are able to put three words together; what I mean is, that the Scriptures are committed to memory by the children, while they read very badly.

Is not the Testament used in those Schools almost entirely to the exclusion of all other books?—In several instances I have found it so; let me go in at what hour I would, I have found the Testament in the hands of the children.

Do the children invariably carry the Testament home at night?—They generally do.

Do the children that are educated in the schools in connection with the London Hibernian Society, advance as rapidly in writing and arithmetic as in those schools in which the rules of the London Hibernian Society are not followed?—No, I think in general they do not, but I cannot call to my mind many instances; I remember one in which I expressed my surprise that there was not a greater proficiency in reading and spelling, and both the master and patron told me, that the children spent so much time in learning the Scriptures by heart, they could not attend to those particulars; in this instance the master said he had some idea of declining the patronage of the London Hibernian Society, on account of the serious impediment which the practice of committing the Scriptures to memory caused to the progress of the children.

Did they learn the Scriptures by heart during the school hours?—Yes.

Are you sure of that?—I am, from what the masters tell me.

Did you ever examine any children to ascertain whether they still retained in their memory chapters in the Testament they had learnt in the preceding quarter?—No, I did not.

Is any explanation whatever given of the meaning of the words to the children in those schools that are connected with the London Hibernian Society?—It is admissible, and I believe recommended by that Society,—I think Capt. Pringle told me so.

Do the rules of the Kildare-place Society and the London Hibernian Society agree upon that point?—The London Hibernian Society recommend that those questions shall be asked, and as far as I understand the Kildare-place Society's rules, they recommend that they shall not.

When the master is in connection with both, which does he obey?—It is not a sine qua non with the Kildare-place Society.

But that answer supposes that the question put as to the meaning of the words in the Scriptures shall be confined to their grammatical purport and not upon doctrinal points?—Yes.

Do you happen to know whether any individuals connected with the London Hibernian Society's Schools, which you have seen in connection with the Kildare-place Society, are in the habit of explaining the Scriptures to the children or talking to them upon religious subjects?—I cannot call to mind whether those schools in which I have found explanations were given were precisely under the London Hibernian Society, as well as the Kildare-place Society, or not; but there were many instances in which I found explanations were given.

In what class of schools?—The lower class of schools; I cannot say how many were under both societies, or under one; but in the schools I have visited, I have found explanations were given.

Have you frequently found that explanations were given in schools connected with the Kildare-place Society alone?—I think I have.

Have you always noted it?—Yes, I have; the frequency is mere conjecture. I am certain I noted every instance which I found.

By whom were such explanations given, the schoolmaster or patron?—By different persons; sometimes by the master and sometimes by the patron, and sometimes by the minister.

Do you mean controversial explanations?—Yes, as far as I understood the matter, they were controversial explanations upon doctrinal points.

Do you find that the parents of the children like the system of instruction given by the London Hibernian schools?—I cannot say; I have never asked them any thing about it. It occurs to me strongly that I have heard some peasants make an objection to learning the Scriptures by heart. I recollect a clergyman of the established church to have told me, that the farmers in his neighbourhood objected to their children committing the Scriptures to memory, on account of loss of time.

Have any of the schools, in conjunction with both societies, lending libraries?—They generally have.

Do you find that the children make as much use of the lending libraries in the schools in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—I have not drawn a comparison; but in general they did not make much use of them; and in many of the schools, I have generally found fault with them for not using them.

Do you confine that to the London Hibernian Society's schools, or extend it to all schools?—To all schools, for I cannot make the distinction.

Did you generally find the desk or cupboard full of the books?—Yes; sometimes I found them altogether, and sometimes tossed about the room; but I have examined the scholars in the histories, and found them deficient in their knowledge of them.

Did you hear of any instances of children having changed their religion, when they had been educated in the schools under both societies?—No, I do not think I did.

Did

Did you hear any instance of any child having become a Protestant, or being a Protestant, having become a Roman Catholic, in any of the schools of the Kildare-place Society?—Not on my tour, to the best of my recollection.

Did you hear of any case where it was established, that any effort had been made to tamper with any child?—No, I do not remember any on my tour.

Is it your opinion, that the members of the Kildare-place Society would sincerely disapprove of such an attempt?—Decidedly. I heard a Roman Catholic bishop say, that attempts had been made to proselytise some Roman Catholic children in his neighbourhood; but I cannot say whether they were at any school under the Society.

Did you examine into the facts?—No, I did not; I had not an opportunity. I am not certain of the facts, but I do not think it could have been under the Society; for there was not any school belonging to the Society in the neighbourhood of the place. In one instance I did discover a disposition on the part of the patron, to do as much as he could to make the Roman Catholic children Protestants.

How did that disposition shew itself?—A gentleman called upon me, and said, he had heard I intended to visit his school; I said, I did; and he asked me if the Kildare-place Society would not prefer a Protestant master to a Roman Catholic. I said they did not express any wish upon the subject. He then asked me, if they would not prefer a Protestant version being placed in the school; I answered to the same effect. "Well," he said, "I have done the best I could; I was told it was of no use to place any master there but a Roman Catholic, and I think he will become a Protestant; and I have placed the Protestant version there."

Do you know whether that scholmaster has become a Protestant?—I cannot say.

Did you see him?—Yes.

Did you see any thing about him to lead you to suppose he had become a Protestant?—No, quite the contrary; I found the Roman Catholic catechism in a desk, and I reported it.

Did you report the conversation between you and the patron?—No, I have not put it upon my report; I intended to have mentioned it to the committee.

Had that school been long in operation?—No, it was the first time I visited it.

Where was that school?—At Dysart, about nine miles from Donegal, in a very retired situation.

Why did you mention the one circumstance in your report, that relating to the catechism, and not the other?—It was too minute a thing, I did not think I could put it clearly upon paper; but I believe I have a note of it; and it struck me so forcibly, I have it in my mind.

What deviation from the rules of the Society did you find most frequent?—I think, explanation of the Scriptures.

Do you mean explanation of a verbal description?—Verbal explanations of a doctrinal nature, oral explanations.

You mean explanations that went beyond the giving the meaning of any single word?—Yes; as far as I understood the explanation of the master, when I have asked him whether the Scriptures were explained in the school, and he has told me that it was the case, I have said, how so; and he has taken up the book to shew me. He has read a verse, and has evidently given that sort of explanation which, if practised through the book, would lead to doctrinal points, though that was not a doctrinal passage.

Have you any means of knowing whether the children, by their mode of reading the Scriptures, were able really to comprehend the meaning of them?—I really do not think they were.

How were you able to form an opinion upon that subject?—They in general read so badly, and so quick, that they would make mistakes in words, and call one word for another. I speak in general; but I never ask any explanation.

Have you ever heard them interrogated at all as to the meaning of what they read?—No, not while reading the Scriptures.

Did you meet with any instances in which controversial tracts were dispersed in the schools?—Not on my tour; any that I have met, are in my reports. I remember the gaol school at Cavan; there I found tracts.

Is that in connexion with the Society?—Yes.

Is that an adult school?—Yes.

Were those merely religious tracts, or controversial tracts?—Words of a doctrinal nature were explained, and tracts of a controversial nature were used.

Do you recollect the names of any of the tracts?—No, I do not.

Did you ascertain that they were controversial as well as religious?—It is on my mind that I must have done so, for I would not have ventured to have returned it otherwise.

What other deviations did you find from the rules of the Kildare-place Society?—I had understood, until last September, that it was a sine qua non with the Society, that the Testament should not be made a school book, from which the children should learn to read and spell. I have frequently reported it as a deviation; and I was written to by the Society, that it was not so provided; there were no explanations given. I persevered in saying, I conceived the practice a deviation from their rules, and then I was called to town, and had a conversation with the committee upon the subject; and they explained to me that it was not a deviation, but a matter of recommendation to avoid the practice. I believe I have subsequently noticed it, once in the former respect, and in a few instances, in the latter.

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
13 Dec. 1824.

Did they give you any written instructions upon that subject?—They did.

[The witness was directed to produce them.]

Can you recollect any school in which the Roman Catholic catechism was taught after school hours?—I cannot call to mind any particular school; but it occurs to me there have been some on my tour.

Do you remember any school in which the Presbyterian short catechism was taught?—No, I cannot point out the schools; but I am pretty sure it is the case in a few instances.

You are speaking of the Kildare-place Schools?—Yes; I visited very few others.

Did you find many schools in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Yes, I met some, but I do not think many; but they were also in connection with the Kildare-place Society.

Was the catechism taught in those schools?—Yes, I remember one; and I remember I sent a request that it should be struck out of the books of the Society.

Was the catechism in that school taught during school hours?—So the master told me.

Was that the school where you recommended that the connection should be discontinued?—Yes.

Was it on account of the catechism being taught?—On account of the rules of the Society being violated in that respect and in others; but I cannot recollect them.

What school was that?—Drumloor. The catechism was taught almost regularly every second day during school hours; and the catechisms are kept in the school room in places of easy access.

Do you consider that practice to be a breach of the rules of your Society?—Yes.

If, when they began to teach the catechism, they had said school-hours were over, and turned the Roman Catholic children out of the school, would not that have been in conformity with the Kildare-place Society's regulations?—Yes.

Would not the only difference have been, that the Roman Catholic children would have been turned out of the school?—Yes.

Do you know what the Roman Catholic children were doing during the time the Protestant children were learning the catechism?—To the best of my recollection, they were learning their common lessons.

Do you know whether this practice was strongly objected to by the Roman Catholic priest?—I cannot say that it was in that instance; I do not find any mention made of it.

Were there both Roman Catholics and Protestants in the school?—Yes, I am sure there were.

Is that the only school you found in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—No, I found more.

Can you state, from recollection, what arrangement was made for teaching the catechism?—Yes, out of school hours.

Was that the only school you recommended to be discontinued?—I think I recommended Cavan gaol school.

Do you happen to know whether the schools of the Association for discountenancing Vice are more or less objected to by the Roman Catholic priests than those of the London Hibernian Society?—I do not remember that they have objected to them in any particular instance, unless under the general term of any society's schools.

Do you know whether they are more or less objected to than the Kildare-place Society's schools?—They are very seldom met with in my tour.

Did you meet with any schools established by the Baptist Society?—No, but I met with one which had been established by a society called the Methodist Missionary Society.

Was that in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—No.

Where was that?—In a very retired part of the county of Donegal; I wanted to see how near it was to a school connected with our Society that had been broken up; it had been put forward after the other had been suppressed.

Was it lately erected?—Only a few months.

Was the school kept in a good school-room, or was it like a hedge school?—A little money might make it a good school-room, but it was not then; it was spacious, but had no windows or desks.

Was it built for the purpose?—I do not know.

Was it fully attended?—Yes, I believe by between about 30 and 40 children.

Were there many Roman Catholic children?—I do not remember whether I asked the question.

Do you remember the system of instruction?—I did not enquire into the system.

Did they read the Scriptures?—To the best of my recollection, I asked that question, and I think they did, but I will not be certain; I generally do.

Did you hear whether it had been denounced by the Roman Catholic priest?—No. I know the priest of the neighbouring parish was opposed to the Society's schools; whether that place was in the parish, I do not know.

Have you reason to know whether the Roman Catholics generally suppose all societies schools to be similar?—I do not remember having heard them speak particularly of schools under any society, except those under the Kildare-place and the London Hibernian Societies.

Which do you think are the most objectionable?—I think they reckon the Hibernian Society the most objectionable.

Have

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
13 Dec. 1824.

Have you heard any thing of the Baptist Society?—No, I do not think I have met with any of its schools on my tour.

Are many of the schools that you visited in connection with Erasmus Smith's charity?—No; I have not visited any, except from curiosity; I have looked into them, not in many instances, but not one of them is in connection with the Kildare-place Society on my tour.

Did you see many schools that receive aid from Colonel Robertson's bequest?—Yes, there are several in the diocese of Raphoe.

How many schools did you find that were aided by his bequest?—I do not recollect the number.

Do you know in what way the charity is administered, according to what rules?—I believe it is a sine qua non that the master must be a Protestant.

Is there any condition with regard to reading the Scriptures?—I never heard of any.

Any condition as to the catechism?—I do not remember that I have heard of any.

Do the trustees of the charity appoint a schoolmaster, or is it given in aid of schools where the master is appointed by other persons?—I believe that depends upon respectable certificates, but I cannot say.

Are any of them in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes.

Would your return shew which of them?—Yes.

What opinion were you able to form of the proficiency of the scholars; do you think their progress is as good as might reasonably be expected?—I cannot judge from comparison, not having seen the schools before, and I do not know of any other way in which I could judge.

Have there not been many applications made for aid for new schools from the Kildare-place Society?—Not many; I think they are chiefly grants already made.

Do you think the schools in general are on the increase in that district?—Yes, if I judge, comparing my own tour with the gentleman who preceded me.

How do you account for the great increase of the number of schools, accompanied with the great decrease in the number in attendance?—The clergymen of the established church are the chief patrons that apply for assistance for a school near them, according as they want it; and when the answers to the queries are satisfactory to the Society, they grant the money; they generally wait for the inspector to visit.

Do you think it likely that a gentleman of the established church would wish to have a school established, unless he thought there was likely to be a good attendance?—I cannot say as to that.

Do you think that the efforts that have been made to clear the schools are merely a temporary exertion, or do you think it will be permanently effectual in diminishing the attendance of Roman Catholics in the schools?—I have a strong opinion that the opposition will be permanent in preventing them attending the schools under the Kildare-place Society.

On what do you found that opinion?—On the disapprobation I find in general expressed by the Roman Catholic clergy.

Do you think that the people have either the will or the power to resist their authority?—They have the power, but I think the authority is equal to keep them away from attending.

Is the dread the people have of being denied the rites of the church, such as to induce them to forego the advantages of educating their children?—Decidedly.

Have they any alternative; when they have removed the children from the school, can they send them to other schools?—Sometimes they can; but I met one instance in which the priest established a school after having withdrawn the scholars from one of the Kildare-place Society's schools, and the children left the new school because the master charged them something; he could not teach them for nothing; so that it is to be supposed they are now destitute of education.

Did you meet with any instance in which the owners of the land exerted their personal influence with Roman Catholic parents to send their children to the schools?—Not on my tour.

Did you meet with any school in which there was a Roman Catholic master, and in which all the pupils were Roman Catholics?—Yes; that one I mentioned a while ago, the Dysart school, in the county of Donegal.

Is that in connection with your Society?—It is.

Was the Testament read in it?—Yes.

Regularly?—I believe so.

Appendix, N° 215.

Further Examination of Malachy Daly, Esquire, on Oath;
Wednesday, 15th December 1824.

CAN you state about how many Kildare-place Society's schools you visited in your last north-west tour?—I have since ascertained it to be 160 in connection.

About how many of those in the province of Ulster?—There are but very few that are not in that province.

Were there many Roman Catholic children in attendance in them?—It is not the practice of the Society to enquire, but I have sometimes enquired from the master outside the school-room, but I could not give the average.

Did you find the schools, generally speaking, attended in a manner you considered sufficient by the scholars?—No.

Malachy Daly,

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
15 Dec. 1824.

Did you find them generally more empty than you expected?—Yes; wherever my visit happened to be anticipated there was a full attendance, but in general there was rather less than I would expect. But I did not compare the number given me on the book with the attendance; there were many of them that were lately established.

Can you say whether the schools, upon the occasion of your visit, were more or less numerously attended than upon the visit of the preceding inspector?—No.

Have you any opinion upon the subject?—No; I could ascertain it by comparing my reports with my road book.

Was not it a part of the ordinary course of executing your peculiar business, to compare the state of the school when you visited it with the state in which the preceding inspector had found it?—I did not consider it my duty to compare it, as to the number, but as to the improvement of the scholars.

Can you state, generally, the average number you found in the schools?—It must be a very vague answer I could give.

Did you often find 40, 50 or 60?—On the average, about 35 or 40.

What was the greatest number you recollect to have found any where?—In one house, in which there were two rooms, one appropriated to males, and the other to females, I found 99 in each; and in another I found 99 also.

What was the least number you found in any one school?—Four, five, six or seven; there were very few so small as that.

About how many schools were there in which you found less than 20?—I can scarcely give an answer to that; I think that I am under the number when I say five, or six or seven; perhaps ten or eleven.

You think from five-and-thirty to forty is the average?—Yes.

Be so good as to ascertain that point?—I will.*

What is your impression as to the proportion of the children in attendance in the schools of the north-west of Ireland that were of the Roman Catholic religion?—I think the Roman Catholics were in small numbers; but when there was a tolerably good attendance, about 40. I think I have sometimes found them, on enquiry of the master, about equal.

Where there were ninety-nine in attendance, which was the majority, Roman Catholics or Protestants?—I could not say; I did not ask.

Was it a fact that came under your observation, whether the Roman Catholic clergy had exerted themselves much to withdraw the Roman Catholic children from the Kildare-street schools, in the province of Ulster?—I heard a Roman Catholic priest from the altar object to the children going to any of the Society's schools, and that he would withhold the rites of their religion from the parents, if they sent them to those schools; and I have heard other priests object against them from the altar, though not so directly.

In what parish did you hear that particular denunciation?—It was very close to Donegal.

Were there any Roman Catholic children in attendance at the Kildare-street schools in that parish?—Yes; and I heard that that priest was priest of two parishes, in both of which there were Kildare-street schools, and Roman Catholics in them. I mentioned in my report that few of the children attended, in consequence of the opposition; and on my return through Donegal, I heard what I have stated.

Will you state any proceedings that you either knew to have been adopted by the Roman Catholic clergy, or that you heard had been adopted, so as to lead you to believe that they had kept the children from the schools?—I do not know that I have heard of any except preaching in the chapels, except in one instance; that was at Kilcock. The master and the patron both told me, I believe, or certainly one of them, that the priest not only spoke at the altar, but went round to the parents to desire them not to send their children to the schools.

Did you ever hear of the dying consolations of their religion being refused to persons in consequence of having sent their children to those schools?—No.

Or the churching of the women?—No.

Nor absolution?—No.

In what manner do you account for the Roman Catholic children attending the Society's schools in the north-west of Ireland, when the Roman Catholic clergy denounce the practice?—I suppose from desire for education; I cannot give any other reason, not having mixed with the people or enquired, and indeed not having any means of enquiring.

You have stated in the former part of your examination, that the practice of getting the Scriptures by heart was considered more objectionable by the Roman Catholic clergy than the mere reading of them?—Yes.

Will you explain what you conceive to be the grounds of that feeling?—I cannot say, I have had so little argument with them upon the subject; but they have told me they objected to that practice highly. I was asked, on my last examination, whether the committing the Scriptures to memory interfered with the progress of the children in any degree; I could not call them

* NORTH-WEST TOUR.

Sixty-four schools were visited on this tour by the inspector in the year 1823; the average attendance stated to be found by him in these schools at inspection, amounted to 47 $\frac{1}{2}$.

The same schools were visited by me in the year 1824; the average attendance found by me in the same schools, at inspection, amounted to 41 $\frac{1}{2}$. In one school, which I have not taken into account, the inspector found in 1823, 57 scholars in attendance. The reason I have not included it in the above calculation is, that the teacher had been deprived of his school room. There was not a school going forward.

The teacher told me that all the Roman Catholic children who had been in the habit of frequenting his school, were withdrawn by the parish priest, in consequence of the use of the Scriptures in the school under the regulations of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland. It was not under the London Hibernian Society, nor do I believe under any other.

to my recollection at the time, but I have in my mind instances in which that practice was stated to interfere with the progress of the children.

Have you had much conversation with the Roman Catholic clergy, upon your tour, upon the subject of education?—Previous to my visit to Dublin, in September, I had some; but except then, I had not. Afterwards they knew who I was, and sought it, and I did not shrink from it.

In what light do they view you, as a Roman Catholic gentleman having accepted an office under the Kildare-place Society?—They did not appear to think me a conscientious man; but I remember a priest having expressed his astonishment that the Society had appointed a Catholic.

Did they often remonstrate with you?—They did not openly, except on one or two occasions.

Did you vindicate your proceeding?—Yes.

In what manner?—I told them I had the consent of Doctor Murray, and of my own bishop, which has subsequently been withdrawn.

Did you make any exposition upon those occasions of what you conceived to be the rules of the Society?—I have made expositions of the practices of their schools.

Did you state any thing as to your own opinion of the sincerity of their professions?—I am not certain whether I did or not; but if it came across me, I should have done so, decidedly.

Did you find that, in any instances, such conversations between you and the priests had the effect of abating their prejudices against the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, in one case, particularly; and I noted it on my mind, since my last examination, in order to mention it to the board; I think it of great consequence. The priest of the parish told me the master of a school in connection exclusively with the Kildare-place Society, had been refused the rites of the church for the two last years in consequence of being master under the Society, and that this refusal was by the directions of the bishop of the diocese. I had thought it my duty, when I understood this, to mention it to the Society, and also to endeavour to relieve the poor man from such a stigma upon his character as well as unpleasant feeling, and I endeavoured to explain the principles and rules of the Society to the priest, and he asked me afterwards to allow him to go to the school along with me. I told him I was delighted at his offer. I took him there; and on his return he said he would remonstrate with his bishop, and almost in spite of his bishop, he would administer the rites of the church to him. I said, "Will you admit him to the sacraments?" and I think he said positively he would.

In what manner do you account for the master submitting to the deprivation of the sacrament for two years?—I suppose he felt there was not that degree of impropriety in the circumstance which was imagined, and that the school was an object to him; he is looked upon as a well conducted man, and his school is a very good one.

What is your own opinion as to the popularity or unpopularity of these schools, among the people themselves, supposing their clergy not to interfere upon the point?—I have had every reason to induce me to think that the Roman Catholics in general will be guided by their clergy in that respect, and I have no acquaintance except with the higher classes that I call on officially, that could give me any means of forming an opinion.

Was it your practice to make a note of the number you found in the schools on all occasions when you visited them?—Yes, and I reported them.

Were you in the habit of examining the registers or rolls for the purpose of ascertaining the number in attendance at other times?—Yes, in order to ascertain the average, I am obliged to state the average for two or three months preceding.

Your average statement was made up from the actual examination of the rolls?—Not always, generally from the statement of the master, and looking at the roll where it was kept, and comparing the two together.

Do you recollect visiting a school at Strabane, called a female free school?—I do.

Do you happen to recollect whether you found the rules of the Society conformed to in that school, or whether you found any deviation?—I found a deviation; I found a Roman Catholic edition of the Scriptures with notes and comments to it—whether there were any others I cannot charge my memory.

Was the teacher in that case a Roman Catholic?—I believe not.

Do you recollect whether you gave any instruction on that occasion, that no explanation whatever should be given, not even verbal explanations of the Scriptures, or were you in the practice of giving any such directions?—Yes, when I suspected it was done, I always did.

Even verbal explanations, and the meaning of words?—My practice was this—if my opinion were asked upon the subject—that it was considered by the Society inexpedient, but that it was not prohibited to ask the meaning of words, except such as involved doctrinal points, such as baptism or repentance.

It is a recommendation, though not an absolute rule?—Yes, so I understand the laws of the Society.

Do you recollect visiting at Strabane, a school that was in connection with your Society, and also the Hibernian Society?—I do.

Do you recollect any thing particular occurring at the time of the examination of that school?—I think I remember giving the man directions not to make the Testament a school book.

Do you recollect your giving any instructions with respect to the number of children that should be permitted to read the Testament?—Not the number but the description of children, those who had attained a suitable proficiency.

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
15 Dec. 1824.

Do you happen to recollect, that a considerably greater number had been entered on those reading classes by the inspector of the Hibernian Society?—I believe I do; I cannot say for certain, without referring to my report.

You mentioned, on your former examination, that the progress of the children attending the Hibernian Society's schools was not in general equal to those who attended the Kildare-place Society's schools?—Yes.

Did that fact arise in a great measure from the circumstance of their being confined to the reading the Scriptures almost entirely?—Yes, and committing them to memory.

Do you not conceive it may also arise from the circumstance that those schools are in general less adequately provided with books, writing materials and other things, compared with the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, that combined with the other reason may strengthen the effect, but I am decidedly of opinion that the practice checks the improvement in other respects, and since my former examination, I have recollected two instances; in one place the master received 11*l.* a year from the London Hibernian Society, and he told me he had some idea of declining the patronage of that Society, as he could not get the children on; I looked at my memorandum to ascertain what his annual receipt was under that Society; the other was a school in which there were 99 children in attendance, I found the proficiency of the scholars in reading and spelling very tolerable indeed, but I found a considerable deficiency in writing and arithmetic; on my observing this deficiency to the patron and master, they agreed that it could not be rectified, the master told me, on account of the practice of committing the Scriptures to memory; the patron told me aside, that he did not wish to deprive the master of the benefits of the Society, but he disapproved of it, and if he could, he would decline the patronage of that Society. The patron was a clergyman of the established church, and a zealous man.

Do you recollect in those Hibernian Society's schools, finding the children committing the Scriptures to memory?—In one or two instances I was told that they committed them to memory at home; I have ascertained the number of Hibernian schools to be 32, and I believe more, which are also in connection with our Society, and which I visited.

In what number of those did you find the children employed in committing the Scriptures to memory?—I did not ascertain that.

Is it a regulation of the Kildare-place Society, that the Scriptures shall not be carried home by the children or not?—I never heard any prohibition upon the subject.

Have you been in the practice of recommending that they should not be carried out of the school-room?—Yes, in this way; not that they should not carry them out of the school-room; but I understood previously to my being called back to Dublin, that all the Society required was, that the Scriptures should not be made a school book; I directed that the book should be taken from the scholars after they had read it, and be laid aside; I think I have been asked in some instances whether they were to be taken home or not; and I do not know whether I controlled them or not; the impression on my mind is, that I have not controlled them.

What would be your practice now, with the impression and understanding you have of the rules of the Society?—Decidedly to let them take them home, and not to check them at all; I have no controul in this respect.

You have stated that a number of schools derived aid from a fund left by Colonel Robertson?—Yes, in the diocese of Raphoe.

Is it not a condition, under the will of Colonel Robertson, that the teacher of the school should be a Protestant?—I understand so.

How is that reconciled with the regulation or principle of the Kildare-place Society, that persons are eligible of all religious persuasions?—I am often at a loss to know that; it depends upon the patron who applies for the school, what answer he gives to that query; I understand that it is not absolutely an affirmative or a negative that is required to that query; I understand this from my brother inspectors, that to the query, asking whether all persuasions are admissible, the answer might be, I have chosen a Catholic or a Protestant, as the case may be.

Have you known of instances in which answers of that kind have been given, and have been deemed satisfactory?—No, I have not; I only heard it the day before yesterday; I always understood it required an absolute affirmative or negative. The priest who was so well satisfied with the teacher's conduct that he would admit him to the sacrament upon my exposition of the rules of the Society to him, said, "I declare, I think I will apply for a school at my gate going into the chapel-yard;" I said, "As I have explained the rest of the rules of the Society, I must explain to you one point; can you answer as to the admissibility of any persuasion as teacher in your school?" "No," said he, "I would not admit a Protestant."

Was any application made by that person to the Society?—No.

Have any other deviations taken place that you can mention in the schools belonging to your Society, either by the schoolmaster, the visitor, or any other person in the school?—In the school at Enniskillen I found a deviation.

What was the nature of the deviation?—The master told me that the London Hibernian inspectors were the only persons in the habit of explaining the Scriptures.

Did he mention the occasions on which this had taken place, and the persons by whom; did he state that this was their usual practice; did he apply to all the inspectors, or one, or how many of them?—He applied it to two, and he named one whose name is O'Connor; he told me that in consequence of that circumstance, the Roman Catholic priest had withdrawn some children who had been a long time in attendance.

What

Examination of Malachy Daly,
Esq.
15 Dec. 1824.

What was the name of the schoolmaster at that school?—M'Guire, I think.

Did he mention the particulars of the explanation that had been given upon those occasions?—No; I asked him if the explanations were of a controversial nature, and to the best of my belief, he gave me to understand they were.

Did you make it distinct to him that it was not verbal explanations that you meant?—I am pretty sure I did, because I am very particular in that in general.

Have you, besides the case you have mentioned of the Roman Catholic Testament with notes, found any other instances where copies of the Scriptures were used with notes?—Yes, I have found Association Bibles; they are, I believe, considered controversial, as they have marginal notes in which the phrase is put in other words. I believe the admission of such Bibles in a school is considered a deviation. I have always reported so, except in one instance, where the book was covered with dust on a shelf in a corner of the room, and evidently not in use; and the impression on my mind was, from the patron's family and the master, that it was not in use, and I did not mention it.

Did you find any case where the schoolmaster was a Protestant, and where the superintendents were Protestants, in which the Scriptures were not used?—I met the other day with a school where the Scriptures were not in use, and the patroness was daughter to the Protestant rector, and I suppose a Protestant, and the mistress, I should think, was also a Protestant.

Have you met with a considerable number of instances where the Scriptures were not used?—No, very few; I have met some instances where there were Prayer books lying in the school-room, and some instances where a prayer was used at the commencement and end of the school, which are considered deviations.

Have you observed any remarkable instance of prejudice existing against the Society which you attribute to ignorance of the principles of the Society?—The priest who went with me to the school I have mentioned, told me, that his bishop observed to him, when he said he would ask my permission to go to the school, that I would not allow him.

Did he mention the reason that was given?—No, he did not; I understood it exactly as I have stated. The impression on my mind is, that he meant that I would not wish him to see the practices of the Kildare-street Society, that I would wish to conceal some practices in the Society from the priest.

Appendix N° 216.

Examination of William Fitzgerald, Esquire, on Oath; Wednesday,
29th December 1824.

ARE you an inspector of the Kildare-place Society?—I am.

How long have you held that office?—One year.

What tour have you been?—The north-east tour.

What counties did you visit?—I commenced my tour of inspection in the county of Dublin, and visited Meath, Louth, Down, Armagh and Antrim.

How many schools had you an opportunity of examining in the course of your inspection?—I should think better than 200.

What proportion of those may have been in connection with the Society?—As well as I recollect about 170.

What were the other 30 principally?—Schools not in connection with the Society.

What induced you to visit them?—I was directed by the Society to visit all other schools, not in connection, should time permit.

Was the attendance in the schools, connected with the Society, as great as you had reason to expect?—In general better in many cases; I was enabled to judge of that by the inspector's report of the former year.

Do you mean, that the number you found in those schools exceeded those numbers?—Yes, in many cases.

Can you say, whether, upon the aggregate of all the schools you inspected, there was a greater number in them at the time of your inspection, than there had been at the time of the former inspection?—I have reason to think it was the case.

Did you find many instances in which the rules of the Kildare-place Society had been deviated from?—Yes, and I reported accordingly.

Could you specify in how many of those 170 schools there were deviations?—As well as I can recollect, not more than 30 of those in connection with the Society.

Mention the general nature of those deviations?—They were schools not supplied with the Testament, and reading the selections in lieu of the Testament, and in other cases where catechisms were introduced.

Which of those deviations most frequently occurred?—The want of the Scriptures—unintentionally in general.

Did the non-use of the Scriptures appear to arise principally from a disinclination to admit them into the school, or from the rule of the Kildare-place Society, that omits to supply them?—The want of funds to supply them.

Did it arise from any objection entertained by the Roman Catholics?—Not in many cases.

Were there many cases, in which Roman Catholic children had been withdrawn to any considerable extent by the Roman Catholic clergy?—In the county of Armagh, I met with some cases, and in the county of Louth particularly.

Examination of William Fitzgerald,
Esq.
29 Dec. 1824.

In about how many instances, out of 170, did you find that any Roman Catholic children had been withdrawn by their clergy?—As nearly as I can recollect, not more than 25, or from that to 30, and that not to any great extent.

Is it your impression, that no attempt had been made to withdraw them in the other counties, and the other schools, or do you believe that the attempt, though made, had not been successful?—In general the attempt was successful, but the children afterwards, I understood, came back to the school.

Are we to understand, that the attempt had been pretty generally made, or that it was confined to the 25 or 30 instances you have spoken of?—Confined chiefly to the number I have stated.

Are we to understand, that in about 150 instances no such attempt had been made?—The number I have stated, is that in which such attempts had been made.

Supposing the number to be correct, and mentioning that, we do not consider the number of five or ten schools, on one side or the other, of any consequence, you must see there is a distinction between such an attempt having been generally made, and having generally failed, and having only been partially made, and partially failed, will you tell us whether it is your impression, that in the 140 or 150 instances above referred to the attempt had been made or not?—The attempt has been made in several schools, particularly in those counties I have stated; I met with very few cases personally, and in those schools I had to visit, I heard of very few attempts having been made; but on my return, I met with a great many more, particularly in Armagh and Louth.

Laying out of consideration the 25 or 30 schools in which an attempt had been made, had an attempt been made in the remainder of the schools, or not?—It had been talked of; I did not hear it from the patrons generally, for the part of the country where I had been is mostly composed of Episcopalians and Presbyterians, and there was nothing unpleasant going on there.

Did you find many Roman Catholic children in the schools you are speaking of?—Yes, particularly in those schools in the counties of Louth and Armagh.

The fact we wish to ascertain is, whether there was or not such opposition exerted in those other schools?—I should imagine there was opposition given.

Did you hear of such opposition, or did you not?—Yes, I did; but I did not hear of any unpleasant consequences arising from it generally.

Is it your impression, that an opposition was attempted, and did not succeed?—Yes; in fact, I heard very little until my return; it was a part of the country where there was very little opposition from any quarter.

Mention the parts?—Hillsborough, Dromore, Banbridge, Belfast, Carrickfergus, and all in that direction.

In those districts, is it your impression that no opposition was made to the schools by the Roman Catholic clergy?—I heard there was opposition given, but nothing occurred in consequence of it; the Roman Catholic clergy spoke against the schools.

Are we to understand, that in those districts the Roman Catholic clergy had spoken against those schools?—Yes, but did not succeed in general.

Had they succeeded in other places?—Yes.

Every where?—Not every where.

Are we to understand, that those places comprehended within them the 140 schools, be they more or less, the subject of the former question?—I stated about 25 or 30 were those I heard of where opposition was given.

Where were the 25 or 30 schools of which you have been speaking?—Chiefly in the counties of Louth, Armagh and Down; some opposition was given by a Roman Catholic clergyman in the county Antrim, arising from his unwillingness to have the Scriptures read.

Did he succeed in those instances?—Yes, but the children came back.

Can you mention any probable proportion of the 170 schools, in which there was no opposition on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy?—On Lord Downshire's property, I visited 14 or 15 schools, and I heard of no opposition there, nor on any part of his lordship's property; in the county of Antrim, I heard of very little opposition being given.

What do you consider was the average attendance you found in the schools?—That I cannot immediately recollect; the attendance of the children is very bad at this period of the year, and therefore it would be very difficult to tell that, unless by a reference to my road book.

Is that book drawn out?—Yes.

Have you your reports?—They have been sent up to the Society.

Will you mention any particular schools, in the counties of Armagh and Louth, in which the opposition of which you have been speaking particularly occurred?—There were two schools, one under Mr. Thackeray, of Dundalk, and he was obliged to exclude the Scriptures altogether, or the children would not go to the school.

Was that school in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, and he got a grant; I called upon him, and observed, that the rules of the Society were not complied with, he said he could not help it; he said he had found, if he attempted to introduce the Scriptures, he would not have a child in the school.

Do you consider that school in connection with the Society?—No.

Do you know whether Mr. Thackeray had actually received any grant from the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, I think in books to the amount of 10*l*.

Not in money?—No, books and school requisites only.

Will

057
Examination of William Fitzgerald,
Esq.
29 Dec. 1824.

Will you mention any other instances in the counties of Armagh and Louth, where particular opposition was given to the schools?—There is a place called Tullymore Park, in the county of Down, where opposition was given.

Were the children withdrawn from those schools?—Some of them were, I heard.

To what extent?—I think about eighteen or twenty out of seventy, as well as I can recollect; the other case was at a place called Kinnery, in the county of Armagh, in the parish of Clonfeacle, there the Roman Catholic clergyman opposed the school, and set up one in opposition to it, and he took off fifteen children.

In the school at Tullymore Park, about twenty children were taken away and fifty remained, were the fifty who remained Protestants?—Principally Protestants and Presbyterians.

Did any Roman Catholic children remain in that school?—I heard afterwards that they had gone back.

Did you hear whether they had returned to the school at Clonfeacle?—No, I did not.

Did you feel able to form any confident opinion as to whether the children are likely to come back or not to the schools whence they had been withdrawn?—A great deal depends upon the respective patrons and teachers going on quietly and taking no notice of the opposition from whatever quarter it may come.

Do you think the opposition itself will cease, or cease to be effectual?—I am inclined to think the opposition will cease.

Had you an opportunity of seeing the school at Drumcar?—I had.

Did you find any Roman Catholic children in it?—I never enquire into that.

Did you find many children in it?—Yes, I was accompanied by the senior inspector of the Society, Mr. Mills.

About how many children might you find?—About sixty or seventy, I think.

Have you heard what number of children may be in that school at present?—On my return I made some enquiry, and I understood the school had fallen off to ten or twelve; I heard that the teacher had made an application to Mr. M'Clintock to allow him to go away from the neighbourhood—that he was afraid of remaining there.

Afraid of what?—That was all I heard, that he did not like to stay in the neighbourhood.

Were there any London Hibernian schools in the course of your tour?—Very few.

Were there any connected with that Society, also in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, one was under the patronage of the Reverend Mr. Oliver, of Loughgall, in the primate's diocese, and the second was under Major Bailey; the latter, I believe, received only a grant of Bibles and Testaments, and no other aid whatever from the Hibernian Society.

Was the Hibernian system pursued in those schools?—I should think so.

Did you find any schools in connection with the Society for discountenancing Vice, also in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, I did.

About how many out of 170?—About twenty, but that I did not know till I received an order from the Society to enquire into the funds of the school.

Have you any observation to make upon those schools as a class, have they any distinctive character that would make them different from the rest?—I did not enter into the principles of either of those societies.

Were they in general more fully attended or less attended, or more opposed or less opposed?—I never heard any thing upon that subject.

Did you observe many instances in which the schoolmaster was also the parish clerk?—Yes.

Have you any impression upon your mind whether that was a desirable or an undesirable arrangement for the purposes of the school?—It is most likely it might not be so agreeable to the Roman Catholics to have the parish clerk as a master, but as to that I have no particular information to communicate, for if they complied with the rules of the Society they would receive assistance; I have been called upon by clergymen in several cases to see those schools, and try to have them placed in connection with the Society.

Is it your impression, that the feelings of the clergy of the established church in the district you have visited, are favourable to the principles of the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, quite so.

Is it your impression that the Presbyterian clergy are favourable to the establishment of the Kildare-place schools?—Particularly so, they are uncommonly zealous in the cause of education.

Are they particularly zealous in that mode of education pursued by the Kildare-place Society?—In general very much so.

Is it your impression that the clergy of the established church, or the Presbyterian clergy, are the most inclined to favour the Kildare-place schools?—I think they were nearly equal, particularly the young clergy of both persuasions.

Had you any communication with the Roman Catholic clergy in any instances?—In one case only.

Did you hear much of their opinions or of their proceedings from the masters whom you visited?—Very little, in fact my whole proceeding was relative to the school and examining the children; I never enquired, except to see that the principles of the Society were attended to, and into the proficiency of the children.

Did you enquire into the fact whether children had been recently withdrawn from the schools you visited or not?—The school account books guided me to that, and if I saw a deficiency in point of number I always enquired.

Examination of William Fitzgerald,
Esq.
29 Dec. 1824.

Did you enquire into the cause?—I did.

Did you find that cause to arise from any thing else than a dislike on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy to the school?—It arose from the severity of the weather in several cases during the last three months; those objections were stated to me, namely, that the Roman Catholic clergy were not favourable in general to the reading of the Scriptures.

Did you hear of any instances in which the Roman Catholic clergy had recourse to any particular measures for the purpose of withdrawing the children from the schools?—Those objections I heard stated, were to the reading of the Scriptures, and when that ceased, they said they were perfectly willing to allow the children to attend the schools.

Do you mean that the Scriptures were given up upon the objection being made?—Only in the case of Mr. Thackeray's schools; in the other cases they adhered to the original principles of the Society, and did not deviate.

Appendix, N^o 217.

Examination of the Reverend James Doyle, P.P. on Oath;
Thursday, 16th December 1824.

The Rev.
James Doyle,
16 Dec. 1824.

YOU are the parish priest of Bray?—Yes.

How long have you held that situation?—Twelve months.

Are there many schools in your parish?—Yes, many.

Who is the Protestant rector of your parish?—My parish runs into three Protestant parishes, and indeed comprises the greatest part of those three; it comprises the parish of Delgany, and the whole of Powerscourt, and part of the union of Bray.

Who is the Protestant rector of Delgany?—Mr. Cleaver; and of Powerscourt, Mr. Daly; and of the Union of Bray, I understand the rector is Mr. Knox, but the residing clergyman is Mr. Hunt, assisted by Mr. Plunket.

Do you sanction the use of the Scriptures to any and what extent in any portion of the parish of Bray, in the schools?—I allow the use of the New Testament, provided no comment be made upon it.

Are we to understand that there is no opposition proceeding from any Roman Catholic clergyman to the use of the Scriptures without comment, in all the schools of the parish of Powerscourt, for instance?—I do not believe you can understand that; before I came to the parish of Bray, it appears there had been a steady opposition made to the use of the New Testament by Catholic children in the schools, by the two curates under my predecessor, the Reverend Mr. Young, and Mr. Daly; from all that I can learn, there was a general objection.

Do they continue to object?—Mr. Young is now quite under my controul, and he makes no objection at present, but such as he suggests through me; he submits generally to me, and does not object to the use of the Testament in the schools in the part of the parish that he visits, when no comment is offered; with regard to Mr. Daly, my other curate, who is in the Powerscourt district, he is far removed from me and is not so much under my controul, and I believe he objects generally to the use of the New Testament, and I have not yet certainly assumed that controul over him that I know I ought to have, for this reason, that my predecessor gave him that district for his exclusive management, and during his life, he looks upon himself as independent in it, and since I have been there, he has not been so much under my controul.

According to the discipline of your church, is it Mr. Daly's duty to conform to your opinion as to the use of the Scriptures in the schools?—No, it is not.

Are we to understand, that it is perfectly regular you should permit the use of the Scriptures under the modification you have stated, in the parish of Powerscourt, while your curate Mr. Daly is objecting to them?—He may object as a priest, but as my curate it is not prudent or discreet to oppose my opinions, especially as my opinions are not against any principle of doctrine or practice in our church; but without transgressing his duty as a curate, he may object.

Are we to understand that that is the actual state of things at this moment in the parish of Powerscourt?—I cannot answer fully upon that head, because I have only informed Mr. Daly by note, in a general manner, that I had arrangements in progress which I had not yet explained to him satisfactorily, and required him to make no interference till I should arrange the matter.

Have you any doubt, whether Mr. Daly is at this moment or not, prohibiting the Roman Catholics from sending their children to the schools within the parish of Powerscourt, in which the New Testament is read without comment?—I believe he is steadily opposed to it, but I think his opposition has arisen from a conviction that the Scriptures are used in a manner hostile to our religion.

What do you conceive will be the probable result to the Roman Catholic parishioners of that district, should they be under the impression that you are permitting them to send their children to the schools, and that he is prohibiting them?—At present my arrangement has not been made public to the parishioners—I have been absent for some time in Dublin, and the next Sunday I mean to publish to the parishioners of Powerscourt the arrangements I have entered into a month ago, and hope to make them as public as I can in a very short time, and I know very well that the parishioners will acquiesce in my direction upon this point, and that opposition will cease.

Will you state the arrangements you entered into a month ago upon this subject?—The arrangements

659
Examination of
The Rev.
James Doyle;

arrangements generally were, that Lady Rathdowne's daily school shall be conducted on the principles of the Kildare-place Education Society, and on those grounds I shall not only allow the Catholics to go to that school, but encourage them.

Are your sentiments upon that subject known at present to the parishioners?—No, except in private conversation; I have not yet made them known.

Has the practice of Lady Rathdowne's school always been conformable to the principles of the Kildare-place Society?—No, she has exceeded them very much; she has given explanations herself upon the Scriptures, and allowed her mistress to do it; the mistress has acknowledged to me she has given explanations hostile to our religion.

Did not those circumstances materially create a degree of distrust upon your mind as to Lady Rathdowne's school?—Those circumstances only became known to me when I went to take the account required of me by this commission, which was about six weeks ago; and immediately on discovering the facts, I remonstrated through the mediation of Mr. Daly, and have procured this accommodation, which is confined to the daily schools; for Lady Rathdowne would not relax in her system in the Sunday school.

Will you explain why you did not rather adopt the proceeding of withdrawing the children from Lady Rathdowne's school altogether?—Because I look upon education as necessary for the poor in particular, and the nation in general; and it is not only more becoming in me, as a minister of religion, but more useful to my flock; and in a national point of view, still more useful to accommodate the matter, if possible.

Are we to understand you approve of the practice of the Kildare-place Society?—I consider that the rules of the Kildare-place Society carried bonâ fide into effect, are such as might be tolerated by a Catholic clergyman; but my opinion is, that they are capable of improvement; and not only that, but they require it.

Would you approve of Roman Catholic clergymen generally entering into the same terms with the patrons of schools, that you have entered into with Lady Rathdowne?—Yes, I would, provided they had similar assurances.

Is it your opinion, that that is the general view that the Roman Catholic clergy take of the subject?—No; I think they do not go so far.

How many Roman Catholics are actually in Lady Rathdowne's school?—I cannot answer that question; but I do think that nearly one-half of the children are Roman Catholics.

Are there as many as thirty or forty?—About thirty.

Is it your expectation, that when your consent to the arrangement is made known, that the numbers will very considerably increase?—It is.

We collect from you, that Lady Rathdowne has also Sunday schools?—Yes.

Have the same terms been made as to them?—No; I have tendered the same terms as to that, but Lady Rathdowne will not consent.

Then we conclude, it is her intention that comment shall take place?—Yes.

In that case, is it your intention to consent to the Roman Catholic children attending it?—No; and I signified to her that I should oppose it all in my power.

Are any of the Roman Catholic children in attendance?—There are some.

Do their parents know at present that you disapprove of their attendance?—Some of them do.

Have you any doubt as to whether the Roman Catholic children will be universally withdrawn from the Sunday school, when your sentiments are more fully known?—Indeed I will not go so far as to say they will be universally withdrawn; I think they will, except in two instances, in the case of two families.

Do you conceive that any undue influence, in the way of temptation or coercion, is likely to be used to induce the attendance of those two families?—Lady Rathdowne has acknowledged to me that she will use inducements, so far as rewards and premiums, and encouragement of clothing, and such things as those, for the purpose of attaching them to the Sunday school. She disclaims coercion; but I must say, that the parents of the children have agreed in declaring to me, that hitherto threats of dismissal from employment, and from their residences, have been used, unless they shall send their children to the Sunday school.

By what persons have you been told that?—One child, whose testimony I think would be accepted in a court of justice, told me, he heard Lady Rathdowne herself say as much; and more than one has told me, that the mistress had declared, in the absence of Lady Rathdowne, that their parents will not be employed, and that they will be turned from their holdings.

If Lady Rathdowne has given you a contrary assurance, would you believe that child?—Not as to the coercion; but as to the mistress, I am quite disposed to believe the child.

You do not believe that Lady Rathdowne intends it, if she has assured you that she does not?—I do not believe she does; but the mistress would hold that out.

Are we to understand, that the premiums of clothes you have spoken of, are to be given to Roman Catholic children generally, as a mere reward for going to school, or distributed among the Roman Catholics and Protestants, as a reward for superior good answering and conduct?—I believe they will be distributed as a reward; but I am of opinion that inducements have been held out to Catholics in particular, in the way of clothing.

Is it your impression that the two families, of which you have spoken, will send the children to that school with their own hearty good will, or more or less against their own conviction of what is right?—Against their own conviction of what is right; and I will give you my reasons: one of the parties told me he had eight children, and was very poor, and not able to provide for them, especially if removed from his dwelling, which is on Lord

The Rev.
James Doyle,

Rathdowne's property; he was satisfied that he would be dismissed if he did not send his children. And besides his own employment, he receives considerable help for clothing, and so on, through his children. And the answer of the other one was, that he took care to instruct his children at home at night, in their own Christian doctrines; that whatever impressions they might receive elsewhere, he had no fear of their remaining on their minds; for when they would be taken from the school, he could remove them; and as he felt it useful to him now, he felt it might be permitted to him to send his children.

Do you not think it natural and even probable, that the parents might use that sort of language to you as a sort of excuse for doing that which really and truly they might like well enough, and which they adopted as a matter of free choice?—I believe they were sincere on that head.

Would you, upon that explanation, refuse the rites of the church to those persons if they persevered?—If they persevered in opposition to my decided opinion and declaration, I would.

Would you, under those circumstances, express an opinion to them that would necessarily induce the ultimate refusal of the rites of the church, in case they did not choose to attend to it?—I would put them to it; I feel it a conscientious obligation; I feel that their faith is in danger, and that no circumstance can warrant me to suffer them to endanger their faith.

Have you any doubt in your mind, whether they will submit under those circumstances?—I think they will submit to me.

Do you not think it is at least possible, that it was in the hope of preventing you from making it a point with them to withdraw their children, that they expressed those sentiments you have just stated?—Yes.

Do you really believe that Lord or Lady Rathdowne would withdraw their protection from either of those families if they took their children from the Sunday school?—I have no reason to form a belief, except from Lady Rathdowne's declaration.

Have you ever known Lord or Lady Rathdowne to dismiss any persons from their employment or estate, upon the ground of their not sending their children to the school?—I have been only twelve months in the parish; they live at a distance from me, and I was not more than two or three times in the neighbourhood; I was confined a good deal by sickness, and have been occupied in building the chapel, but I do not know of any instance of the kind.

You never heard Mr. Daly, your curate, state there was any such instance?—I heard him state frequently they were threatened with dismissal.

Is it your opinion, that if there was no interference on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, that the schools in which the Scriptures were read would be frequented extensively by Roman Catholic children?—I think they would.

Are we to understand, that in that case you conceive it would be the voluntary act of the parents to send them?—Yes; because the parents are not in those cases authorized to judge for themselves; in all cases I think, wherever danger would not be apprehended, they would go generally.

Is it your opinion, that the present state of things leads to a great deal of bad feeling on the part of the parents?—I am sensible it does.

Explain the nature of that feeling?—It is a jealousy and distrust of the motives even of the good actions of the Protestants, and that the good they do is suspected to come from motives of proselytising themselves and their children, and that, as they look upon their faith as their best treasure and inheritance, they esteem it a great cruelty and great tyranny to tamper with them upon those points.

But those feelings would not exist, as we have collected from your former answers, if it was not from the prohibition of the Roman Catholic clergy to attend the schools?—The Roman Catholic clergy feel themselves bound in the first instance—that it is their paramount obligation to preserve the religion of their flocks; they feel themselves bound on every occasion to warn them of the danger of losing their faith, and therefore they excite the attention of the laity to those points, and when the Catholic clergyman lays before them the steps actually taken and the danger really incurred, it stirs up that sentiment in the minds of all such persons.

But the proximate cause producing the sentiment is the prohibition of the Roman Catholic clergy, and not the circumstance of the scriptural school being open to receive their children?—The proximate occasion is no doubt the prohibition, but the real cause is the interference.

But still if the interference was not pointed out by the Roman Catholic clergyman, we collect from you there would be no feeling of disinclination to send their children to schools, or distrust of the motives of those who conduct them?—Where there was no danger apprehended, there would be no disinclination.

And there would be no danger apprehended, probably?—Not so frequently as now.

Do you conceive that the parents, when left to themselves, have any disinclination or distrust in the system of the Kildare-place Society?—They have; the parents understand it very little, but at this time, when the matter has been so generally taken up throughout the kingdom, and when such a general outcry is raised against the system, there is a general prejudice against it.

But supposing that the Roman Catholic clergy had not warned the people of the danger of attending these schools, is it your impression that the people themselves, from their own observation and their own experience, would be well or ill inclined to send their children to them

661
Examination of
Rev.
James Doyle,
16 Dec. 1824.

them?—The sole obstacle on the minds of the people would be the danger; the people, from the want of education themselves, might not be aware of the danger, and might not offer opposition.

Do you think, if their children were either converted or in the process of conversion at those schools, that the parents could be blind or insensible to the fact?—Yes, they might be, because many parents cannot read, and many of them are in a state of general ignorance and not inquisitive.

Is it your impression, that the Kildare-place Society are sincere in disclaiming the wish to interfere with the tenets of the Roman Catholics?—I have reason to doubt their sincerity.

State those reasons.—Sincerity on their part requires a strict adherence to the letter and spirit of their own rules. I have known cases where their rules were transgressed, and which were made known to their authorized agent, and I have known no steps taken to enforce the rules, and those deviations had a leaning to proselyting.

Mention the schools and the agent to whom the deviations were communicated.—One instance was the school of Mrs. Bailey, at Ballyarthur, in my former parish, in which scriptural explanations were given in the school to the Protestant children at the same time that the Catholic children were intermingled among them; those scriptural explanations were given by a Protestant of course, in the spirit of the Protestant religion; another instance was in the case of the school of Mr. Lees, at the "Meeting of the Waters," where scriptural explanations were given and the Protestant catechism taught to the Protestant children with the Catholic children intermingled amongst them, and Protestant hymns taught to Catholic children; they were taught to sing them in company with the Protestant children.

Can you mention any other deviation?—I cannot mention any other instance under my knowledge.

At what time did those deviations take place?—I think about five years ago.

To which of the agents of the Kildare-place Society was any communication made upon the subject?—I now forget the name of the visiting agent at that time; he was appointed after Mr. Veveers.

Was it Mr. Mills?—Yes, it was.

Who made the communication?—I made the communication.

Are we to understand, that those deviations have never been corrected?—The deviations were corrected; one of them in Ballyarthur school, at the remonstrance of Mr. Mills, and in the other, at my own remonstrance.

Then the deviation was in fact corrected in each instance?—Yes; the deviation was certainly corrected, but the pledge of the Society is this, that they will not give assistance to any school where those transgressions are allowed; now the assistance which they always had given, was continued to those schools afterwards as well as before.

Though that may be an impeachment of the success of the plan of the Kildare-place Society that such deviations should occur, how can it be any impeachment of the sincerity of their intentions, if they, as soon as they are discovered, correct them?—I will give one reason in confirmation of that opinion. I suggested to Mr. Mills the propriety of posting up in each school, the rules of the Kildare-place Society, and of remarking especially as to those rules which were liable to be violated to the injury of the Catholic religion, and of declaring their determination hereafter to publish the name of every patron who would allow any violation in his school of those rules. Mr. Mills opposed my opinions on that point steadily; and I believe that he opposed them from his knowledge that the committee would not adopt them.

Did you make any representation to the committee?—No, I did not; I did intend at that time, but he said the committee would find it a very hard thing to expose any name; I said as the matter was for general good, that such steps should be taken as would secure the observance of the rules.

Have you any other reasons than those you have stated, to doubt the sincerity of the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, I have heard it said that they afford aid to schools under the patronage of the Association for discountenancing Vice, and that one of the rules of that Association is, that the teacher must be a Protestant, whereas their rules declare an utter regardlessness as to the religion of the teacher, and in their queries, put on giving any assistance, the person must declare, that he shall not confine himself to the adoption of either Catholic or Protestant.

Do you not think it possible, that the patron or the schoolmaster, in that case may deceive the Society, either as to the fact of connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice, or as to the fact of any rule of that kind having existence as to any such school?—As to the fact of the school being in connection with any society they may be deceived; but they cannot be ignorant of the rules of the Association for discountenancing Vice, they are public and open, and I think it is one of their questions, whether the schools receive assistance from any other quarter; I think it is, I am not quite certain.

May not such school become connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice, after and not prior to its union with the Kildare-place Society?—Surely.

Have you any other reason to distrust their sincerity?—I have nothing else I can advance as fact; I think they have not shewn consistency with regard to their insisting on the use of the Scriptures, because they allow select lessons to be offered to the children by the teacher or visitor.

Will you describe a little more fully the irritation, that you conceive results in the minds of the people from the state of uncertainty that exists at this moment with respect to those schools?—In my mind, the people couple the efforts of proselytising by the established church with the Government, and they look upon the whole as combined together, and bent upon the injury, if not the extermination of their religion; and attached as they are very strongly to their religion, they consider it to be the greatest injury they can offer to them, and therefore all the hostility and rancour, in some cases, and of irritation in most cases, are proportioned to the loss they suppose they should sustain; hence too often a want of due confidence in and attachment to Government arises, and in the intercourse of life a distrust and jealousy on the part of the Roman Catholic, of what may really be meant for his good on the part of the Protestant: he couples benefits conferred or proffered with the end he supposes to be aimed at, and instead of gratitude which he would feel, did he not suspect that his religion was in danger, he looks on the benefactor with distrust, jealousy and alienation.

Would not it necessarily follow from that, that the peasantry would have a feeling, not only of obeying but co-operating with their own clergy, in keeping their children away from schools fraught with such destructive consequences?—As I told you before, when they see actual danger they do withdraw their children; and, indeed, I think in most cases, they withdraw their children when warned to do it by their clergyman, but some parents may not imagine the danger is so great as the clergyman may.

Is it your impression that the people generally would now, in point of fact, withdraw their children from those schools at the mere warning of the clergy, unless they understood the clergy were prepared to go the length of refusing them the rites of the church?—Yes, I think they would at the bare warning of the clergy.

Have you known any instances of it?—Many instances.

What was the nature of the warning?—Generally, that it is meant to tamper with their religion,—they are to look upon that as their greatest treasure, and not to receive a lesser benefit at the loss of a greater.

Does the warning go further, and say that the next warning will be given in a different tone?—In some cases it has, but not often.

Would a simple warning of the kind you have mentioned, if it was understood by the people that it would not go further, induce the people to do it?—Yes, generally speaking, a simple warning would be sufficient, because they look upon it as suggested by duty, and for their sake.

Is it your opinion, that in the component parts of the irritation you have described, that there is any feeling of irritation against the Roman Catholic clergy, for enjoining the withdrawing of the children from those schools?—No; I am sure there is a feeling of gratitude and attachment generally.

Are we to collect it is your opinion, that the people do not in any instances view with a feeling akin to indignation, certainly going far beyond ordinary dissatisfaction, the commands of their clergy to withdraw their children?—I am not aware of any one instance that could warrant me in saying there are such feelings.

Then, are we to understand, that there is a bonâ fide and hearty concurrence, on the part of the people with their clergy in withdrawing their children?—Yes,—with regard to those two families I mentioned, they agreed in principle with me, but said they would guard against the danger.

Do you conceive, in point of fact, that the Roman Catholic children are universally withdrawn from those schools throughout Ireland?—No; but with regard to that portion of the country under my own notice, the thing has been so agreeably adjusted, no efforts have been made, except where danger was suspected.

Is it your impression, there are more or fewer than 50,000 Roman Catholic children in attendance upon the schools you are speaking of?—I am not competent to speak upon that; but there may be more than that.

If it should turn out there were only 10,000, would you still be of opinion there was a hearty concurrence on the part of Roman Catholic peasantry with their clergy, to the withdrawing their children?—I believe in those cases they go with the consent of the clergy, not against it; I know, in some parts of the country, those schools are attended to by the Roman Catholic clergy; I had two schools in the part of the country where I was, a female school, and two schools, under masters in connection with the Kildare-place Society, and I may say it was I who brought about the connection.

Then, are we to collect, that you are of opinion, there is a degree of concurrence in the principles of those schools on behalf of the Roman Catholic clergy throughout Ireland, co-extensive with the attendance of those children?—Yes.

If it should turn out there are not fewer than 50,000 Roman Catholic children in attendance upon the scriptural schools, would it not then follow that there is a very considerable extent of acquiescence or concurrence upon the part of the Roman Catholic clergy in that system, greater than is at present generally understood to be the case?—I think, although those things are permitted and acquiesced in, on account of the benefits arising, that the Catholics generally disapprove of some of the principles of that Society.

The question is general as to the scriptural schools, and not confined to the Kildare-place schools, but extending also to the Association, and the Hibernian schools?—With regard to the attendance in schools where the Scriptures are read, it is done in the confidence that an ill use will not be made of the Scriptures; but it would meet the approbation of the Catholic clergy much more, if the Scriptures were wholly excluded, or only extracts used that have been submitted to their approbation.

Can

Examination of
Rev.
James Doyle,

Can you state how the fact is, whether all, or any, or which of the Roman Catholic prelates of Ireland have enjoined their clergy to insist upon the withdrawing of the children from those schools?—I do not know of any instances.

Have you ever lived near to any charter schools?—No; the charter school of Arklow was given up about the time I went to that country.

Do you feel yourself competent to speak of the feelings with which the Roman Catholic clergy, or the peasantry, regard the establishment of the charter schools in the neighbourhood?—Chiefly as proselytising schools; I am not aware that any Roman Catholic children are sent to those schools; but I cannot give a satisfactory answer to that.

If Roman Catholic children were not sent, how could they be called proselytising schools?—It is the opinion, that most of the inmates in those schools are the children of poor Catholic parents, received from other parts of the country, and transmitted to particular stations. From what I know of the charter school in Arklow, the whole of the children were strangers, transmitted from other parts of the country; and that the feeling is, that they were the children of poor Roman Catholics, put in through necessity, and in order more certainly to proselytise them, they were withdrawn from their parents, and were sent to a distant part of the country.

If the suspicion of a spirit of proselytising, existing as to the day schools, produces the degree of irritation you have described, will you explain to us what extent of dislike or irritation results from a knowledge of its existence, with respect to the charter schools?—With respect to the charter schools, an utter abhorrence of them.

Do you conceive, that that abhorrence produces a considerable practical irritation in the minds of the people?—No, because they are but few in number, and do not come in contact with the practical habits of the people.

But in the immediate neighbourhood of the school, can you state, whether the building is viewed with sentiments of considerable dislike?—Certainly, it is such as I have described on the subject.

Do you consider the institution of the charter schools to have been very successful, for the objects they were understood to have in view?—No, not very successful; successful to a certain degree; but it has frequently resulted at last in a return to the Roman Catholic religion, when they get into the world again.

What do you conceive is their proximate and practical inducement to return to the Roman Catholic religion?—I think in some cases, where the children have been able to recollect they were born of Roman Catholic parents, this circumstance has induced them principally, or when they have come under a Roman Catholic master, or married to a Roman Catholic, and had no connection with parents, and the belief that they were of Roman Catholic parentage, they have easily come round.

Can you state, whether the peasantry view the children coming out of the charter schools with feelings of respect?—With feelings of contempt.

How would you analyse that feeling; what is it grounded upon?—First, on the nature of their education, and their supposed base origin; and grounded again, on a belief that they have been tainted with strong prejudices against the Roman Catholic religion in their education.

Has your own observation and experience, enabled you to say how those charter school children generally turn out in the world?—The females are apt to become harlots, and the men are generally of the lowest description, in point of morals and behaviour.

Have you actually had many opportunities of observing instances of those two results?—Yes, I have.

Have you known in any instances of their becoming respectable members of society?—Yes, I have known some instances of their becoming good mothers, and good wives, and good husbands, but very few.

In those instances you speak of in which the result was good, had they previously become converted to the Roman Catholic religion?—Certainly, in the instances I allude to, they had; the observations I make apply both to the children of the Foundling, and the charter schools.

Examination of Mr. Peter Blenkinsop, on Oath; Monday, 6th December 1824.

ARE you a printer?—I am.

Are you printer to the College of Maynooth?—I am stationer to the College of Maynooth.

Where is your printing business carried on?—In Capel-street.

Have you ever printed books for the College of Maynooth?—None.

Have you been employed by any public bodies?—Only the Kildare-place Society; I printed one edition of Trimmer's Selection of the Scriptures, that is the only one for any public body.

Are you at all in the habit of printing books in use in Roman Catholic schools?—Yes, I am.

Have you not printed several sorts that bore on the title page that they were approved of by the Royal College at Maynooth?—None.

When did you first print the Selection of the Scriptures you have named?—At this moment I cannot recollect.

Mr.
Peter Blenkinsop,
6 Dec. 1824.

Examination of
Mr.
Peter Blenkinsop,
6 Dec. 1824.

State as nearly as you can, how many years ago?—The first edition I printed was at the instance of Mr. William Parnell, member for the county of Wicklow.

Was it at his expense that edition was published?—It was by his directions, but the Kildare-place Society paid me for it.

What copy did you print it from?—A copy I had received from Dr. Troy.

Did you in the first instance, print it from a copy you had from Dr. Troy?—Yes, certainly.

Was that a printed copy?—It was.

Were there any alterations in writing in it?—There were some omissions and some alterations, but the alterations were very few, the principal were whole passages left out.

Do you know in whose hand-writing the alterations were?—No; with the exception of the following words that are in the hand-writing of the Reverend Mr. Doyle, “the sequel to be omitted.”

Is that copy still in existence?—It is in my possession.

Who sent you that copy?—Mr. Doyle in the first instance spoke to me. Afterwards Mr. Parnell came to me, and told me he had it in contemplation to have such a work published for the schools in his own neighbourhood; he said he had given it to Mr. Doyle, and Mr. Doyle had given it to Dr. Troy, and it was from Dr. Troy I received it.

When you received it from Dr. Troy, did you receive any directions from him?—None; I do not know of any directions at this moment; I certainly printed it at his desire.

What passed between you and Mr. Doyle when first he spoke to you upon the subject?—He merely mentioned it in a general way, that such a work was to be put in hand, and he said it would be a very desirable publication, but at this distance of time it is impossible for me to recollect all that passed upon the subject.

Did you ever converse with Dr. Troy upon the subject?—Several times.

What passed between you and Dr. Troy?—In the first edition I found there were passages in it that I did not think were such as should have remained in the work.

Are you a Roman Catholic or Protestant?—A Roman Catholic.

Did you point out such passages to Dr. Troy?—I did.

Would it appear in the book what those passages were?—I think I could lay my finger upon the passages if I had the book before me.

What observations did Dr. Troy make?—I think he said it would be a desirable thing if they were altered, but that he had confided the work to Mr. Doyle, and he thought he would have looked into it more narrowly than he had; this was after the first edition was printed, and before the second; at that time I had obtained Dr. Troy's permission to print it. It is always usual to get the approbation of the ordinary, and I pointed out those passages; and he said, as I have before stated, he had confided the correction of it to Mr. Doyle, or he believed that Mr. Doyle had made the necessary corrections, but he requested me to make application to the Kildare-street Society to have something of an errata appended to the work. I did make an application, I think it was a personal one, to the Society; I cannot charge my memory whether it was in writing; they declined, and said they could make no alteration whatever, which I communicated to Dr. Troy immediately.

What did he say to that?—He said nothing upon that, he regretted it should so happen; and I believe at the very time he gave me a written approbation; he gave one to the Kildare-place Society also.

Will you call to mind to what member of the Kildare-place Society you made that application?—I think it was to Mr. Bewley, but am not certain.

Can you recollect whether it was in the house at Kildare-place it took place?—It was, I think.

Was there any body present but Mr. Bewley?—Yes, I think some persons belonging to the establishment.

Had you begun to print the second edition at the time you made that application?—It was in hand; the first edition was printed upon the idea that it was for the schools in Mr. Parnell's neighbourhood.

Did you ever expose the work in your shop before you heard that the Kildare-place Society had intended to publish a second edition?—No, I do not think I sold any of them.

Did you not expose them?—No.

What was the number of the first edition?—One thousand.

What was the number of the second?—I believe 10,000, the first thousand was sent home to No. 15, Sackville-street to the depository.

Was the second edition exactly conformable to the first, as it is printed?—Yes, with the omission of a note. There was a note that referred to the numbering of a chapter.

Was that note at all material?—Not in the least.

Do you mean the note was in the first edition and omitted in the second?—Yes.

Was there any thing inserted in the second edition that was not in the first?—I do not believe there was, I have no recollection of any.

With that exception, they were uniform?—They were.

At the same time you suggested the expediency of having an errata in the second edition, did you point out what the desired errata were?—I think I did.

Did you submit to Mr. Bewley, or some other person on the part of the Kildare-place Society, a written errata that you wished to have printed?—No, I pointed out the passages in the work itself.

What

665-
Examination of
Mr.
Peter Blenkinsop,
6 Dec. 1824.

What description of errata would have cured the objections to the passages themselves?—One of them was the addition to the Lord's Prayer, that was one; that is not considered a part of the Scriptures by the Roman Catholics.

Do you mean, "For thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory, for ever and ever. Amen"?—Yes.

Can you recollect any thing else?—There was another passage respecting the Angelical Salutation, it was, "Hail thou art highly favoured," in that copy; in the other, it was "Hail, Mary, full of grace," in the Douay version.

Are we to understand that this book of Scripture Lessons was taken exactly from the authorized version of the Scriptures?—I do not know what it was taken from; I know nothing of what it was taken from.

Did you ever compare it either with the authorized version, or the Douay version?—Those passages I have, and they are not conformable to the Douay version.

Do you happen to know whether there were any other passages in it that were conformable to the Douay version, which did not conform to the authorized version?—I do not know.

Was the copy from which the first edition was printed, delivered to you by Dr. Troy's own hand?—It was.

The Commissioners observe the following preface:—"The following harmony of the New Testament is printed by permission as a Scripture book for the use of the upper or reading class in schools. It is well adapted to the apprehension of children, and the narrative of the four gospels being woven into one, with every possible adherence to the order of time, gives a clear and impressive idea of the gospel history to young minds; every thing above the capacity of children, or which might lead to disputed questions being omitted; and the letter of no particular version being rigidly adhered to, it forms an unexceptionable book for schools, where children of different denominations are instructed." By whom was that preface written?—I got it in Mr. Parnell's hand-writing from Mr. Parnell himself.

Did you ever shew it to Dr. Troy?—I believe not the original, but after it had been printed; for the word "letter" was not underlined.

Did Dr. Troy see that preface afterwards?—He certainly did.

Did you take upon yourself the responsibility of printing that preface without shewing it to Dr. Troy first?—I think I did, but it was only a proof sheet, and that was a thing that could be easily cancelled if it did not meet his approbation, and I believe it was at the end of that same proof sheet I got Dr. Troy's imprimatur.

Did he approve of that preface?—He certainly did, otherwise I should not have printed it.

Is that sheet still in existence that has Dr. Troy's imprimatur?—I believe it is, but a duplicate of it is in the hands of the Kildare-place Society.

Have you not heard very bad faith imputed to the Kildare-place Society for their conduct with respect to this work?—I have.

Is it your opinion they have been guilty of any bad faith with respect to it?—None in the world, and wherever I have had an opportunity I have contradicted it.

Do you know whether those Scriptural Lessons have ever been printed by any other printer than yourself?—I do not know.

Would you now print a third edition of that work for the Kildare-street Society, if they applied to you?—Not without the approbation of the present ordinary, Dr. Murray.

Is it your own impression you could obtain that approbation?—I rather think not.

Have you never heard that the book has been particularly objected to in particular parts of Ireland by the Roman Catholic authorities?—I have.

Had you ever any conversations with Dr. Troy upon it, after it was printed and published?—Several.

What opinion did he express upon the subject?—He did not seem to lay that great weight upon the objections that others had formed against it.

Did he ever assert to you that he had not given the Kildare-place Society his consent to their publishing the work?—Never; I do not think we had ever any conversation upon that point; he knew I had his consent in two ways; I had the original work, and also a letter of his upon the subject.

Were you with him when he wrote the permission to print it upon the paper?—Yes, I was present.

Did you ever hear him express an opinion that he had been imposed upon?—Never, except that he thought Mr. Doyle would have read it as it should have been, and corrected it.

Are you able to say how long it remained in the possession of Dr. Troy?—I believe a very short time.

Further Examination of Mr. Peter Blenkinsop, on Oath;
Monday, 3d of January 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
Peter Blenkinsop,
3 Jan. 1825.

MR. PETER BLENKINSOP was again called in; and delivered in to the board the original sheets of Mrs. Trimmer's Selections corrected, in manuscript, and which he stated were the sheets given to him by Dr. Troy; and that he printed the book for Mr. Parnell, exactly conformable to those sheets as so corrected. He also produced a letter, written to him by Mr. William Parnell, dated "Avondale, November the 22d, 1818," which is as follows:—
"Sir—The edition of the Scripture Lessons, printed by you for the Education Society, is exactly conformable to the copy given by me to Dr. Troy, and which you received from him."

Appendix, N° 220.

Extract from the Examination of the Reverend Robert Daly, on Oath;
Wednesday, 15th of December 1824.

Rev.
Robert Daly,
15 Dec. 1824.

ARE you rector of the parish of Powerscourt?—I am.

Have you been so many years?—For ten years, last March.

Have not considerable exertions been made in the parish in which you reside, to establish schools for the instruction of the lower orders of people?—Yes, there have.

Are the schools principally in connection with some of the public societies?—No, there is only one connected with any of the societies, and that is one that is my parish school; it receives aid from the Society for discountenancing Vice. We have Sunday schools that receive gratuitous supplies of books from the Sunday School Society for Ireland.

Have there been many schools established in that parish by private funds?—Yes, I think there are five schools that have been established and supported entirely by private aid.

Do the people avail themselves, as far as they can, of the means that are afforded them of educating their children?—With very great anxiety, except as far as they are prohibited by the Roman Catholic clergyman.

In point of fact, would the schools hold more children than attend them?—Yes; but we would build more if the children would come; we could educate them to any amount. I should say, that within a short time the Rev. Mr. Doyle, Roman Catholic rector, had an interview with myself, and some of the leading persons concerned in education, and he has consented to the children going to the schools upon the system of the Kildare-place Institution, and we have agreed that there shall be no comment of any kind upon the Scriptures in the every day schools; but the other priest, Rev. Mr. Daly, I understand, says he will not ever allow any children to go to the schools where the Scriptures are read; he told me so himself last year, and I do not believe he has withdrawn his opposition since the Roman Catholic rector agreed with us that he would admit the schools upon that system. We have put up, in a school near me, the rules we agreed upon, that with his consent and my own the Scriptures are to be used by the children without note or comment.

Does that concession on the part of Mr. Doyle apply to more than one school in the parish?—It was particularly made with regard to one school, but it was intended by him to apply to all the schools. The school under my especial care had acted upon that plan for many years; he told me, that he did not object to the children being sent to that school, but the agreement he entered into was about the school at Charleville, of which Lady Rathdowne is the patroness, and wrote to Lady Powerscourt, who has some schools she is anxious about, in order to ask her to agree to the same rule, and she said she would; I believe he has not had an interview with her yet, but she is prepared to enter into that arrangement whenever he asks it; and upon that plan the schools are now going on.

Although I understood you to say there is no school in your parish that receives aid from the Kildare-place Society, are there many in which the instruction is carried on upon the same plan?—Yes, pretty nearly.

Can you say how many?—In that school under the Association, the only thing in which the Kildare-place rules are not followed is, that we must have a Protestant master under the rules of the Association, and he belongs to the established church; and during school hours, except upon Saturday, we do not explain the Scriptures; the master hears the children read the Scriptures: they are prepared for me; and on Saturday, after the Roman Catholic children have gone away, the Rev. Mr. Mackee or myself give the children instruction, but that is not during the school hours, nor has it been ever since the school has been set up, though we have had no rule upon the subject.

Do the Protestant children learn the church of England catechism?—Yes, which Mr. Mackee, my curate, or myself, hear the children repeat on Saturday; they also learn to prove some parts of our church service out of the Scriptures; and we teach those things that are according to the plan of the church of England on Saturday, after the Roman Catholic children have gone away.

Do you also give explanations of the portions of the Scriptures that the children have read?—I do not explain the Scriptures in the school at that time, because all the Protestants of the parish, whether those that go to school or those that do not, come to me at another time in the week, and there I examine them, and explain the Scriptures to them; I only require them to be prepared with the words of the Scriptures in the school, and I have the chapters read,

*Examination of
Rev.
Robert Daly,

read, that they may have them off by heart; and then at other times I collect the Protestant children by themselves; and I should state, that the reason for having the Protestant children by themselves is, that we may not interfere with the Roman Catholic children at the Sunday schools, where we have both Roman Catholics and Protestants; we leave the Sunday school open for more general instruction.

What number of children is the school you have been describing, connected with the Association, capable of accommodating?—It could accommodate 130 or 140 children: the school would accommodate 120 in the room, and this would allow 140 upon the roll.

Could you state what proportion are Roman Catholics?—I think only 26 out of 114 now upon the roll are Roman Catholics.

At what hour do the children assemble on Saturday?—They assemble at the same hour as on other days, viz. at ten o'clock, and the Roman Catholics are dismissed at twelve; before that hour on Saturday, the Protestant children are separated from the Roman Catholics, to prepare the church catechism against I come; the Roman Catholic children go on with the ordinary business; but in general much fewer of the Roman Catholics attend upon Saturday than the other days, knowing that it is but half a day with them, so that many do not come on Saturday.

How long do the children continue in the school receiving the religious instruction you have stated to be given on Saturday?—About an hour or more, as things occur; their general time is from twelve to one; they have, perhaps, been an hour before we come, learning a portion of the catechism off by heart; the elder children are heard proving part of the church service from the Scriptures till one o'clock; then they separate.

Do you know in what way the Roman Catholic children learn their catechism; do they ever bring it with them to the school?—No, not to our school; that is one objection, I understand, that has been made to our schools, that we do not teach the Roman Catholic catechism; but then it is a matter of conscience; I could not do it, and I could not ask a Protestant master to do it; I should not think so well of him if he would teach it; I should consider it shewed a want of principle and feeling in him to teach the Roman Catholic catechism; though I know some schoolmasters that would teach any thing they were employed to do.

Do many of the children who attend on week days in the school you describe, attend the Sunday school?—Yes, some of them do; the children of the more respectable farmers do not attend the Sunday school, they attend the day school; but the poorer children attend the two schools.

Is the instruction of the Sunday school entirely of a religious character?—Yes; except as regards those that are not able to read; we have children now reading the Scriptures who had not been at any other school, and can now read the Scriptures, without having attended any other school; we teach them to spell and to read if they are unable to do so.

Is it attended exclusively by Protestant children?—No; we have a good many Roman Catholic children; we have two Sunday schools in the parish, one more immediately under my care, and one under the care of Lady Rathdowne; at which last there are about half Roman Catholics; there are but few at mine.

Has any arrangement been entered into, with the consent of Mr. Doyle, as to the mode of instruction of the Roman Catholic children at the Sunday school?—No, he would not sanction their attending the Sunday school at all; and we were not so much disposed to tie ourselves by rules upon Sunday. Employing gratuitous teachers, we could not answer so well for the rules being observed, and we feared that we should only have got ourselves into a scrape by promising a thing we did not perform.

Has he made any considerable exertions to prevent the Roman Catholic children attending the Sunday schools?—I understood on Sunday fortnight he gave out in his chapel, that the children should not attend the Sunday school; he honestly said to Lady Rathdowne, he would oppose the Sunday schools.

Did you understand that Mr. Doyle gave notice he should hereafter interfere, or did he at once denounce the parents of the children?—I understand that he said that he allowed the children to attend the day schools, I believe, particularly speaking of Lady Rathdowne's school at Charleville, where the Scriptures were read without note or comment, but that he strictly forbade them attending the Sunday school. I would state one thing which occurred in our conversation; he said one of his reasons for objecting to the Sunday school was, that the hours interfered with the chapel hours. I told him, which I knew to be true, that the hours did not interfere, because the Protestant children came for instruction from Lady Rathdowne's Sunday school, after her school is over, to me in the church before service, and when I am going in the morning to church, I see almost all the Roman Catholic population about me on the road, they going to the chapel and I to the church; the Protestant children from Lady Rathdowne's school attend me, and the Roman Catholic children have an equal opportunity of going to chapel after the school is over.

Was the attendance of the Roman Catholic children much diminished in consequence of what Mr. Doyle stated in the chapel?—Not one child was taken away.

How many were there?—About forty or fifty in Lady Rathdowne's Sunday school: the people, particularly in that part of the parish, really value the instruction of the school, they are very well taught, and well instructed, and they do not like to be deprived of it. I must also say, that probably some may be taken away at Christmas, because at Christmas there are premiums given to the children at the school, but my own opinion is, that they will not; there was one family whom both Mr. Daly and Mr. Doyle, I am informed, particularly tried to take their children away from both schools,—a family of the name of Norris, and they went three times to their duty, as they call it, when the priest held a station in the neighbourhood, and they were three times sent away; the man, as I am informed, told both the priests he would rather cut off his hands than take the children away from the schools, for in truth they had no other schools to go to but those, and the people are fond of schools.

Do you know whether that man has been received to the rites of the church?—He has not; the woman came to me the other day and said, "I believe, Sir, we have done with them, for they will not receive us."

What did she mean by that?—That she would have no more to do with the priest; the husband said he had been a soldier twenty years, and the king had never turned him away, and he had no idea when he only took good care of their children, that the priest should turn him away; and that he did not turn away those who were bringing up their children in wickedness of every kind.

Do you think that that sentiment, or any similar sentiments, are general among the people?—I do think they are; there is a poor man that took away his children, and since Mr. Doyle gave them leave to go to the every day school, they have been sent back to both schools. I had a conversation with this man one day as I was going up the long hill where he lives; his children saw me going up, and knew I should return back the same way, and when I was returning the two children who had been taken away six weeks before, were sitting reading on the green outside the house; I was fully aware that the children placed themselves there that I might see them, so I went up to them and spoke to them; one little girl could read remarkably well, as well as a gentleman's child. I asked her to read, and she began before me; the man was at work in his garden just behind. I got into conversation with him, and he said, I would give all I am worth in the world to read as well as that child, it is the worst thing that was ever done to our children taking them away from those schools, but, said he, if we did not give them up to the priests entirely, we must do as they bid us; and a very extraordinary thing occurred; the priest made his appearance upon the brow of the hill just as we were talking, the children ran into the house and hid their books, and the man dropped his head; I said I believe it is the priest that is coming up, the man said it is very like his beast. I left him lest I should bring upon him the priest's anger; thus the very sight of him scattered us all to the four winds in a moment; as soon as ever this family got leave to send their children to school again, the first Sunday they heard of it, they sent their children back again, whether they made a mistake I do not know, but though they had leave only for one, they have sent them both to the Sunday school and day school.

Can you recollect what book the children were reading?—I know it was the new Testament, and a curious thing happened about one of those children, she came down about a fortnight after that, to a lady living near me, to ask for some vinegar, and the lady thought it was odd she should ask her for such a thing, as she was not in the habit of coming to her for any thing; the child did not go away when she received it, and the lady thought she wanted something else, as she knew the child was a very nice reader and fond of it, she immediately asked her if she ever read at home, and she said she did, and she repeated for her the two first chapters of the first Epistle of St. John, that the child herself had learnt off by heart while she was away from the school, without any body having asked her to do so, and I have no doubt the reason of her going to the lady was not to get the vinegar, but to have an opportunity of repeating that portion of Scripture.

About what age is that child?—About ten, I believe.

Does that child continue to go to mass?—Yes, she does.

Have there been many instances in which the children educated in your parish have ceased to be Roman Catholics, and conformed to the established church?—Until last year, that we had a little row with the priest, not one had ever gone away from the Roman Catholic church; since that there have been two or three; there was one about four weeks ago, a grown girl, a Sunday scholar.

About what age?—About sixteen.

What were the ages of the other persons?—The other was older; she is twenty-two now; she came over last year.

Was it in consequence of marriage?—No.

Were there any circumstances attending the collision between the priest and these persons, that you can account for as having induced a change of religion?—No; I think it was their minds being led to think.

Is it your impression, if there had been no collision there would be no conversion?—I think probably not.

You think those individuals would have continued in the church of Rome?—Yes, I think so; I think it probable that the collision excited their minds in a way that led them to think.

Before Mr. Doyle had given his permission to attend Lady Rathdowne's school, had he at any preceding time refused such permission?—No, he had not; he has only been in the parish a short time; but it was most strongly forbid by Rev. Mr. Daly, who has been there for seven or eight years.

Is the parish divided between the two Roman Catholic priests, or do they act together?—Mr. Doyle is the rector; he has the parish of Bray, which is an union; there is Bray, Kilmacannock and Powerscourt; there are three chapels in them, and two curates; and the Rev. Mr. Daly is the curate of most part of the parish of Powerscourt, and he is anxious, I believe, to be ruler there, but Mr. Doyle is anxious that his views should be followed in it; and I understood from Mr. Doyle, that upon that subject they did not understand each other very well.

Is their authority equal?—No; Mr. Doyle tells me, that his authority is supreme, but the other, I believe, says not.

Do you know whether those persons, who have become Protestants, have been subject, in consequence of it, to much obloquy or ill usage?—No, nothing more than a little abuse amongst their own friends; I cannot say they have met with any thing they have had reason to complain of in the least.

Do they continue to live with their parents?—Two were servants that I speak of; one was a servant to a good sort of a man, who always allowed her to go to the Sunday school.

Is any inducement held out to children to attend either the Sunday school, or the other schools, besides the premiums you have mentioned; and the advantage of having good instruction?—No other inducement but that.

Are clothes ever distributed?—Yes, as premiums, we generally give them clothes; to some that will not have clothes, we give books; we give clothes to those that are in need.

Do many of the children obtain clothes as premiums?—Yes, many.

Is there a lending library in the school?—No, there is not.

From the Rev. John M^c Davitt, Parish Priest of West Ardstraw, County of Tyrone.

From application on behalf of Tullymock School.

- 10.—Are the Scriptures read in the school, by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

They are generally. Peter M^cCallan states, that the Scriptures shall be used in the school, without note or comment by all the children who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading.

- 11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

None, until Saturday evening; there are two catechisms taught in the afternoon of Saturday, after the school breaks up.

From application on behalf of Deragish School.

THE aid for which I supplicate of your humane Society, are four or five dozen of the Scripture Lessons, one spelling-book, one reading and dictating spelling-book; the arithmetic and dictating ditto would be of service; also four or five dozen of large slates, and the same of smaller, with pencils, alphabets, and merit tickets; a few quires of paper would be serviceable; but as we cannot expect all that we stand in need of, such portion of those as to your Society shall seem meet, will be most thankfully received, and will much facilitate the progress of education, and rouse the inhabitants to a sense of the benefits accruing therefrom.

From application on behalf of Kiesty School.

Sir,

THE Kiesty school is at a great loss for want of books, school requisites, such as slates, cutters, paper, lending library, &c. &c. and leaves it to the consideration of your honourable Committee as to the amount of the grant.

As to the school-room, we refer it to the answers to the 14th, 15th and 16th queries, to the wants of it, and the loss the pupils must be at by its insufficiency. We also leave that to the consideration of your honourable Committee, knowing their benevolence and liberality on all such occasions. And we further hope, that your Committee will extend their wonted liberality and benevolence to us on this occasion.

Secretary to the Education Society, Kildare-place.

Sir,

THE benevolence and liberality shown by the Society to the Drumnabey school in my district, and the rapid progress made by the children in that institution, embolden me once more to offer a young man to your consideration, to have him qualified in the model school, in order to make another establishment in a quarter of this parish where there are fourteen townlands without a school of any sort; he was from his infancy under my personal inspection, and can say with candour he is of the strictest moral conduct, and hope his other acquirements are such as to give great satisfaction.

Your attention and support to the Drumnabey school is fully appreciated by all classes, and the contrast between that and the other miserable cabins around is great; and should I be instrumental in making another establishment through the bearer, I should feel it a happy circumstance.

I take this opportunity of returning my sincere thanks to the Society for their former favours, and hope they will be equally generous on the present occasion.

I remain, with every good wish for your success in your praiseworthy undertaking, (signed) John M^c Davitt, P. P. Westardstraw.

Sir,

HAVING experienced the important utility of your benevolent institution towards the education of the poor of this kingdom, and conscious of the ignorance which prevails in this parish, and beholding their eager desire of obtaining some education, I am now resolved to open a school in each of the two chapels of which I am pastor, having received the particulars of the system from a young man belonging to my parish who has been taught in the model school in winter last at my request, and through his assiduity in qualifying some boys for me, whom I intend appropriating as monitors, I expect to effect the system; there would be upwards of 200 pupils would attend each chapel if I got my design effectuated, which I think would be the means of promoting religious and moral knowledge among the poor. I approve much of the order of the pupils, the regular arrangement of the classes, and the direct harmony of your compilations in every school that are taught upon the system adopted by your Society. I therefore request your Society will deign to grant me two dozen of the Scripture Lessons and one dictating spelling-book, with a few merit tickets for each chapel; any other gratuity that accrues from your Society I will not require, as I will not introduce any more than spelling and reading; and fully convinced of the benefit that would derive from your grant to me, as learning is at a very low ebb in this country at present, unless that certain individuals take part with your laudable Society in adopting some means for the promoting of education.

Ardstraw, August 1st, 1820. (signed) John M^c Davitt, P. P. West Ardstraw.

P.S.—I also request that you will inform me if the Society continue to make any grants for the fitting out of school-houses, and also when we will expect an inspection in this country.

Sir,

Ardstraw, March 1st, 1821.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of November 8th, 1820, with queries requiring information of the state of education of the poor in my charge, which I now return, I hope, with a satisfactory information, and wonder much at the inattention paid to your letters (directed to me) in the Newtown Stewart post office, as it was yesterday I received your favour, which I expected would be in August last, which I hope you will have the goodness to accept as my most plausible apology in not returning a more seasonable answer to your praiseworthy communication. The schools which I have endeavoured to establish in my charge, I hope will be attended with good effect, which I was obliged to hold in the chapels, for want of school-houses, until a more favourable opportunity occur of having houses erected; the children are making progress beyond expectation under all difficulties, want of books being among the first, which is hoped your Society in its philanthropic spirit will deign to remedy; it is admirable to see the endeavours of even the adult of both sexes to receive some education in both chapels, particularly on Sundays. I think the number attending both does not fall much short of 300, and increasing rapidly, eagerly expecting your Society's liberal grant, as we labour under great difficulties for want of books, and are obliged to arrange them into upwards of twenty classes; whereas if we had them on cards, we could contract the number of classes, and also of monitors; and as your Society have been so attentive in answering my letters, I hope you will favour me with the answer of their deliberation as soon as possible.

N.B.—There is a district in my charge, namely Tullymuck, where there are upwards of eighty families destitute of schools these three years, until lately, and I am much afraid will have to desert again, for want of a school-house; the inhabitants being so poor, are not able to build one, and are daily requesting of me to supplicate your Society for aid towards the building of one; but from the clemency shewn by your Society towards my poor charge, in making a grant to Drumnabey school, and also my solicitation at present, I declined complying with their request, fearing to be over-troublesome. I only make bold to make known their wishes and hopes; you will inform me, in your answer to this my letter, if your Society can with propriety assist in the erecting of school-houses; they tell me, Mr. Veevers can inform you of questions you would demand relative to this district. I fear I have trespassed too far with this long scroll.

Sir,

Ardstraw, March 24th. 1821.

WHILE I acknowledge the receipt of your favour of 17th instant, I beg leave to return my most sincere and heartfelt thanks (as also of my parishioners) for the signal mark of approbation conferred on me by your Society, in vouchsafing to grant me the books, slates, paper, &c. for the use of Deragish and Carncorran schools, and also for the four pounds granted by them for the purpose of having desks and forms fitted out for the children; which unmerited favour shall in future stimulate me to persevere in a steady adherence to their principles—principles which are deserving of testimonials of public approbation.

We have already commenced making the desks and forms, and when completed I will apprise the Society according to their request. I here enclose the two receipts signed as you desire, and will feel much obliged by their sending me the ninth Report. I have agreed with a carrier to bring me the books, &c. which I hope you will have the goodness to deliver him on his calling for the same; with every good wish for your Society's exertions in the cause of education amongst the poor of Ireland and abundant success.

Sir,

Carncorran, June 3d, 1821.

IT is with the greatest pleasure I commit these lines to you, in order that you will be so kind as to transmit my most zealous respects to the Committee for the laudable and very liberal grant they have made to the two chapels of which I am pastor; it really is the means of diffusing education to the peasantry of this neighbourhood, which if they had not come under the clemency of your enlightened Society, they might remain strangers to every social link of education. This day I have the pleasure of superintending 600 scholars in the two chapels, of which the principal part of them have it not in their power to attend weekly schools. I am getting forms, &c. made, in order to complete a few classes for writing. I would be desirous of getting the dictating spelling-book, and also the arithmetic, as the children appear to get out in such numbers; it would yield great regularity and concord in the classes, I plainly perceive, by a view of the practice which I saw in the Drumquin school, to have them taught from the tablet. Your compliance will greatly oblige, &c.

(signed) John M^c Davitt, P. P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

Carn Corn, 10th March 1822.

THE Society for promoting the Education of the lower orders of the people of Ireland, that most noble institution, which causes instruction to be given to such vast numbers of children who never would have had it in their power to have got any learning, the Society having had the goodness at the time they gave the grant of books, paper, slates, &c. to the chapel of Carn Corn, they also had the goodness to grant 2*l.* for benches, forms, &c. The forms are in use this long time. I thought it proper to have twelve forms made for the convenience of the figurers and writers, there being such a number of them, and they could have made no proficiency for want of seats. The work being completed, the carpenter is desirous of having his wages. The Carn Corn school is doing well.

(signed) John M^c Davitt, P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

I HAVE with pleasure received your letter, dated August the 29th, which has not come to hand until the 21st instant, to which I can only say that I return my thanks and blessings to your honourable and charitable committee, together with those of my flock. As for the Scriptures, Bible or Testament, being read in either schools, it was upon account of the want of said books, and our inability to purchase them; you will see from Mr. Mills' report on visiting the Corn Corran and Derragish schools, they met with his approbation, which, I trust, we will continue to merit.

(signed) John M^c Davitt, P. P. Westardstraw.

Sir,

Carn Corn, December 9th, 1822.

IN reply to your letter of the 25th ult. I will expect you will excuse me for not acquiescing sooner, but in consequence of different interferences, I could not; however, as to the purport of the objection respecting the reading of the Scriptures in my schools, communicated to the committee by Mr. Mills, I have none, but would rather encourage the use of such sacred writings among all denominations of people, and any books recommended by the Society in future shall be duly practised, both in the Derragish and Carrincorn schools; but the poverty of the people in this neighbourhood is evident, that they are not adequate to purchase books or pay a master; I have also to remark to the committee, that since our neighbourhood got acquainted with the liberality of the Society, that numbers are very competent to read the Scriptures; whereas I dare say, if so well founded an institution had not been diffused here, they would have continued in their original obscurity.

(signed) John M^c Davitt, P. Westardstraw.

P. S.—I expect the committee will remember the 2*l.* grant expended on the Derigish school house or chapel.

Sir,

Carn Corn, 28th December 1822.

IN reply to your letter of the 25th ultimo, I did answer it the 9th instant, but from receiving no answer since, it is a matter of doubt to me whether you have received it or not. It is my wish, and I am fully convinced the wish of the masters both of Carn Corn and Deragish schools, to comply exactly to the rules of the society in every one degree. Neal M'Grath says, that he thought by Mr. Mills, when on his tour of inspection, that he would have ordered all the books that he remarked as wanting, that the school stood in need of at that time, and sent forward particularly thirty Testaments mentioned as wanting by Mr. Mills; Mr. Mills also knows that there was no objection made to the reading of so sacred a book as the Testament; I would rather encourage any thing that would be of benefit to the community at large, and of every description of people; if it was allowable that the Testaments, or a part of them, would be Rhemish. If the Society does not grant the Testaments, the people are so very poor, together with the present circumstances of the times, that they will not be able to buy them; the schools at present are in great need of books, paper, and particularly writing pieces. I most earnestly hope that the Society will not preclude from taking the claims of the masters into consideration.

(signed) John M'Davitt, P. of Westardstraw.

30th June 1823.

— Such of the scholars as were able, have procured sixteen Testaments of the common version. Was it not for the poverty of the people at large there would be more of them. I take this opportunity of letting your Society know, that the measures of the committee will be complied with as nearly as possible. We have had no paper these six months past. I am highly gratified in having it in my power to inform the gentlemen of the committee, that they are the cause of a number of poor children being instructed in this parish, who very probably never would have received any instruction.

(signed) John M'Davitt, P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

Carn Corn, 4th August 1823.

I HAVE received your letter of the 19th July, with the inclosed receipt for the amount of books and school requisites, which your committee were pleased to grant to the Carn Corn school. I do assure you, that there is no one order of the committee that shall not be complied with.

I return my unfeigned thanks to the committee for the very liberal grant, and I assure them, that it is my determination to promote the objects of the committee as far as comes within my power.

(signed) John M'Davitt, P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

Tawany, 15th December 1823.

I HAD the honour of receiving your letter of the 30th ult. this morning, inclosing two letters and a gratuity of half of a 5*l.* note in each of them, for Mr. Neal M'Grath and Mr. Eugene M'Glensy, masters of Carn Corn and Deragish schools. There is nothing can be more pleasing to me than any thing that will favour the general good of this neighbourhood and its rising generation, as I have it so much at heart; I am also happy to find your inspector made so favourable a report of the schools to your honourable committee; there is no men could be more grateful than those two are, and you may rest assured that they will continue their best exertions, in order to have a proficiency in number that will be pleasing to your committee.

As to the answer to the 10th Query in the printed list, viz. "There are three Bibles and 16 Testaments in use in the Kilreal school at present of the common version," I am very much indebted to your honourable committee for their liberal grants to me and the schools under my care.

(signed) John M'Davitt, P. P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

Tavanaugh, 10th of October 1824.

I HAVE an occasion to trouble your very honourable committee in behalf of a school in Tullymuck; there is a very great extent of country, and no school, even a hedge school, but itself any where convenient to it. This neighbourhood is totally ignorant, and I doubt will remain so if your worthy committee will not do something for them. If they would have the goodness to give a grant of books, paper, lending library, slates, cutters, and all sorts of school requisites, as my entire object is to have the ignorant instructed, and to infuse learning for the general good of the poor at large.

By doing something for this place, you will place me under many obligations.

The master is a young man of excellent parts; he is highly esteemed by the country at large for being attentive to business, and a good scholar.

(signed) John M'Davitt, P. of Westardstraw.

Sir,

Tavanaugh, 16th November 1824.

IN reply to yours of the 25th ultimo, as a Roman Catholic clergyman, I cannot comply with the rules of the Society, and therefore I beg leave to withdraw myself from being patron of any school or schools belonging to Kildare-place Society; as, the Society wishes the Scriptures to be read without note or comment, which is contrary to the fundamentals of our church.

It is to be hoped that your benevolent committee will take the peculiar hardship of my case under their humane consideration; and that besides the liberal aid which may be given towards Devlin school, something may be done also to encourage the other institutions to which I have alluded; otherwise it is to be apprehended, that from the extreme poverty and desolation of the parish, a continuation of those schools cannot be accounted on.

For further information on this subject, I beg leave to refer you to Mr. Donelan, to whom we all feel much for the interest he has taken in promoting the education of the poor in this country.

Sir,

Louisburgh, 25th October 1823.

IN reply to your respected letter of the 18th instant, I beg to return your committee my sincere thanks for the readiness they have shewn to aid my feeble efforts in affording education to the poor of my extensive parish.

For the satisfaction of the committee, I can have no difficulty in stating more fully my answer to the 13th query, viz. "there is no rule to exclude persons of any religious denomination from the situation of masters" in the schools established by me, and for which aid is now sought, and christians of every denomination shall be equally eligible to the situation, if in other respects suitable.

Herewith I transmit my answers to the 12 lists of queries, which I anticipate will be deemed satisfactory; and it is resolved to adhere strictly, in the management of these schools, to the regulations of the Society which are now before me.

Sir,

YOUR very kind favour of the 1st instant, with the accompanying documents, have been just handed to me, for which I beg leave to return to your committee my most sincere and grateful acknowledgments.

Sir, I AM most anxious that one at least of the masters of the schools in my parish should be instructed as soon as possible in the system taught at your model school.

May I therefore request of you to inform me, with as little delay as your convenience will admit of, if I shall send up a young man, by the name of Thomas Malbay, about 18 years of age, for that purpose.

—If, as I understand, your Society occasionally supplies other schools which are more powerfully supported than mine, with the authorized version, it may not be perhaps deemed unreasonable on my part to seek for some compensation for the copies of the Douay version with which I have supplied the schools under my care.

Sir, I HAVE had the very great pleasure of receiving your sundry favours of the 6th instant, inclosing first half notes of the sum of 67*l.* 10*s.* being the amount of gratuities to eleven schoolmasters, and beg leave in return to send you their acknowledgments for same, as required.

Have the goodness to present to your worthy committee my sincere thanks for this further manifestation of their disposition to cheer me in my humble efforts to promote the intellectual improvements of my most miserable parishioners.

None of the scholars have yet attained a suitable proficiency to enable them to read the Scriptures; but as soon as a class will be prepared, select passages from the Douay Testament, without note or comment, shall be read.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

When the scholars shall have learned to read, they will be permitted to read such easy passages in the Douay Testament, without note or comment, as Rev. Mr. Lyons will deem to be suited to their age and capacities.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

None whatever.

Ardnaree, 9th March 1824.
Sir, THE answers to the foregoing queries will, I dare say, fully satisfy your committee with regard to the Cloonslane school; there are no people in the parish into whom it is more difficult to infuse a spirit of improvement; they are dispirited, and in a great measure demoralized by their extreme penury, and look with indifference upon every plan for their amelioration, which is not accompanied with immediate relief. Some assistance therefore to pay the master; the first and second parts of the Dublin spelling-book, an arithmetic, small slates, &c. are, in my idea, the kind of aid at present necessary for this school, more than any other school in the parish; it requires much prudent management, and a fostering hand.

Sir, THERE are no resident gentlemen, or persons of opulence, in the neighbourhood, from whom aid might be obtained.

Your committee therefore is my dernier resource. From my experience of their liberality, I have full confidence they will enable me to revive the school in this neglected quarter.

From an Application on behalf of the Breafy School.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 2d December 1823.

THROUGH some mistake in the office, your communication of the 15th ultimo did not reach me until this day. In reply, I beg to state to your committee, that, by "select passages from the Douay Testament," I did not mean "an abstract or abridgment from the Scriptures," as your committee seem to infer, but such passages in the New Testament as will be deemed suitable to the capacities of the children.

With this explanation, which I hope will not be misunderstood, my reply to 10th query is sufficiently explicit.

Desirous, however, to give your committee as little trouble as possible, I beg the following will be considered as my answer to the query.

None of the scholars have yet attained a suitable proficiency to enable them to read the Scriptures; the greater part are mere beginners, and scarcely one in the whole school spell, much less read with propriety; but as soon as a class will be prepared, they shall read such passages and chapters in the Douay Testament, without note or comment, as will be deemed sufficiently easy for them.

To J. Topham, esq.

(signed) J. P. Lyons, P. P.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 3d January 1824.

PERMIT me, even now, to return thanks to your committee for their liberal donation; it comes very opportunely, for the stock which I had on hand was considerably decreased, and quite inadequate to the demands upon it. I shall feel it a very great kindness, if you will take the trouble to let me know whether I can hope for any aid from your committee to establish four schools, on a small scale, in four remote townlands of this parish. They are too remote from the Kilmore Moy school to profit of it, and too poor to establish schools independently. I expect the landlords will contribute something. My own mite will not be wanting; and if your committee will lend their aid, I trust those remote villages will have the blessings of a well-ordered education communicated to them. At present their only source of information is the Sunday school, in which nothing but religious knowledge has yet been circulated.

Fully aware of the advantage of a lending library, for the use of those who frequent the Sunday school, I beg to submit, through you, the accompanying application to the consideration of your committee. It is, however, but fair to state, that the Sunday school is principally for the purpose of teaching the principles and catechism of the Catholic church.

I send the receipt by bearer; he will take charge of the package intended for me.

Permit me to return you my grateful acknowledgments for the handsome manner in which you had the goodness to announce the liberality of your committee.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 9th March 1824.

YOUR kind communication of the 17th January arrived in course. In a few days after I wrote a letter to acknowledge it, and committed it to the carman who does business for me, but through some inadvertence he forgot to take it with him. I trust, however, it is not yet too late to return my thanks to your committee for their liberal donation, and to you for the polite terms in which you announced it.

I take the liberty to request you will get the value of the enclosed, delivered to bearer in the following articles; viz. six dozen slates, seven by five; three dozen Dublin spelling-books, first part; and the remainder for as many of the second part as it will purchase.

May I request you will have the goodness to send me by bearer, or otherwise, a few blank applications.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 17th August 1824.

I ENCLOSE the receipt for the grant to the Calleens school, and shall feel much obliged if the box containing it be delivered to Mr. Black, who is at present at your training school. He will procure a carrier to bring it down.

When Mr. Mills was here, he was perfectly satisfied the delay with regard to the Scriptures was not owing to me. He saw Mr. Coyne's replies to my repeated applications. I wrote to Mr. Black ten days ago on the subject, and feel assured I cannot be disappointed. As soon as they arrive, I pledge myself they shall be read in perfect accordance with the rules of the Society.

Now that the Scriptures have been at length procured, and that they are read according to the regulations of the Society, I confidently hope the committee will take the poor man into their kind consideration, more especially as he is to lose the Kilmore Moy school, on Mr. Black's return from the training school, and be transferred to Breafoy, where his salary will be more precarious, and his situation in every respect less advantageous than at present.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 20th November 1824.

I UNDERTOOK the improvements, on the liberal assurance of the committee, that they would contribute towards the intended expenditure, provided the Scriptures were read according to the regulations of the Society. The work, I trust, will meet the unqualified approbation of the inspectors; 356 children are accommodated under the same roof, in the most convenient and orderly manner, and the furniture is of the best description. On the other hand, the regulations of the Society are strictly observed. The Scriptures are in the school, and read by such of the children as can be reasonably deemed qualified for their perusal.

Sir,

Ardnaree, 8th November 1824.

I HAVE the honour to acknowledge your letter of the 6th instant, inclosing 5*l.* for the use of Culleens school, for which I return my thanks.

Owing to the very numerous attendance of children at the Chapel schools, it became absolutely necessary to furnish it anew with desks and forms. I gave notice of my intention to do so in August last, when you had the goodness to state in reply, that the committee would have much pleasure in making the grant required, on receiving an assurance that the Scriptures are in the school, and that they are read in accordance with the rules of the Society. Now, I beg leave to submit the following account of the actual expenditure on the schools, and also to assure the committee that their regulation has been complied with.

The school is now furnished for 356 scholars, on the improved method of instruction.

Without note or comment, written or oral.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No; neither one or the other are used in school hours.

If your Society would afford to the parishioners of Killeagan 30*l.* towards building a school-room adequate to their numbers, 12 dozen of slates, as many pencils, half a dozen of each of the following reading books; viz. History of Joseph, Fables of Æsop, Instinct Displayed, Exiles of Siberia, Robinson Crusoe, and Commodore Anson's Voyage, and eight or ten reams of paper, I think it would enable them to have their children instructed in science and morality, the neglect of which has, in my opinion, proved fatal to many of themselves, to this neighbourhood, and to society at large, as I can attribute to no other cause than neglect of education, the perpetration of crimes which at this day are not known in any other part of Ireland.

Since we have been so fortunate as to be noticed by your Society, the obstacles which impeded the progress of education began to disappear, and by your liberality they have been all removed, except the want of a school-room, but at present the scite on which to build could not be procured in a convenient place.

The wants of this school I have already taken the liberty of mentioning to you in my application of last week, which if granted, or any part thereof, your committee will confer additional obligation on me and most other poor of this neighbourhood.

THE want of an appropriate school-room is the greatest obstacle to the education of the poor in this neighbourhood, though every exertion has been made by the inhabitants to procure one. Application has been made even to government, and a grant of about 96*l.* obtained, yet something prevents the landlord from making the necessary transfer of ground on which to have the school-house erected.

This school stands in need of every school requisite to accommodate about 80 or 90 children, but I will be exceedingly grateful to your committee for any part they in their liberality may think proper to bestow on it.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 21st June 1820.

I ENTERTAIN strong expectations, if aided by your Society, that the growing generation in this large and thickly populated tract of land, will be rescued from ignorance and immorality. They are a people naturally disposed to be subject to the laws of their country, but they have hitherto been enveloped from the view of many of them by a cloud of ignorance, which I hope is about to be dispersed by the charitable interference of your Society. I trust our people will be grateful, and ever invoke blessings from the Giver of all good gifts, on the person by whom they shall be enabled to enjoy the happiness of an early and moral education.

Sir,

allowed them. I intend commencing the first quarterly examination on the 17th instant, after which I shall be able to inform your Society to what extent I can comply with their regulations, hitherto I have literally fulfilled them. In my answer to the 6th query, I mentioned 250 children to be generally in attendance; their numbers have since encreased to three hundred, and not a sufficiency of books or other accommodations (except house room and forms) for half the number, notwithstanding, in the short space of time since the establishment of the school, there appears a great improvement in the children's information, their cleanliness, and even in their little homes, a degree of neatness, and almost comfort, is daily manifesting itself. If the regulations of Tynaclash school meet the approbation of your Society, I hope, Sir, to be informed what security will be required for the rightful application of their donation.

(signed) John Gahan, P.P.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 24th July 1820.

WITH great pleasure I can inform your Society, that I have in the Tynaclash school forty children who, I think, may be allowed to read the Scriptures as soon as the sacred volume can be procured for them. If your Society in their bounty would grant so many copies of the last edition of the Douay Testament, it would be an additional obligation on me and the parishioners of Kiltiagan. I hope your committee will take into their favourable consideration, not only my former application, but the people's poverty, their great number of children, and how inadequately my demands would supply them, either with school-room or other accommodations.

(signed) John Gahan, P.P.

P. S. There is no part of your regulations in the printed statement sent me from your Society, but the school at Tynaclash will be in perfect conformity with, when I shall have the Scripture, and it shall, I hope, long continue so.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 25th September 1820.

IMMEDIATELY after the receipt of your letter of 29th July, I procured as many copies of the New Testament as are sufficient to afford an opportunity to all the children attending the school at Tynaclash, who have attained a suitable proficiency of reading the Scriptures. That school now is, as it has been since its commencement, and shall continue in perfect conformity with the printed regulations of your Society, two copies of which I had the honour of receiving from you.

I shall mention one instance of their scanty means; about 170 children, from 16 years old down to nine, who attend the school, were not able to procure dinner these four months past, and, of course, studied from about eight o'clock in the morning until past five in the evening without subsistence; from this instance of poverty and zeal to procure instruction, I hope your committee will perceive that the children of Tynaclash school are really those for whose education your benevolent Society is interested.

Numbers have increased to 350 children, and the average attendance has also increased to, of male children 130, of females 150; of these there are at present forty-eight of each sex reading the Scriptures, without note or comment, written or oral, and I expect to have three classes more of twelve each, capable of reading them in the course of this month.

I take the liberty once more of informing your honourable committee, that the parishioners of Kiltiagan, hope, from the number of their children, their poverty, their great zeal for their education, and above all from the liberality of your Society, to be aided with 30*l.* towards building a school-house equal to their necessities, or to be expended in any other way more agreeable to their more enlightened views.

Sir,

Sir,

AFTER experiencing the many advantages derived to the school at Rathvilly, conducted on the principles of education recommended by your Society, a portion of our parishioners too remote from Rathvilly, anxious to enjoy equal means of facilitating the education of their children, request me to solicit your committee to receive into their model school Patrick Keating, who will, if admitted after being qualified, teach school at Ballyhacket, two and half miles from Rathvilly.

(signed) John Gahan.

Sir,

Rathvilly, Sep. 8th, 1821.

YOUR letter of 1st inst. filled me with sentiments of gratitude and respect for your benevolent society. The sum granted to the Rathvilly school, and the school requisites, for which I send you a receipt, are proofs of the liberality of the laws by which your Society is governed. Since I first had the honor of a correspondence with your committee, I was convinced that if your regulations were properly understood, no reasonable objection could be made to them by any denomination of professing christians, and as an individual I flatter myself I contributed something in this neighbourhood to remove prejudices entertained against some conditions required by your Society from schools in union with it; but an inspection of the schools in this parish in union with and aided by your Society obviates every objection that even the most prejudiced of their visitors can propose.

I am thrice happy to hear that the school at Tynaclash met the approbation of your inspector; it was greatly impeded in its progress this summer by sickness.

Rev. Mr. Lyons is at present absent, but on his return he will with sincere thanks to your Society for so kind and generous an admonition, make application for the instruction of the Englishtown master at your model school.

I send the items of the actual expenditure of the Rathvilly school, signed by two of the most respectable inhabitants of this neighbourhood, who are also very grateful to your Society and much interested in the education of the youth of their country.

(signed) John Gahan.

Sir,

April 29th, 1822.

THE report of the Rathvilly School for last week, amounts to one hundred and forty-eight scholars.

I hope your committee will with their usual liberality grant whatever school requisites they may deem necessary to bestow on such numbers. I expect your committee will, in their deliberations, call to mind the extreme poverty of the parents of the children who attend at Tynaclash school, also the greater number of those of Rathvilly.

WITH great pleasure I can inform your committee, that the schools of this parish continue to be conducted with the strictest observance of the system of education recommended by your Society, through this observance and their paternal kindness so liberally extended towards them, they are progressively advancing towards perfection.

To the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 22d November 1823.

NOT until this day have I had the honour of receiving your communications of the 1st, 19th, and 1st, instant, with the enclosures to the teachers of Tynaclash and Rathvilly schools. My gratitude is inexpressible especially at this moment, so transported am I with admiration of the liberality of your committee in granting premiums of ten pounds each to the masters, and seven pounds ten shillings each to the mistresses of the above schools. Their conduct and faculties for communicating information have greatly pleased me, and have given very general satisfaction to all friends of education in their respective neighbourhood that their zeal and exertions will increase; I am confident, were I to detail the advantages the peasantry of this parish derive from the patronage and munificence of your Society, it would far exceed the limits of a letter; advantages that no person can sufficiently appreciate, who was not acquainted with the manners and morals of our country-people before the establishment of our schools on the plan of education recommended by your Society.

The school at Englishtown has, since its establishment, been supplied with two Testaments to every three children who were capable of reading them with any degree of accuracy, though from some fatality they were taken out of the school on Sunday, Monday morning being the time of inspection, nor were they missed by the teachers, as a similar circumstance never before occurred. I waited at Baltinglass to explain to Mr. Mills, but was not fortunate enough to meet him; however the proportion of two Testaments to every three good readers may appear to your committee, each of the three schools shall be supplied with a Testament for each child capable of reading it, from this day forward.

(signed) John Gahan, P. P.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 21st January 1825.

WITH pleasure I send signed and inclosed the receipts for the grants made to the schools at Tynaclash, Englishtown, and Rathvilly.

I think, if I remember well, your inspector said he did not visit a school in which the children answered him so well as at Rathvilly, and I am quite convinced that there is not in this country a school in union with your Society where there is so great progress made by the children in attendance as at our schools, and I believe in no instance are the teachers so poorly remunerated as at Tynaclash, Englishtown, and Rathvilly.

May I hope for the honour of hearing from you if our teachers are entitled to premiums from your Society for the last year; if they are entitled, I beg leave to offer my opinion as I have made very close observations on the progress of the children of the respective schools. I think the female teachers, if not more, at least equally deserving as the masters.

From the Reverend Richard Carolan, Parish Priest of Ratoath, County Meath.

Sir,

Ratoath, December 11, 1822.

THE very kind, polite and prompt attention of your Society encourages us still to hope we may be able to effectuate this great and necessary object we have in view, in the perfecting of which that Society is interested equally with the local managers here, we shall therefore waive all minor particulars which can be reasonably objectionable, and endeavour, by co-operating earnestly, to remove that dark cloud of ignorance which overhangs the minds of the entire group of peasantry, inhabitants of this neighbourhood.

The Testament without note or comment shall be read in the school by those who have obtained a suitable proficiency in reading, but shall not be used as a school book; and as we cannot yet calculate on our means of procuring such, neither can we specify any particular number, but must confide in the charity and generosity of your Society; I have now only to repeat my reply to the 13th query; surely all denominations of christians must be eligible as masters, managers, teachers and scholars.

Should your Society consider us as just objects of their charitable attention in the present case, we shall with pleasure submit, as far as possible, to such other regulations as they may at a future period require, tending to promote the good order of the school, and the improvement of the poor children.

I cannot but express my deep sense of your very courteous and polite attention, for which I beg you'll accept my best thanks and most grateful acknowledgments.

PRESUMING your inspectors have by this time communicated to your committee the result of their inspection of our intended male and female poor school, and that those gentlemen have made minute reports of our state, circumstances and situation, your committee are therefore now better enabled to form a judgment of our claims to encouragement and assistance from your Society, upon which report, joined with the great confidence which their kind attention has excited, we are induced to hope the Society will grant the sum of forty pounds towards enabling us to complete our establishment, and the admission of the master (when appointed) to the training school, and requisites for the use of the scholars, expected to amount to sixty males and forty females. The kindness and attention we experienced from your inspectors, Messrs. Daly and Veevers, must be to me one of the strongest incitements to discharge the important duties with which I am entrusted in aiding to promote the improvement of the education of the youth of this poor village.

Secretary to the Committee for the Poor School of Ratoath.

Sir,

Ratoath, November 30, 1823.

THE committee for conducting the general free schools of Ratoath, &c. &c. grateful for the kind encouragement already given by your Society, and agreeable to the instructions contained in your letter of the 9th of August, anticipating the happy consequences of so useful an establishment, although their new school-house has not been as yet inhabited, have proceeded to elect a person, whom they have judged from experience of his general sober, moral and attentive habits, in every qualification eligible, and whom they confide, will be found suitable to the conditions proposed by your Society; they beg now to be informed if he can be admitted into your training school in the beginning of the next month, so that he being instructed in that system of education recommended by your Society, the schools here may be opened in the beginning of the new year, and go on without interruption.

(signed) Richard Carolan,

Sir,

Ratoath, 23 March 1824.

IN compliance with the rules of your Society, we the society for promoting the education of the poor of this village, wishing to co-operate with your laudable exertions, have determined that the Testament without note or comment shall be read by all the scholars in the Ratoath school, who have attained to a suitable proficiency. Therefore, upon this assurance, hope we shall obtain a grant of such school requisites as to your committee be deemed necessary.

By order of the Committee,

(signed) Richard Carolan, Secretary.

Sir,

Ratoath, 1st June 1824.

AGREEABLE to the directions contained in your letter of the 9th of August 1823, we transmit a statement of the items of the actual expenditure on the building of the male and female schools for the benefit of the poor of this neighbourhood, and beg leave now to call upon your committee for the amount of the grant of 40*l.* as specified by your letter, made by your committee towards defraying the expense of our building. We can assure your committee the schools are supplied with a suitable number of the New Testaments, which have been and shall continue to be read by all those of the scholars, who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; the schools opened the beginning of May, and there are, within one month, 127 children; 68 boys and 59 girls, who profit of the improved system of education as taught by our master, who owes much gratitude to your Society for the very useful knowledge and the many advantages he has obtained by being instructed at your training school; our prospects of obtaining that assistance in this neighbourhood, which in the commencement of this undertaking we flattered ourselves we might expect, are at present much altered, so as to induce us to hope that upon an inspection and proper inquiry being made by your committee, they will be convinced of the necessity and propriety of affording us this, which we now apply for, and even some additional aid, in promoting this work of charity so necessary amongst the illiterate and too long neglected peasantry of this neighbourhood.

I CANNOT express what my heart feels for the honourable notice which your committee have been pleased to take of my weak and humble efforts in our common cause.

'Tis a peculiar gratification to me to have merited the approbation of gentlemen who know so well how to appreciate any exertions which may be made to promote the public good; their sanction and confidence, I shall consider among the most estimable attainments of my life,

Permit me, Sir, to entreat that you will assure the gentlemen of your committee, of my profound respect and most grateful acknowledgments.

My gratitude is, if possible, increased, by the committee having conveyed their sentiments through a gentleman whose manner of communicating them, enhances the obligation.

Isaac Topham, Esq. Assistant Secretary to the Education Society, Kildare-place.

From the Rev. James Hughes, Roman Catholic Curate of Castlebar, County Mayo.

From application in behalf of Castlebar Free School.

Sir,

Castlebar, October 3d, 1823.

YOUR last letter on the subject of education which I had the pleasure to receive was dated 3d August 1822. It stated that my answer to the tenth quere on your list precluded the Society from granting any aid whatever to our school. But the conscientious difficulties under which I then laboured, and which prevented me from acceding to the terms and conditions of your Society, have been latterly (in my mind) so fully obviated by the ample and very satisfactory explanation given to me by Counsellor Donelan of the views and principles of the Kildare-place Society, that for the present I can see no motive that could or should reasonably prevent me from submitting to your regulations. May I therefore expect that you will transmit to me a copy of the queries, which I shall deem it my duty to answer without delay.

(signed) James Hughes, R. C. Curate.

Sir,

Castlebar, Nov. 8th, 1823.

AFTER the receipt of your letter of the 1st instant, I have not delayed in acquainting the free school committee with its purport and contents, the committee beg to offer the most unfeigned expression of their gratitude to your Society for their very favourable consideration of the claims laid before them in behalf of the free school of this town. The committee also pledge themselves for the most scrupulous adhesion to the principles and regulations laid down and required by the Society.

In compliance with the directions of the Society and your request, I transmit a correct and detailed estimate of the expenses to be incurred in finishing of the school-house. The estimate has been given by the most nominal architect in this town. The committee, anxious to trespass but as little as possible on the kind indulgence of the Society, have directed the architect to make the terms of the estimate as low as possible.

The committee engage that the strictest economy will be observed in the application, and the most satisfactory account given of the expenditure of any aid which they may receive from the Society. I send you the receipt for 12*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.* signed, and the gentleman who shall hand you this letter and the receipt will be able, if required, to give your Society any further information. He shall also receive and forward to me your grant of books for the school.

(signed) James Hughes, R. C. Curate, Secretary.

P. S.—The committee, convinced that the large number of scholars usually in attendance at their school cannot be sufficiently attended to by one master, without the aid of some regular system, and highly approving as they do of the system adopted by your Society, earnestly solicit the permission of the Society to admit their master for some time into their training school.

Sir,

Castlebar, January 7th, 1824.

THE free school committee of this town return your Society their sincere thanks for the liberal grant of books, paper, &c. &c. which they have been pleased to send them. We have sent to Coyne for four copies of the edition of the New Testament which your Society recommended. We have deferred the partial and imperfect improvements of our school-house, which, independent of the aid which we expect from your Society, we may be able to effect.

In your last letter you ordered me to have sent you a regular estimate of the expenses to be incurred in the finishing of our school-house, and assured me that the Society were disposed to give the kindest consideration. In consequence of mentioning in the estimate different items which I had not considered in my first application, the estimate exceeded my first application by 54*l.*

I received a letter from Mr. Donelan, the inspector of the Society, on the 26th November last, in which he mentioned that the Society were inclined to grant our school 50*l.* He wished to know if I could, as a Catholic clergyman, have any objection to receive the aid of the Society on the terms and considerations on which the aid was offered; my answer was, that as far as I understood from him, and the rest of my correspondence with the Society, their laws and their terms, I could have no hesitation whatever in submitting to them, that all catechisms and tracts on religion should be excluded the school during the school hours, and that the New Testament, without note or comment, should be read under the restriction specified and required by the Society.

Kildare-place, Dublin.

Sir,

Castlebar, 21st January 1824.

I HAVE received your letter of the 17th instant, and have to inform you in reply, that I shall feel much pleasure in attending to any instructions of your committee; since they are of opinion that twelve copies of the New Testament are necessary for the Castlebar free school, that number shall be procured as soon as we can get them from Dublin.

Although this school be in its infancy, not being established more than four years and three months, however I can feel no difficulty in adopting in it the reading of the Scriptures, under the restrictions laid down by your Society as explained by Mr. Donelan.

To J. Topham, Esq. &c. &c. Dublin.

Sir,

Castlebar, 28th February 1824.

I HAVE received your letter of the 7th instant, stating that your committee must decline making any grant to our school on this account, that the house was built on chapel ground.

The conditions on which you assured us you felt disposed to make these grants were specified. The only conditions were, that the Scriptures, without note or comment, should be read in the school during school hours, by such of the scholars as had attained a suitable proficiency in reading, and that all catechisms and religious tracts were to be excluded the school during school hours. With these conditions, as they have been laid down and explained to us in your letters and by your inspector, Mr. Donelan, we have most strictly complied.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, oral or written?

The Douay Bible and Testament shall be read by all the scholars, as required by the Society without note or comment, oral or written.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No catechism shall be used during school hours, nor any book of controversy, nor inculcating peculiar speculative opinions.

Sir,

Graig, February 13th, 1823.

I HAVE to acknowledge your favour, and in reply, have to say, as your benevolent Society leave to the managers of the school the choice of the version, and the selection of such parts as are judged best suited to the capacity of children, I feel no difficulty in complying with the rule; men of different religious persuasions may hold various opinions regarding the necessity of authority in expounding the sacred text, or the competency of private judgment, aided by that interior conviction which affects the reader in perusing the work; but where there is question of educating so numerous and so indigent a population as Graig, such discussions would be unseasonable; reading a portion of the Testament, as you mention, will meet with no opposition, and if it is complained of, it will be only when read by zealots or by ladies whose piety sometimes outstrips their prudence. Aware of the good intended by these interpreters of the word who, although violating your rule, mean only to reclaim us from what they conceive to be errors, I hear of this interference with indulgence, it often causes irritation, and always proves an obstacle to the education of the poor. Our funds are so exhausted, having expended above 300 l. erecting our school, that we are scarcely able to buy the Testaments; if your Society will furnish them with the other requisites, I will take care to have them read; if such books be not distributed, I will, as soon as possible, provide them, so that our not this moment having them, will not, I trust, prevent the grant; our school is strictly on the plan of the Kildare-street Society, and when completely filled up, will accommodate between three and four hundred children, and I have little doubt your inspector will report it to be the best village school in the province.

(signed) Maurice Kearney, P.P.

Sir,

Graig, March 8th, 1823.

I HAVE this day ordered two dozen Testaments for the Graig school, from Mr. Tims, of Grafton-street, we will have them about the end of next week; I shall, as soon as convenient, make a further purchase of Testaments, so that each boy who has attained a sufficient proficiency in reading may use them; your inspector, I have no doubt, will report the plan of education education at Kildare-street to be completely exemplified here. I have again to call the attention of your honourable Society to our immense population here, and to its great poverty; the school, when our third room is fitted up, will educate 350, which number I hope they will have in view in granting the requisites.

A committee is forming to manage a school agreeably to the plan of Kildare-street at Gores-bridge; I cannot yet state the amount of subscriptions, but at a proper time will lay the matter before the Society.

(signed) Maurice Kearney, P.P. of Graig.

Sir,

Graig, March, 26th, 1823.

IN common with the managers of the Graig school, I feel grateful to your benevolent Society for their liberal grant of school requisites to our establishment; I have further to express my acknowledgments for receiving and instructing at your model school, the Gores-bridge master; I shall select one to send up who will profit from the opportunity offered, and carry into effect the charitable views of the Society towards the numerous poor of Gores-bridge. Whilst I feel truly grateful for the grant already made, I hope your liberal Society will not consider it trespassing on their bounty, humbly to submit, that our third room (where we intend to instruct by a monitor the younger children) is not yet quite fitted up, and would require eight desks, 12 feet long, with seats, to provide which, six or eight pounds would be wanting; if your funds could afford us that sum, we would forthwith educate between three and four hundred children.

(signed) M. Kearney, P.P.

P.S. Enclosed I send the receipt.

Sir,

Graig, February 11th, 1824.

I FEEL much indebted to your honourable committee for the prompt assistance given to our school; their liberal grant of requisites are all this moment wanting, and will be of the greatest use; our numbers are encreasing and are likely to encrease.

I shall always very cordially co-operate with the Society in educating that portion of persons over whom I have a controul; our combined efforts hitherto have been eminently successful. I have strong reasons to believe it will long continue to be one of the most numerous and best attended schools in this part of the province.

(signed) M. Kearney, P.P. of Graig.

Sir,

Graig, July 6th, 1824.

THE Committee were graciously pleased to attend to my application in favour of Gores-bridge, and to make a grant of 80*l.* for building a school; the house now building for that purpose, I am sorry to say, is too small to answer the views of the committee or the people; it is now under my controul.

I hope my application in favour of Graig, will be equally favourably received by your committee; there is no part of Ireland in which it will be productive of more good.

From the Rev. Francis Haly, Parish Priest of Kilcock, County of Kildare.

FOR the last six or seven years, the public schools of the parishes of Kilcock and Newtown have been progressively on the decline, and in consequence, the progress of education amongst the children of the labouring classes has been considerably impeded.

From the want of all sorts of furniture for a school-room, I am of opinion, that less than fifteen pounds will not furnish the two rooms of the "Newtown Free School," by practising the most rigid economy. The Rev. Mr. Dunne, the late incumbent, received from the Society for educating the Poor of Ireland, a quantity of books, slates, &c. which are forthcoming for the use of the school.

Sir,

Kilcock, 2d May 1823.

THE person who has the honour to hand you this letter, has been appointed principal of the Newtown school by the subscribers, and is sent up to the model school at Kildare-place, in order to qualify himself for teaching on the Lancasterian plan.

If any ambiguity of expression appears in my reply to the 10th query, on behalf of the Newtown school, I beg to assure you, that nothing of that kind was intended; my meaning was, that the Scriptures would be read by such of the children as had arrived at the reading class. The Society may rest perfectly satisfied, that any contract I may enter into with them shall, on my part, be most scrupulously fulfilled.

I shall lose not a moment in fitting up the Kilcock, Newtown and Tiermoghgan schools, which, when done, shall be certified, according to the regulations laid down in your letter.

To the Committee of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Gentlemen,

Kilcock, 5th December 1823.

I HAVE had the honor of receiving a letter from Mr. Topham, to inform me, that you had been good enough to grant me 12*l.* for additional improvements in the Newtown free school, for which I beg to return you my best thanks. I beg also to assure you, that nothing shall be wanting on my part to have this grant applied to the purpose for which it has been made with the greatest possible economy. When Mr. Mills visited the Kilcock and Newtown schools, he remarked to me, that the book which I considered to contain the four Gospels, with the Acts of the Apostles, all entire, was only extracts from the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles; I assure you, on my word, that this mistake was unintentional on my part, never having examined the books till after Mr. Mills had made the observation to me. I have sent an order to Coyne for 30 copies of the New Testament for the two schools, which I expect down immediately, and I should have them before now, but have been prevented from going to town myself in consequence of being ill for some days back of a very severe cold. By a letter from Mr. Topham, received this day, I am given to understand, that before you can take the claims of the respective teachers for gratuities into consideration, it is necessary, that the schools should be furnished with a sufficient number of Testaments, and read by the children according to the regulations of the Society. I assured you, when first I applied to the Society for aid, that whatever compact I entered into with the committee, should be religiously fulfilled by me. This pledge shall be honourably redeemed, and you shall always find that I shall never be guilty of the meanness of wilful or deliberate misrepresentation. My conduct, I trust, shall be at all times guided by a principle of honour, which will enable me to court an investigation without fear of the result; I do confess, that no exertion is wanting on my part to make these schools as useful to the community as possible; and I think the gentry of the neighbourhood will do me the justice to say, that my exertions have not been unsuccessful; I hope the mistake that has taken place with respect to the Scripture lessons, will form no obstacle when you come to consider the claims of the teachers, for they were completely blameless; if there was any fault, it rests with myself, and I trust you will do me the justice to believe, that it originated in misconception.

— These sums, added to the tradesmen's estimate, will make an entire sum of 26*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* a large sum no doubt, particularly when added to your original grant in favour of this institution; but I beg to remark, that by making this grant you will render the school of Kilcock one of the most respectable, and I verily believe one of the best schools I have ever had an opportunity of knowing; that your grants to the schools of Kilcock and Newtown have been most liberal I most freely confess, but at the same time I assure you, that greater economy could not be observed than there has been in its application to answer the ends for which it has been granted. When you add together the various sums granted to assist the public institutions of these parishes, do not, I intreat you gentlemen, be startled, but remember, that by the liberality of your aids, you have been instrumental in diffusing the benefits of a well regulated system of education, accompanied by its usual retinue of blessings, over a tract of country of about 25 square miles. I pledge myself to you, that in the event of your granting me this request, the money shall be applied to the best possible advantage; there shall be no jobbing I promise you.

Kilcock, 12th December 1823.

Sir,

Kilcock, 6th July 1824.

I AM happy to find, that the report of the inspector has not been at variance with my representations, and I feel grateful to the committee for the manner in which they have been pleased to express their approbation of my exertions. In the support of these interesting teresting institutions, I beg to assure them I feel a very lively interest, and nothing shall be neglected on my part to give them stability, and render them, in the most extensive sense of the word efficient. The attendance is numerous at both these schools, and the improvement of the children quite perceptible. I beg, sir, you will accept my best thanks for your readiness in forwarding at all times my statements to the committee.

Sir,

Kilcock, 16th November 1824.

I HAVE had the honour of receiving your letters of the 6th instant, enclosing gratuities for the masters and mistresses of the Kilcock and Newtown free schools. I have been prevented by absence from home from acknowledging sooner the receipt of your letters. I beg to assure you, that I have no reason for withholding the gratuities from the persons for whom they are intended, believing as I most firmly do, that they leave nothing undone on their parts, to advance their pupils, and in preserving order and discipline in their schools; indeed, if I do look on them with too partial an eye, I do not know any schools where a proper and unwearied attention is paid with better effect to the interest of the pupils, than in the schools of Kilcock and Newtown. The frequency of my visits to these institutions, enables me to judge of the attention of the masters and mistresses, as well as of the proficiency of the children; and I can honestly declare, that I cannot see any thing wanting on the part of the former, and I always feel gratified at witnessing the progressive improvement of the latter. This observation can only apply to those children who are regular in their attendance; those who only come occasionally, cannot be supposed to derive the same advantages from the school as those who are constant in their attendance. The average attendance at Kilcock and Newtown schools amounts daily to about 90 in each. I beg to return my best thanks to the committee for their liberal donations to the masters and mistresses of the Kilcock and Newtown free schools.

IF your charitable committee will be pleased to grant the aid required, bearing my signature, I shall give undoubted security that it shall be expended according to the wishes of the committee, and that it shall be executed with all possible economy and dispatch. In my first application I mentioned, that so impoverished were the bulk of the people in this parish, that they are quite unable to do any more in the way of educating their children than they have done already; and can assure you, that any aid given in such way as not to interfere with their creed, would be received with sincere gratitude. To say any thing on the lasting benefits to be derived from such aid, is on this occasion unnecessary. I have only to add, that the respected and revered rector of the parish, the Reverend Mr. Gorges, with whom I have the honour of living on terms of the strictest intimacy, will bear testimony to the truth of the statement made in this letter.

Towards erecting the school-house in this impoverished country, after making all possible exertions, all I could calculate on with safety, in subscriptions, labour and materials, would amount to no more than fifty pounds; so that if your committee will make a grant of 160*l.* the work shall be completed by the middle of June next.

I do also assure you, that I have distributed one dozen copies of the Douay version of the New Testament, to the pupils in the schools under my care, which I got them to read, together with some copies of the authorized versions, which have been given to the Protestant part of the pupils, and read by them. I have all the necessary preparations already made for that purpose, and request to have the master, whom I intend for it, received into your training school about the 10th November next; so that he may be duly prepared to instruct in the modern improved system, at the time the school-house shall be prepared for the reception of pupils.

Sir,

THE situation of the poor in this neighbourhood is truly miserable, save a few of the better class of farmers, being by the downfall of trade rendered unable to educate their children, or even to procure books for them should they get free schooling, and consequently must remain in total ignorance, without some assistance from your charitable and most serviceable Society. There is a debt of 8*l.* against the house, which was paid by a neighbouring farmer, who is one of our committee, towards the expense thereof, on conditions that it should be refunded by the neighbourhood, who are undoubtedly insolvent.

Therefore this 8*l.* together with all school requests as are practicable to your Society to communicate, knowing our necessity, particularly books, paper, slates and pencils, with the means whereby we may fit out the house with seats and desks, which gratuity you never communicated to a school more in need than ours, for which we shall ever be indebted.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading?

The New Testament published by the English College of Rheims, and approved by Dr. Troy, without note or comment of any description, will be read by those qualified.

THE people in general in this parish (Doone) are extremely poor, yet they have not been inattentive to the education of their children, and were the aid now afforded given in a less exceptionable shape very satisfactory results might reasonably be expected. There are no regulations, however well devised and plausible in theory, but should be allowed to yield to particular circumstances. I do therefore think, that if your Society has solely in view the education of the poor, the catechism might be allowed in any school where there is only one denomination of Christians; as to controversial tracts, they are books with which it would not be prudent to allow children to meddle under any circumstance.

From application in behalf of Turagh School.

Sir,

February 28th, 1824.

I BEG leave, through you, to solicit aid from the Kildare-place Society for the Education of the Poor, for a school which has been opened a few days since in this village. I am informed by Dr. Armstrong, of Tipperary, that 10*l.* will be necessary for the purchase of the usual school furniture.

The school above alluded to contains a list of 209 scholars, and has been opened at my request by Mr. Frazer, inspector to the London Hibernian Education Society.

(signed) John Ryan, P. P.

Sir,

Turagh, 23d April 1824.

I HAVE this evening received your very elegant and explicit letter of the 17th instant, and, from your explanation relative to the 13th query, have no hesitation to say, in answer to said query, "Yes."

The schools will in a few days be supplied by the agents of the London Hibernian Society with an adequate number of the Douay version of the Testament, without note or comment, which shall be read by "all the children who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading." I feel much gratified at your assurance of obtaining from the Kildare-street Society the necessary aid for the four schools established in my parish, and have only to remark that the sooner it could be effected the better, as the schools cannot be regularly nor effectually conducted without it.

(signed) John Ryan, P. P. Tough, Pallas Green, County Limerick.

Turagh, 17th June 1824.

THOUGH I would be desirous to have suitable houses for the other schools of my parish, yet I feel very anxious at this time to have Pallsbeg house erected as soon as possible, for many reasons (which probably you will hear in detail from another quarter). These important reasons induce me earnestly to request of the Committee to grant forthwith the estimated expenses for said purpose on the inclosed plan, if they should think them fair, and any further local aid which may be procured from time to time can be remitted to the treasurer of the Society, or applied in any manner the Committee shall direct.

I have made the request on no light or trivial grounds, but from the sincerest motives for the general success of this very beneficial plan of education, and as tending to the diffusion of that object in other neighbouring districts and the security of those already established in mine.

The furniture for the different schools is making on an approved plan given by Mr. Phelps, and the boxes are safely arrived here. I have to request you will give my sincere thanks to the committee for these prompt and liberal grants.

I anticipate the committee's order for the above purpose on an early day, as the season for building is passing apace, that the work should be finished in due time.

Sir,

Turagh, September 11th, 1824.

THE bearer, Eliza Raleigh, who has been heretofore recommended by Doctor Armstrong and me, as a person fit to be admitted into the training school, Kildare-place, hands you this letter, and I beg you may be pleased to inform the Society that in my opinion it would answer well for the encouragement of the schools not to be scrupulously exact with respect to a particular day of admission into the school, and also to remark, that in parishes, particularly where the parish priest is not the manager of the schools, it would be well done, in order to remove suspicion and jealousy, to have at least some of the visitors, &c. of Catholic schools, Catholic also; I beg leave to remark, that I have been engaged for a few days past in endeavouring to conciliate my bishop, he being on his visitation in this and the neighbouring parishes, where I had an opportunity of impressing on the minds of the reverend gentlemen my high opinion of the utility of your Society's system of education, and I have gleaned from all, that making a proper selection of every denomination of Christians with respect to masters, visitors, &c. would answer best, so as to preclude the interference of either visitors, master, &c. with the religious tenets of the other. I now beg leave to remark, I had not time to make the necessary inquiry relative to the last printed queries which I shall have answered in the course of one week.

Gentlemen,

I BEG to acquaint you, that I have appointed Catherine Minahar to be mistress of the Bilboa school, and have to request that she may be admitted to the training school of the Society, to receive instruction in the improved system.

From the Rev. James Doyle, Parish Priest of Redcross, County Wicklow.

THERE being no notice taken in Mr. Litton's letter to me of the 26th, of my humble petition to the Society for aid to erect a school in Kilpatrick, I beg to call the attention of the committee to it, and hope they will enable me to place the poor of this part in such circumstances with regard to schools, as will both set an example to those parts where such matters are less attended to than they ought, and also to furnish a demonstrative refutation to the charges which I know are unfairly made against the Society.

THE Petition of the Rev. James Doyle respectfully sheweth, that the Bray free school of which he has given a description, is in want of all manner of requisites for carrying on the school; that the present fund for the subsistence of the teachers till next August, which is the period of the charity sermon, does not amount to 12*l.* out of which it is impossible they could purchase requisites; petitioner therefore confidently hopes that your committee will be pleased to furnish the school with a supply; slates, cutters, copy-pieces, merit-tickets, class-lists, arithmetic-lists, arithmetic-lessons or book-maps, spelling-books, reading-book, ruled and unruled paper, report-book, registry, &c.

Petitioner further states, that it would greatly add to the comforts of the poor children if the floors were boarded, and the walls dashed and plastered, to which the parishioners are totally incompetent, being now engaged in building an extensive chapel for religious accommodation.

Your committee are humbly solicited for a grant for the above purpose, for which he will pray.

Sir,

YOUR letter having been mislaid by a friend, who, through civility, was bringing it from the post-office, I had not the pleasure of seeing it till just now. I beg to offer you my grateful acknowledgments for laying my application before the committee of education, and also to that highly respectable body, through you, for the flattering notice they are pleased to take of my puny endeavours to promote the cause of education, as well as for their readiness to comply with my request. Knowledge being the only sure path to social and religious perfection, I feel that I could but ill discharge my duties as a member of society, and still less as a christian, and a christian pastor, did I not endeavour to promote it as far as my little power and influence may reach. In this endeavour I have made it a principle to aim at success, without offending the religious feelings of my separated brethren, many of whom for several years have been under my direction, and I have found the task not at all difficult; I trust that, proceeding in the same way, I shall always find a sure and efficient support in that estimable Society of which you are the organ. I shall procure as soon as possible the most correct estimate of the expenses sought to be known in your communication.

Dear Sir,

Ballinacor, Arklow, 25th November 1820.

I HAVE taken means to procure the most correct estimates for the intended school at Newbridge, which I now submit for the consideration of your humane committee:

Total of estimate - - - - - £. 92. 11. 11½.

I am collecting materials for the walls, and purpose, by the blessing of God and the aid of your worthy committee, to have them covered in, and fit for the reception of children by the month of April next, or at farthest, the beginning of May. To this end it will be necessary that your beneficent committee be pleased to enable me to purchase materials for roofing, &c. &c. that I may have all things made and fitted by the time the walls are completed. The work shall be executed in the best manner, and on the cheapest terms, and an account of the expenditure faithfully submitted to your committee, to satisfy them that not a penny of their benefaction shall be mis-spent. I have to add, that the poverty of the surrounding neighbourhood is such as leaves me no room to expect that I shall be able to procure more by subscription than will build the walls, plaster them within, and dash them without; for the rest, I throw myself, and the undertaking, on the benevolence and kindness of your committee.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Sir,

Ballinacor, January 8th, 1821.

I HAVE to apologize for not having answered in due time your kind communication of the 2d ultimo, in which you inform me that the committee have been pleased to grant me 30*l.* towards the erection of the Newbridge school; I beg you will present my grateful acknowledgments to the committee for this instance of particular liberality; and assure them, that I shall endeavour, as the most acceptable return I can make them, always to co-operate with their benevolent views in promoting knowledge and morality amongst the poor. The communications from the masters accompany this, which have been a little delayed through my unavoidable hurry in the holidays. There is another object which I wish to accomplish for the better promoting the end we have all in view, which is to have the master of the Newbridge school instructed in the system of Kildare-place. He is a native, which is desirable, and a most excellent character, in all respects, as to sobriety, steadiness, and exemplary conduct; but he is 38 years of age, which I perceive excludes him from gratuitous reception into your establishment. It would press very heavily on him to support himself, and we have no fund from whence to assist him, having, through the increasing poverty of the people, been obliged to receive more poor children this year on our charity list than our means have enabled us to pay for. Please to lay this case before the committee, and inform them, that if any thing can be done through their kindness to obviate this difficulty, it will enhance my obligations to them.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Dear Sir,

Ballinacor, 23d December 1821.

I wish to send a young man of good parts, acquirements and conduct, to be instructed in your model school, and beg you will be pleased to lay this my humble request before the respectable committee; and, in case of his being admitted, to transmit me the earliest information. I have therefore to request that your committee will allow my name on the list of your subscribers for one guinea annually, which I wish I were able to increase to ten; and to beg that I may be informed of the precise period of your next general meeting, at which I have a desire to be present.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Sir,

Ballinacor, Jan. 15th, 1822.

I HAVE just received your favour of the 12th, and proceed to submit a copy of the estimate which I have received for Kilpatrick school. I am aware of the regulation regarding the Testament, and shall comply with it.

Total amount of estimate, 105*l.* 13*s.* 3*d.*

I calculate upon raising 30*l.* in the neighbourhood of the school, and amongst friends elsewhere, by subscription and gratuitous labour, and for the rest throw myself on the generosity of the Society.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Dear Sir,

Ballinacor, 30th Jan. 1822.

I AM honoured with your's of the 26th. I beg to offer my warmest gratitude to the committee for their liberal grant of 40*l.* for Kilpatrick school; and to assure them of my faithful execution of the engagement under which their kindness has laid me, and of my faithful compliance with the conditions of the grant. May I take the liberty of inquiring whether the young man, for whose admission into the model school I petitioned sometime back, can be admitted this year.

Ballinacor, 11th May, 1822.

I BEG you, my dear Sir, to assure your most liberal and benevolent committee, that I am impressed with lively gratitude for their beneficence to the poor under my care; and were I not even sensible of my obligations, as a christian and a pastor, to promote moral and religious knowledge amongst the poor, I should be ashamed to be found backward in a cause, wherein those who have neither local nor personal concern have evinced such a warm interest. I inclose the receipts.

Dear Sir,

Ballinacor, July 26th, 1822.

AFTER using my best endeavours to obtain further aid towards defraying the expenses of Newbridge school (in which there are at present two most promising schools, one of boys, containing 80; one of girls, containing about 60, which I flatter myself will obtain the approbation of the Society), I have been able to obtain no more than 5*l*. The truth is, no man here has any thing to give; the farmers being unable to pay up their rents, the gentry are really distressed. I must, therefore, throw myself on the bounty and consideration of your Society, which I have hitherto found so liberal to me; and beg that they be pleased to remit me the sum they were pleased to promise, to stop the craving of those to whom it is due, and who really need it; and shall leave it to their kind consideration to determine, whether the balance shall fall on me, whose promise is pledged for it, and who can by no means afford it, or whether they will be pleased, by their liberality, to grant the whole sum stated in my last petition, bating the 5*l*. mentioned above. As there are most importunate demands made on me, I beg the committee to favour me with the promised remittance.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Dear Sir,

I HAVE this day received your letter and inclosure, and return the receipt. I offer the tribute of most grateful feelings to the committee, whose agent you are. I trust, that since the commencement of my connection with them, nothing has appeared to make them distrust the sincerity of my engagements; and I can add with truth, that in my private intercourse I have zealously laboured to dissipate the clouds of prejudice and misapprehension, which I have frequently encountered with regard to that body. I flatter myself that the inspection of Newbridge school will give satisfaction; and that every year will prove more fully that it has not been unworthy of the partiality shewn it by the worthy gentlemen of the committee. I believe I cannot do more to prove, that the liberality of the establishment is not in name only,—a thing which I myself have sometimes had the pain to witness,—but in fact and deed, than that I have selected a Protestant for one of the teachers, as the other was a Catholic; and this not through necessity, for I had the offer of Catholics perfectly qualified.

(signed) J. Doyle, P. P.

Dear Sir,

Bray, 18th Jan. 1825.

I INCLOSE the receipt; bearer will take charge of the articles.

I beg you to assure the committee, that I entertain a high sense of their goodness. I shall have an estimate prepared and forwarded very soon.

10. Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading?

The Bible or Testament is or will be read soon as the scholars know how to read English well.

Is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

It is, and will be used without note or comment.

WE certify that the above-mentioned questions are honestly and candidly answered, and that we are of opinion that the sum of twenty guineas, exclusively of the expenses already incurred, will scarcely suffice to glaze the school-house, purchase seats, tables, and every other apparatus necessary for the school.

From Application in behalf of Currendolla School.

Sir,

Annadown, 15th February 1822.

You must be not a little surprised on being addressed by a stranger, who has not the honour of knowing you, or any member of your charitable Society; but, aware that even strangers find easy access to the seat of charity, I presume to intrude by informing you, that that I am a parish priest of Annadown, within few miles of Galway; that on entering the mission of said parish, I found the flock committed to my care deeply sunk in a state of ignorance, particularly in the literary sense, without a knowledge even of the English alphabet, with very few exceptions. Moved with compassion, in order to rescue the minds of the rising generation, at least, from total darkness, and furnish them with means of receiving some little instruction, I undertook establishing two schools, for one of which I pay the master 10*l.* annually, which I purpose shall be continued in perpetuity, having sunk a competent sum for that end out of my own very slender means indeed. Seeing these two schools quite insufficient for the instruction of half the youth or children of the parish, I ventured erecting a large school-house in a remote, but very populous part of the parish, four or five miles distant from the other schools, same time depending on subscriptions, or some little contributions from the poor, who are the only residents of that district, but now see myself utterly disappointed; for they, together with my whole congregation in general, consisting of a peaceable, loyal, but distressed and very indigent peasantry, harassed and ground down by rack-rents, county charges, tithes, &c. with all their exertions and industry are unable to satisfy these necessary demands, much less can they afford contributing their mite towards building a house of instruction even for the use of their own children. That house is now built, well thatched, with a chimney for the accommodation of master and scholars, nearly at my sole expense, which has already amounted to near 30*l.* In order to complete it, there are still some things necessary; that is, timber for frames, sashes and glass for four windows, the cost of which, according to the calculation of a judicious and conscientious carpenter, will not exceed 3*l.* 10*s.*; also, boards for tables, and benches or forms for the use of the scholars, the number of whom, I may safely assert, cannot be under from a hundred and fifty to two hundred from time to time. For my part, limited as I am in circumstances, I cannot, consistently with my means, proceed to further cost, but must leave the house in its present state, without some external or foreign aid. Thus circumstanced, I am induced to appeal to your honourable and benevolent Society for succour; for here, at home, I have no resource. If they condescend to listen favourably to my appeal, by granting a small sum of money for these necessities, I would not have it placed in my hands, lest I be mistaken for a swindler or impostor, but wish it lodged with Rev. Mr. Daly, Protestant Warden of Galway, and cousin-german to the member of our county, a most humane gentleman, very solicitous for the education of the poor, without prejudice or partiality; he will take care to have it duly expended in the proper channel for the completion of the house in question. Your Society, Sir, is aware that charity has no limits, and that it extends its bounties to the remotest extremities; therefore, remote as we are here from the capital, I fancy the result of my humble prayer will prove successful, partly for this reason, that I admit the reading of the Holy Bible in the schools of my parish without note or comment, seeing that it is the wish of your Society and of government, same time that my spiritual brethren in general are adverse, from an apprehension, I suppose, that young minds or weak heads may pervert the sense of the sacred volume; but I am not to be counted among that number.

I have trespassed too long on your patience; I beg, Sir, you will forgive me. The love I feel for my fellow creatures, and a sincere anxiety to have them instructed in the morality of the Gospel, are my only apology. I have only to add, that the Rev. Mr. Marlay, rector of this parish, joins me in patronising these schools.

(signed) Raymond Hardiman, Pastor of Annadown.

Should you deign, Sir, to give an answer, please to direct to the Very Rev. Warden Daly, Galway, to be forwarded to me to Annadown.

If any doubt you may entertain of my integrity, I refer you to Mr. Albert Blest, of Sligo, agent to the London Hibernian Society, who contributes to disseminate the Bible instructions, as I frequently correspond with him, and who consequently knows me.

Annadown, 23d March 1822.

— SHOULD the Society condescend to remit me twenty pounds for requisites, and for a little compensation for my own expenses, I would be grateful, and exert myself to see the school prosper. In the course of time I have it in view to prepare a lad for the model school, but at present none offers that I may select.

Sir,

12th August 1822.

WITH a grateful sense of the charitable donation of the Kildare Society, I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 3d instant, enclosing a twenty pound half note, with a receipt for the same, which I return signed. The receipt for the books, &c. ordered by the Society for the Wood-park school, I recollect to have signed, and returned some time ago. I expect that will not be the last benevolent act of the Society for the progress of said school, as I am confident they will not lose sight of it at a future day, should they be informed of its proficiency, which, indeed, must be slow, as it is (I may say) only in its infancy. Be pleased to forgive all the trouble I gave you on this subject since the commencement of my correspondence.

May the labours of your Society, and their anxiety to forward the moral education of the Irish poor, finally meet an eternal reward, is the sincere wish of

Sir,

ENCLOSED you have Mr. Bain's receipt for 5*l.* which, with the encouraging letter you sent him, ought to increase his zeal, and double his attention in the instruction of his pupils, which I am confident he will not neglect.

The great anxiety your Society feels for the diffusion of knowledge and the education of the Irish poor, induces me to intrude further on their indulgence, wishing to have another school in this parish under their patronage. They may judge it superfluous to patronize two schools in one parish; but when I inform them that this parish of Annadown is in extent about nine miles, inhabited by a very numerous and most wretched population, and that Woodpark is eight miles distant from the other extremity, they may see the consistency of my proposal. Should the Society favourably receive my present address, as they did relative to the Woodpark school, the inhabitants and I shall be grateful; the same laws and regulations prescribed for the said school, must be observed here if my wish be acceded to.

Please to let me know if my present proposal prove acceptable.

Sir,

8th March 1824.

In your letter of the 21st ultimo, you say the Society were not satisfied with my answer to the 10th query of the printed list, viz.; Is the Bible read by all the scholars who have attained suitable knowledge in reading? my answer was—"It is, by all under the Hibernian Society, and those under your patronage." My motive for making the exception was, that I have more than 40 pupils educated in the Carrondolla school at my own individual expense, whose capacity, generally speaking, is not suited to the reading of the sacred text, being not sufficiently ripe or intelligent for that Divine book; and moreover, as the Hibernian Society oblige their pupils to read and commit to memory a certain number of chapters in the Testament every three months, when in the mean time they scarcely know how to spell, a system I totally disapprove of, as the Divine book ought to be handled with more propriety. Now, in answer to your 10th query, I say, I shall have no objection that all the scholars in said school, mine included, do hear or read the Testament or Bible as soon as they arrive at competent knowledge in reading it.

(signed) Raymond Hardiman, Pastor of Annadown.

Sir,

3d April 1824.

THOUGH not well able to write in consequence of a fall from my horse a few days ago, yet I lose no time to answer your letter of 20th ultimo, which I received this day, wherein you say, that the committee are not pleased with my answer to the 10th query. It occurred to me, in my former answers, that I may lay a plan for the instruction of the pupils educated at my own individual expense; but it seems the committee are not pleased with any exception or distinction in the school, therefore there shall be none; for they must all read the sacred volume without note or comment, written or oral, agreeably to the rules of the Society. I cannot answer in more explicit terms. I must soon apply for the 10*l.* granted by the Society for the addition to the Woodpark house, which will be soon completed.

(signed) Raymond Hardiman, P. of Annadown.

Sir,

20th April 1824.

I RETURN by bearer, signed, the receipt you enclosed to me in your letter of the 10th March, of books and other requisites ordered by the Society for the use of Corondolla school. In your letter of the 13th September 1823, you were pleased to mention that the committee had made a grant of 10*l.* towards the addition made to the Woodpark school house. Soon as convenient I expect the amount of the expenditure of said addition, which is now complete and habitable. Below you have the certificates and signatures of two respectable gentlemen, as the committee require.

From Application in behalf of the Aughagoer School.

Sir,

Aughagoer, October 25th, 1823.

HAVING read the 11th report of your honourable Society, and considering your extensive charity, permit me to transmit you a memorial in behalf of the school at Aughagoer, towards which I feel confident you will be as liberal as you can, when I inform you that it is established in a poor country, destitute of all support, except what it receives from me and a few others (there being no resident gentry). The number of children in it is 72; and I am sure we would have three times the number, if we had the means to purchase books and pay the schoolmaster. Aughagoer is within three miles of Westport, in the county of Mayo. The school, which is kept in the parish chapel, was established in March last, since which period the scholars have made a good progress. A committee has been appointed, of which I have the honour to be treasurer; all denominations of christians are eligible as masters, and persons of all persuasions admitted as scholars. Now the applications for admittance are so numerous that we are obliged to apply to your benevolent Society for aid, who will find that any assistance given shall be punctually applied, and their system of education most strictly adhered to; this, however, will be better known when your inspector visits the school, and makes his report.

(signed) Peter Ward, P. Priest of Aughagoer.

Sir,

Ashfield, May 28th, 1824.

Now that your honourable Society has received additional means from Parliament for the education of the poor, may I beg leave once more to call your attention to the schools of Aughagoer, Mace and Erive, in this parish, the poverty of which compels me thus to apply to the Society for some aid, either in books, paper or otherwise. A chapter from the Douay Testament is daily read in the two first schools; it would also be the case in the last, if I had one. From this you can plainly see into the poverty of the district, and the inadequacy of the parents, though extremely anxious, to extend the blessing of education to the rising generation. That I should apply thus for three schools, may appear strange; but when I inform you that the parish is 16 miles long, with a population of a thousand families, you will clearly see the necessity of establishing at least as many others, when time and circumstances will permit. By having the Scriptures thus read, I hope you will allow that I have done what the Society requires, and every thing in my power to enlighten and instruct the ignorant.

(signed) *Peter Ward, P. P. of Aughagoer.*From the Rev. Arthur Stairs, Parish Priest of Longfield, County Tyrone.

Sir,

Drumquin, 24th Sept. 1819.

HAVING lately experienced the important utility of your benevolent institution towards the information of the poor of this island, I am now resolved to open a school upon the model system in my own chapel, as I have received the particulars of the plan from a young man belonging to my parish that hath been taught in the model school; and through his assiduity in qualifying some boys for me, which I intend appropriating as monitors, I expect to effect the system. I approve much of the order of the pupils, the regular arrangement of the classes, and the direct harmony of your compilations; I therefore expect your Society will be so kind as to grant to me four dozen of the Scripture Lessons, and one dictating spelling-book, with some of your merit tickets. For any other gratuity that accrues from the Society I will not demand, because I intend to introduce nothing more than spelling and reading in my school.

(signed) Arthur Stairs, P. P. of Langfield.

THE particular design of my address to the Society, is for promoting the laudable plan which they have adopted in my school; and all the grant I require is, four or five dozen of the Scripture Lessons (which I have had the pleasure of seeing in Mr. M'Dermott's school), and one dictating spelling-book; I stand in need of nothing else; the liberality of your generous Society, even in my parish, is worthy of being rewarded here for time immemorial.

It shall be.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

None.

WHATEVER my prospects of relief may be from the generous sympathy of your humane Society, they are cheering, though solitary; I am limited to them alone, my hopes are bounded by them; they have broken in upon my view with the singular recommendation of a new and unexpected bounty.

I owe this consolation to Mr. Donelan; his agency is as zealous and discreet as his commission is honourable to the Society for whom he acts; he cannot fail of success: his manners, his means, and his object, all amiably unite to insure the success of his humane and liberal mission. I shall not further state any suggestions for the direction of your sympathy, but shall be always prepared to co-operate with your humane wishes.

Sir,

Becan, 31st Oct. 1823.

THE contents of your letter were exceedingly gratifying to me. I hope my answer to the Becan queries will be within the approbation of the Committee; there never was, and will not be, any regulation in the schools under my management, rendering the mere difference of religion an obstacle to the eligibility of a master or manager, or trustee, &c. I thus far consider the visit of Mr. Donelan to this country exceedingly auspicious to the diffusion of education in this neighbourhood, inasmuch as it is received by every liberal man as an unequivocal pledge of the disinterestedness and benevolence of your committee in furthering their humane object.

I feel a pleasure in assuring you, Sir, that I shall always strictly enforce the regulations of the Society, and economize, with all the prudence in my power, any grant of their's, or gift in aid of the schools under my management. I shall also endeavour to make known to my brethren in the ministry the cheering promptitude of their efficient benevolence; this too may contribute very much to improvement; the facility of parting with a good name, and the difficulty of parting with a bad one, is not one of the lightest afflictions.

Sir,

Ennistymond, July 7th, 1824.

I FEEL I would be deficient in the discharge of my duty as a christian minister, if, in my anxious efforts to promote the education of the youth of both sexes in my parish, I were to neglect the indispensable duty of giving moral and religious instruction in the different schools under my care, without which I consider the best system of education, however well regulated, a source of greater evil in general than of real blessing to the poor.

The hours during which school will be held on each day, shall be from nine o'clock in the morning until twelve, and from one o'clock until three. A portion of the intervening hour shall be spent in conveying religious instruction to the Catholic children, without interfering directly or indirectly with the religious creeds of the other pupils who may attend the schools, and who shall be at liberty to retire at that time, it being the usual dinner hour of labourers in the country.

With respect to the Holy Scriptures, I must observe, that I am decidedly against having them placed indiscriminately in the hands of the rude and illiterate, or made a common school-book of.

I shall, however, make no objection to have a select portion of the Douay edition of the New Testament read, under my own inspection, in the schools, by such of the scholars only as shall have made a suitable proficiency in reading. I beg leave also to state to your committee, that no consideration shall ever induce me to relinquish to any society or individual, except my bishop, the exclusive right of appointing managers and teachers to the different schools in my parish. However, there shall be no positive law in the schools excluding persons of any religious persuasions as managers, teachers or pupils. These alone are the conditions in which I would conceive myself justified, as a Roman Catholic pastor, in receiving aid from any society or individual, towards enabling me to establish or support any school with which I am or may be hereafter connected.

(signed) Peter O'Loughlin, R. C. Pastor of Ennistymond.

AN estimate of the probable expense of fitting up the school accompanied my application, to which your committee first made no objection, and only required "a more satisfactory reply to some of the queries," which I have given; but to my utter astonishment, they have afterwards instituted an objection to the estimate, which led me to believe they had every reluctance to co-operate with me in my efforts to promote the education of the poor of this country. Under this impression, I must beg to decline complying with your instructions, as I have come to a resolution of supporting my schools independently of any aid from your Society. I shall, therefore, consider your committee at liberty to withdraw from the male school at Ennistymond the forms, desks, &c. at any period they may please, by giving me two months previous notice. I am reluctantly compelled to adopt this course, from the conduct of the Society towards me, and also from the impressions on the minds of the Catholic clergy and laity, and also of many of the Protestant gentry of this country, respecting their principles.

IN reply to your letter of the 11th, I beg you will no longer consider the male school at Ennistymond in connection with your Society. I regret being compelled to act thus, but my reasons I have already stated in my former letter to you. The school being now actually withdrawn from all connection with your Society, I beg you will excuse my not sending the return, &c. you called for.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

The Bible has not been hitherto used, but the schools having recently been placed under the London Hibernian Society, its regulations in that respect will of course be complied with.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

The children attending the school being all Catholics, have been instructed in their prayers and catechism by the master after the school business was terminated.

You will have the goodness to recollect that my present application is in behalf of two separate schools, one in Borris and the other in Heigh, for both I request a supply of books, papers, slates and pencils, and for the school in Heigh, a grant of 5*l.* or 6*l.* to put it in comfortable repair, and also about the same sum to procure desks and seats for the scholars. I do not at present apply for any pecuniary aid for the school at Borris, as I have only taken the house for six months, and before that period is expired, I expect to have a good house built for the purpose. May I expect the favour of a line, to inform me whether the aids required will be granted, and if so, when and where I am to apply for them.

No such book or catechism will be used during school hours.

Sir,

Borrisoleigh, 2d January 1824.

I WAS favoured with yours of the 13th ult. enclosing a list of queries to be answered by me, relative to the Borris and Heigh schools, which I beg to return, business having prevented my replying sooner to your letter; should my present answers to the queries not satisfy your Society, I don't think it would be in my power to give any that would be satisfactory, and in that case I must only endeavour to let things remain as they are, or remedy them by some other means.

Sir,

Borrisoleigh, 8th August 1824.

HAVING been from home during the last six weeks, I found on my return a letter of yours, dated 1st July; in reply, I beg to acquaint you, that the schools in this parish which had been for a time under the patronage of the London Hibernian Society, have ceased to be so, and that they are no longer in connection either with that Society or yours; under these circumstances, I did not consider myself justified in applying for the sum which had been voted some months back for the repairs of the Heigh schools, and for the same reason I must decline accepting the offer contained in yours of the 1st July.

Sir,

Borrisoleigh, August 23, 1824.

I RECEIVED your letter of the 17th instant, calling on me to answer the queries contained in this sheet. I beg to remind you, that on the 8th instant I wrote to apprise you, that the school to which those queries refer, was not to be considered any longer in connection with your Society, and I now acquaint you, that I shall state the same in the return which I am preparing to send to His Majesty's Commissioners in my communication with them; however, I will not omit to acknowledge the books, &c. which this school formerly received from your Society; my letter of the 8th, which must have reached your hands, as it was directed in the usual form to Sir E. Lees, has given you sufficient notice, that this school is at present totally unconnected with your Society, but should that letter have miscarried, this I suppose will not; however, although the connection alluded to has ceased, I have no objection to give the information called for during the time it existed, and I have accordingly answered the proposed queries as to that period.

They will be used without note or comment, written or oral.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No catechism will be used in the school during school hours, nor any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions.

I HAVE, gentlemen, to solicit your aid towards the finishing of the Duleek school-house; this will require, according to the opinion of an intelligent carpenter, the sum of 20*l.* including plastering, desks, forms, labels, &c. Should your committee be pleased to advance that sum, or authorize me to expend what may be necessary, I shall procure two or three persons of character to vouch the manner it was expended. Books, slates, &c. would be necessary.

I have also to pray that you will receive the bearer, John Kearney, into your model school, and have him instructed in the system. He is a young man of good character. I could not say too much for him, although poor, he is admired and respected by all in the neighbourhood for his good conduct.

Dear Sir,

Duleek, January the 8th, 1821.

FROM my answers to the printed queries, you will perceive the state of education in this neighbourhood. On my appointment to this parish not quite two years, I expressed to the people my opinion of the necessity of establishing a school in this village on the plan recommended by your Society, and they contributed according to their means; the house is finished as to the exterior, but much remains to be done before the system can be carried into effect; indeed, I must despair of seeing it, unless aided by the liberality of your Society. Whatever assistance may be given by the committee in maintaining and educating the master in money, books, &c. &c. will be gratefully acknowledged by,

R. Logan, P. P. of Duleek.

Sir,

Duleek, January 17th, 1821.

It was but this day I received your letter of the 13th, with the receipt which I return signed; the bearer, Mr. Hatch, will take down the articles for which the receipt is given. Permit me to assure you, that I feel towards your Society the most lively sense of gratitude for their very liberal donation of books, slates, &c. and for admitting Mr. Kearney into their training school. I trust that his conduct will give satisfaction, and entitle him to such marks of favour as the Society bestows on persons of merit.

On

On the assurance of the committee that the sum of 20*l.* will be given to finish the school-house when the Parliamentary grant for the year 1821 is made, I shall commence the work without delay, and when finished, shall transmit to the committee the items of expenditure, certified by two persons of respectability in the neighbourhood.

Dear Sir,

Duleek, March 13th, 1821.

THE encouragement I received from the Society for educating the Poor of Ireland, caused me to incur some expense in fitting out my public school-house; I apprehend that at present, I can have no claims for indemnity on the Society, and that I must forego the promised assistance, as it is not permitted me to observe all the regulations which that Society requires. Since the time I made application to the Kildare-street Society, many Catholic bishops and priests as you must know, have unequivocally expressed themselves hostile to the principle of admitting into the hands of children, the Bible as a school book; after such decision, it would be criminal to introduce it into the school under my care, it would be acting in opposition to the opinions of persons for whom I entertain the highest respect, and by whose counsels I must be ever influenced in matters connected with religion and morality. The best proof that I act from a sense of duty, and that I meant no fraud on the Society when I solicited favours and received them, will be found in the declaration that I now make, that I am willing to return the books, slates, paper, &c. by the first convenient opportunity, and that I hold myself accountable to the Society for the expenses of the master's board and tuition while in Dublin, requesting only that such charge may be as moderate as a due regard to the interests and principles of the institution will permit. This house has already cost me much; I should not regret the mere loss, were it not accompanied with the failure of my undertaking; perhaps, indeed, I should not say failure, as the house is nearly finished, and the master instructed in the new and approved system of education, yet my wishes are far from being accomplished. Permit me to thank you, and the gentlemen acting with you, for the very polite attention paid to my communications.

Dear Sir,

I RECEIVED a letter, signed Daniel Litton, informing me, "that your committee were pleased to make me a present of the books and school requisites now in my possession, and that they make no demand for the expenses of the master while in the training school." This is a favour I did not expect, indeed I had no claims on their bounty; an act of such pure liberality, whilst it demands my warmest acknowledgments, it causes me to recommence my labours with new ardour in fitting up and finishing the Duleek school house. Please to return my most sincere thanks to the committee for their valuable presents, and for the very kind and complimentary terms in which they make them.

WE are hourly expecting the receipt of your generous grant of 15*l.* in favour of the Bumbo Hall school. Baltinglass, July 26th, 1824.

I RECEIVED your letter of the 23d June, and am sorry to hear the Bumbo Hall school has not pleased your committee in every regard. With respect to Prayer books, Catechisms, the work entitled, the Sincere Christian, or any other book inculcating peculiar religious opinions, I confidently assure you, after the most strict enquiry, they have not been used in said school during school hours, and that the book alluded to was taken out of the chapel adjoining, and left inadvertently in the school-room by the master; and that the Scriptures, without note or comment, written or oral, have been read in said school, as prescribed by the rules of your committee, and so of all the other rules, if not in the most perfect manner, at least substantially so; and whatever time I have to spare, after the parochial duties, is devoted to this, and the many other schools of the parish, as much as possible.

After this my assertion, should your committee be pleased to withhold in future any aid from said school, it cannot be remedied.

My Dear Sir,

Newport, 18th December 1824.

It was only this day your kind favour of the 8th instant, with its enclosure, half notes, amount 3*l.* has reached me. I have not been at home these twelve days past, otherwise you should hear from me by return of post. I rested satisfied that the Society shook me off entirely, from what cause I know not; their inspector, Mr. Mills, whom I consider to be a steady sensible gentleman, promised me when in Newport, he would represent the poverty of the town and neighbourhood to the Society on his return to Dublin. I pay 10*l.* per annum for a school-house out of my own pocket, which sum I thought would be taken into consideration by the Society, until such time as we would be able to build a suitable school-house; probably Mr. Mills forgot to make any representation of it from the multiplicity of business he had on hand; if so, I pray you, Sir, to lay this appeal of mine before the Society, and should they deem fit to comply with it, I shall acknowledge it with thanks. I have complied with your instructions to Mr. Edmund Nolan, and send you the receipt with his signature and mine; he further requests with me, to return his sincere thanks to the Society, for having so far taken him into their consideration.

It is really laughable to hear your committee talk of aid towards my exertions in favour of education—any thing for them but pecuniary grants, on this or any like occasion. I have at an early period applied to them for assistance towards building a school-house, but the answer was, that it was contrary to their regulations and rules to take my claim into consideration, and therefore referred me to the Lord Lieutenant's fund for that occasion. I also applied for some aid for my other school of Tieranere, but this was also out of rule and out of season, so that I never yet, since my first introduction to your committee, could devise any method of succeeding in obtaining any aid whatsoever, but

Sir,

C. Bar, 24th August 1824.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of two letters from the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, regarding the free-school of this town. To the first I shall only advert to say that I thought the inspector appeared satisfied that the introduction of catechisms during school hours grew out of my unacquaintance with a resolution to exclude them, of which I was not aware, to the moment of inspection. Indeed I did not suppose the connection between the Society and school to be so bound as that the breaches alluded to should be deemed violations of compact. However, I have on the instant, and the inspector has acknowledged it, given strict orders for their exclusion during school hours; and I have myself seen copies, I believe twelve, of the Testament deposited in the schools, at the reading of which I have been present in both schools, leaving orders they should be read the number of times required, when other duties prevent my own attendance.

I was prompt in having the rules of the Society observed, as I understood the inspector to say, I might expect an annual gratuity for both schools from the funds of the Society.

Sir,

C. Bar, December 22, 1824.

TOWARDS the close of your last communication, touching the grants solicited for three schools belonging to this union, you expressed the willingness of the committee to consider favourably of said schools, were the conditions required observed. I have to say, that, for the present, I must leave two of these schools as now conducted, but engage to have the third, the one to be established at the village Clonkeen, conducted on the conditions required. I would find it difficult at once to supply the three with copies of the Testament for the use of the senior scholars. I am now advanced in roofing Clonkeen school. I can add that the expense is defrayed by myself, but confidently hope the committee of education will extend aid towards it, to cover the expense of roofing and completing this school. When once established, it shall be open to inspection, and I hope to give satisfaction. The scholars of sufficient proficiency shall read, as required, a portion of the sacred Scriptures.

Sir,

In soliciting aid from your charitable Society in behalf of the chapel school of Mina, we can with safety assert, that our means at present are miserable; and taking into account the impoverished state of the country, must of necessity fail, unless immediately aided. We have received no aid as yet from the resident landlords, and only a contribution of from 1*l.* to 1*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* per annum from some of the members of the committee. We are also of opinion, that what contributes greatly to impede the progress of education, is the great want want of stationery; and next to this, nothing is so indispensably necessary as the erection of a suitable school-house, particularly as there is half an acre of land bestowed upon the chapel of Mina, by the Marquis of Sligo (lease for ever), and surrounded by a seven foot wall, where said school-house could be erected. We beg leave also to remark, that in addition to the four other schools in the parish, we have three others in the parish of Killmacloss, a part of this living, which labour under the same inconvenience, the principal school being in the chapel. For conclusion it may be added, that in this populous parish the chapel school of Mina is to them very central; so that the greatest possible benefit would result from the erection of a suitable school-house there.

The Bible or Testament has not been hitherto read; but we pledge ourselves that the Douay Bible, without note or comment, shall be read by all the scholars who have attained suitable proficiency in reading.

Sir,

IN making application for the chapel school of Fahia, I can assert with all possible safety, that in regard to the promotion of education in this populous and industrious district, they have to depend on their own scanty means, aided by the most active co-operation on the part of the acting clergy. The principal landlord is the Earl Lucan (and an absentee), who gives not the support as yet in the furtherance of this most laudable and necessary object. It is unnecessary to remark, that without a good supply of books (in this district in particular) our most sanguine expectations will be frustrated. I have been always of opinion, and must remark at present, that without a suitable school-house, whatever the grant of books, or other necessary articles might be, matters could never be carried on methodically, in fact, that such a grant would be misapplied. I am authorized, however, to state, that by a substantial grant on the part of your enlightened and liberal committee, such a house might be erected in this forlorn district. The Earl Lucan's agent will, I am sure, consent to a grant of half an acre of land; and on the return of your kind answer we shall endeavour to have the lease perfected.

The Bible or Testament has not been hitherto read; but we pledge ourselves that the Douay Bible, without note or comment, shall be read by all the scholars who have attained suitable proficiency in reading.

Sir,

I AM authorized to state, that we have reason to expect a grant of a commodious spot of land, from the principal landlord in this district, for the erection of a suitable school-house. What impedes the progress of education in this district is the establishment of a school, patronized, I suppose, by the Hibernian Bible Society, where they are supplied with all school requisites, instructed, clothed, &c. free of any expense. Hence it follows that the parents object to pitiful contributions of a penny per week, which our system very justly requires. An ample supply of books and school requisites is of course necessary. Having been informed that your model school has been opened for the reception of a certain limited number, and that that number has been already completed, I have hitherto deferred the recommending of any teachers for admission. I now clearly see, that unless one of our teachers be well trained in the system of education, taught in your model schools, your liberal liberal grant of books, &c. would be in part misapplied; I therefore beg leave to recommend the teacher of the Mina school, as a fit person to be instructed in your system.

The Bible or Testament is not read at present; but in the event of obtaining the aid now sought for, it shall be read. It shall be read from this day, as I shall purchase the Testaments before I leave town, for the purpose. It shall be used without note or comment.

Sir,

Colville, Edenderry, March 9th, 1824.

I HAVE had the honour of receiving your letter, intimating that the gratuity has been withheld from the master of the Trimblestown school, in consequence of the school not being provided with copies of the New Testament, agreeably to the regulations of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland. I beg to state, that I made inquiries at all the Catholic booksellers in Dublin for copies of the New Testament without note or comment, and could not procure them; and I feel it a peculiar hardship, that the master, who is acknowledged to be a man deserving encouragement, should be punished for a neglect, which it was not in his power to remedy. If there be any fault, it ought to be visited on me; and I can assure you, no industry on my part was wanted to fulfil any engagement I had entered into with the Education Society. I could not possibly have any objection to the entire of the New Testament being introduced into the school, more than to the lessons or extracts from it, when the Society left it optional with me to select any passages I thought proper to be read by the children. The school is now supplied with a sufficient number of copies, and shall continue so, and be uniformly read, as the regulations of the Society require. As to the introduction of catechisms, I beg to assure you they have not been in use in the school, nor have I ever understood they were brought there by any of the children; and as for Dr. Doyle's Pastoral Address, its introduction into the school was merely accidental, and entirely unknown to the master or me. Under all these circumstances, I trust you will feel the justice of paying me 25*l.* 15*s.* the amount of the grant made for the furnishing of the school; and also the further sum of 13*l.* the amount of all the repairs made on the school; and that the gratuity usually given to the masters, will not be withheld from the master of the Trimblestown school, when it is clear that the want of copies of the New Testament in the school was a matter of mere necessity, and not through any fault of his.

Sir,

Colville, Edenderry, Dec. 13th, 1824.

YOUR letter, inclosing half notes amount, 7*l.* 10*s.* for the master of the Trimblestown school, came in due course, but as I had been from home, its receipt could not be acknowledged until now. I consider the master to be very deserving the gratuity, and he is very thankful to the Society for their liberal grant. The mistress of the school is a woman of great merit; she has taught upwards of thirty children within the last year to sew and work samplers in so perfect a manner, that the ladies of the neighbourhood expressed not only their approbation of the work, but their surprize at the proficiency of the children. I beg leave, through you, to recommend her to the committee; and to suggest, that a small gratuity could not be better disposed of, than in rewarding her for her attention to the improvement of her pupils.

I beg leave also to request the following requisites for the use of the scholars. There are at present about 60 children in daily attendance at the school, which, considering the state of the weather, is a large number. We have not a sheet of paper; we want also three dozen of spelling books, three dozen of slates, with pencils, and a great many reading books of the kind we got before.

You would oblige me much by letting me know when we may expect to get those articles. Inclosed I send the receipt, signed by the master and myself.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading?

The Bible is taught, and Testament in this school by all the scholars who have attained suitable proficiency in the art of reading; the Scriptures are used in this school without note or comment, written or oral; no catechism used in this school during school hours, or any books inculcating peculiar religious opinions.

Sir,

September 21, 1823.

I FEEL most anxious on account of the circumstances and general state of the education of this neighbourhood, situated, I may say, almost in the face of a mountain, with a large extent of population, unable from their circumstances, and from the pressure of the present times, to give their children the benefit of timely education, that a suitable school-house should be erected as soon as possible; this I trust your committee will be able to discover, from the nature of the several answers replied to in the queries you had the goodness to send.

I can say with confidence, that the wishes of those connected with the school will sincerely accord with those of the Society, in regard to the mode of education. As I have reason to affirm, that it is and will be their particular wish not to offend the religious principles of any, but to encourage and assist in promoting among the peasantry of this quarter, which has been so long neglected, the best principles of education, as so warmly recommended by your Society. I will on my part say, that I will use my best exertions, and will feel most happy in being instrumental in promoting such a good in this neighbourhood.

I HAVE waited with impatience for your favourable letter of decision respecting the Gubaveny school, of which I had the pleasure of sending my letter of authenticity, enclosed with the queries in September last, hoping to have shared of your munificent grants, as also the necessity of establishing your plan of education in this poor mountainous country; and from my representation in my letter of authenticity, in holding myself accountable to your benevolent Society for any grant that might be made. Understanding from your annual report and letter, that it is the prevailing and essential rule of your Society to guarantee any amount granted by the Society to be laid out, as mentioned in the queries, with every economy, accordingly I promise to fulfil any commands directed to me from the Society, understanding their system to be founded on charity, not interfering with religious principles of teachers or scholars.

WE cannot express what we feel in gratitude to the Society for establishing in our own neighbourhood a permanent school, which is a very great blessing, considering the great poverty of this part of the country.

We have the house completely finished, but still it remains to be finished with seats, desks, &c. which the master regrets not being done, as he cannot teach according to the instructions he received in your model school. We will not entreat for any particular sum, for we do not exactly know what we will require, but whatever the Society pleases to give, we will receive it with gratitude.

CONVINCED that the real intention of the Society is to promote the education of the poor, by their goodness and kind attention to our school, for which the poor of this part of the country are ever bound in GRATITUDE to pray for their spiritual and temporal welfare. The comfortable accommodation we have for children is the admiration of the whole country.

Now the future prosperity of our school entirely depends upon the master attending well to his duty (which he zealously observes), and a sufficiency of school requisites, the want of which is the only inconvenience we labour under at present, which we humbly hope the Society will grant us.

FROM the trust and confidence the Society repose in me, I consider it my duty to give a fair, candid and true description of the present state of the school, nor would I be a friend to humanity if I did not take an active part with the Society in promoting the education of the poor in general, but particularly of my own parish, well knowing the great loss they sustain who are deprived of an early and virtuous education.

I can say the master does not receive from the parents of his scholars five pounds per annum; the master told me, was it not for the gratuity he received last year from the Society, he would be under the necessity of resigning the school, and provide for his family in some other honest employment.

Now in order to make it a free school, we have applied to the London Hibernian Society for aid, which we hope to receive.

Being duly sensible of the many favours we have received from your Society, we would not, for any consideration, wish to tease you with importunate demands, but with your kind assistance, and that of the London Hibernian Society, we hope to have a school that will be of great service, and open a door of education and useful knowledge to a poor, ignorant and unlettered people.

The system recommended by your Society shall be strictly attended to, in the same manner the inspector informed us.

I can assure the Society, that the master is a moral, honest, active and zealous man, and that he will faithfully discharge the confidence the Society reposes in him.

Dear Sir,

Lisbane, February 29th, 1824.

WHEN we consider the nature of the institution, we wish from our hearts to correspond with its well digested system. And when we consider the kind attention you evinced to us, and moreover the many favours we have already received from your truly benevolent Society, we are encouraged to look forward, with an humble confidence, that the Society will not let our school fall away. We labour under unfavourable circumstances, which we beg leave to lay before the committee; a great many of the inhabitants of this neighbourhood are so extremely poor, that they are more likely to leave their miserable habitation than pay any thing for the education of their children, and hence the master has been subjected to many distressing circumstances these three years past, but is now reduced to the necessity of quitting the school, in order to procure a subsistence for his family in some other employment. When we found that the master was denied the gratuity last year, we ordered him to admit no scholar that would not pay weekly, or something in advance; we are sorry to state the result; above fifty poor children have remained at home ever since, and may live and die in ignorance, unless a free school is established by your committee.

We assure the Society, that any deviation from the rules laid down to us was merely accidental, not intentional, and in future the strictest attention shall be observed on our part; and we have every reason to think, the master will discharge the confidence we repose in him to the most sanguine desires of all concerned. With the fond hopes of having our school established, we have persuaded the master to persevere until we receive your answer.

Dear Sir,

July 29th, 1824.

IN reply to your letter of the 21st instant, we have the pleasure to state, that with the encouragement given by the London Hibernian Society, together with the aid we hope to receive from your Society, we may yet expect a permanently prosperous school. On the 31st May we commenced anew (upon Mr Daly's encouragement), and on the 3d July the London Hibernian Society's inspector established our school under their regulations, in co-operation with your Society, and examined and classed 116 children; and there are at present on the list 127.

Dear Sir, we were promised two copies of each of the cheap books published by the Society since the date of the last grant of library books, and have not received them yet, granted on the 15th November 1823, N° 26. We are in great need of some writing paper, ruled, and alphabet leaves for tablet boards and class lists, and copy pieces, which are of great use, and any other grant much wanted will be gratefully received.

Sir,

Dungannon, August 1824.

THE committee for Crewbridge school return their sincere thanks to your honourable Society, for the benefit of the lending library and school requisites which we have received. The children have made a great proficiency in reading the various kinds of natural history, which are owing to the liberality of your Society. The object of the present communication is, to acquaint your Society with the inconveniency of the school-house, for want of fixtures to accommodate the children in their classes; we assure you our fixtures are by no means accommodating to the school, and the neighbourhood is very poor, which obliges us to apply to your honourable Society for some pecuniary means to procure them. We have reason to think, that our school would be very pleasing to your visitor or inspector, if we had this small but necessary relief, which we promise, through the blessing of Providence, would leave us a permanent school. We have nothing more to communicate, but trust that your honourable Society will take our application into consideration, for which we and the poor of this neighbourhood will ever pray, &c. from the Crewbridge school, parish of Clonfeacle and county Tyrone.

If your Society comply with our request, I believe they will most effectually promote the improvement of the poor in this populous district.

WE had a large school this last quarter: there were 128 children examined and classed by an inspector of the London Hibernian Society at the commencement of the quarter; and at the end of the quarter, there were as many who had attained to the proficiency required, as entitled the master to the sum of 2*l.* 10*s.* for the quarter, which was paid by the Society. Now, dear Sir, if your Society encourage our school, we have no doubt but our school will continue very useful to this poor neighbourhood.

The master regrets not having seen the inspector, having had some necessary accounts to shew him. The master observes the system recommended by your Society, as much as is deemed necessary in a country school, and the rules are particularly observed.

We have got books and stationery, and labels, &c. for which I sincerely thank the committee, but for want of desks and forms and boards on which to paste the labels, we can make but little use of them.

There are at present in the school from 100 to 110 children, and a large proportion being poor, and merely beginning their letters, could you supply us with a few more spelling books, I would feel infinitely obliged. Allow me to request that the inspector will make his visit as soon as possible; I am confident he will be highly pleased with the system of education pursued in the school. To the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Gentlemen,

Balla, Nov. 8th, 1823.

HAVING got the eleventh report of your Society from Mr. Donelan, your agent at Balcarra, at a meeting of clergy where I preside, and finding you are desirous of being informed respecting the general state of education among the poor of Ireland, I think it my duty to acquaint you with the state of these parishes, Balla, Balcarra, and half parish of Minola; the causes which impede the progress of education is their great poverty, and having no school-houses. I built the walls of a school-house in Balla, and another in Minola, and from the badness of the times, and getting no assistance from the people, could not finish them.

These circumstances I submit to your humane consideration; any aid you may think proper in your wisdom and charity to extend to this poor district, shall be duly acknowledged and subject to the inspection of your agent.

I can assure you, gentlemen, with confidence, there is no part of the county Mayo stands more in want of your liberal consideration than the present.

Sir,

Balla, Dec. 22d, 1823.

I HAVE to acknowledge the favour of receiving a letter from you some posts back, and from the hurry of business could not answer it sooner.

I had applied to the Society of Kildare-street for aid to build a school-house in Minola and Balla, presuming they would be glad to have such application made to them, as it was the object of their establishment to promote the education of the poor. As to the plan or dimensions, I mentioned before, that one house was 40 feet long and the other 30; breadth in proportion. The estimate of one may be from 60*l.* to 70*l.* and the other from 50*l.* to 60*l.*; as to local contribution, I cannot exactly say what it may be, as the people are so poor, and under so many other taxes; but I am sure of some, say 10*d.* a house among

Society.

500 houses in both places. I can also depend on labour a day from every house. The tenure of the plot in Minola is a rood of ground Lord Kilmaine made a grant of to me some time back; in Balla is a plot of which there is a lease of three lives; there can be no doubt that the plot of any such charitable establishment would be reclaimed by the landlords. When the school-houses are built, I shall then comply with any regulations proposed by the Society, compatible with our church. I am confident, that honourable Society has no other object in view but the individual one of ameliorating the condition of their poor countrymen without distinction of every description, and the first step towards attaining that desirable end, is the building of school-houses.

(signed) Patrick Nolan, P.P.

Sir,

Balla, Jan. 30th, 1824.

I ACKNOWLEDGE to have received your letter of the 10th, mentioning you laid my last letter, on the subject of education of the poor, before the committee, for which I return you thanks.

Desirous of being an humble instrument in the hands of the Society, in promoting the blessings of enlightenment among the poor in this district, I made the communications I thought necessary in my different answers. In my last letter I proposed to build two school-houses, one in Minola, on a handsome scite, and another in Balla. The houses would be in proportion to the aid I received from the Society; I mentioned the local aid I could expect from a poor population.

You now say the committee expect a pledge from me that the Testament will be read without note or comment, and no catechism at school-hours; I can give no pledge but my word and character, which is well known these 30 years past, to people of every rank and description in this country.

(signed) Patrick Nolan, P.P.

Sir,

Balla, April 25th, 1824.

HAVING been prevented by various incidents from attending sooner to your last letter, dated 7th February, and wishing to satisfy the Society in every respect, I have to state that fewer schools (as you say) well attended to, would be more effectual to attain the desired end, and that you would grant aid towards building one school-house at present. I perfectly coincide with you in opinion. As to the site, I am in the same situation with my neighbouring town, Castlebar. It is on the plot Lord Lucan gave for the chapel, the school-house for free education was built, to which your Society granted aid of money and school materials, which I have seen, and it is on that reliance that I made my application. I am building the school-house in Minola, on the plot Lord Kilmain gave some years back for building a chapel, there can be no doubt therefore of its permanent use to the public. The dimensions I have already mentioned, 40 feet by 20; the estimate will be in proportion to the grant given. The trustees are John Bourke, Thomas Bourke, Francis Ivers, Patt Ivers, all living in the town of Minola, of course interested in the cause. I myself, the manager.

I have already stated the local contribution, which I compute half-a-crown a house in money and work, among about 200 families.

This being done, I should not hesitate to conform to the principles of your Society, as I think them liberal, not like other societies who have impossibility for their object, that of making proselytes of millions. If they could succeed in any thing, it is in making a few hypocrites.

The additional grant we learn, made by Government to your Society, makes me, and hundreds of poor forlorn creatures for whom I am begging assistance to cultivate their rude and uninformed minds, hope for a favourable answer.

Are the Scriptures used in the school; are they used with or without note or comment, written or oral?

Is any catechism used in the school, during school hours?

There is; but not at school hours.

Sir,

Cahir, 3d July 1818.

HAVING perceived the incalculable advantages arising from a school lately established in Scariffe, in the county of Clare, by the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland; as the director and advocate of a considerable portion of this suffering class, I feel myself loudly called on, without further delay, to apply to this most benevolent Society for their aid towards establishing a similar one in the parish of Feakle, where I can vouch it is extremely necessary, for it consists of 1,100 families, 300 of which scarcely can afford to to send any of their children to the schools we contrived to establish ourselves among them. There is another district, called Kilnena, consisting of only 500 families, committed to my care, equally, if not worse circumstanced.

Should these partake of the benefit of this most laudable institution, what a pleasing reflection must it not be to each of its members, to consider they had been instrumental in rescuing thousands (I may say) from the fatal effects of ignorance! I am sorry to have trespassed so long on your time. I shall only say, that should the purport of this meet the approbation of the committee, no exertion on my part should be ever wanted for its support.

(signed) Tho' M' Innery, Parish Priest, Feakle.

— Mr. Byrne, one of the present teachers, I think, is the most proper person to be trained for the school, who will be ready as soon as required. I have also to say, that I have not the least objection to have the Scriptures, without note or comment, in the school, or small moral tracts, if they could be procured.

Sir,

I HAVE the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 18th instant; I am sorry thereby to learn I have not been explicit enough in my answer to one of the printed queries contained in section, N° 3, of the printed statement. I only intended to inform the committee of the real state of Kilnena school hitherto; but now desirous of being under the patronage of the Society, and of course willing to be conducted upon its principles and regulations.

If Mannix for Feakle school, and Hogan for Kilnena school, could be admitted shortly into the model school, it would be of great service to this neighbourhood. I beg you will excuse all this trouble I give you.

Sir,

Feakle, May 26th, 1821.

I HAVE the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of the 16th instant, and also the Ninth Annual Report, together with the list of queries to be answered, which I did submit to the inspection of Dr. O'Shaughnessy, our bishop, who highly approved of the principles on which the schools are conducted, with the exception of what the third paragraph in the printed statement contains, referred to also in the 10th query, under the impression that it would be in some measure a profanation of so sacred a work as the Scriptures to have them in schools, used or rather abused by undiscerning children.

This, I dread, will disqualify this indigent neighbourhood from the enjoyment of the benefit or assistance that may be otherwise obtained from the Society.

I HAVE the pleasure, Sir, of signing and enclosing to you the receipt for the grant of books and school requisites made to Naas free school.

Though the Society have not thought it expedient to grant the entire sum applied for, I am still much indebted to them; and I hope I do not flatter myself when I think, that, from the increased advantages this establishment is producing, I shall have a particular claim to their attention.

The books and school requisites will be called for on Friday the 27th.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

The Bible and Testament may be read by Protestants at will. The Catholics, who have suitable information, may read the Bible and Douay Testament under the direction of Rev. P. O'Reilly, with the view that respect shall be paid to the volume of truth, and that their religious opinions be not interfered with, &c. without note or comment.

Sir,

Ballymachugh, April 1st, 1824.

THE poverty of my parishioners, and the melancholy neglected state of the mental culture of my youngling flock, with the want of suitable means of education, are powerful motives with me to call to your Society for the necessary assistance to erect a decent school-house. If you answer this so charitably as you are called on, I shall apply to you for a similar school in my other parish, Ballymachugh, under the patronage of Mr. Dease and Rev. J. Story, Ballyconnell, who has also given an acre of ground to me for a similar school; of the two, the latter is more needful, as the present school contains more than 120 poor children.

Sir,

July 21st 1824.

I LOST no time, after leaving your office, in procuring an architect to furnish me with the necessary specifications of the expenses attending the completion of the Ballyheelan school-house. That I can thatch it, is evident; but this consideration vanishes, when I consider how liable to the vicissitudes of the inconstant seasons it will be, which we so generally witness in Ireland. (See Mr. Mills's Report). I have a perpetuity of the land whereon it sits; and I say, why not make the house also perpetual, as far as a slated roof, and the other necessary appendages. Walls of the best materials are now built, and only needing those requisites. It now remains with your committee to grant the contents of the estimate, and make the whole a good and permanent work. The expenses are trivial, in comparison to the vast benefits society will reap from so good and local an establishment. This house will be exclusively a boys school; and in a few days I shall again call on you for assistance for a girls school, of which I shall also build the walls, &c.; for a female school is as necessary in this parish as (or more) than a boy's. The subscriptions which remain unpaid (owing to the unfavourable season of the year, when all are going to market to buy) will erect the female school. I shall expect your answer by the next post after your committee sit, letting me understand what I may expect.

As I adopt your system, contrary to the spirit and intention of the other clergymen of this respectable diocese, I shall take no boon less than the contents of the estimate which I inclose, and also the plan of the house; whether you give aid or not, I'll expect the plan back.

The undertaker is a respectable Protestant, highly recommended by the rector of the parish, &c.

Sir,

Ballymachugh, July 22d, 1824.

INCLOSED I send you two plans and estimates of the Carrick school-house for your inspection and approval. Mr. Conway's meets my decided approbation; he proposes to finish the house according to the plan (same specifications as the Ballyheelan school-house,) given by him, for 52*l.* 10*s.* 1*d.* Give me the necessary instructions, and your will shall be done. I intend, as the season is so favourable, to begin the mason work of the Carrick school-house about the middle of the next week; therefore I shall require an immediate answer and the plans, as usual.

From application in behalf of Ballyheelan School, County of Longford.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading?

Will be read as required by your committee, without note or comment, but the Rhemish version.

Sir,

Granard, August 5th, 1824.

As to the remarks alluded to in your letter respecting the two queries, I authorize you to answer them as in this. I shall forthwith proceed to roof the houses, and establish the schools before the winter. I shall send you, time after time, the specifications of the work to be done, and shall apply to you for money as I stand in need of it, giving a satisfactory account of the expenditure. Every assistance in my power shall be given to procure local subscriptions and grants. The Ballyheelan school-house is large enough for the boys; but I should require aid to further my intentions of adding to it a school-house for females, females, with apartment for the schoolmistress. How far I am allowed to call for so much is for you to tell me. This I know, that females in this parish stand in need of instruction as much as males. Please to say when I may send up two young men to your model school to be trained, to have them duly qualified to teach the system properly. Any remarks you have to make, I shall be glad to know.

(signed) Philip O'Reilly, P. P.

Sir,

30th August 1824.

It appears from your letter of the 14th instant, that the rules of the committee require that no particular day be set apart for general religious instruction. Should the committee be satisfied that the early part of Saturdays be devoted to an examination and revisal of the week's work, and that one hour be spent in catechising each denomination of children, I should feel obliged; yet your committee are perfectly at liberty to adopt their own rules.

I also find, by the tenor of your letter, that the committee returned the 13th query for a more explicit answer; when I answered "Roman Catholic teachers," my motives were grounded on these reasons, the vast number of pupils who will attend these schools, will be in the proportion of Catholics 20 to 1 Protestant. The proximity of these school-houses to my chapels, calls upon the schoolmasters to attend the altar on Sundays as clerks. The young men, who are to conduct the schools, are natives of the parish, of respectable parentage; scholars, and favourites with Protestants and Catholics.

The already deep impression on the minds of many, that your Society wish to proselytise the Roman Catholics; from these, and many equally strong motives, let me ask you, would it be prudent of me to appoint Protestant teachers to my schools under these circumstances, though I have no objection to any denomination of christian teachers, provided they be duly qualified for their calling. If I wish to do good, must not I in a great measure amalgamate myself with the poor, and square with their weaknesses and narrowmindedness to apply the proper remedies to these disorders, and be able to reap due advantage in the proper season.

Dear Sir, I feel unhappy to put you to so much trouble about my schools, or that you spend so much of your valuable time. In one word, I beg leave to call for your final answer before six days, whether I get the aid required to complete the two houses or not.

From application on behalf of the Newcastle Charity School.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

Will be read three days in the week as soon as the books are sent up. Without note or comment, certainly, written or oral.

Sir,

June 10, 1824.

In consequence of the eager anxiety manifested by the youth of the parish of Newcastle, in the west of the county of Limerick, to obtain some education, I felt it my duty, as their pastor, to establish a school, in which at present, upwards of three hundred pupils are in attendance, consisting of nearly as many boys as girls.

I have been fully informed by Mr. Eugene O'Cavanagh, late superintendent of Lady Conolly's school, in Celbridge, who had been trained in your model school in 1820, and who is now appointed to conduct mine, of the particular advantages of your system, to which I strictly mean to adhere, and for which purpose I have procured a school-house (rented) for the present, in which is a ground floor 40 feet in length by 20 in breadth, for the boys, and another of equal dimensions overhead for the girls, who are also to be instructed conformably to that system laid down by your honourable Society.

The advantages of impressing early on the youthful mind of the poor and indigent peasantry religious and moral knowledge, cannot be too much appreciated, and more especially in this unfortunate district, where perhaps the want of early instruction was a principal cause of the many misfortunes and calamities which distressed, dissected and distracted the harmony of its inhabitants.

I approve very much of the order of the pupils, the regular arrangement of the classes now in training, and the uniformity of your compilations in every school which I have seen conducted on your plan; and regret extremely that for want of these very necessary requisites, we are still in a state of confusion. But this difficulty, through your timely aid, I hope will be obviated; the very important advantages resulting from your benevolent institution towards the education of the poor of this part of the kingdom, induce me to apply to you for pecuniary assistance, to furnish and carry on these schools; and also as soon as possible, should you please to grant it, a set of lessons (placards), dictating and otherwise, arithmetical cards, and dictating ditto, some class lists, merit tickets, and such assistance as you should think we stand most in need of, as we are miserably poor here. As I am determined, and do hereby pledge myself to have the Holy Scriptures read both in the Irish and English languages, in my male and female schools, on three days in each week, as soon as I can procure the necessary elementary books and Scriptures, your reply as soon as possible, and the probable aid to be expected therein mentioned, will very much oblige.

To Joseph D. Jackson, Esq.

FROM the answers to your queries, which are candid and sincere, you may easily judge the extent of the aid which the Newcastle poor school requires. We want Bibles, charts, school books, &c. and more desks and forms. I have an acre, rent-free, and a part of this I would willingly give gratis, to build a school-house. This statement places our wants in a clear point of view before you; and in my opinion, no less a sum than 200*l.* would establish and place the school this year on a permanent footing. In this part of the country the Irish language is generally and correctly spoken; but it is not one out of a thousand who can read and write it; but should this school be liberally aided by you, I pledge myself to have the youth and adults of this neighbourhood taught to read the Scriptures in that language.

Any aid sent by your honourable Society will be scrupulously expended, and satisfactorily accounted for, by J. Dowling, esq. treasurer.

Newcastle.

Sir,

Newcastle, August 14th, 1824.

SINCE the receipt of your last reply to my request in favour of the Newcastle charity school, I anxiously expected that your promise would have been realized, and that the inspector would have called here in order to confer with me on the practicability and propriety, &c. of erecting a school-house here; and also of taking into consideration the means of supporting this school in a place where the blessings of education are so much wanted in the poorer classes. From your Society I expected aid, my school being exactly conducted according to the plan recommended by you.

The Irish Society most humanely sent Irish Scriptures and primers, which are read in the school daily. To the Bible Society I have applied for English Bibles, but to you I apply for more substantial aid. As the commissioners of education in Ireland have applied to me for a reply to their queries, I think it right to apply to your Society previously to my answering them; for should you not think well of giving that support which you so liberally held out, I shall be obliged to petition the government for aid, sooner than have 400 children deprived of that blessing which that government is so anxious to dispense amongst them. A speedy reply, signifying the aid likely to be afforded, would very much oblige.

(signed) William Fitzgerald,

Sir,

Newcastle Charity School, Dec. 7th, 1824.

THE grant made by your committee arrived safely here last week; for which I return you most sincere thanks. Nothing could equal the joy of the little children on being each, according to his degree, furnished with requisites. The evident improvement already made in the school is really astonishing, owing to their being classed, having at each desk the same books. The narrowness of our school-house at present precludes any use that could have been made of the placards, which to us is a very great inconvenience, as all the books sent did not even supply the entire of the boys; and the girls are equally numerous. This consideration induced your very respectable agent Mr. Griffiths, to encourage us to apply for further aid; assuring us, that we need not be delicate, as it was the wish of the Society to assist such schools as ours. His report, I am confident, will shew the justness of our claim, and our intention of adhering to your system. Every effort has been made by our master, even before we got the requisites, to bring the boys and girls to a systematical form. He has done his endeavours to train the mistress; but should you encourage us to send her to be completely modeled in your school, it is our wish that she should, determined as we are to adhere strictly to your plans. Your agent told me, that I should immediately receive a premium for his attention; I wish I did, as we can do little for him at present. The mistress too merits your support.

The Testament should be read in our school daily, if we had them; but we have no means to purchase them; what we have, the Irish Testament, is daily read in our school. I am certain, that if we had a proper school-house, next season we would have 600 children in attendance. To you we chiefly look for the support of this institution.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 9th January 1821.

THE desire of giving correct answers to your queries, prevented me from having the honour of acknowledging, ere this, the receipt of your communications transmitted to me according to Rev. John Gahan's intimation. I entertain the most sanguine hopes, if aided by your Society, that the rising generation of this large and thickly populated neighbourhood will be rescued from ignorance and immorality. They are people naturally disposed to be subject to the laws of their country, but they have hitherto been enveloped from the view of many of them by a cloud of ignorance, which I hope is about to be removed by the charitable interference of your Society; I trust they will be grateful, and even invoke blessings on the persons by whom they shall be enabled to enjoy the happiness of an early and moral education.

They are.

Are they used with or without note or comment, written or oral?

Without note or comment, written or oral.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school-house, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

None whatsoever.

I KNOW of no cause which can impede the progress of education amongst the poor of this neighbourhood, but the want of school-houses.

If your Society would grant to the parishioners of Englishtown, 30*l.* towards building a school-house suitable to their necessity, half a dozen of each of the following books; Robinson Crusoe, History of Joseph, and Elizabeth or the Exiles, eight dozen of slates, and 10 reams of paper, I think it would enable them to have their children instructed in science and morality, the neglect of which has proved fatal to so many of themselves, to this neighbourhood and society at large; as I can attribute to no other cause but the want of education, the perpetration of crimes which are scarcely known in any other part of this kingdom.

Sir,

Rathvilly, 21st September 1821.

I FEEL very grateful to your committee, for directing that application would be made for the admission of the Englishtown teacher into your model school, though having but an imperfect knowledge of the system of education approved of by your Society, still the children have made a great improvement under him this season; in temper he is mild, of diligent habits, and unblemished character. Should your committee be pleased to admit him into your model school, I have great confidence that the children will derive much advantage from his instructions next season.

The Bible, without note or comment, written or oral, will not be objected to.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

Sir,

Ardcastle, 30th October 1823.

ON the 22d instant I received your favour of the 4th, which gives me to understand that your committee is pleased to give an order for 15*l.* when the walls of the school-house at Carna are built, upon a distinct pledge being given that the rules of your Society (as explained in your's of the 4th instant) will be strictly adhered to. The part of Conamara that I am in, is so distant from persons of respectability, as to render it impossible for any to superintend the school. Being consequently deprived of the support of such persons, I undertake the management of it myself, in hopes that this neglected people would share in the blessings of a liberal and well regulated system of education.

In the wish, then, of attaining that end, I do promise to you and the Society, to adhere strictly to the rules laid down by you, and co-operate as well as possible in forwarding the intention of your committee. If a promise thus made to act in accordance with the principles of your institution be deemed insufficient, may I trouble you to inform me what else might be considered as a pledge sufficiently distinct.

Sir,

Carna, October 22d, 1824.

I HAVE been favoured by your's of this month, inclosing half notes to the amount of 15*l.* half the grant for the erection of a school-house at Carna.

Though the committee was pleased to grant 30*l.* only towards the buildings, yet I had no doubt but they would pay the amount of the entire expenditure, for I said in reply to the queries proposed that there were no resources but from them.

If the house was completed for less, I could not require of the committee more than the actual expenditure. From these circumstances, I had hopes that they, the committee, would not see me at a loss, if to complete the building I advanced, as I did, a trifle of my own. My means, as curate in this parish, are so slender as not to enable me (though much inclined) to advance any money towards the erection of the school-house. May I request you will have the kindness to say, will your committee be pleased to allow me the remaining sum of 2*l.* 14*s.* 9*d.* which with the 30*l.* received is the entire expenditure.

Please to say, will your committee give a further grant, and to what amount, for furnishing the house with tables, desks, forms, &c.

In your next, tell me when I may expect books, papers, slates, ink, &c. and what salary may be given to a master.

From the Very Reverend Dean Egan, D. D. and Parish Priest of Dunmore, County of Galway.

Gentlemen,

Dunmore, 30th October 1824.

ALTHOUGH the teachers of the Dunmore school, and all the parents of both persuasions, are ready and willing to prove, before any competent tribunal, that the late inspector (Mr. Mills) of the Kildare-street Society, must have totally forgot himself, when he omitted stating to you that a competent number of Testaments of the approved Douay version were exhibited to him, and taken before him out of the hands of such of the scholars as were considered by me to acquire a sufficient proficiency in the perusal of the same, three days of the week invariably, without note or comment, as required; moreover, the parents and children of both persuasions can incontrovertibly attest, that the perusal of the Testament without note or comment, was not confined to any portion of scholars, sect or otherwise.

(signed) Dean Egan, P. P.

Gentlemen,

Dunmore, 26th November 1824.

BEING in the constant habit of reading from my altar, to both young and old, the version of the Douay Testament, without note or comment, I could feel no reluctance in having the same practice pursued in the Dunmore school; I am happy, therefore, to learn, by the receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, that the regulations of your Society have been so far complied with, in the perusal of the New Testament by the senior classes three times a week, I do therefore beg leave to assure the conductors of that institution, that the report made of the perusal of the Scriptures being confined to Protestants alone, is highly injurious to my character, as can and will be, I trust, fully established by His Majesty's Commissioners. As all obstacles, therefore, towards a remuneration or gratuity to the teacher are hereby removed, I do flatter myself with a more favourable communication in the next.

(signed) B. Egan,

R. C. Pastor of Dunmore and Dean of Tuam.

Copy of a letter from John O'Donnell and Patrick Reily, Teachers of Dunmore School, and certified by Dean Egan, R. C. Pastor of Dunmore, to the Kildare-street Society, for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Gentlemen,

WE the undersigned, teachers of the Dunmore school, after respectfully acknowledging the receipt of the late communication of the 4th inst. beg leave to give the following (we trust) conclusive reply to the gentlemen of the Kildare-place.*

1st. We are ready and willing to depose, in truth and honesty, before any competent tribunal or court, that we have caused the Testament, both of the Protestant and Douay version, to be read and perused, by order of the Reverend Dean Egan, who was commonly present, by all the senior class, as well as by other scholars who have acquired a suitable proficiency in reading.

2d. We do depose, at the very risk of our character, that in the perusal of the Scriptures three times generally a week, there never was any distinction or reserve kept up or observed in the perusal of the same, between Catholic or Protestant children, and that they were all alike in their turns called upon, one by one, to read chapter and verse, without distinction.

3d. We are ready to give up our present situation or livelihood, if Mr. Mills can substantiate his report as set forth, that the Scriptures are only read by such Protestant children as attend the school, and that there are in the school but three Testaments, the property of Protestant scholars.

4th. For self-preservation sake alone, we are under the indispensable necessity of contradicting most fully the above statement, as the three Testaments alluded to are exclusively the property of the Reverend Dean Egan, and of no other whatsoever; the Protestant children bringing and carrying home at will their own Protestant Testament, without any molestation whatever on our part, and that there are at present in the school eight Testaments of both versions.

Dunmore, 10th December 1824.

John O'Donnell.

Patrick Reily.

N. B.—We beg leave to have it clearly understood, for fear of any misconception in our statement, that the Catholic children read only their own approved Douay version, the Protestant children reading their own; their names, Jeremiah Petty, James Petty, William Gibrose, Mary Pollard, Christopher Johnson, not mentioning those who have not as yet made a sufficient proficiency in reading.

(signed) John O'Donnell.

Patrick Reily.

I do hereby certify the above statement to be literally true, and indulge in the fond hope that it may prove satisfactory and conclusive at last.

(signed) Dean Egan.

R. C. Pastor of Dunmore and the Arch-diocese of Tuam.

* When this school was visited by the Society's inspector, it appeared that the Scriptures were read but by one denomination of christians attending the school. The regulations of the Society have since been conformed to.

10.—Is the Bible read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

The scholars in both schools have not arrived at a suitable proficiency in reading nor in age to read the Holy Scriptures; probably after a year or two, some might be allowed the Sacred volume, but at the present time there is scarcely one who could read the common story book with any ease or accuracy; therefore I have not introduced the Testament with or without comment.

Are the Scriptures used in the school; are they used with or without note or comment, written or oral?

The Scriptures will be used in the school, without note or comment, at school hours.

Is any catechism used in the school during school hours?

No catechism will be used at school at school hours.

THE undersigned begs leave to assure the committee of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, that not only in his district and neighbourhood, but in the extensive county where he resides, there are hardly any opportunities offered to the poor of instruction, except what the most independent of them may be able to procure from a country teacher, who seldom or ever is qualified for that important office. The undersigned, therefore, as well as to obviate and remedy so lamentable an evil, the principal sources of those atrocious crimes which have so frequently disgraced that country for a series of years, and to correspond with the design and wishes of the committee for the Education of the Poor of Ireland, has selected, in the first place, and brought to Dublin for their inspection, a teacher of approved morals and serious deportment, who has exercised himself successfully for the time past in conducting a school of his own, for English, Greek, Latin and writing, and his scholars have been uniformly found at Maynooth college to distinguish themselves in the above languages.

The undersigned means to employ him in the new school, when previously instructed in the Society's model school.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

It is intended, if the school is assisted by your Society, as it is one of its rules, to have the New Testament read by the grown children every day, without note or comment of any kind.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No catechism, during school hours, shall be hereafter taught in the school.

Though I do not consider the Holy Bible fit to be put into the hands of scholars, and used as a school book, yet, under my own inspection and direction, the lessons which I will point out may be read without note or comment of any kind.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

There is no catechism taught in the school during school hours, nor any controversial tract of any description used in it.

13.—Are all denominations of Christians admissible as masters, managers, teachers and scholars?

Yes; provided they be duly qualified, do their duty, and be under my direction and controul; this school has been frequented by Protestants as well as Catholics since its commencement.

Gentlemen,

Balyna, August 2d, 1822.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of your secretary's letter of the 6th of July, informing me that, as catechism is taught in the Balyna school at school hours, the Society regret that, according to their rules, they are precluded from giving any assistance. I beg leave in return to state, that after maturely reflecting on the great advantages that may be derived by the poor of this neighbourhood, by your Society liberally seconding the views of a generous legislature, I shall dispense with the catechism not being taught at school hours, as soon as I shall be informed of the intention of your Society to extend to us the required assistance.

Sir,

Kilcock, October 16th, 1820.

THE Rev. Mr. Dunne, P. P. of Kilcock and Newtown, incloses the two receipts for the donations granted by the Education Society to his poor schools, and at the same time begs leave to return his most grateful acknowledgments and that of his parishioners, for the kind assistance afforded those schools.

Mr. D. further takes leave to forward an application to the Society for the admission of a master for each school, to be taught in the training school of that Society in the improved system of education, for which he will recommend proper and approved of persons.

Sir,

Kilcock, October 30th, 1820.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of your favour of the 28th instant, as directed from the Education Society, Kildare-place, and feel grateful for the kind and liberal determination of your Committee, in accepting of the masters recommended by me to be instructed in your model school, and hope to send them to Kildare-place about Monday, the 5th of November.

Sir,

Kilcock, May 6th, 1822.

I HAD the honour to receive a letter from your Society, Kildare-place, dated the 2d instant, and very much regret that our circumstances do not allow us to conform more agreeably to the rules and directions of that Society in our poor schools of Kilcock and Newtown.

A strict conformity to your system of education, particularly where the common reading of the Scriptures is so indispensably insisted on seems to give displeasure to many of our subscribers, and alienate their attachment from the interest of these schools. I have always to acknowledge the kindness of your Society in looking so particularly to the welfare of our establishments, and shall hereafter dispense with giving further trouble to the Society, as it seems to be the inclination of our committee and subscribers to manage our subscriptions (small as they may be) without interference or controul from any other establishment.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading?

The Testament is not read; but it shall be read according to the principles of the Society.

Is it read without note or comment, written or oral?

It will be used without note or comment, written or oral, during school hours.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No catechism during school hours, or any other religious book.

I CAN engage to procure ten pounds from the poor by way of gratuitous labour. I think 30*l.* more would be sufficient to build a school-house, which I trust the Society, in their kindness, will be good enough to grant me.

Sir,

Westport.

FROM the explanation which Mr. Donelan has given of the principles of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, I consider I can conscientiously, as a Roman Catholic clergyman, comply with their regulations with respect to reading of the Scriptures, and should your liberal and philanthropic Society think fit to extend your liberality to the deserted children of this parish, I will undertake that the principles of their Society shall be most strictly complied with.

An approved version of the Douay Testament, of which select passages are read, without note or comment.

11.—Is any catechism used in the school during school hours, or any book inculcating peculiar religious opinions?

No catechisms, or books of religious opinions, during school hours.

13.—Are all denominations of christians admissible as masters, managers, teachers and scholars?

All denominations admissible.

Sir,

12 November 1824.

IN reply to your letter, dated the 23d ultimo, I beg to inform the committee, through you, that there was a Bible, without note or comment, in the Dangan school, but I believe not used according to the regulations of the Society, in consequence of the master not being trained as yet, and not knowing any regular system. However, in order to comply with their laudable desires and the order of the inspector, I have borrowed some Testaments, without note or comment, until I can get a supply of my own from Dublin, as I could not get them to purchase in the neighbourhood. I have also to express my gratitude for their kind encouragement to me to promote education in my neighbourhood, for which I beg leave to offer my most humble thanks. I have further to state, that, by this time, I would give a statement of the expenditure for the furniture of the school room, but in consequence of the increase of pupils when I received the grant of books, &c. &c. the master was under the necessity of commencing an addition to the school-room, which I hope will be soon in fit repair for the reception of scholars, at which time I shall state the actual expenditure.

May I request to know what encouragement the master can depend upon from the Society, circumstanced as he is, without aid, as yet, from any individual, but wholly depending on their bounty and humane consideration.

(signed) W^m Jennings, P. P. of Killarcan.

Sir,

November 29th, 1824.

THE repeated favours I have hitherto received through you from the humane committee, induces me to hope they will be kindly pleased in sending the master, who has paid the strictest attention to the school, some relief that would encourage him, as he is wholly depending on the bounty and humane consideration of the Society, without aid from any individual, except what has been stated in the last queries. I left nothing undone to procure procure some additional assistance to support the teacher; the dulness of the times rendered my endeavours ineffectual as yet. I regret to notice that the inhabitants of this neighbourhood are extremely poor, and not able to pay for the education of their children. I have also to inform the committee, through you, of my willingness to excite my exertions in promoting the laudable desires of the Society.

I was encouraged, long since, by some private sources, that they would contribute to a subscription for the support of schools, although none effected, I believe, in consequence of their misery and distressed situation. May I request to know when will the master be sent for to be trained.

I beg an answer as soon as possible.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

It is intended that the New Testament be read by all who are suitably qualified, without note or comment; at present they have no books.

This is the first attempt to set on foot any means of educating the poor in this parish. A house has been taken for one year, from the 1st of January 1823, at the rent of 12*l.* per annum. The subscription list at present amounts only to 15*l.* and application is made to the Society for pecuniary aid to fit up the school-room with the requisite accommodation of seats, desks, &c. &c. for which an estimate is enclosed; also, for such supply of books, paper, slates and pencils, as the Society may think in their liberality wanting to an infant establishment.

More particularly, a sufficient supply of New Testaments to carry into effect the answer to the tenth query.

As I learn you are the organ through which every communication relative to the education of the poor is forwarded to the Society for the Education of the Poor, I beg you will direct their attention to my application in behalf of a peasantry, from many causes, unable to afford their children the blessing of education. The inhabitants of these parishes are very poor, and consequently unable to pay for the schooling of their children, nor afford them the necessary clothing. There are many causes operating against their education, which I hope your benevolent exertions will ultimately counteract. There are three schools at present thinly frequented; one at Kilconly, one at Sysaleen, and the third Kilbannan. I entreat your attention to this application, and I pledge myself to be a strenuous co-operator in the cause.

Sir,

Ballybricken, 1st November 1822.

From the present distressed state of the poor in this country, and the great probability of its being much more so hereafter, there can be little or no hopes that they could expend any thing on the education of their children in future. I have therefore endeavoured to establish a plan whereby I hope to have the poor of my own parish educated gratis; but as this could not be effectually accomplished otherwise than by the Lancasterian system, I most humbly beg the assistance of your benevolent Society. At present I only beg that you will admit for instruction into your school Thomas Shaughnessy, a young man of most exemplary morals. I hope to have an immediate answer, as the time is short; and, on a further occasion, you shall have a more satisfactory communication.

ENCLOSED I send you, as by your letter to me of the 11th May last, by order of the Society for the Education, &c. &c. an account of the expenses incurred by me in the erection of the school-house, which you will see amounts to 67*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* I hope, therefore, that the committee will be satisfied that I am entitled to the conditional grant, 30*l.* they have made, as I have fulfilled all the conditions they required; and also, that they will think with me, it is the best possible mode of erecting schools for the education of the poor, and which are at present so much wanted, as the work has been done under my own inspection, and in the most permanent manner.

Sir,

9th December 1822.

I HAVE been absent from home these three months, and on my return found your two letters before me; one on the subject of granting a premium to the teachers of the Wicklow free school, and the other for withholding it. In the sentiments of the latter I heartily concur, as, on examining the respective classes on my return, I found they made little or no progress during my absence; I therefore declined recommending them to the Society as attentive labourers. However, I feel very much indebted to the Society for thinking of the schools and their teachers, and hope an opportunity may offer when we will have a well founded claim to make their offer available for our teachers. My absence, then, Sir, was the cause why your communication from the Society to me was not attended to with that promptitude it should have met were I at home; and I hope you will assure the gentlemen of the committee of the same, and also to assure the gentlemen that the rules of the Society are particularly attended to in both the schools.

(signed) M. M'Guire, P. P.

Sir,

May 1823.

I HAD the honour of receiving your letter, together with the last report of the Society for the Education of the Poor of Ireland, with the perusal of which I was highly gratified. I am also happy to find that the temporary omission that has occurred in the Wicklow free school, with regard to reading the Scriptures, has been placed by the committee to its just cause, the want of my superintendence, occasioned by ill health, during the severe winter just past. But I am happy to inform you, that the like cannot occur again, as I have established a reading diary in each school, in which the names of the readers, together with the books read each day, will be entered, particularly the Scriptures; for it is my most anxious wish that the rules and regulations, as laid down by the Society, should be strictly observed in the Wicklow free schools under my inspection. Enclosed I send you 1*l.* 2*s.* 9*d.* being my subscription for the current year.

Sir,

I HAVE to request you will lay before the committee for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, my request to admit Ann Kavanagh, about 22 years of age, into the female model school, and of my parish. She is a young woman of most excellent morals; and I believe her literary character will not be found deficient for such a place.

As she is the daughter of a very poor widow, with several children, and who is not able to assist her on her way to town, may I also take the liberty (if there is a place) to solicit a small trifle to bear her expenses, from the Society. Whenever your answer to this will arrive, she will be ready to depart.

UNRELIEVED, as we have been by any Society, and depending on the precarious existence of individual bounty, we have been obliged to proportion our exertions to the state of our funds. During the years before the last, the number that was permitted to attend amounted amounted to two hundred and seventy-five, about 175 male children, and 100 female children; the females were instructed to sew, to knit, &c. &c.; but the decreasing state of our funds obliged us to discontinue the mistress, and to deprive so many children of some of the best comforts and the most pleasing advantages of life; and I much apprehend our exertions will scarcely be sufficient to continue it, owing to the pressure of the times, and the consequent difficulty of procuring money. It is melancholy to reflect, that though the education of the poor be the theme of every tongue, and the desire of every heart, and though the bounty of Parliament has supplied so much money to the achievement of this object, its advantages have been so little experienced in this country. The school for whose aid I now solicit assistance, has struggled to exist these four years against all the vicissitudes and pressure of the times, imparting instruction and education to nearly 200 children, and yet has never been assisted by any society or experienced the bounty of government. If the present appeal shall prove fruitless, the large number of children above alluded to, must be turned on the world, exposed to all the horrors of ignorance and idleness, the real sources of those crimes which have disgraced and demoralized our country; as the place where the school is now taught, is by the bishop's particular indulgence, the chapel of Ballybrown, which subjects us to a great many privations and inconveniences; and as nothing can give more permanency or security to a school than a proper house where it may be held, I humbly submit to the Society the propriety of building a school-house. Colonel Monsel, of Turvew, to whose bounty the school is already much indebted, has had the goodness to promise a convenient and eligible situation; my utmost exertions can do no more than to build the walls, which I propose to do, so as to make the house 28 feet in length, 16 feet in breadth, eight in height from the ground to the commencement of the roof; the rest I must leave to the Society. Mr. Mills will give any further information, as he has visited the school.

THE school-room requires to be enlarged, repaired and fitted up with desks, forms, stationery, books, slates, &c. which the school is in immediate want of. The parents being in most instances, utterly unable to purchase the most ordinary requisites for a school. But the first assistance our committee requires is the gratuitous instruction of the master; we have selected a man in whom our committee place the greatest confidence, and from whose unwearied assiduity and moral deportment, we have the highest expectations.

HAVING seen the liberal and humane resolutions of the last annual meeting of the Kildare-street Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland, the Roman Catholics of this town have formed with me a school committee for the purpose of extending this valuable institution, and complying with its regulations, which in process of time I hope will be productive of the happiest effects; there shall be no exertions wanting on my part.

I have contributed to the formation of Mrs. Lambert's school in this parish, by convincing the parents of the poor children there was no danger of proselytising.

This town and vicinity being in wretched poverty, could not accomplish the building a school-house sufficient to contain from two to three hundred poor children, with other necessary expenses, without the aid of the Kildare-street Society, which they request of me to solicit, and for which they will be for ever grateful.

10.—Is the Bible or Testament read in the school by all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading; is it used without note or comment, written or oral?

As education, not proselytism, is the object, the Bible, with or without note or comment, is not used in the school.

1st Observation.—Education amongst the poor in the town and vicinity of Clara is in rather a neglected state, as there is neither poor, free nor cheap school in this neighbourhood, saving the one over which I preside, neither will a school here effect the purpose, if the indiscriminate use of the Bible be obligatory.

2d.—I know of no person from whom any aid could be procured.

3d.—The school over which I preside is conducted free of religious distinction, having therein the children of both Protestants and Catholics.

4th.—The aid I ask is for the benefit of the poor boys who now and may hereafter attend my school, for education to be given to them as their wants may require, therefore I refer the committee to my former communication, soliciting one gross of slates, six gross of cutters, six reams of writing paper, twelve dozen primers, six dozen readings, six dozen spelling-books, and six dozen moral histories, devoid of tracts or religious topics.

COPY of a Letter from the Most Reverend Dr. Troy to the Honourable and Venerable Charles Le Poor Trench, D.D. Archdeacon of Ardagh, dated Dublin, 23d July 1818.

Very Reverend Sir,

IN reply to your obliging letter of the 18th instant, handed to me on Tuesday last by Mr. Galway, I have to state, that I did authorize Mr. Blenkinsop, of this city to publish historical and moral extracts from the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, on condition they would not in any manner refer to controverted doctrines; and desired a Roman Catholic clergyman to compare them with the Douay version of the Testament. On his report to me, I sanctioned the publication alluded to in your letter.

In this publication, I have discovered that the Protestant rather than the Douay translation has been followed, particularly on controverted points, such as the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper, the veneration of the Blessed Virgin, Mother of God, the supremacy of St. Peter, and that repentance is substituted for penance.

However, as I cannot object to the extracts in general, and under the expectation that a further edition of them will be more conformable to my original intention, I have not withdrawn the sanction of my name from the publication.

Allow me, very reverend Sir, on this occasion to observe, that the Catholic church in all ages has prohibited the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures, in the vulgar tongues, without note or comment comment, also the interpretation of them by every one's private judgment. This interpretation has been the fatal and prolific hive from which swarms of sectaries daily issue, each one finding his religion in the Bible; which has disfigured and distracted the Christian church since the days of Luther: wherefore the Catholic church condemns the indiscriminate use of the Scriptures in vulgar tongues without note or comment, and permits it only to the learned, or the lettered of the laity.

REPLY to the Document read by Lord Cloncurry, at the general Meeting of the Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland.

Reply to Document
read by Lord Cloncurry, at General Meeting of the Kildare place
Society.

AT the last annual meeting of the "Society for promoting the Education of the Poor of Ireland," a document was read by Lord Cloncurry, entitled, "Thoughts submitted to the Right honourable Charles Grant, on the subject of the Education of the Poor of Ireland, by Lord Fingall and by Doctor Troy, for himself and four other Roman Catholic prelates, now in town."

And this document having since appeared in the public newspapers, and being calculated to give an erroneous view of the principles and practice of the Society, the committee of this Institution have deemed it right to draw up the following concise, and they trust, satisfactory Reply to it.

The publication alluded to, commences in the following manner:—

"It is most respectfully submitted to the consideration of His Majesty's Government, that the want of an early religious education is one of the principal causes why the peasantry of this country are easily induced to take rash and unlawful oaths, to combine for bad purposes, and to commit those excesses which for centuries past, as well as at present, have disgraced this country, disturbed its peace, and prevented its prosperity.

"That a vast majority of the poor children of Ireland are Roman Catholics, one half, at least, of whom are unprovided with any kind of useful instruction in their youth: and that a great proportion of those who are sent to schools, profit little thereby, owing to a want of a good system of education, convenient school-houses, and competent schoolmasters.

"That, at the present period, the Roman Catholic poor are totally unable to provide the necessary means of instruction for their children; and that if not assisted by the legislature more effectually than hitherto, education will advance but slowly amongst them, if at all."

With these observations upon the state of the peasantry, and upon the causes of the disturbances which have long retarded the prosperity, and degraded the character of this divided country, the committee cannot but entirely concur; that the majority of the poor of the country are of the Roman Catholic religion, and are still inadequately provided with useful instruction, is also an undeniable fact, which the committee most earnestly deplore:—but, it should be recollected, that the diffusion of a well ordered system of education throughout any country, to be permanent and efficient, must necessarily be gradual and slow; and the committee trust, it will appear from the facts hereinafter stated, that since the formation of the Society, the progress of education among the poor of Ireland, has been as rapid as the peculiar circumstances of the country would admit.

The publication next proceeds to state,

"That no beneficial aid can be rendered to the Roman Catholic poor, in the way of education, if the distribution of it be regulated in a manner adverse to their religious principles, or calculated to excite the apprehensions or distrust of the parents or pastors of the children."

To the justness of this observation the committee entirely subscribe; but they altogether deny the conclusion that is attempted to be drawn from it, namely; that

"Hence, the Society for the Education of the Poor in Ireland, has not been enabled to fulfil, in their regard, the intentions of the legislature, in placing at their disposal a fund for the education of the poor, without religious distinction."

That the Society has fulfilled the intentions of the legislature to the utmost extent of the means entrusted to their care, the committee think, must be obvious, from the rapid increase of schools under the auspices of the Institution, notwithstanding the various obstacles which have hitherto impeded their progress.

In the year 1816, there were only eight schools in Ireland receiving aid from the institution;—

and in the last year the number of schools, conducted on the principles of the Society, amounted to 513.

It is also right to observe, that these schools are not confined to the parts of the country where the majority of the poor are Protestants, although the committee freely admit, that at the commencement of the Institution they had stronger prejudices to encounter amongst the Roman Catholic poor than amongst those of a different persuasion.

Those

 Society.

Those prejudices, however, are gradually yielding to the steady and impartial conduct of the Society, in proof of which the committee would refer to the state of the Society's schools in the county of Cork, where the poor are, for the most part, Roman Catholics.

In 1816 there was not a single school in that county receiving aid from the Society.

In 1817 there were but	-	-	-	3

- 1820	-	-	-	20
And in the last year	-	-	-	35

Each successive year very nearly doubling the entire amount of those which had previously been established.

The committee conceive, that this progressive increase of schools, conducted on the principles of the Society, together with the fact, that no instance has ever been brought forward, to the knowledge of the committee, of any attempt having been made, in any one of those 513 schools, to interfere with the peculiar religious opinions of the children, must be sufficient to prove, that education regulated on the system of the Society, is neither "adverse to the religious principles of the Roman Catholic poor, nor calculated to excite the apprehension or distrust of the parents or pastors of the children." The more especially, as the successive committees have been always anxious, that the Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen of the parishes in which the Society's schools are situated, should frequently visit those schools, and report to the committee any deviation they might observe from the fundamental principles of the Institution.

The committee think it also right to state, in corroboration of the above observations, that in several instances, Roman Catholic clergymen have stood forward amongst the original founders of the Society's schools; and that, in many cases, clergymen of that persuasion have been, and still are, members of the managing committees of those schools.

It is also conceived that the number of schoolmasters educated in the Society's model school since the year 1813, amounting in the whole to 356 masters, whereof 144 were of the Roman Catholic persuasion, must afford an additional argument in favour of the position advanced by the committee.

It is next stated in the publication,

"That the fund now mentioned could be made available for the education of Roman Catholic children, if the rules of the Society to which it is entrusted, were so modified as to remove the distrust which now prevails with regard to it; and for this purpose the following suggestions are most respectfully offered to be adopted by the Society, through the influence of His Majesty's government."

That the fund placed at the disposal of the Society might be made available for the exclusive education of the Roman Catholic children in the peculiar tenets of their religion, if applied to the support of schools from which the Scriptures, without notes or comment, should be excluded, and which should be placed under the management of the persons who are proposed in this publication as members of the committee, it is not intended to deny.

But the committee are confident that in such case, the fund would cease to be applied to the promotion of a system of education for the poor of all persuasions, without religious distinction; and, in support of this position, they would refer to the failure of the attempts made in the extensive cities of Cork and Limerick, to establish schools for the poor, of every denomination, on the principle of excluding the Scriptures without note or comment. The school in Cork having become an exclusive Roman Catholic seminary, in which the children are instructed in the peculiar tenets of the Roman Catholic faith;—and that in Limerick, having altogether ceased to exist.

The first modification of the rules of the Society proposed in this publication is,

"That the Roman Catholic archbishops residing in Dublin, be of the number of the vice-presidents of the Society; and that the names of six parish priests in the city, or of any other six persons suggested by Dr. Troy or his successor, and approved of by government, be added to those of the committee."

It would not be very just to endeavour to force any particular individuals, however respectable, upon the committee of this voluntary Society, in violation of one of the laws under which they have been associated together, namely, that the affairs of the Institution should be superintended by a committee of members, to be elected at each annual general meeting.

But the impolicy of such a measure is as obvious as its injustice;—as it could not be expected, that much benefit would be derived from a committee, which would in such case, be composed of members entertaining the most opposite sentiments as to the best mode of promoting education.

At the same time the committee freely admit, that if the legislature or the public should consider the Society unworthy of the trust reposed in them, or that their system of education is inefficient, or prejudicial, both Parliamentary grants and private subscriptions ought to be withheld from this Institution;—but so long as the committee are enabled to state such facts as are above detailed, they will look with confidence to the continued and increased support of both the legislature and the public.

It is next proposed,

"That the Evangelical Life of Christ, without notes, or any other compilation from the Scriptures, approved of by Dr. Troy, be substituted in the place of the New Testament for the use of the Catholic children."

In reply to this proposal, the committee would observe, that the Society has been entrusted entrusted by Parliament with pecuniary grants, and by individuals with subscriptions and donations, upon the faith of its strict adherence to the rules originally laid down at its formation;—one of the principal of which was, that in all schools aided by the Society, the Scriptures without note or comment should be read by all children, sufficiently advanced to read them with facility and propriety, whilst all catechisms and controversial books should be excluded. And in their first annual report, published in the year 1813, before any Parliamentary aid had been granted to the Institution, the Society declared their determination, “rigidly to adhere to this part of their plan, looking forward to it with confidence, as affording the only true and solid foundation which can be laid for the moral and religious education of the great body of the people of Ireland.”

One leading object which the Society had in view, was this:—they were desirous to unite, as far as was practicable, in one common bond, and at the earliest age, the poor of all religious persuasions, in this too long divided country. Now the only tie by which Christians, of all denominations, admit in common that they are bound—is the law of God, promulgated in Holy Writ; an authority to which we must all bow. Heretofore in this country, the poor of different religious persuasions had been, for the most part, kept asunder; feelings of mutual rancour and hostility had been thereby cherished in their minds; and it was difficult to make them believe that they were equally bound to each other by the tender ties of Christian charity. Since the diffusion, however, of the system of education recommended and supported by the Society, the committee can affirm with truth, and with gratitude to divine Providence, that very different sentiments and feelings prevail amongst the numerous children of various religious denominations, who have flocked to their schools for instruction; and surely it requires but little reasoning, and still less knowledge of mankind to prove, that this most desirable feeling of harmony and brotherly love, would be but little promoted, however it might be interrupted, by the introduction into schools of a book to be used exclusively by the children of one communion.

For these, as well as many other reasons, the committee entertain the strongest conviction that no book ought to be made a substitute for the Holy Scriptures. Yet, did they think differently, they are satisfied from their own experience, and from the variety of religious opinions which exist amongst the population of this country, that it would be impossible to select any work such as those suggested in the publication, which could be made unexceptionable to all. And the committee think it right to observe, that although the work entitled the “Evangelical Life of Christ,” is now proposed to be used in schools, without the notes annexed to it, yet that the form in which it has been published so lately as the year 1820, (and in which it now appears in circulation) under the sanction of the respectable prelate above named, as “a very proper family and school-book,” would, of itself, be sufficient to excite an apprehension, that the approbation of that respectable prelate might possibly be obtained for some work for the use of the Roman Catholic children, which would be most objectionable to persons of a different persuasion, and which would be calculated to check the growth of that kindly feeling towards each other, which the Society are most anxious to cherish amongst the poor of this country; and, in justification of this remark, the committee would refer to the following passages, contained in the notes to this work:—

“Rome:—To this church, on account of its superior headship, every other must have recourse.”—Note, page 310.

“The Catholic church alone retains the true worship; into which he that enters not, and from which he that goes out, forfeits the hope of life, and of eternal salvation.”—Note, pages 270 and 271.

“Let no one deceive himself;—out of this house, that is, out of the church, is no salvation.”—Note, page 274.

“Whoever falls from her communion, neither is, nor can be called a Christian.”—Note, p. 315.

“As they shall not possess the kingdom of God, who have been defiled by fornication, other impurities, and the worship of idols, so neither shall heretics.”—Note, page 274.

In the next paragraph it is recommended,

“That no books be hereafter printed for the Society, to which any three members of the committee would object; and that such passages in the books hitherto printed, as may appear objectionable to three or more members of the committee, be omitted in future editions of them.”

This recommendation is unnecessary, in point of fact; for the committee have never published, in any book, even a single passage to which any one of its members has objected; and all books before publication are, according to the rules of the committee, laid on their table for the perusal of its members, for at least one month before they are printed.

But this recommendation seems to imply, that books which are objectionable to Roman Catholics have been published by the Society.

In answer to this insinuation, the committee would observe, that the persons to whom this department of the Institution has been, from time to time entrusted, have been always particularly anxious that there should not be a single line in any of the Society's publications objectionable to the professors of that religion to which the greater part of the poor of Ireland belong: and, as proof of the success which has attended the Society's labours in this respect, the committee trust it will be sufficient to state, that although the Society have, since the month of November 1815, circulated more than half a million of volumes of cheap, moral, instructive and entertaining works for the poor of Ireland, exclusive of their numerous school books, yet there have been but two instances (to the knowledge of the committee) committee) of any of the Society's publications having been at any time objected to, either in the whole or in part, by any member of the Roman Catholic church.

One of the publications here alluded to, and to which some Roman Catholics have objected, is entitled, "Selections from the New Testament," and was originally published without the knowledge of the committee, by the printer and stationer to the Roman Catholic college at Maynooth, and with the printed sanction of Doctor Troy in the title-page, as "an unexceptionable book for schools where children of different denominations are instructed."

This book the Society were induced to reprint, with the approbation of Doctor Troy in his own hand-writing, which written approbation the committee still have in their possession; and they trust that, under such circumstances, they will stand acquitted of any intention of publishing a work objectionable to persons of the Roman Catholic persuasion; and they would beg to observe how much the objections made to this (as the committee had conceived, most unobjectionable work) corroborates the opinion they have above expressed, of the impracticability of publishing any selection from the Scriptures, or any other book of the kind, without its incurring the disapprobation of some individuals.

The only other instance, to the knowledge of the committee, of any of the Society's publications having appeared objectionable, even in a single passage, to any member of the Roman Catholic church, was made known to the committee by a letter in the Waterford newspaper, published on the 15th July 1820, signed "John Fitzpatrick, P.P." containing the following animadversion on one of the Society's schools:—

"In my review of the books, &c. the first I met with was one entitled, 'Travels through Italy,' &c. containing calumnies and misrepresentations calculated to make impressions on the tender and uninformed mind, injurious to the religion of which these poor children are members."

The Society, not having ever published any work, entitled, "Travels through Italy," inquiry was immediately made upon the subject; and the committee were informed that the work referred to, was "Mungo, or the Little Traveller," and that the passage in it objected to, was the following:—

"By following him in his rambles I found also, that man here was cruel and revengeful."

"It seemed, there existed a weak and wicked law, that every murderer, who could take refuge in a church, was safe from his pursuers, no one daring to seize him in so sacred an asylum. They had always friends to supply them with food, and in time to provide their escape. My master was one evening intently surveying some painting in an obscure part of the church, when one of those wretches, wrapped in a long cloak, with murder and revenge scowling on his dark countenance, glided by us. Even I shook with fear at the assassin's sight; and my master, casting toward him a look of horror, left the place. I pretend not to say that this disgusting circumstance hastened him away, but on the following day we took our leave of Rome."

The committee certainly did not concur in opinion with the reverend gentleman above-mentioned; but with an anxious desire to reconcile all parties, and avoid, as much as possible, giving offence to any, they had the whole passage alluded to, expunged from the new edition of this work lately published by the Society.

The publication next proceeds to state the reasons which have induced the framers of it to propose the changes therein recommended.

"The reasons why the above modifications of the rules of 'the Society' would be proposed, are, first, that they do not seem to infringe materially on its present rules, and are so consonant to its principles of extending the blessings of education to all, without interfering with the religious opinions of any, that without them these principles cannot be carried into effect."

In reply to this part of the publication, the committee conceive it requires no argument to prove, that the forced introduction of ten individuals upon the committee of a voluntary association, and the abandonment of the only principle on which the Society could have been induced to undertake the great work in which they are engaged, would not only infringe most materially on the present rules of the Society, but would, in its results, tend to the total destruction of the institution.

And the committee hope it is apparent, from the facts above detailed, that without any such changes as are proposed in this publication, the principles of the Society can be, and have been carried into complete effect.

The next reason assigned for the proposed recommendation, is in these words:—

"Next, that from a variety of causes, the Roman Catholics of this country will always look with distrust to any system of education devised and conducted exclusively by persons professing a religion different from their own."

This observation is founded on an erroneous assumption of fact, as will be evident to any person who will take the trouble of reading over the names of the committee of each successive year, since the establishment of the Society. It will thus be seen that the business of the Society is not conducted by persons of any peculiar religious persuasion; but that, on the contrary, many individuals of the highest respectability, of the Roman Catholic religion, assisted at its original formation; and that several members of that church, have been, from time to time, and still are, members of the managing committee.

The publication then proceeds—

"Nor can a reasonable hope be entertained that they will cheerfully or generally avail themselves of its advantages, until it meets with the cordial support and approbation of their pastors."

In reply to which, the committee would refer to the facts above stated, as proof that the Roman Catholic poor have both cheerfully and generally availed themselves of the advantages of education afforded by the Society; and also, that the system of education recommended by this institution, has in many instances met with the cordial support and approbation of Roman Catholic clergymen.

The publication then proceeds to state a further reason for the proposed changes.

"Also, because the reading of the sacred Scriptures in schools by children, is opposed both to the principles and discipline of the Roman Catholic church."

That the reading of the Rhemish version of the sacred Scriptures, without note or comment, in the schools by children, in the manner recommended by the Society, is opposed to the principles and discipline of the Roman Catholic church, is an assertion, which, though purporting to come from such high authority, the committee cannot but hesitate to adopt, when it is undeniable that very great difference of opinion exists upon this very point, among the clergy as well as the laity of that church; and when the committee find many individuals of both classes alluded to, coming forward and adopting the system of instruction recommended by the Society, and permitting the reading of the Scriptures by the children of their schools; they, therefore, think they are fully justified in concluding, that the reading of the sacred Scriptures in schools, as recommended by them, whether it be opposed or not to the general practice, cannot be considered as contrary to the principles and discipline of the Roman Catholic church. And the committee are the more inclined to come to this conclusion, from the reasons assigned in the publication for the position therein laid down, namely,

"Inasmuch as she considers such practice as tending to diminish the reverence which the professors of her faith should entertain for the word of God."

This objection might be considered as entitled to some weight, did the regulations of the Society require the sacred Scriptures to be made use of as a book for teaching children to spell or read;—but as they are only directed to be put into the hands of youth, who have made a suitable progress in reading, and are intended as a sort of reward and distinction for such children—and are desired to be read with proper solemnity, as the sacred word of God, the committee deem it impossible that such a use of it should tend to diminish the reverence which the professors of the Christian faith should entertain for the word of God.

The next reason assigned for the Roman Catholic church objecting (as it is alleged) to children reading the Scriptures in schools, is, that it would tend "To unsettle their religious belief, by giving occasion to young and ignorant persons to form erroneous judgments of many passages of the Scriptures, which are hard to be understood, and which have ever been interpreted in different ways by divers persons, and not unfrequently to the great detriment of the most venerable institutions both in church and state."

But the committee conceive that this objection will not appear a solid one, when it is recollected that the Society does not prescribe what particular parts are, or what are not to be read, but leave this to the judgment and discretion of the managers or teachers of each school; and further, that they warmly recommend to the several pastors of the children, the necessity of imparting religious instruction to the children of their respective flocks out of school hours; by which means the comparatively few passages that may be hard to be understood, can be interpreted to the children, according to the peculiar opinions of their respective pastors. And here it may be well to observe, that a version of the New Testament, as used in the Roman Catholic church, has been published in Dublin, without notes or comments; and that the use of this book in schools is a compliance with the rule of the Society respecting the reading of the sacred Scriptures.

The framers of the publication then state their last reason for objecting to the reading of the sacred Scriptures in schools:—

"Further, Roman Catholics are of opinion, that the religious and moral instruction which children are expected to derive from the reading of the sacred Scriptures, can be more easily and effectually communicated by means of certain extracts from them, less liable than others to misinterpretation, and by religious tracts suited to the capacity, station in life, age, habits, and feelings of those who are to be instructed."

The committee conceive they have already sufficiently shewn the impracticability as well as the impolicy of substituting any work in place of the holy Scriptures.

The publication then proceeds—

"The insufficiency of 'the Society' for the attainment of the objects of the legislature, is stated for this reason, that as far as the knowledge of those who make this representation extends, the schools receiving assistance from it are comparatively few in number."

In reply to this passage, the committee would again refer to the facts above detailed, as affording abundant proof that the Society is not insufficient for the objects for which it was established; and that the schools receiving assistance from it, are not few in number, with reference to the extent of its means, the short period which has elapsed since it was founded, and the prejudices and difficulties it had to encounter.

It is further stated in the publication.

"That in such of these, few as are frequented by Roman Catholic children, the rules of the Society are either evaded (to the no small prejudice of that truth and sincerity which should never be departed from, but above all in institutions where youth is trained up:) or if they be observed, the children are reluctantly permitted by their parents and pastors to remain in such schools, to avoid giving offence to the patron, or exciting his resentment."

With

With regard to the evasions thus said to be practised in the Society's schools, the committee are convinced, from the reports of their inspectors, upon whose vigilance they have every reason to rely, that very few such instances are to be met with, and that such duplicity must be of very rare occurrence indeed; and, in reply to the concluding observation of the paragraph, the committee feel it due to the parents and pastors of the Roman Catholic children to state, that they have not known even a single instance of Roman Catholic parents or pastors permitting the children of their communion to attend the schools of the Society, from the unworthy motives imputed to them in this publication.

The committee have thus, as succinctly as possible, and they hope as temperately, given such an answer to the animadversions and observations contained in this publication, as they conceived were directed against the Society; and they trust it will be considered satisfactory by the public and the friends of moral and religious education.

In conclusion, they would merely beg to disclaim any intention of contending, that the system of education recommended and diffused by the Society, is in all respects, the best in theory that could be devised for the education of the poor. All they have endeavoured to establish, and which they think they have succeeded in, is this,—that the operations of the Society, as far as they have extended, have been attended with the greatest success, and have already produced considerable benefit to the country. That the system upon which this Society acts, is more practicable, and better adapted to the peculiar circumstances of this country than any other which has yet been proposed, or which the experience of the committee has suggested;—and further, that the alterations proposed to be made in that system, would, if practicable, be quite inexpedient;—and, lastly, that the regulations agreed to by the Society at its original formation, on the faith of strict adherence to which various sums have been received from individual bounty, and many successive grants from Parliament, render it now impracticable to infringe upon their original rules; and that the adoption of such as are now proposed, would not only be an infringement upon the rights of the Society, but would strike at the very foundation and first principles of the institution.

Dublin, 23d March 1822.

Appendix N° 227.

INSTRUCTIONS to the Inspectors with regard to the reading of the Holy Scriptures in the Schools under the Patronage of the Kildare-place Society.

IT is desirable that the inspectors should not only conform to instructions received from the Society, but that they should be convinced that such instructions are in conformity with the fundamental principles of the Society.

There are three fundamental and essential regulations or principles which must be uniformly adhered to in all schools, to entitle them to receive aid from the Society; those are to be found in the rules prefixed to the printed Annual Reports; the printed statement contains more by way of explanation or recommendation; however, where the three fundamental regulations are complied with, the school must be considered as not precluded from the patronage of the Society.

Those fundamental principles are,

1st. That the appointment of governors and teachers, as well as the admission of scholars, shall be uninfluenced by religious distinctions:

2ndly, That catechisms, and books of religious controversy, shall be excluded:

3dly, That the children shall be made acquainted with the principles of the Christian religion, by the reading of the Holy Scriptures, but without comment, thereby avoiding the inconveniencies which would attend the giving of peculiar or sectarian religious instruction in the Society's schools.

These principles being adhered to, the Society thinks it best not to dictate nor enforce any other principle or practice to be uniformly followed in the schools under its patronage.

Without entering into a lengthened detail of the motives which led to the adoption of these as fundamental principles, it may be observed,

That the object of the first, is to enable the different denominations of Christians to associate together on common ground, and be instructed in the same schools.

As to the second, it is not to be understood that the Society disapproves of the use of catechisms, but only considers that each religious denomination must be left to give to their children such peculiar religious instruction, as they think right, out of school hours, and therefore that the hours for schools being open should be so regulated as to afford ample opportunity for such being given.

In order to accomplish the third important object, the general usage and practice has been, to require that all the scholars who have attained a suitable proficiency in reading, should have the Bible or New Testament, either in the authorized or Rhemish version in their hands, and read therein to their teachers.

The Society considers it best to leave all the rest to local managers of each particular school, and not to interfere, unnecessarily, with the prejudices, partialities or practices of any; therefore, although the committee is distinctly of opinion that it is not eligible to use the Bible or Testament as a school book, from which children are to be taught to spell or read, thereby treating those sacred records with too little reverence, care should however be taken to allow local managers to act in this respect as they may each think best, and according to the views of the residents of the county where the school is situated.

Some think the only or best proof of the Scriptures having been read or effectually read in schools, schools, is to be obtained, by obliging the scholars to commit certain portions of them to memory; this, however, the Society does not require, although many of its members approve of the practice; but it is obvious to do this, that the children must be permitted to read such portions at their seats, or at home, to prepare them to repeat the same from memory, and the Society could not consider such a practice in any school, as any violation of its rules or principles, or as precluding such school from receiving assistance from its funds. In like manner the practice of allowing the children to peruse the chapter at their seats, previously to their reading it aloud to the teacher, although it may be conceived by some as using the Scriptures as a school-book, may rather be intended to imprint the subject more forcibly on the minds of the children, and, therefore, ought not to be unnecessarily interfered with by the Society, or its officers: but further, even supposing any manager of a school should actually teach the children to spell and to read from the Testament, however highly inexpedient the Society might think such a practice, there is nothing in its fundamental principle that would justify the exclusion of such school from receiving aid from its funds; and the line of procedure on the part of an inspector ought to be, to endeavour to convince the manager of the inexpediency of the mode followed, and not to direct, or order, a different procedure under the expressed or implied understanding, that in default, the school would be excluded from the benefit of the Society's patronage.

Lord Lieutenant's School Fund.

Appendix, N° 229.

Examination of Major Benjamin Blake Woodward, on Oath;

Saturday 11 December 1824.

ARE you one of the commissioners for the distribution of the grant which bears the name of the Lord Lieutenant's Fund?—I am.

How many persons are joined with you in that commission?—Two others, Mr. James Digges Latouche, and the Rev. Mr. Dunn.

Is either one the chairman?—We have no distinction of that kind, we have merely considered ourselves as a private board; we have no commission; the government have always referred applications that were made to the Lord Lieutenant for aid from the fund to us, and acted entirely upon our report; we have no commissions, we are merely private persons acting for the government.

Are your services gratuitous?—Yes.

Have you the assistance of any secretary or clerk?—Yes, within the last year; I did the business myself of secretary until this last year, when it accumulated so from the increase of the grant, that I begged there might be a secretary appointed, and there has been a salary allowed to Mr. Litton, who acted as solicitor before and had a great deal of business thrown upon him that belonged to the secretary more than the solicitor.

Does he receive a salary?—Yes, 100*l.* a year only for the last six or nine months.

When did the grant first commence?—1819 was the first year.

Was the first grant 3,000*l.*?—Yes.

Have there been from that time successive annual grants?—There have been; we had two of three thousand pounds, then it was raised to four thousand pounds for two years, seven thousand for one year, and ten thousand the last year.

Did you receive any instructions as to the mode in which the money was to be administered?—No; we received originally no instructions, we formed our own plan, and the principles upon which the fund was proposed to be administered by us, were approved of by government, and we found that the fund was much better applicable to assist in building school houses than to any other purposes; we have therefore refused all aids to the schoolmasters, and only given a portion of the cost of the building of the house.

Do you know in what way the grant originated; was there any petition or application by any persons?—No; I understood from the secretary of that day, that it was the suggestion of some members of the House of Commons, that Mr. William Parnell was one of the persons who suggested that it would draw out a quantity of private subscription in this country if there was any aid to assist persons in establishing schools in the first heavy expense of them, and until the 3,000*l.* was actually granted that year, there had not been any plan formed of the direct object to which it was to be applied.

Do not the directors of the Association for discountenancing Vice make grants for building schools?—They do; but upon such terms that so few people can meet, they have had no success whatsoever comparatively; they have I believe almost discontinued making building grants, if not entirely, their terms are such as the country cannot meet.

Do not the Kildare-place Society also make grants for building schools?—The Kildare-place Society I have not attended, so as to speak from my own knowledge, but I believe their grants are very small, and that ours is the only fund from which a very considerable aid can be expected in building schools.

Do the governors of Erasmus Smith's fund make grants in aid of building schools?—It was their plan, but that I can only speak to from hearsay; I understand they are not now making any building grants.

Do we understand you to say that it was the object of the fund which you have superintended the distribution of, to provide the means of making grants to persons who could not comply with the rules of the association, the Kildare-place Society, or the governor's of Erasmus Smith's fund, or was it to supply the means of building schools, which they were inadequate to supply?—Both, I think, for we never considered of the Kildare-place Society, that building was one of the leading objects of that Society, and we knew that the terms of the association were fixed and settled, and that there was a maximum beyond which they never went, and we therefore did consider that our fund was the only one from which much encouragement was to be had in building school houses, and also we felt that we were clear from the objection that might be made by some people to comply with the terms of the other societies, for we made no terms whatsoever.

Will you state what are the conditions of the association which tended so much to circumscribe the field of their operations?—They have given no grant exceeding 50*l.* and that upon a subscription of 100*l.* as I understand; they also subject their schools to catechetical examination, and I believe require absolutely a Protestant schoolmaster.

Have no conditions whatever been affixed to grants made from the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—None whatever; that is, of course, I do not speak of the condition that we make of a grant of land and of a certain subscription, but no condition as to the mode of education.

When an application is made to yourself and to the other commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's fund to make a grant, have the goodness to describe the course you pursue?—The first application is by memorial to the Lord Lieutenant, and if the application is made in any other way, we point out that that is the regular course; we do not in general receive a case until it is referred to us from the Castle, when the case is referred to us we forward to the applicant a paper of printed queries, which queries are merely intended to ascertain the terms; the quantity of land that will be granted; the amount of the private subscription; the number of children, and some other questions as to the amount of the salaries and the repairs of the house—when those queries are returned to us, we then enter upon the examination of the case, and we now in general reject a case unless half the amount of the estimate is raised by private subscriptions; if we approve of the case, we then make a report upon the back of the memorial, precisely in the words in which the answer is to go from the Castle, at the same time stating that in the event of a grant of land being made to the minister and churchwardens of the parish or to trustees, or whoever they choose to grant the land to, and the house being built on an improved plan, and estimate, and so on, that His Excellency is pleased to approve of a grant of so much money, and the letter is filled up in the office (copying that report) which is signed by Mr. Goulburn and forwarded to the applicant; and as soon as we find that the private subscriptions are actually expended, we then send a note to the Castle, saying, that the case is ripe for the issuing of a warrant for the money, which is done.

In deciding upon the rules by which you can guide yourselves in granting or with-holding aid upon the several applications, have you been left entirely to exercise your own discretion, or have you had any instructions?—We received no instructions whatever; our suggestions were approved of.

How did you collect the object of the grant, is there anything in the vote at the time it is made by Parliament?—No; there is nothing mentioned except that it is in aid of schools established in Ireland by voluntary subscription; that is the only rule; but its being given towards building houses or any other object of that kind was not pointed out to us at all; and it was merely the result of our own experience that has decided us in our pursuing what is now a regular settled course.

What conditions do you require with regard to the tenure of the land on which the school-house shall be built?—We require a lease in perpetuity; at the same time, in some very few cases where that could not be had, we have been satisfied with a certain length of time, conceiving that a great number of years of education would be a sufficient object attained for the sum we granted, but in general we require a grant of land in perpetuity, and we allow the applicant to put it into any safe hands; we do not require it shall be made to the Protestant clergy, or any particular people, but we look to the trustees to see that they are in their own persons, or in their representatives, likely to be permanent trustees; we have refused to name certain trustees when in case of the death of that person we saw no prospect of any of their family holding it for them; but we generally allow them to name their own trustees, and unless there is some objection of that kind, we do not object; we have had leases to Roman Catholic clergymen and to private lay trustees wherever the proprietors of the school wished it.

How many trustees are named in each lease?—I think they vary; we have no rule with respect to that; there are three where the minister and churchwardens are the parties, but in other cases we have them made to other individuals.

Is it the common practice to make it to the minister and churchwardens?—Yes; a great many of the schools have been established by the parochial clergy; they have been by many degrees the most active body in the kingdom; I dare say, two applications out of three come from the parochial clergy; they apply to their neighbours, and collect subscriptions, and if it is their wish it should become a parochial school, we accede to it; a great proportion of them now are parochial schools.

What do the trustees hold the land in trust for?—In trust for the continuance of the school, and the appointment of the master is generally in their hands; the other societies, both the Kildare-place Society and the Association, are satisfied with our leases; they will grant salaries from their funds without requiring any other lease than the lease made to us.

Is there any provision for the schoolmaster?—No.

In whose hands do the leases remain?—They are registered, and remain in the hands of our solicitor and secretary, Mr. Litton.

In what way do the commissioners ascertain that the money granted for the school is properly expended?—There is a return made by the Treasury every year to the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts, and they throw upon us the onus of passing the whole account; they make a return to us of the list they receive from the treasury, and we are obliged to make a return to them, shewing the amount of private subscription, and the public grant in each case, and to accompany it with vouchers, stamped receipts and affidavits of the expenditure, so as to pass the accounts before them, not only as to the money given by the public, but the private subscriptions, and we have in no instance failed to pass our account.

What individual certifies that the money has been properly expended in the building of the school, and that the work has been substantially done?—An affidavit is made, stating that the school is built, that it is in operation, and that the work has been executed; they swear to all the bills of the workmen.

Is that left to the subscribers?—Yes, it is left to the applicant, whoever the person was that originally established the school; the moment we make a grant we send a circular printed letter to him, stating that such a sum of money has been recommended, and warning him that an account will be called for by the commissioners of accounts, of the expenditure of the whole money, cautioning him not to destroy the vouchers; and afterwards we have another form, when the Imprest office call for the account.

Do you make it your duty to ascertain that there is a probable and sufficient fund forthcoming to maintain the school afterwards?—Our queries go so far, and as far as we can we do ascertain it; but if at the same time we were to require satisfactory security upon that subject, the work would not go on near so fast as we think it is our duty to make it do; the great object is to build a great many school houses.

After the school houses have been built, have they generally been adopted by any societies?—A great number of them of which we have information; and we have books in which all that appears; but a great number of our schools are parochial schools, and a great number of them are of a description of school that can only be aided by us, private schools; our fund has been of very great use in promoting and encouraging them.

Are many of the school houses, after they have been built, adopted by the Association for discountenancing Vice?—A great many.

Do you believe that many of them have been afterwards in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—Certainly.

Any of them in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—We do not know any thing of that.

Do you know whether they are ever adopted by the Baptist Society?—We do not know any thing of any Society beyond those who receive parliamentary aid.

Do you know whether any of the masters are paid from Erasmus Smith's fund?—Sometimes; I know it to be so; Erasmus Smith's fund not now granting building leases, but granting salaries; many schools establish themselves in that way, and come to us for aid to build, and get a salary from Erasmus Smith's fund.

Do you believe that the greater number of schools erected from the Lord Lieutenant's fund are now parochial schools in connection with the established church?—I should think the greater number of them decidedly are.

Of the total number of applications made, do you think the majority has been rejected?—About half and half; about 850 I think is the number we have got up to now, and I reckon, as far as I can guess from our last returns, we have built 400 schools.

Is there any one prevalent cause of rejection?—Nine rejected out of ten are for inadequate voluntary subscriptions; that is the great cause of rejection. I should say, that when I mentioned parochial schools, that most of those parochial schools are established by the contributions of the laity in the neighbourhood, of gentlemen of property; the clergyman being the natural person to take the trouble to promote such a thing, is desired to memorial the Lord Lieutenant, and the case is sent forward in his name; he may subscribe a very small sum of money, and the laity of the country subscribe large sums, and the leases being made by their consent to the minister and churchwardens of the parish, they become in many instances parochial schools, but the laity establish them by that means at their own expense.

Are you acquainted with the description of schools which generally bear the name of parochial schools, inasmuch as they exist under the authority of an Act of Henry the Eighth?—That was not any thing more than the allowance of 40s.

When you describe them as parochial schools, are they generally of that description that the clergyman allows 40s. towards the maintenance of the master?—Into several of the schools that 40s. is thrown, but there are a great number of parishes that have several schools in the hands of the minister and churchwardens of the parish, and of course but to one of those could that 40s. go; what I mean by a parochial school is a case in which we have made a lease to the minister and churchwardens, and vested the appointment of the master in them.

Have you ever assisted in building more than one school in one parish?—Frequently.

How do you estimate the probable number of children it is necessary to provide for?—By one of our queries, which is, "What number of children may be expected to attend, distinguishing males and females, Roman Catholics and Protestants."

Is there any specification of the plan of the school room sent to you?—Yes; we have got every plan in our possession; we require a plan, and elevation and estimate, all of which we retain, and we can oblige them to pass their accounts in conformity with the estimate, and we also have a plan of the school.

Do you make it necessary for them to build the school of stone or bricks?—We have not made any particular regulations as to that; we have some small thatched cottages; we have given grants of 10*l.* in aid, and 10*l.* more to build a cottage, but the greater proportion are substantial slated buildings.

Have many applications been made on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy?—A great number of them have made applications lately; until lately we had very few, but their demands were in general such as we could not at all attend to, their plans were so very high, and their quantity of subscription so very low, it would have swallowed up the fund in a moment; and we gave them the same answer that we did to our clergy, that the terms they proposed were totally out of our reach.

What amount of contribution do you require in proportion to your own grant?—There is no decided rule, but we make it almost a general rule not to grant more than half.

Do you require that the money supplied by subscription, should be actually paid in and forthcoming before you pay the money granted?—Actually expended upon the house; we require a report that the house is in progress, and the private fund expended.

Have the goodness to describe the kind of schools the Roman Catholic clergy were in the habit of applying for?—They were schools that would require from us a grant of three and four hundred pounds, and that in exceedingly insignificant parts of the country; we consider 200*l.* as almost our maximum grant, and we are never induced to grant that, unless besides in addition to our getting an equivalent in subscription, the town or place is of sufficient importance to make it a fit situation.

Major Woodward,

Did they transmit plans when they made those applications?—Yes, I think they must have done so; in a great number of cases the want of the school and sum required were stated in the memorial, and answered at once, but we have granted a great many sums to Roman Catholic clergymen.

Did it appear that they generally sought to provide habitations for the master, as well as school-rooms?—That we encourage in almost all our schools; they include accommodation for the master.

Have you made a grant to a school at Tuam?—Yes.

Do you recollect the description of building you aided?—It was a large building, upon which they had laid out a great deal of money; they did not apply to us at first, but after they had proved to us they had expended a great deal of money, we granted them 100*l.*; and as we are now making some reports, in order that we may not have a great arrear of business, but which we are afraid to send to the Castle till we know whether the grant will be renewed next session, we have, amongst other cases, decided upon giving them 44*l.* more, which is half the amount of the additional subscriptions.

Has there been any lease granted to trustees of Tuam school?—Yes, certainly.

Do you know who those trustees are?—I do not, indeed; they were named by Archbishop Kelly, and Mr. Eneas M'Donnell.

Do you know what number of children the school is calculated to accommodate?—It is a very considerable number; I do not recollect it.

Have any grants been made to the schools which are taught by nuns?—None that we know of.

Have any applications been made from them?—We do not know of any; there may have been applications made by Roman Catholics; we do not enquire what the nature of the school is; we have granted sums to two or three schools in this neighbourhood under Doctor Magee; in the neighbourhood of Chapel Izod, we granted 100*l.* in aid of three or four schools; what sort of schools they are we do not know; we have aided very few Roman Catholic schools.

Can you say how many?—I should certainly say not above a dozen I think.

Did you make a grant for the school at Castle M'Adam?—That is the Rev. Mr. Bayly's school; yes, we did.

To what amount?—I do not recollect.

Is that a distinct grant from the school at Newbridge?—Decidedly.

Do you require a plan and elevation of the school to accompany the application?—Yes; I do not know whether we had it in that case; it was to be attached to the chapel, and that made us careless.

Do you know whether your grant to Newbridge has been laid out in increasing the chapel?—I cannot say whether that is among the cases that have passed the Board of Imprest Accounts or not, but it would appear, that that had not been the case if it had passed them; we have not, perhaps, passed the accounts of that school.

In what manner could the Commissioners of Imprest Accounts enter into the circumstances whether it was an addition to the chapel, or the creation of a school?—It would be examined if the plan was adhered to; this may, however, have been a room added to the chapel, and yet on an efficient plan as a school-room; we gave but 30*l.* to it.

Should you consider that a legitimate application of the fund?—Certainly not in general; at the same time I do not know if they had built a room attached to the chapel as a school-room, whether we should refuse to grant 30*l.* to it.

Supposing it communicated with the chapel, and was used as a chapel?—We should treat it in the same way as if a clergyman of our church was to build a room against the church, we are not allowed to make any distinction, and carefully avoid it.

Should you not suspect that there was a possibility of its being made an addition to the chapel, although it was called a school room?—We should feel it our duty to proceed exactly in the same way as in the case of a church; we might perhaps consider, that the proposal meant that it was to be a school-room, and also a vestry-room, to either church or chapel; perhaps we should consider that a reason for not giving a very large sum, but not perhaps an objection to it altogether.

Have the commissioners always given, within a year of the grant, the whole amount of the grant voted?—We have always been obliged to stop before the end of the year; we have never had money enough.

Have you money on hand now?—About 300*l.*; but this year we have been particularly cautious, not knowing what the result of this commission might be; whether it might be part of the plan of education next year to renew our grant; and we have been more anxious on that account to keep enough on hand to wind up; we have a number of leases not completed, and we shall have a large bill of costs to pay.

Have you a great number of applications?—Yes, a great number; a great many cases we have made up our minds upon; we shall grant 3,000*l.* away the next day we meet, if there is another grant next session.

I see a note at the foot of the account for the year 1823, which states, that 10,000*l.* will be required in the present session to give effect to this branch of public education; have the goodness to state how you estimated that amount?—From finding that 7,000*l.* had not been been near enough, we thought 10,000*l.* would answer for our purpose this year, and we had made up our minds to estimate it at 12,000*l.* for next year.

When you say to answer the purpose, do you mean, to satisfy all the applications?—To satisfy all the applications that deserve encouragement, that we should be glad to assist.

Of the cases you have examined and decided upon in your own mind, are the greater number from clergymen of the established church?—I think the majority perhaps are.

And such as you believe would become parochial schools?—Yes; a great number of them will be schools under the management and patronage of the established church, but they all receive the Roman Catholic children of course too.

Can you recollect at all what number of them have been applied for from Presbyterians?—We may have a great number that we do not know any thing of, that are from private gentlemen in the north; but we have had about ten different applications from Presbyterian schools; from the congregations or clergy of Presbyterian churches about ten or twelve.

In those cases, were the grants generally made?—They were decided, exactly upon the same ground as the others; we have made several grants of that kind.

Is it ever considered whether the school is likely to be wanted in the position in which it is intended to erect it; is there any examination made as to the locality of other schools in the neighbourhood?—No.

From which province has the greatest number of applications been made?—I really have no fact on my recollection as to that. I should think we have had pretty nearly equal applications from every province; we have had a great number from the county of Wicklow, and but few from the rest of the province of Leinster; a great many from Connaught and the diocese of Tuam, and from the county of Cork; a great number in the north, particularly in the county of Down. I should think they were pretty even in that respect. Different dioceses differ very much. In Cork we have 20 schools more than we have in the diocese of Cloyne adjoining it; and in the diocese of Waterford scarcely a school.

How do you account for that?—From the zeal of the clergy in different parts of Ireland.

Why should the clergy be more zealous in the diocese of Cork than Cloyne?—It has certainly happened to be the case. With respect to our schools, I know one gentleman in the diocese of Cork that has been the cause of the establishment of the greater number of our schools, Mr. Horace Newman. In the line of country between Cork and Bantry, there is scarcely a school that he has not interested himself in the establishment of; and seeing a neighbour establish a school is an encouragement to other people to apply. We have scarcely any in the diocese of Cloyne.

Does not Mr. Horace Newman reside pretty near the boundary that separates the two dioceses?—I believe not; the river Lee is the boundary of the dioceses of Cork and Cloyne, and I think he lies quite in the interior. The Lee runs towards Macroom direct from Cork, and I know that is the boundary.

Have you had any applications to enlarge old schools?—Yes; in several cases we have done it. We have the houses regularly estimated; and, whatever the value of the school is we consider as so much private contribution, if the school has not been public property before. To this we add a grant, and require that the proprietor should make it over to us by lease; and we have by that means got possession of a great number of old schools, and we have even bought houses, and given half the value of them, upon getting the lease made.

Did you not, in one instance, on application, grant aid to a school that was a diocesan school?—We refused it.

Do you recollect the circumstances of that application?—We had an application from the town of Rosscarbery, from whence I believe the board of education had removed a diocesan school. The clergymen who had held the diocesan school applied to us for money, and we did not think we were at liberty to grant it. We had an application from Kilkenny, which we also refused, for a diocesan school.

Are you aware that there are some congregations, professedly Socinian, that interest themselves in founding schools?—I am not aware of that.

Supposing the fact to be, that there was a meeting-house of Socinians desirous of establishing a school, would you, according to your regulations, feel at liberty to assist such a school?—I should think not; I can only speak my own feeling upon it; I think we would reject it.

Is there that sort of enquiry made with respect to the character and nature of the school, that would practically guard you in making such a grant?—Yes; we have very often suspended the report until the case should be investigated. We ourselves have a pretty general knowledge of the circumstances of the country, being much acquainted with the interior parts of it. Mr. Latouche, being the secretary to the Sunday-school Society, has a great knowledge of schools in Ireland; and, where our own knowledge leaves us in the dark, we suspend our report till we make enquiries. The other day we did so for a long time.

If it was avowed to you by the applicants, that they intended to exclude the Scriptures, would you assist that school?—I am speaking as one individual for three; they might give a different account of it. The case has not occurred; but I think we should not think we were warranted in refusing it on that ground.

Have you ever had any applications to grant money for repairs?—We refuse it; we require some equivalent. The repairs would be an endless source of expense. For instance; the other day there was an application made to us from the county of Carlow; the school was actually built, and cost 100 l.; the applicants wanted to add what would cost 100 l. more, and they wanted us to pay that sum. We said, No; this is in the church-yard, and it is already the property of the church, and you can give us nothing for the money. If it was not already a public property, we should be very glad to repair it upon the condition of the lease being made.

Examination of Major Woodward,
11 Dec. 1824.

Can you recollect what the amount of the unsatisfied applications was this time twelve-months?—I recollect once, upon our first meeting, we had expended 3,000 l., if not upon the first day. We had in our box applications ready for passing to the amount of above 3,000 l. upon the first day, and there might be nearly as much unsatisfied.

Do you think the applications at present unsatisfied exceed that?—There are a great number of applications outstanding now. The applications, I should think, at this moment would exceed 10,000 l.—the actual memorials that we have; but there are a particularly great number of our printed queries now outstanding, more than I remember. Very often they are twelve months unanswered, and then come in. Where people have failed in procuring subscriptions in the first instance, they keep them by them, and then try again. We have no limited time; our printed queries are outstanding a long time, and we have more now, by many, out than I ever remember before.

You have stated that one of your printed queries calls for information respecting the relative number of Roman Catholics and Protestants; what is the object of that?—In fact, it is merely because we had a curiosity to know; we form no decision upon it. It is not a matter that is taken into consideration; so much so, that in making the regular minute for the board from those queries, we do not insert the number. The commissioners, when they are deciding upon the case, do not know the number of Roman Catholics and Protestants; it is not at all connected with our decision on the case.

Then that answer to the query does not influence your decision?—No, certainly not; it does not go before the commissioners when they decide upon the case.

Have you in any grant given a greater proportion than one-half of the whole sum?—We have.

Considerably more?—In some cases we have; we have been more guided by general rules latterly than at first. When the fund was created, it was given us without any rule; and we have in some cases given the whole money, which has amounted to a trifle in the whole.

Do you ever make grants to Sunday schools?—We have always refused it; from all societies we have refused applications universally.

Do you recollect any application having been referred by the Lord Lieutenant to you, with respect to a school at Galway, which was to be established by the Roman Catholic warden?—Yes.

Do you recollect what the answer was?—Yes, in substance; they stated to us that they had great funds applicable to the school, which they did not choose to expend upon it, and they wished therefore to apply to us for the funds. We considered our fund, although we could make no distinction between one school and another, was not by any means applicable to schools possessed of quite sufficient funds to go on, and we refused it on that ground; I think the Lord Lieutenant's answer to the application distinctly stated the ground of the refusal.

Do you conceive that a fund by which a security is given for permanent support to a school, is an objection to a grant being made to that school by government?—No; not giving security that they will support the school, but stating they are possessed of a sum of money (as I think), the interest of which would produce 100 l. a year. We considered the funds of the school to be such as not to warrant our making a grant from our fund to enable them to apply their funds to any other purpose.

The question is not, whether it would be proper to give them a fund to build a school, but whether that is a ground for refusing them any aid whatever?—We should consider it so; there was a school the other day at Fermoy, for which there had been 1,000 l. left, and it was ascertained that they could not possibly apply any part of that fund; application was made to the Board of Education here, to get permission for them to apply part of that fund to building, and it was refused, and then we granted the money to them; the Board of Education had no power on the subject.

It was understood by the commissioners who were at Galway, that there was a subscription for the purpose of erecting a school there, which subscription amounted to 800 l. and that the fact of the existence of such a sum was an objection to aid from government, was it so?—No, I do not think it was stated what the nature of the fund was; the impression upon my mind was, that it was some bequest, some fund of that kind, that they wished not to encroach upon, and to build their school by applying to the Lord Lieutenant's fund.

Do the Lord Lieutenant's commissioners refuse aid in any case where there is a considerable sum in hand towards building?—I think we have, where we thought there was no necessity to call upon us. I do not think we should have given a shilling to the school at Fermoy (the manager of which has attended the Board of Education here); if we found that the legacy had been applicable to the school, we should in that case have declined giving them any money.

Has there been any subsequent application from Galway?—I am not aware that there has been.

Were you aware of the extent of the population of Galway and the extent of the school about to be built?—I suppose it was stated, but we had given a very large grant for the establishment of a school there, that was stated to us as being a school open to all the inhabitants.

inhabitants, without any distinction. We should not have given it in this case, if it had been for a Protestant school.

The other school was under the patronage of a member of the established church?—It was.

You do not conceive the school being established under the patronage of the established church as an objection to it?—Not at all.

Is it not, on the contrary, considered that the fund should be given as much as possible to the clergy of the established church?—No, there is not the least difference made in the application from the Roman Catholic body, or another.

Have not the commissioners considered, and so stated in answer to some applications made to them, that their object was, to place the education of Ireland as much as possible under the clergy of the established church?—In the drafts of our leases (the great proportion of schools we are applied to to aid being established by members of the established church), in the printed form of the rough draft of our lease, about which we had a great deal of consultation with government, it is made to the minister and churchwardens of the parish; but this part of the draft of the lease we alter according to the wishes of the applicants; if they choose to have their school established under the established church, the lease is so engrossed; if they do not, we allow them to name their own trustees; but if the application comes from a Roman Catholic quarter, we should never think of not having it under their clergy, if they approved of it, or under any lay trustees.

The question was, whether you had ever stated that you considered your funds should be applied with a view as much as possible (or to that effect) to place the education of the country under the direction of the clergy of the established church?—I do not recollect that any of us have given any such opinion, and we do not act upon it.

Will you have the goodness just to call to recollection whether you had any correspondence with General Bourke, who lives in the neighbourhood of Limerick, upon the subject?—The only communication I recollect with him was this:—it appeared there was a mistake as to General Bourke's school, and we volunteered to write to him; for we have made a grant to him; he made an application to us for aid to the school, and we granted him 50*l.* which now lies at his disposal; and I had a letter from him yesterday, telling me, that upon the whole he did not think it expedient to accept it at present, that the school was finished in another way, but it still remains now applicable to his school; after we had granted the money, then the drawing of the lease was to follow; and by the Act of Parliament under which a tenant for life is enabled to make a grant in perpetuity for the site of a school, it becomes necessary that the bishop should be a party to the lease; we had much rather there was no such necessity; it is a difficulty with us, and has been troublesome in one or two instances; but when this lease came to the bishop's signature, he would not consent to it, and General Bourke was by that means deprived of the grant; but that was a question between him and the bishop, and not between him and us.

Was not it distinctly stated to General Bourke by you, that the object of placing a school under the direction of the bishop, or having the lease signed by him, was to place the education of the country in the hands of the clergy of the established church?—I have no recollection of such a statement. It is partly placed in their hands by old Acts of Parliament, which require, that the bishop should be a party to the lease. The first Act, 5 Geo. 2, c. 4, enables a tenant for life to grant a lease in perpetuity, and requires that the master must be a Protestant; the second Act, 56 Geo. 3, c. 38, was silent as to the religion of the master; and in order to guard the established church, the Act required, that the bishop should be a party to the lease.

Is it understood, that leases are only to be made to the bishop or the churchwardens, or persons appointed by the proper ecclesiastical authorities, where the lease is to be made by a tenant for life?—Yes.

Do your queries, or the documents going forth from you, that suggest the necessity of the lease being made to the bishop, confine that necessity to the case of a lease made by a tenant for life?—Certainly, further than the rough draft of the lease may mislead; we have always considered it a difficulty that the bishop should have been made a party.

Further Examination of Major Benjamin Blake Woodward, on Oath;
Wednesday 15th December 1824.

IN the distribution of the money that forms the Lord Lieutenant's Fund, has it been an object with you to regulate the grants in such a manner, that the education in the schools you assist, should be placed in the hands of the clergy of the established church?—If we ever had any feeling upon that subject, it was in the earlier part of the administration of the fund, when we were, in fact, severely attacked for not sufficiently doing so; one of the bishops published, publicly, in a letter to the rural deans of his diocese, an opinion, that we had so acted, and he made a very strong objection to the fund; on that account we endeavoured to defend ourselves against having any partiality on any side. I think we have acted the most impartial part upon that subject.

The commissioners would refer you to a letter that contains that expression, and you will give any explanation that you please, how that rule of action is compatible with your letter, in which you express yourself thus; "the general principle upon which the fund is worked" is, that education shall be placed in the hands of the established clergy, and the commis"sioners have in very few instances indeed, been prevailed upon to depart from the general rule?"—I have kept no copy of any correspondence of this kind; we have never acted on that principle, and candidly speaking, the only way in which I can account for having written this, which I suppose can be shewn under my hand (I have no recollection of it) is, that it may have been written at that particular period when there was an impression made upon my mind, there having been a very great press made upon us, upon the charge that we were not sufficiently endeavouring to give to the clergy the influence that they ought to have in the education of the poor; but if this was said to General Bourke, it certainly must have been a sentiment that would have been totally confined to a school established by a member of the church of England. I was speaking to Mr. Latouche upon the subject since I was last examined here, and I was reminding him that we had, in one case, objected to putting the control of the school in the hands of a layman, that layman not being a Roman Catholic or a Dissenter, or a Presbyterian, but of the church of England. We thought it a safer plan to incline to putting the control of the school in the hands of the clergy; but I reminded him that a year or two afterwards, we had reconsidered that principle, and given to the very same gentleman the money for the very same school upon the terms proposed; that was Mr. Price.

When was this fund established?—In 1819 or 1820.

The letter to General Bourke was written so late as in June 1822?—We are decidedly not now, and have not been for a length of time, if we ever were, acting upon that principle at all; and we should have erased from our leases the printed form that names the minister and churchwardens; but we were afraid of the uncertainty there would have been in the trustees, that would be named by individuals, who would be unknown to us.

Do you think that similar answers to that given to General Bourke have been given in many cases?—I should think not; the fact is, that that letter, I confess, is totally and entirely out of my recollection; I have no copy of the correspondence with General Bourke.

You have no reason to doubt its authenticity?—No; I take it for granted I did write such a letter.

If similar answers had not been given, how would you explain that passage of the letter that runs thus; "the commissioners have, in very few instances indeed, been prevailed upon to depart from the general rule;" the general rule having been previously laid down, as involving the principle, that education should be placed in the hands of the established clergy?—I have said, I do not doubt that we might, at that time, have thought so with respect to those schools. I recollect the case of Mr. Price; we objected to the schools being placed in his hands, and he refused to have the lease made to the minister and churchwardens, although he was a member of the established church; we then felt, that those of the established church should not have the control where they were laymen; but I afterwards wrote a letter to the bishop, who objected to General Bourke's lease, to endeavour to induce him not to persevere in making the objection. I told him that we must make our leases without any conditions in favour of the minister and churchwardens; and that the refusal of bishops to execute would be a very great difficulty. His lordship wrote to me to say, that he was perfectly satisfied that our views of the subject were very honestly intended; but he could not agree with us, and in consequence of his answer, we were obliged to make a grant to Mr. Nugent, of Portaferry, leaving the name of the bishop out, and leaving the lease imperfect. On my last examination, I was asked as to General Bourke being a tenant for life. I have seen Mr. Litton upon the subject, and the fact appears to be this; we thought that he was so, and in the original draft of the lease, there appears this memorandum, "Query, tenant for life;" and General Bourke having never answered that query, we acted upon the idea that he was tenant for life, and the lease was so made out.

You observe that that is not stated in the letter, but that the education should be placed in the hands of the established clergy?—The wording of that letter seems as if it was intended more to guard the fund from being in improper hands; for it says, although there could be no objection to the appointment of the master being placed in his hands, yet that our general confidence in people was not so great, and that that was our first general rule, not so much that we made it a general rule, as that it is the first proposition that stands on the front of our lease; if there is no objection, we conceive it is by far the most judicious plan; with regard to our schools, it is certainly now considered merely a matter of security with respect to the trust of the land.

Do you know whether the bishop did refuse to let General Bourke have the nomination of the master or mistress?—He did; but our grant was made; we granted the money.

Was the money ever claimed till within the last three months?—No; because it was in a late conversation with General Bourke, in Limerick, I found out by accident, that he was not tenant for life. I happened to meet him at Limerick, and explained the matter to him, and asked if he thought the present bishop would sign the lease; he said, "I am not tenant for life;" and that was the very first time I heard of his not being under settlement; we then opened the correspondence with him again.

What is the principle by which you regulate the amount of the grant made?—Latterly we have a good deal formed a system; our early grants were infinitely more arbitrary than they are now; we had no instructions for our guidance whatever. With respect to the quantum of voluntary subscriptions, no rule was ever laid down for us; we have proceeded without instructions, and gradually tried our way; and have latterly come nearly to the determination to require half to be given by private subscriptions.

Do you recollect any correspondence you had with Doctor Kelly, of Tuam, upon the subject of schools?—I recollect I have spoken to him several times upon the subject.

Do you recollect any communication from Doctor Kelly which led you to infer that his parishioners or any of the Roman Catholics under his charge, were not disposed to subscribe voluntarily towards the establishment of a school, or that any fund that would be obtained from them, would be by compulsion or through a strong exercise of authority by him?—No; I think in the conversation with him upon that point, as well as I remember, he was perfectly satisfied with the sentiments I expressed at the time; I think I spoke to him when I found a very great number of applications coming at once from his diocese; he called upon me; I have frequently seen him at my house, and talked to him very freely upon the subject of the schools, and I told him that I thought that our fund would require an immense increase in the event of funds appearing on the part of the Roman Catholics, equal in amount to what we should require, in order to meet those applications; that we should probably call for a list of the subscribers, in order that we might see in what way the fund was raised, and I think I never went further; for it was not our intention to throw difficulties in their way. I remember saying to him that the amount would be so immense, that Parliament must give us 50,000 l. as if you are able to bring forward money to meet us in the way that the Protestants do, our fund would not be able to meet the case; and I said that we should probably examine where their private funds came from; the case, however, did not arise, no case occurred in which we did call for it; it was merely a matter of conversation between ourselves, in which I spoke freely to him. I had various communications with him, and the last words I heard him say were, that he could bear testimony to our impartiality. The commissioners had, to the best of my recollection, talked the matter over, and the other commissioners rather agreed with me in this principle which was first started by me.

It having been stated to the Commissioners by Mr. Latouche in his evidence, that he understood from you, there was an objection to making the grant to Dr. Kelly, owing to the funds provided by him having been obtained, as if through taxation, and not voluntarily, we wish you to state the grounds upon which you found the opinion which Mr. Latouche so collected from you?—I should be obliged to think that Mr. Latouche has rather mistaken the nature of our conversation. I think it arose from a case in the county of Clare, in which the landed proprietor came forward to me to give up the school, because he could not raise 30 l.; and in that neighbourhood the Roman Catholic clergyman of the parish did raise 100 l. and we gave to him 100 l. having refused to the landed proprietor 30 l. When I spoke to the Roman Catholic clergyman, I said to him, this appears singular, but if you were to raise money by contribution from your people, a question would arise, whether we should be able to keep pace with it. He told me he had really collected the money as voluntary subscription, and very much from rich people, whom he had gone to and asked for it. I recollect talking this subject over with Dr. Kelly, but I do not think there was any such case that arose in his diocese, it was put to him as an abstract question; it is very probable I might have said, if many of these cases come forward they will raise five pence, or something upon every man, for otherwise how can they raise this fund from voluntary subscriptions, and we must call for a list of the subscribers; but that case did not afterwards arise.

Did that prevent the grant being made to Dr. Kelly?—No, it was given to him, and his second grant was given to him; we gave also 100 l. in his diocese to the Westport school.

Do I understand you to say, that if a Roman Catholic clergyman wishing to build a school gets a collection from his parishioners, you would consider that a reason for not making the grant?—That is a case I really ought to say I have completely made up my mind upon; but I think it would be a fair principle if we were to call upon him for a list of his subscribers.

With what view?—To know in what way the fund was raised; but then would arise a question, which question we have made no decision upon, that is, how we should act if there was a regular contribution in the country from all the poor, to raise funds for this sort of purpose; the Lord Lieutenant's fund would be a drop in the ocean; it would not last for an instant.

If there was a contribution from the poor in each parish, so that in each parish a fund should be established for the erection of a school, do you think in that case, the Lord Lieutenant's fund could not give considerable aid?—Judging from the applications that have come from Tuam, I should think there would in such a case be a demand upon such a scale, that the fund would be wholly inadequate; however the principle has never been decided, and I should really request to be allowed to take some time to consider of it.

Has it been your practice to enquire in what way the voluntary contributions have been raised?—Yes, and where they have brought forward people, who have been willing to give a certain sum in labour, we have acceded; but we have required the party applying for the grant to guarantee the whole sum.

Suppose a statement is made by a person applying for aid, that he had in hand 100 l. should you feel yourself called upon to ask him how he came by that 100 l.?—Yes, at least if I thought it would be a common thing; if it was an insulated case, we might not, but I think we ought to know it.

Does not it appear to you, that such a principle goes very nearly indeed to exclude Roman Catholics altogether from aid from your fund, regard being had to the cases of individual Roman Catholics and individual Protestants?—I would beg leave to say, that that is a subject that I should think would require a good deal of consideration, and I should go to the inquiry with a perfect determination not to adopt any principle that was not precisely as liberal to one denomination as another; but what would be the result I cannot say.

Major Woodward,

Would not the effect of that system be to give to the rich and withhold from the poor?—I think that must be the result of the management of any fund constituted as our's is, viz. in aid of voluntary subscriptions; this very objection has been made by a Protestant clergyman, to whom a grant was refused, in consequence of his inability to raise a subscription; he pleaded the point contained in the question, to which we replied, "We cannot help you;" then he replied, "you do not give me aid because we are poor;" that we could not help, as we can only recommend a grant where a sum of money has been already raised, the direct object of the grant, being not only to aid the poor, but to elicit private aid to them.

The question does not imply, that you are to give money where there has been no subscription; but if you give money only when there is a considerable sum subscribed in large sums, and refuse it where a sum is raised by a variety of small contributions; whether that does not confine the benefit to the rich and exclude it from the poor, who can only contribute in small sums individually?—We should never object to small sums accumulating that were voluntarily subscribed to the school; the only question I propose, and which was merely discussed was, whether these were private contributions to this school, or taken out of any fund raised by a general levy upon the people; but that subject is one that at all events has never gone beyond a thought; for whether that might or might not be our course, if the case were to arise, I cannot take upon me to say.

Examination of James Digges La Touche, Esquire, on Oath;
Tuesday, 14th December 1824.

Examination of
J. D. Latouche,
Esq.
14 Dec. 1824.

ARE you one of the commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—Yes, I am.

Have you attended regularly to the business that has come before the commissioners?—Yes; I think I have been present at most of the meetings, except when I have been out of town; the documents have passed through my hands and been signed by me.

Have you regularly meetings from time to time?—I do not think they are regular; it depends upon the number of applications from the country.

How often is there occasion for meetings?—In summer more frequently than winter, that being the best time for building; we have not had a meeting for some time; Major Woodward's avocations take him out of town.

Are the rules under which you distribute the money, of your own making?—We have no rules, Parliament did not give the Lord Lieutenant any; the course, as far as we considered it, was, that it should be in aid of the exertions and contributions of others, therefore we considered that the only rule was, that a contribution on the spot should be generally required; we had no power to bind the Lord Lieutenant; we are completely unnoticed in any thing of the Parliamentary grant; we are merely a kind of council, to whom the Lord Lieutenant has reference to look through the documents, and give our opinion upon them.

Do you not, in point of fact, report upon the cases brought to you?—Yes.

Has any case arisen in which you have recommended a grant, where the grant has not been made?—No.

Or a case in which you have recommended a grant not to be made, and where it has been made?—No; but there have been two cases where grants have been made independently of us, one of them was at the commencement of the fund, and the other was at the solicitation of a very amiable man, who is since dead, there are only two instances; I think one was a fund for printing some books in Irish, and the other was a grant to the Education Society in the county of Wicklow.

Are there any rules that are understood between yourselves, which decide in each case whether you shall recommend a grant to be made or withheld?—I think every case stands upon its own merits; I do not think there are any rules, except that one rule which we considered warranted by the terms of the grant by Parliament, which was that of requiring contributions from the persons who apply for aid; to some schools we give more willingly than to others.

Have you any reference to the mode of instruction to be pursued in the schools?—No; there has been no stipulation whatever upon that ground; it is generally the character of the persons applying for aid, and the probability of the school being continued.

Do you think yourselves at liberty to grant to persons of all religious persuasions, without distinction?—We have recommended grants to persons of all religious persuasions.

Is it at all an object with you to prefer schools in which a system of education is pursued, that may be open to all classes generally, or do you prefer a system in which the different classes are educated separately?—It has not come before us in the way of preferring one system to another, or of digesting the system, but every case has stood upon its own foundation. We may have felt more pleasure in our minds in granting to one system than to another, but every person adopts his own system and brings it before the commissioners, and there is very little passes upon the subject of the system of instruction between the commissioners, as they are called, and the persons making applications.

Are there any rules or regulations that guide your discretion, that tend to make it more probable that schools shall be erected more in connection with the Protestant church than the the Roman Catholic?—The rule of requiring contributions has operated, I conceive, to do so very frequently; the most numerous contributions upon the subject of education generally, as far as have come before us, have come from members of the Protestant church, and in that way they have called for and obtained greater assistance; the applications from the Roman Catholic clergy have been attended to wherever they came within that rule; but in some cases they came forward supported by something like a taxation, which the commissioners thought was not in the light of voluntary contribution; they therefore expressed their disapprobation of it.

Will you explain what the character of the taxation was?—As far as we understood it, it was that persons attending the place of worship should be required to pay money at different times, a kind of contribution which was not voluntary, it was insisted upon.

By whom?—I suppose by the Roman Catholic clergy.

How did that fact appear?—I do not know that I could produce evidence of it, but the fact is, it was reported to me; I was not in negotiation upon the point, it was through Major Woodward I learnt it; the fact had been mentioned by him to a person of eminence in the Roman Catholic church, and seemed to be admitted.

Can you state the particular cases in which that has occurred?—I rather think the cases which were subject to the remark, were a number of persons that applied from the diocese of Tuam, and I understood from Major Woodward that he had had a long interview with, I believe, Dr. Kelly, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam, and that he had perfectly satisfied his mind, that it was all right and all fair, that they should not be considered as voluntary contributioners.

Do you in all cases require there should be a permanent support to the school?—No; we have not required any satisfaction upon that point, because we considered, if a gentleman or clergyman laid out a certain sum of money upon a school-house, he was in earnest about carrying it on.

Can you say, in those instances of the system of taxation, whether it was for the purpose of building a school or providing a salary for the master?—In those cases, I conclude it was for the purpose of building the school; they were taken credit for as contributions in aid of the building the school.

Did they say that they would, by what is called taxation, obtain a sum, or did they say they had already received a sum?—I do not think I could absolutely answer that from memory.

Would you consider it the duty of the commissioners to ascertain by what ways and by what means persons had been induced to subscribe a fund already in hand?—I should consider it was the duty of the commissioners to ascertain the mode in which that fund had been raised.

Do you conceive, if it were proposed by a Roman Catholic clergyman that the parishioners should subscribe from week to week towards a fund for the establishment of a school, and that a certain sum of money having thus been raised was in his hands, would this be an objection to his receiving any money from the commissioners?—Not if it was a voluntary contribution.

What do you conceive to mark the character of a contribution, so that it should be deemed involuntary?—I should consider if a clergyman gave out notice at his place of worship, that there was a fund to be raised for a specific purpose, and if he applied to them individually, using no more than his own influence, I should not consider that compulsion; I should consider it voluntary if the person was without any displeasure or any restraint, or the relinquishing of any privileges to say, “there is the money for you.”

Did you understand from Major Woodward, that in the cases upon which he communicated with Archbishop Kelly, that it was admitted by him that he had not obtained funds in the way you approve of, but by compulsion?—What I understood was this, that he had mentioned to Doctor Kelly what the commissioners conceived voluntary contributions ought to be, and that Doctor Kelly seemed to admit that the contributions in the cases under consideration, were not of that description, and that it was perfectly fair for the commissioners to limit the grants to the sort of cases which Major Woodward described.

Then we are to understand, that according to the representation made by Major Woodward, you consider that those contributions had not been obtained voluntarily, but from some undue exercise of authority by the Roman Catholic clergy?—I would object to the word “undue,” because it expresses a judgment upon the point; but I understood it was by an exercise of authority; the communication with me was very much in the way of a conversation; therefore, perhaps, did not make so distinct an impression upon my mind.

Are you in the habit of requiring that the subscriptions shall be actually paid before you make the grant?—This would satisfy us, if any respectable person would engage that such a building should be erected, of such an estimate and perfected, we would make a grant to him; but in all cases, except undoubted cases, we do not pay the money until the work is very nearly finished, if not entirely. I believe that the fact has been, that more money has generally been expended than has been estimated.

Is it not usual to make collections at the doors of the Roman Catholic chapels on every Sunday?—I think their collections are made, if I am not mistaken, at going into the Roman Catholic chapels.

Have you reason to suppose that the money that was proposed to be given, was gathered in that way?—It did not come in such a specific way before us, as to enable us to know what the mode was, but it did not appear to be a voluntary subscription.

Examination of
J. D. La Touche,
Esq.
14 Dec. 1824.

Do you hold it necessary it should be a voluntary contribution for a specific object, or would it be sufficient if it was an application of a part of a sum subscribed generally for charitable objects?—I think that the grant seemed to allude to voluntary contributions raised upon the spot for that object, and that the government would provide a certain sum in addition; that seemed to be the intention of Parliament in giving the grant, and there is wisdom in it as far as I can see, because not only by the sum given by the Parliament, double the money has been expended in furtherance of education, but also local contributions are a guarantee to Parliament that the people about it are in earnest.

Do you in general enquire of the persons who make an application for aid from your fund, and who state they have also money in hand towards the erecting of a school, how they came by that money?—The printed list of queries asks that question, if I remember right; I have not one of them about me; I think the words of the question put are, what the amount of the contributions is, and whence they proceed; supposing the amount were stated in answer in one sum, without stating whence it proceeded, I think the commissioners, if they had any reason to doubt, would be justified in asking whence it did proceed, and for this reason, because they would be carrying into effect what we considered to be the object of the legislature in making a grant to assist voluntary contributions.

Suppose the answer was, that it was obtained by subscription, would you deem it your duty to enquire whether it was purely voluntary, or otherwise?—To ask for a list of the subscribers, and if there was any reason which would lead us to desire it, to ask who are the subscribers; I think we have done so, but I am not sure.

When you got the list of subscribers, have you enquired how the subscriptions were obtained, or how they were induced to subscribe?—It does not appear to me, that cases of so much difficulty have arisen; the cases I have mentioned, seem to me to be the only cases in which the difficulty has occurred.

Has there ever been any understanding among the commissioners, that the fund should be so administered as that education should be placed in the hands of the established clergy?—Most assuredly not, as far as I conceive no such thing exists; as an individual, I do not know any superintendence under which I would so much desire to see it placed, but there has been no understanding, as far as I know, between the commissioners on the subject. I think there would be no harm in answering the question a little more fully; the only feature that would give rise to such a supposition, is the printed form of lease they require, as to a grant of land which was made out, and is made out in print to the minister and churchwardens of the parish; and the view the commissioners had in that was, providing a perpetual body in the parish who should be trustees, whereas trustees who are only individuals may die, and the minister and churchwardens were always there to carry it into effect. I think it may be no harm for me to state, that the negotiations with the individuals, and the correspondence has been carried on almost exclusively with Major Woodward, and, therefore, I have never come in collision with the individuals upon the subject.

Are you aware that churchwardens do not constitute a corporation?—I am not aware of that.

Are you aware, that for the purpose of keeping the property so conveyed to churchwardens in churchwardens, you must have a conveyance from year to year?—We are not in the least aware of that, but what peculiarly made the minister and churchwardens upon our mind was, the Act of Parliament, which gives power to tenants for life to make conveyances of a certain quantity of ground, glebe land, and so on, for school-houses, to the minister and churchwardens, with the approbation of the diocesan.

Are the leases invariably drawn out to the minister and churchwardens?—There is a printed form in that way, but whenever there is a reasonable objection made, it is altered, and the parties choose their own trustees.

Have such instances been frequent of objections?—There have been instances.

Have they been many?—I think not; there have been objections made on behalf of estated gentlemen who wished to have the school-house in their own hands; it was not attempted with respect to any Roman Catholic schools.

When the lease is made out to individuals, is it understood that they have the schools in their own hands?—Yes, I should consider the minister and churchwardens were only concerned to guard against the alienation of the school-house, at least in the instances which I have known, the school has been vested in the hands of governors, to hold it under a lease to the minister and churchwardens, they considering themselves merely trustees to prevent it being alienated.

Had this rule been adopted with any view to put the management of the schools in the hands of the established church?—I consider not.

[The following Letter was handed to the witness.]

“ Major Woodward presents his compliments to General Bourke, although in the instance of the school under his patronage, the commissioners of the fund could feel no uneasiness at the appointment of the master being placed in his hands, the general principle upon which the fund is worked is, that education shall be placed in the hands of the established clergy; and the commissioners have, in very few instances indeed, been prevailed upon to depart from the general rule; should General Bourke, upon re-consideration of the subject, not wish rather to surrender his own right of nomination of the master (which virtually would, in all probability, be left to him), than to leave the choice of the master to his heirs, in preference to the established clergy, it would, at all events, be necessary to obtain the bishop's consent; the bishop of the diocese must be a party in the lease, and some bishops refuse to sign the lease, unless the nomination of the master should be placed within the controul of the minister of the the parish; if General Bourke wishes to press this point, and obtains the consent of the bishop, the commissioners will make no objection, stating in their public report, that the arrangement had the sanction of the bishop."

Will you have the goodness to read it?—Upon reading this letter, I confess myself, I should not have sanctioned that letter being sent; the letter appears to me to be a private letter from Major Woodward, and one that did not really come under the direction of the Commissioners, and therefore I could not be accountable for it; at the same time, there may be some circumstances connected with that case, which might qualify the language used respecting it. I remember the case, perfectly—General Bourke was a tenant for life, or the commissioners at least were under that impression.

You observe, it is stated in this letter, "that the general principle upon which the fund is worked, is, that education should be placed in the hands of the established clergy, and that the Commissioners had in very few instances indeed, been prevailed upon to depart from that general rule;" is there any such general principle or rule as is stated in the passage I have now read?—According to the purport of those words, I conceive not; the impression upon my mind, upon reading that letter, and in endeavouring to reconcile it with the general principles is, that where he says the education shall be placed in the hands of the established church, that he means by that, that the ground should be conveyed to the minister and the churchwardens. I should suppose that was the only thing that could give countenance to it. I know instances in which the commissioners have given grants to parties independent of the established church altogether.

You observe, that the circumstance of having given in some cases, appears in that letter, but it would appear to have been done reluctantly?—Yes; I cannot understand the wording of that letter.

Do you conceive that the commissioners have full power to grant or to refuse?—We only recommend to the Lord Lieutenant.

And he has always acted upon it?—Yes.

In a case where the Association for discountenancing Vice, has made a previous grant to the party applicant, do you give to that party credit for that amount so given under the character of voluntary contribution?—No; we consider a grant from the Association and the Kildare-place Society, as a grant from government, and therefore not voluntary subscriptions, of course.

Do you, in point of fact, inquire whether the persons applying to you have previously obtained aid from either of those sources?—We call upon them to state the funds from which they propose to build the school-house, and whence it originates.

If it appeared to you they had received such assistance, would it operate to increase or diminish the amount of the grant?—To diminish it, certainly; and in many cases to decline it altogether.

Have you given your aid to many London Hibernian schools?—We are not aware, exactly, what society they may connect their school with afterwards; I suppose we have. I suppose some of our schools are in connection with all the societies.

You keep up no manner of communication with the school after it has been built?—No; only to see that the money is laid out.

Are you aware of having assisted any school that was in connection with Erasmus Smith's fund?—No.

Do you make any provision for the repairs of the school-house?—No; we have always refused giving aid for repairs; our fund in that case would never hold out; our fund removes the difficulty in the commencement, and when the machine is in motion, we hope it will keep itself in motion.

COPY of a Letter from John Litton, Esquire, to the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated N° 20, Leeson-street, Dublin, August 25th, 1824.

Sir,

IN reference to your letter of the 19th July, I am directed by the commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's School Fund, to forward to you, for the information of the Commissioners appointed by His Majesty to inquire into the state of Education in Ireland, a copy of their report to Parliament, made by order of the House of Commons, during the last session, and continued to the present date.

The Commissioners will perceive by the introduction to the report, that on the principle upon which the Parliamentary grant is made, and according to the regulations under which the powers vested in the Lord Lieutenant are exercised, the connection between the managers of the fund and the schools to which aid is given, necessarily ceases as soon as the grant is in each case accounted for, and the conveyance of the ground and school-house executed and registered, the management of the schools and mode of education being left entirely to the persons who have principally established them by their own voluntary subscriptions.

Under these circumstances, it becomes wholly impossible that the commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's School Fund can be prepared to furnish the information required, which will however be obtained by the Commissioners of Inquiry from the returns of the ministers of the several parishes of the Association for discountenancing Vice, and of the Society for the Education of the Poor in Ireland, as a great proportion of the schools established under the Lord Lieutenant's fund, have since either become parochial schools, or been placed in connection with those societies.

The Commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's fund, direct me to add, that the only means

COPY of a Letter from Major General Bourke to the Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, dated Thornfield, Limerick, December 12th, 1824.

Sir,

Copy of Letter from Major Gen. Bourke, to Secretary of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry.

I HAVE to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date. The circumstances to which the Commissioners allude are these: in the year 1822, I applied for assistance to build a school house from the Lord Lieutenant's fund, and received a favourable answer from Mr. Secretary Gregory, in a letter of which the inclosed is a copy (A.) I proceeded to build the house, and in the month of June of 1822, the draft of a lease of the site was sent for my approval, by the commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's Fund, containing a clause, by which the nomination of the master and mistress of the school was given to the minister of the parish. To this clause I objected, upon the grounds, that being the patron of the school, giving my land to build it on, a subscription double that of any other person, and having placed the building within two hundred yards of my house, for the purpose of enabling my family at all times to superintend the conduct of the master and mistress and pupils, it would be exceedingly unpleasant to Mrs. Bourke and me, and prejudicial to the success of the school, to have a master and mistress put in, of whom perhaps we might not approve, and who being independent of us, would probably care but little for our superintendence. Having stated these objections to the Commissioners, I received a letter in reply, of which the inclosed is a copy (B.)

Agreeably to the suggestion contained in this letter, I communicated with Doctor Mant, then Bishop of Killaloe, and after some correspondence, his lordship refused to allow me the nomination of the master or mistress; I declined in consequence to receive the grant.

I think it right to observe, that shortly after commissioners Grant and Blake had been here, and inspected the school, I received a letter from the commissioners of the Lord Lieutenant's Fund, reminding me of the grant of 50*l.* formerly made to me, and stating, that if I chose now to receive it, the conditions to which I had objected would not be required; I had, however, received assistance from the Education Society, and finished the house, and therefore declined the offer.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

To Robert Pauncefote, Esq. &c. &c.

(signed) Richard Bourke.

Inclosure (A.)

Sir,

Dublin Castle, 29th May 1822.

THE Lord Lieutenant having taken into consideration your application for assistance from the grant of Parliament, to enable you to build a school house in the parish of Killinagariff, I am to acquaint you, that on condition of your giving a grant of land, and the house being built on the plan approved, and estimate of 99*l.* 13*s.* his Excellency will direct an issue of 50*l.* to be made to you towards the expense.

I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

Major General Bourke,
Thornfield, Limerick.

(signed) W. Gregory.

A true copy,
Richard Bourke.

Inclosure (B.)

Major Woodward presents his compliments to General Bourke. Although in the instance of a school under his patronage, the commissioners of the fund could feel no uneasiness at the appointment of a master being placed in his hands, the general principle upon which the fund is worked, is that education should be placed in the hands of the established clergy, and the commissioners have, in very few instances indeed, been prevailed upon to depart from the general rule. Should General Bourke, upon re-consideration of the subject, not wish rather to surrender his own right of nomination of the master (which virtually would in all probability be left to him) than to leave the choice of a master to his heirs, in preference to the established clergy, it would, at all events, be necessary to obtain the bishop's consent. The bishop of the diocese must be a party in the lease, and some bishops refused to sign the lease, unless the nomination of the master should be placed within the control of the minister of the parish.

If General Bourke wishes to press this point, and obtains the consent of the bishop, the commissioners will make no objection, stating in their public report, that the arrangement had the sanction of the bishop.

41, Leeson-street, June 17th.

A true copy,

Richard Bourke.

Sunday School Society for Ireland.

Appendix, N° 239.

Examination of James Digges La Touche, Esq. on oath; Tuesday, 14th December 1824.

ARE you secretary to the Sunday School Society?—Yes.

How long have you held that situation?—Since the establishment of the Society, in the year 1809.

Are your services gratuitous?—They are.

How many members does the Society consist of?—I can hardly answer that question; it could readily be made out from the reports; subscribers of a certain amount are members of the Society.

What is the amount necessary?—Annual subscribers of a guinea and upwards are members for that year, or subscribers of 10*l.* at one time are members for life; a clergyman subscribing half-a-guinea annually, or transmitting congregational collections to the amount of ten guineas annually, and also persons collecting one shilling a week, or five shillings a quarter, are members as long as their contributions are continued.

By whom are the affairs of the Society conducted?—By a committee of 17 persons, resident in Dublin; the secretary, treasurers, president and guardians are ex-officio members of the committee.

Is the committee elected annually?—Yes; by an annual meeting of the members.

Is a subscriber of one guinea a year qualified to be a committee man?—Yes, any member of the Society.

How often does the committee meet?—Every Wednesday.

What is the total amount of the general annual subscriptions?—The annual subscriptions, as detailed in the cash account for the year ending 30th March last, are 432*l.*; the total receipt was something upwards of 2,000*l.* last year.

From what source does the Society derive the fund that makes the total receipt 2,000*l.*?—Donations, subscriptions, collections, partly in England and Scotland, and one sum from Jamaica.

Has the Society any funded property?—None at present.

No permanent resources?—None whatever.

Has the Society ever obtained any grant from Parliament?—No.

Has it ever petitioned for it?—No; there was reason given to believe at one time it might have been obtained, but we declined it.

Do you know for what reason?—Principally for two reasons: in the first instance we thought a grant of the public money would tend to excite expectations in the country on the behalf of the poorer class of our gratuitous teachers who attended, which would defeat the gratuitous nature of their services; and secondly, we thought it better to be dependent upon the kindly feeling of the public, for we had observed, that private subscriptions fall off in proportion as public money is granted; a society loses its friends, and our Society is particularly dependent for success upon the zeal and perseverance of its friends.

To what purposes are the annual subscriptions applied?—The principal expenses of the Society, with respect to its schools, are the books that they print or purchase for distribution; we have also to defray the expense of keeping up an office to conduct the correspondence and the other affairs of the Society.

Does it contribute any thing towards the maintenance of schools, except books?—One of the peculiar features of the Sunday School Society is, that they never give grants of money; they did at first make small grants of money, but since the first two years, I believe, they have discontinued doing so, limiting their aid entirely to donations of books.

Do the schools of the Society obtain aid from any other society?—I suppose they are on the list of other societies, but it is not every society that adopts the system of Sunday school instruction; the Kildare-place Society, for instance, have not any Sunday schools upon their list, nor do they undertake the management or assistance of Sunday schools as such; the Hibernian Society have about 100 upon their list, and I have reason to know that some of them have received assistance from our Society, and in this way have been aided by both societies.

Can you say which of them?—No, I could not, but I could state the quarter of Ireland where they chiefly are, videlicet, the counties of Fermanagh and Donegal, and part of Tyrone.

Do you know of any other society with which any Sunday schools are in connection?—No, unless the Baptist Society may have some under its care.

Has the Association for discountenancing Vice any Sunday schools?—The children that attend their day schools frequently attend also the Sunday schools on the list of our Society, and those Sunday schools are sometimes held in the school houses in which their daily schools are taught, so that the children attending their schools are in these cases included in the numbers stated on our list; but I do not think that the Association have ever aided or encouraged Sunday schools as such.

Do you know in what buildings the schools of the Society are most generally held?—Often in the day school houses, and in houses built specially for the accommodation of Sunday schools by local subscriptions, often in churches and places of worship; they are also held in private dwelling-houses, and in that way they are sometimes scattered over the town or townland; each teacher takes a class to his own house; one of the greatest difficulties culties in the way of Sunday schools has been the want of accommodation; they are very often conducted by the poor, who experience much inconvenience to find accommodation for the children; I recollect one instance, where the only place they could get was a cow-house, and which the teachers regularly cleaned out on Saturday night, to get it ready for the morning.

Are the schools invariably supported by local and private funds?—I suppose any expenses that attend them are defrayed by local subscriptions; we have endeavoured sometimes to make out what the expenditure is, but in the answers to our questions we have so often found, “we have no income and no expenditure,” that it is really astonishing how great a work is carried on without pecuniary means; I think that one of those causes that have contributed so materially to increase the number of Sunday schools, is the facility of conducting them; the teachers are gratuitous; they make out a place, sometimes a barn, sometimes in the open air, in the summer; and then they get books from the Society, and all the expenses are provided for without any money.

In most instances are the teachers gratuitous?—I should consider so; there are some teachers in some very difficult parts of the country who are paid by the neighbouring gentry; there was a case occurred that came before me yesterday, in the barony of Innishowen, in the north, in which they were obliged to pay the teachers in almost every school.

What conditions do the Society require to be complied with, where they grant assistance?—Simply that there is a school, and people willing to teach; we do not make a grant before the school is established and the children collected, but as soon as we get a fair certificate, that a number of children have been collected and are attended by a certain number of teachers we give them books.

What books?—A spelling book in two parts, which the Society has published, and copies of the New Testament; we do not give the Bible gratuitously, we sell it at reduced prices.

Is the spelling book you distribute one previously arranged, or one put together for the Society?—It was put together for the Society.

Does it contain extracts from the Scriptures?—The reading lessons are entirely from the Scriptures; the two parts of our spelling books come cheap; there is no space lost in them either by blank leaves or by extraneous matter; the other spelling books in common use, viz. the Universal, and those of that class, contain a great deal of matter which we would not wish to communicate on the Sunday.

Do you distribute your books gratuitously, or do you in any cases sell them?—We do both; we give them gratuitously when they are applied for; we make but one grant in a year, and if the conductors of the school want books again in the course of the year they are allowed to purchase them at reduced prices, but there are several schools that apply for liberty to purchase only at reduced prices in order to save the funds of the Society; I think it is one of the features of Sunday schools, that those who apply for aid seem very anxious to save the funds of the Society; I have seen instances in which they have put themselves to much inconvenience to avoid trespassing on our funds.

Is it the authorized version of the Testament you distribute?—Yes.

Without note and comment?—Yes.

Do you distribute Prayer books?—No, we do not.

Do you distribute catechisms?—No, we do not.

You do not forbid the use of catechisms?—No, we do not forbid any books; we only require there should be a number of children collected together, and we then grant our books; they may adopt what system of instruction they please, and exclude or introduce what books they please, we do not ask the question what books they teach in the school; our rule being, that “this Society shall not assume to itself any controul over the internal regulations of the schools in connection with it, nor use any other interference in their concerns, than that of kind admonition and advice.”

Has that brought you in connection with Sunday schools of all persuasions of Christians?—Yes, it has; but very partially with the Roman Catholic Sunday schools.

Is that because the aid you grant is not in the form in which they would wish to have it?—Yes, I believe so; the Roman Catholic Sunday schools are generally merely collections of children for the purpose of catechising, and of course they do not in those cases seek for spelling books for that purpose, and they would not in those cases receive the Testament; but it is right to state, that there are some Sunday schools upon our list which are Roman Catholic Sunday schools, in which they have received our spelling books, but they did not receive our Testaments; there are also Roman Catholic Sunday schools in which the Scriptures are read, and I was reading yesterday a report from one of the northern parishes in which the clergyman states, that he had found the Testaments that had been sent by the Sunday School Society to schools in that neighbourhood, in the hands of Roman Catholic children, in the Roman Catholic Sunday schools which had been opened in order to draw the children from the other Sunday schools in that parish; and there was another instance that occurred to me in another northern parish, in which the clergyman stated he had visited a Roman Catholic Sunday school, and that he found a number of children reading the Testament, and a great number more that would be exceedingly glad to get them if they could be given to them, but those Sunday schools are not in our list; there is another Sunday school where the Douay Testament is used, the Roman Catholics have distributed there a great number of the Douay Testaments this year; it is held in the chapel under the direction of the priest; there was a curious circumstance also mentioned in one of our letters from our correspondents, which stated the opposition of a priest to a school; the people people as is generally the case, were all displeased, discontented and unhappy at having their children taken away from the school and without any apparent reason; the priest turned round and became friendly; the only way we could account for the change was the remonstrances of his flock.

Do you mean that the Sunday schools in the north of Ireland, are numerous attended by the Roman Catholics?—There is no question in any of our forms which brings a direct answer on that subject; but I have not a doubt but a very considerable number of Roman Catholics have attended, and do now attend the Sunday schools, at least, that is my impression; I have no evidence of it, but there is one thing which would prove it, which is this, that in the last year, there were very general complaints of a number of Roman Catholic children having been withdrawn, which proves that a very considerable number had in former years attended, but they also state that a good number still attend; it is by no means universal, though it is perhaps general, that there should be an opposition. I remember lately, an instance in which a Roman Catholic curate opposed the school, and he was counteracted completely by his rector.

Is not the instruction in the Sunday schools always of a religious character?—It ought to be so, certainly.

Is not the Testament always explained?—It is, almost universally.

Is there any objection to the Church catechism being taught?—Not the least, to any book that the conductor chooses.

Did you ever happen to hear whether the Roman Catholic catechism was taught in any of the Sunday schools?—I rather should think it was not taught in the Protestant Sunday schools; but in those we have assisted among the Roman Catholics, I should suppose it was.

Can you form any opinion, when you state that the Scriptures are explained, whether the nature of the explanation is controversial upon the points in difference between Christians?—It would be very hard to say; but I should judge not, from the effect which the instruction produces on the children; from the attachment of the children to the school, and to their teachers; for really controversy has very few charms for the young and feeling mind. I should therefore consider, that the instruction given in the schools, was such as called forth affection, and I do not think controversy is that which would cause it.

Referring to your last report, the Commissioners see that you state that in some districts failures have occurred, will you be so good as to state what failures you allude to?—If you cast your eyes over the list of schools you will see a number of schools whose names have no scholars attached to them, and which are in italics, those are failed schools, they have sunk from various causes.

Enumerate some of the causes?—Lukewarmness, people getting tired of their work, the death or removal of persons who took the greatest interest in them, their being deprived of the place in which the school was conducted, the merging of one school into another, and sometimes the opposition of the Roman Catholic priesthood to the schools; the Sunday schools are so variably circumstanced, it would be very hard to classify them.

In those cases are the books contributed by the Society lost?—They do good, some way or other, as it was in the instance I quoted; they find their way into the Roman Catholic schools.

Are the schools of the Society principally in the province of Ulster?—They are principally in that province, as the following statement will show.

Have you many in Connaught and Munster?—Not a great number; but still I believe there are more than are upon our lists; we have not a considerable number on them, but they are an increasing number.

Are your schools generally increasing?—I think they are, decidedly.

From what part of the country are the applications principally received for the establishment of schools?—From the north of Ireland.

Is the increase still in the north of Ireland?—Yes; but they are increasing in other parts also; in Munster, for instance.

Can you state the total number of schools at present in existence, that have received aid from the Society?—Not exactly; I could state it up to the date of the 28th of February, of the present year.

Have the goodness to do so?—1,640 schools that have received assistance, and then supposed to be in existence.

Do you know how many have been since added?—I think, about 150 schools; perhaps more.

Be so good as to describe what has been the proceeding of the Society, from the commencement; what number of schools have been assisted in each year?—In the first year (1810) of the Society's existence, there were but two schools, and 87 scholars; in the year 1811, there had been 44 assisted, and 5,172 scholars; in the year 1813, up to April, 117 schools, 15,800 scholars; up to April 1814, 175 schools, 23,529 scholars; to April 1815, 252 schools, and 28,598 scholars; up to April 1816, 335 schools, and 37,590 scholars; up to April 1817, 418 schools, 49,981 scholars; up to April 1818, 532 schools, and 57,819 scholars; up to April 1819, 762 schools, and 81,114 scholars; up to April 1820, 1,021 schools, and 108,774 scholars; up to April 1821, 1,247 schools, and 127,897 scholars; up to April 1822, 1,395 schools, and 144,848 scholars; up to April 1823, 1,519 schools and 149,782 scholars; up to 1824, 1,640 schools, 157,184 scholars.

The following extract from our last Report, will probably give the most satisfactory information:

" By which it appears, that since 1809, the year in which your Society commenced its " operations, 1,915 schools have been established. It must, however, be remarked, that " this number includes those schools which, since their establishment, have either been dis" continued, or merged into other schools."

Do you find that the arrangement of the schools naturally adapts itself to the parochial division?—We have taken the parochial division, as being the most convenient; it gave us a clearer idea than any other.

Do you find that persons in the country who are anxious for supplying schools, are satisfied with having one school in a parish, or do they seek for more than that?—They require many schools in a parish.

Does that answer apply to populous parishes near populous towns, or country parishes?—In country parishes they actually require more than a town does; they require a number of schools; the best system of Sunday school instruction is where it is spread over the parish, and where the teachers and children live near each other, because it should not be supposed that the instruction of the Sunday school is merely that which takes place on the Sunday; the teacher forms a parental affection for his pupil, and the pupil a filial feeling towards his teacher, and that is carried on during the week; and if a child is seen doing any thing wrong in the week day, the teacher considers he has a right to find fault with him, and keeps his eye upon him; then again the teacher, as it has been represented to me, becomes more circumspect in his conduct, he knows he is under the eye of his pupils, and he would be ashamed to be seen doing a thing on a week day, that he told the children not to do on the Sunday; then again the lessons for the next Sunday are to be prepared during the week—they are generally portions of Scripture to be committed to memory, that brings necessarily not only the Scriptures before the child's mind, giving him something to think of, but it brings it before the members of his family, as he frequently puts the book into the hands of his family to hear him his lessons, so that the Holy Scriptures are brought more closely in contact with the poor, by the Sunday schools.

Can you tell accurately the average attendance at each school?—From ninety to a hundred; there are some very large schools in the north of Ireland.

Have you reason to believe that, in the province of Ulster, the Sunday schools have reached their ultimatum?—No, by no means; I look upon it there is no very large part of Ireland in which it has reached its ultimate point; I might point out, perhaps, a parish or two in which the present wants of the parish were supplied, but I would not wish to convey an impression to the country, or to any individual, that there was any part of Ireland supplied with Sunday schools; I think that is very clearly proved by a map of the county of Antrim, published by the Society, which I believe some of the commissioners have had, in which all the positions of the several schools in connection with the Society are noted down; it is palpable there is a great deficiency of Sunday schools in the county of Antrim, but upon our list the number of Sunday scholars bears to the population the large proportion of one to thirteen.

Have you the means of knowing what proportion of the children in the county of Antrim, between eight years old and eighteen, are in the habit of attending the schools?—No, I have not; but the proportion is very large, the proportion to the whole population is as one to thirteen; I do not know what the general average of the population is of that age; they attend very long, frequently for several years, at Sunday schools; I think that is one other pleasant feature in Sunday schools, grown up young women and young men, instead of idling on the Sunday, or what is commonly called amusing themselves, attend the Sunday schools, for the sole purposes of religious instruction, as they could probably already read and write well; and there have been instances of servants in the north of Ireland making a condition on being hired, that they should have part of the Sunday to themselves, in order that they might attend the schools.

If the whole population of Ireland were supplied with Sunday schools in as great a proportion as Armagh, would you say what addition that could make to the number of schools assisted assisted by the Society?—Upon calculating that, in reference to the population returns of Ireland, taking the proportion of the population of the county of Armagh that are in Sunday schools at one-eleventh of the whole, and supposing 90 to each Sunday school, the result would be, that it would require 7,070 Sunday schools to educate the population of Ireland to the same extent that they are educated in Armagh.

Do you entertain any hope in a short space of time of increasing your number to that extent?—No, not in a short space of time; but I think there is every prospect of the Sunday schools spreading in the south; the higher classes are certainly becoming more and more convinced of the necessity of education, and I hope there is a class springing up there that are becoming more and more capable of becoming Sunday school teachers, and in that way I should hope at least that our posterity will see the Sunday schools as flourishing in the south of Ireland as they now are in the north.

What do you attribute the deficiency in the south of Ireland in Sunday schools; to the indifference and carelessness of the upper ranks to Sunday schools, or to the carelessness and indifference of the lower orders?—The first difficulty that the Sunday school system meets in the south of Ireland is the thinly scattered resident gentry, and those who are resident not always feeling a disposition to engage in the work; the second difficulty is that of the total incapacity from want of scriptural knowledge, and consequent disinclination of the middle class of farmers, who, in other parts of Ireland, appear generally competent and disposed to undertake the office of Sunday school teachers in the north; and lastly, the opposition which such exertion must almost always expect in every southern district from the Roman Catholic priesthood; those are the three great causes which impede Sunday school exertion: I do not attribute any thing to the disinclination of the lower orders, because I am persuaded, from every thing that has come to my knowledge, that if the lower orders were not deterred, that they would gladly embrace Sunday school instruction, indeed instruction of any kind.

Supposing the third of those causes you have enumerated to continue undiminished, but the first and second causes to be materially removed, do you conceive that the result would be a material increase of Sunday schools in the south?—I have not a question about it; I do not myself think, if I may express my opinion, that the opposition of the Roman Catholic priesthood can effectually, for any length of time, prevent the people availing themselves of scriptural instruction in the south of Ireland.

What do you ground that upon?—From the testimony of those who have gone among them to communicate that scriptural instruction, they having, almost in every instance, received it kindly.

Which are more numerous at present, the teachers in the province of Ulster or the pupils in the province of Munster?—The teachers in the province of Ulster are 9,471, and the scholars in the province of Munster are 5,663.

How many may the pupils be, in the province of Connaught?—Five thousand four hundred and fifty-nine; but I think it is right to qualify that, by saying, that the Hibernian Society are at work in the province of Connaught, and their Connaught Sunday schools we have generally nothing to do with; but few of them appear upon our list.

Have you not a considerable number of Sunday schools in the county of Wicklow?—Yes; that ranks the best, after those counties in the north.

How do you account for that?—From the exertions of the better class of Society; and there are a considerable number of Protestants there.

Do you conceive that opposition has been made to them there, to the same extent as in other places?—The opposition in the south always bears a more determined and decided character than elsewhere, because the residence of the gentry will diminish the character of the opposition; the predominance of Protestant influence in the neighbourhood will diminish it also, therefore it varies in intensity in different parts of Ireland.

Do you look to that as the probable result, that the existence of such Sunday schools, as there are in the provinces of Munster and Connaught, will train up a number of persons qualified to extend the system, and at the same time to induce a taste and a wish to introduce it?—It surely must do so; we often find that children who have been educated in Sunday schools, preserve an attachment to those institutions, and become teachers when they leave the school as learners; in that way it may be materially increased.

Do the children of the higher and lower orders assemble together in the Sunday schools?—They are almost exclusively the children of the poor; where, however, the Sunday school system is adopted as an extension of the regular plan of catechising, the children of the higher orders may sometimes attend, in which case it is usually carried on in the church under the direction of the clergyman, and it is part of the exercise that the children of all classes shall come to be catechised. I do not remember any instance that has come before me, or has been reported to me, where the children of the rich attended, except as teachers. I do not think that the opposition of the priests will be permanently successful, from the great reluctance, both of the parents and the children, to leave the schools, and also from the frequent re-actions that have taken place. I remember a friend of mine told me, that the priest never opposed his school, that it did not add ten scholars to it; it cleared the school for a day or two, but it brought a few more back upon the return of the tide, and there have been several schools that have gone through alternations of withdrawing and returning, and so far is this our experience, that the Society always consider themselves authorized in saying to those who lament the withdrawing of their children, "persevere, do not be alarmed, the children will be brought back to it."

Do you find, after a considerable quantity of that alternation, the opposition has a tendency dency to subside?—The impression on my mind is, that it does, or that it assumes another character.

What do you mean by another character?—The establishment of an opposition school, and then the influence of the Protestant Sunday school upon the opposition school is sometimes curious; the opposition Sunday school takes the feature, as is most generally the case, of a school in which merely a catechism of question and answer is taught; that is dry duty enough; it is disagreeable to the children, and the teachers want that affection and that love which characterize generally those in our schools; there is not that communication of mind or affection that there is in the other schools; then the children wander back again to the Protestant school; then there is something else necessary to keep them away, and sometimes they are obliged to introduce the teaching of reading; that is an improvement, and so on, it may be traced, in some cases, to the introduction of the Scriptures, in order to keep the children from the Protestant school.

Could you mention any remarkable instances of the reluctance you have alluded to, of parents to take their children away from Sunday schools?—I could not perhaps mention any remarkable instance of it; but it comes very frequently, indeed I may say almost invariably, before me; the children when they are obliged to give up their books, go with evident reluctance. There was one instance, to my knowledge, in which the two priests of the parish stationed themselves at the two avenues leading to the school, and there they watched the scholars, and used violent measures to keep them away, and did keep numbers of them away; but the children got round some way or another, and got away from them; in that very case, not longer ago than I think three weeks, the children were all locked up in the chapel regularly after service; they got them there to catechise them, and detained them for an hour and a half, to keep them from the school; but the very moment the door was opened, they all went off to the school.

Was that their voluntary act independent of their parents?—Yes; they delight in attending the schools.

Do you think the children or their parents are most anxious for Sunday school education?—The children of the poor of Ireland are treated sometimes with very injudicious indulgence, and sometimes very harshly, and the aspect and the language of disinterested and judicious kindness is very grateful to them. It is quite delightful sometimes to see the very face that used to be turned away from its superior, or to scowl at him under their eyebrows, now looking up with openness and confidence, and shewing by its ready cheerful smile, that it had nothing to be ashamed of, and that it expected to receive a return of that affection which it felt.

Do you not think the increased knowledge they receive attaches them to the schools?—I do, indeed; but there is nothing more delightful than where the amiable and kind affections are called forth; for the benevolent feelings are the most pleasurable feelings. The parents also, very generally say, that the conduct of the children is very greatly improved at home.

Are we to understand that you consider it a peculiar feature in recommendation of the Sunday school system, that it tends to draw the upper and middle ranks into contact with the lower ranks in this country?—I think that is one of the most beneficial features of the system. The Sunday school is a kind of channel, in which all the good feelings and better principles of the upper classes can be conveyed to the lower; it brings them in contact together, and tends considerably to harmonize the different ranks of society.

What do you consider the total actual number of the teachers in Ireland at present?—The report states 12,000, and I should think it is not less than that.

Have you any distinct impression upon your own mind as to the proportion of those teachers that are members of the established church?—No, I could not form any conjecture; I could not form a conjecture satisfactorily.

Can you form any opinion which are most numerous, the members of the Established church or the Presbyterians?—I should find it hard to make that calculation; I have no means of forming an opinion; I never turned my mind much to consider it; the teachers of Sunday schools vary from the very highest rank to that immediately next to the lowest.

Are there very many of the established church that patronize the Sunday schools in their parishes?—A very considerable number of them. I think it is among the clergy of the established church that Sunday school instruction has increased, and is likely to increase; the high approbation of several dignitaries of the church had been given to the system of Sunday school instruction; I am not saying to the Society.

Does the committee of the Society consist principally or entirely of laymen?—No, there is no rule upon the subject.

How does it appear to be at this moment?—There are some clergymen and some laymen, and one dissenting minister, Mr. Carlile; he is a Presbyterian minister.

Can you form any satisfactory opinion as to how far the feelings of the Presbyterian population at large throughout the north of Ireland are friendly or averse to your system of Sunday school instruction?—I am convinced that the feelings of the Presbyterian population in the north are very favourable to Sunday school instruction, and they are becoming progressively more so from the experience they have had of the excellent effects of it. There was some objection at one time raised in the north, on the part of some who considered teaching as a violation of the Sabbath, and that operated to keep back some; but that I think is wearing away, and I do think that we shall have them all with us.

Do you mean that they would have objection to the teaching of the Scriptures upon Sunday.

Sunday, or teaching their own catechism?—I understood, that collecting the children for the purpose of teaching was reprobated by them.

Do you mean teaching them to read?—Yes, I believe so; and it was necessary to do that to enable them to read the Scriptures.

At present, do you conceive that in the majority of your Sunday schools it is necessary to teach to read, or are we to suppose that in very many of them, the children having learnt to read in other schools at other times and places, are rather directed to reading the Scriptures in the Sunday schools?—I am persuaded, from the information I have got, that generally the children are obliged to learn to read at the Sunday school. I believe there are many of the Sunday scholars that never go to a day school.

What do you conceive to be the usual average number of gratuitous teachers in a northern Sunday school, where the number of the pupils may be about ninety?—They vary exceedingly.

Give us the usual limits?—I do not think I could give any thing that could convey a just idea.

Are there often as few as five or six?—Sometimes as few as one or two; really it is quite surprising the zeal of some of those benevolent and excellent people, and the labour which they cheerfully undertake on the Sunday, after labouring hard through the week, I really believe from no other motive than the desire of benefitting those little creatures; a labour which those who have nothing to do in the week would shrink from.

Out of what classes are the teachers in the north generally taken?—The middling classes.

Describe what you mean by the middling classes in the north of Ireland?—Shopkeepers and apprentices and farmers; by the middle class, I mean those. We have a lower class of teachers; I look upon a great number of them to be taken immediately from that class above those that they instruct, or perhaps the same class, having had the benefit of religious instruction.

Do you conceive those persons last referred to are competent to convey religious instruction to the children?—If by scriptural instruction is meant a capability of explaining every part of the Scriptures, I believe very few of any class would prove capable, but yet I do conceive that those persons are in another sense very capable of giving excellent scriptural instruction more simple; they consider the subject in a manner more nearly approaching the movements of the child's intellect and feelings; they have themselves met difficulties such as are likely to occur to the child, and are more likely to sympathize with the children, and to accommodate their instructions to their capacities; there is one part of scriptural instruction, which sometimes is lost sight of in controversy, which is peculiarly important, and that is the influence which the facts and truths contained in Scripture are calculated to produce upon the mind; and I should consider in those cases, that a poor man who has in his own case experienced and felt that influence, would be most admirably calculated to convey that influence, as connected with the portions of Scripture which produce it, to the minds of the children whom he is called upon to instruct.

Is it your impression, that teachers of that description are more likely to confine their instruction to those facts, and their experience of their influence, than to embark in the depths of controversy?—I look upon persons of that description as more likely to enter into the plain truths which they themselves know, and whose power and force they have themselves experienced to their own benefit, than to enter into a controversy. Another check which they would have upon it, would be the children themselves.

Describe in what manner the children themselves would be likely to operate as a restraint?—I should expect if you were to begin to enter upon controversial divinity with a child, you would soon find from the lagging of the child's attention, his vacant countenance, and his entire apathy to your instruction, that you were pursuing a line he would not go along with you.

Do you think the taste of the teachers themselves you have first alluded to, would pursue a line of controversial teaching, if they found the children would go along with them?—That would depend very much upon their own education, it would depend very much upon the class among whom they had received themselves religious instruction and religious impressions; I should conceive there might be some who would be disposed to enter upon controversial matter, but I am morally convinced that no Sunday-school teacher could persevere in it—he would find the task a tasteless one.

Can you form any well-grounded opinion, whether the members of the established church, and the Presbyterians in the north of Ireland, are found to co-operate harmoniously in Sunday-school instruction?—I have found very few instances, if any, of any want of harmony.

Can you state whether it is usual in Sunday schools to commit the Scriptures to memory?—I might almost say it is the invariable practice of Sunday school instruction, to give a portion of the Scriptures to be committed to memory; it is astonishing what a quantity of Scriptures they will commit to memory.

We have also collected from your answer to a former question, that you did not exclude the church catechism from your schools, do you possess any power of enforcing its use, supposing you were so disposed?—I do not think we have any power of enforcing any thing, and if there was any attempt of that kind, it would completely destroy what I cannot but consider the most delightful part of the Sunday school system, which is the union of affection and kindness which has existed from the commencement between every branch of the system; there has been much cordiality and kindness on the part of those who have contributed to the Society; there has been an unvaried kindness from the Society to those whose schools they have assisted, and it has been returned one hundred fold by them; and then the link between those persons and the children, is one purely of kindness and affection, and if there was, in any part of the chain, an assumption of power which seemed hard and disagreeable, I do think it would have a great tendency to fetter or destroy the life and energy of the whole.

Do you not believe that the church catechism is actually employed in many Sunday schools?—Yes, in very many.

If that was made an indispensable requisite, what effect do you think it would have upon the proportion of the Presbyterian children that attend the northern schools?—I do not know whether the teaching of the church catechism in schools, composed of church of England children and Presbyterians, would produce any unpleasantness—I never heard it objected to; it might certainly occur to any thinking mind, that a society without power to enforce its rules, and possessing only the influence of kindness by using restraint, or using force, would only expose its interference to contempt, and destroy the only hold which it has upon its correspondents.

Do you conceive that the system operates in any manner beneficially upon the teachers as well as the pupils?—Yes, most particularly so; I am persuaded that a Sunday school teacher learns more than he communicates from having the Scriptures in his hand, and from being forced by the voluntary adoption of his office, to read the Scriptures along with the children, and to endeavour to explain the difficulties which are level to their capacity, and to impress upon their minds the importance of what they read; it has, secondly, a tendency to open and inform his own mind, and to bring it under the influence of divine truth; if I had opportunity and leisure, I am sure I could bring forward in proof, letters in which persons have engaged in the work at first, merely from kind and benevolent feelings, and who have gone on increasing in religious impressions, until they have become most decidedly pious and excellent persons.

Does your experience in Sunday schools, enable you to state any decided effects they have produced upon particular districts, with respect to the due observance of the Sunday?—They have done so to a very considerable extent in some parts of the country; I think the extracts from the correspondence will manifest that in a very strong degree; in the first instance they keep the children out of the streets, and out of the roads—this tends to make the Sabbath more respectfully observed; then another thing effected, is the bringing the children to their place of public worship, and not only that, but the bringing the parents also, and I hope they sometimes create a love for the holy employments of the Sabbath; the testimony of the better observance of the Sabbath in those districts where Sunday schools abound, is almost universal.

Do you conceive that the agitation that prevails upon the subject of religious instruction at this moment is favourable or unfavourable to the extension of the Sunday school system?—I look upon it, it operates at present unfavourably; but the impression on my mind is, that it will ultimately produce favourable results.

Explain the grounds of your opinion in that respect?—I think that a great part of the population of Ireland have remained without much thought or consideration upon the subject of scriptural education; at present the exertions that are made to withdraw the Roman Catholic children from those schools operate unfavourably, because it takes a great number of them away; but I still think the general agitation upon the subject, and the general enquiry and exertion made, will ultimately lead the people to be more anxious about instruction, and lead to the increase of it; and I cannot but think that even the schools set up in opposition to our schools, will tend to foster the desire of instruction that prevails.

Have you any strong opinion upon your mind as to the probability of the permanence of the present agitation that prevails?—Without attempting to be prophetic, I would be most liable to mistake in giving a decided opinion on that subject; but I have known a good deal of agitation in particular neighbourhoods, similar to that which now exists generally in Ireland; and as, after a little, I have known it to subside in those districts, and to leave behind it results favourable to education, I should hope that the same would take place respecting the present more extended agitation and opposition to instruction.

What is the total income of the Society at present?—I see last year the receipts were 2,421 l. 11 s. 0 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; of that, 316 l. 19 s. were received for books sold at the depository.

Would your sphere of usefulness be every year extended, if your private and voluntary contributions were, suppose doubled?—A good deal might be done in furtherance of Sunday school instruction, if our income was increased; there is one object which the Sunday School Society have had in view, printing a N° 3 spelling-book, more a reading book preparatory to the Scriptures, than a spelling-book, and that has been completely delayed from want of funds. Another inconvenience that the Sunday School Society has been under, is being dependent on the British and Foreign Bible Society, for these some years past, for supplies of Testaments. The grants made to them by the generosity of that Society, has been the only source they have had for supplying the large demand made upon them by the schools; and the committee of the Sunday School Society have therefore given to the schools as sparingly as they thought the mere exigency of the case would absolutely require. Several other objects might be carried forward that might be named, particularly circulation of papers, information, &c. I do think that an intelligent qualified agent, who might go into the country parts of Ireland, and explain the facilities of conducting Sunday schools, and the easiness of procuring assistance, would have a tendency very naturally to increase Sunday school instruction; and these are completely out of our reach, because of the contracted funds of the Sunday School Society.

Can you inform us whether there are many Sunday schools in Ireland that are not connected with the Sunday School Society?—I apprehend there are a good many; there is a list at the end of our report of about 60 schools that are not reckoned in our returns, which receive assistance by purchasing books at reduced prices. I believe a separate list is given. Our general list is of the schools which have received gratuitous assistance; that being the only bond of connection with us.

Do the children in any cases contribute payment of money towards the support of those schools?—They do. Last year the funds of the Sunday School Society were falling so lamentably short, that the Society thought it necessary to write a letter to the conductors of different schools, strongly urging upon them, that, under the uncertain state of the Society's funds, they ought to use their best exertions to have a fund of their own. It was also suggested, that where the fund was more than sufficient to supply their own wants, it was the duty of all to contribute to supply the deficiencies of districts not so well served as their own. There was a suggestion contained in that letter, which was this, that if every Sunday school child in Ireland would give a penny a year to the Society, it would raise an income of 600*l.* a year—that has been acted upon very partially. Some of the children have given most gladly, quite reckoning it a compliment taking their pence, and the teachers also; some sums of money have been received in that way in a manner very gratifying to the Society, but it is perfectly voluntary.

Are you in the practice of receiving reports periodically as to the number of children attending the Sunday schools?—At the end of every year we forward to the conductors of schools a form, in which they give a return of the average number of children attending the school during the year, the number at the end of the year in attendance, and the number reading the different spelling-books and reading the Scriptures, also their income and expenditure.

Is it an annual enquiry only, or do you receive accounts at shorter intervals?—They generally communicate by letter with us any extraordinary circumstance that occurs to them.

Could you form an opinion whether or not the total number of children attending Sunday schools throughout Ireland is diminished within these three months past?—I should consider from the inspection I have had of the returns in the last six weeks, that the number of Sunday school children in the schools formerly assisted has been somewhat diminished. The number of schools has increased, and the stability of the schools, if I may use the expression, appears greater than at any former period I have known. There seems a more settled determination to persevere in the work they have undertaken than I ever knew before; there is less doubtfulness, and less uncertainty.

Are there any schools that are established chiefly or solely for the education of adults?—Very few; not more than half a dozen that I could enumerate as coming under my observation.

Do you understand that there is not a mixture of adults with the children?—There are a considerable number of adults who attend the schools; by adults, I mean persons above the age of 15.

Are you not of opinion, that habits of order and cleanliness are promoted among the children who attend those schools as an inferior advantage?—Yes; of course every improvement of character that I can conceive a poor child can receive is promoted by it; if it was only the notice and influence of their superiors, it would give them those habits.

Do you happen to know the usual hours of attendance at the Sunday schools?—They vary according to the attendance of the teachers; I think they are generally one and a half or two hours before the time of Divine worship, and afterwards. Some of them attend very early; some of them at daylight. I got a letter the other day, in which they mention that, upon a snowy morning, there were 105 little children round the doors of their teachers at daybreak, and they must have set out by moonlight; that was in the county of Derry.

Are the children taken to the church, those that are of the Protestant religion?—That varies considerably, according to circumstances; some of the children, I suppose, never go to church, the church being too far off; there are some cases reported to us, in which the church is at such a distance, that the children could not go to it; but this I could state as an almost invariable effect of Sunday school instruction, that the attendance at public worship is materially increased by it. I remember a remarkable instance:—A church was built; the parish were discontented at it, conceiving that there were no Protestants to go there, but one family and the clergyman; a gentleman, the son of a respectable family that lived near, set up a Sunday school, and thought he might have ten or twelve children in it, and to his great surprise a great number of Protestant children came, and when I saw him last they were talking of enlarging the church; the children came, and some of the parents came to see what was going on; and the church was now filled, whereas there formerly was only one family, that of the principal person in the parish.

Do you know whether males and females are generally taught in the same school?—Sometimes; but the general practice is to divide them.

Is the practice to divide them, if there are not separate rooms?—Yes; the general practice is, to have a female teacher to a female class, and a male teacher to a male class.

Can you state what proportion of the whole teachers are females?—I could perhaps ascertain it, but I could not specify it now.

Do you believe it is far the larger proportion?—I should rather think it is, but I may be mistaken; I think there are more females occupied in good works than men

Are clothes and books frequently distributed at the schools?—Very frequently, wherever there is a fund to procure them; and wherever there are rich benevolent people connected with the school, there is always temporal good done to the children, and many plans originate in a Sunday school for the improvement of the peasantry round about; the children are brought under the notice of their superiors; their wants are known, their characters are known; they become individually interested about them, and thus are led to inquire about their families; and in that way they acquire a knowledge of the poor around them; and I think it would be generally found, that the persons who are active agents of the Society for the improvement of the Irish Peasantry and the British and Irish Ladies Society, are in many instances the agents of the Sunday School Society for Ireland. I would mention one thing that has materially contributed to the furtherance of the Sunday School Society, and that is the punctual correspondence that has been kept up with the promoters of Sunday schools, for which a provision is made in the office, I think, that has immensely contributed to our success, the privilege that was first extended to the Sunday School Society, of sending their letters through the post office free, was the only contribution we ever received from government, in common with several other societies, and it has been a most valuable one; and if there was any cessation of that, it would injure the Society more than any other thing that could be mentioned.

Have many instances come to your knowledge of the abuse of that privilege?—I have known no instance in which it was abused; the correspondence of the Society goes generally through my own hands, and I am morally persuaded no letters have been sent that have not been upon the business of the Society; but I know instances in which sealed letters had been received from our correspondents, and our habit has been invariably to return them, and let them do as they like with them.

Do you know how many schools have been built in the last year, in which there are Sunday schools held?—I do not know.

Are there many Sunday schools held in the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I dare say there are; in looking through the list I see the same names of places, which leads me to think there are a great number.

Do you consider it would be a material assistance to the Sunday School Society, if any other society were to give it the general privilege of holding their Sunday schools in the houses of those other societies?—Yes, provided they did not interfere with them, and permitted the Sunday school to be conducted upon its own proper principles; but I could well imagine that by a well intended interference they might injure instead of serve us; an instance of this occurred in my own knowledge. One of the Education Societies desiring to promote Sunday schools, made a rule that the masters of those daily schools should hold a Sunday school—it was to be voluntary, but on their compliance they were to be paid an additional salary for their daily school, this has in some instances created disunion and jealousy among the body of gratuitous teachers. Money has been there, as it frequently is, an apple of discord; the other teachers have thought it hard that one of their number should be paid partly for their labour, and the paid master has felt their claim, and felt suspicious of them. I have two cases lying before me of that kind exactly; if the Kildare-place Society would give a permission to hold Sunday schools in their school-houses, and which I believe they make no objection to whatever, it would tend to our benefit; but I should deprecate deeply their extending their system to Sunday schools; I should think there could not be a more dangerous thing or more fatal wound inflicted on the Sunday school system, which is largely discussed in our hints to Sunday schools.

Would it not amount to the annihilation of the vital principle of the Sunday school system?—Yes, it would put down altogether that system of gratuitous teachers.

Have you ever calculated to what sum the allowance of half-a-crown to each of the teachers now connected with the Society for each Sunday, would amount to in a year?—Seventy-eight thousand pounds a year; and some of our teachers could not be hired by any pecuniary consideration, and the expenditure of that sum would tend materially to the deterioration of Sunday school instruction.

Ireland.

THE Committee will assist a Sunday school by a gratuitous grant of Testaments, spelling books and alphabets, (should the circumstances of the school appear to render such a grant necessary) once in each year, commencing the 1st of March, but not oftener. The committee, however, trust that the conductors of schools will feel the importance of using their utmost exertions to prevent any unnecessary expenditure of books, that the demands on the Society, already great, may be rendered as light as possible.

A list of queries must be filled up and sent to the secretary of the Society, on every fresh application for gratuitous assistance; no grant can be made until these queries are transmitted, and laid before the committee of the Society. The queries should be either signed, or certified by persons known to the committee, or a reference given to some person in Dublin, as knowing the school or its managers.

Books

Books are not granted gratuitously, except to Sunday schools actually established; but they may be purchased at reduced prices for the use of Sunday schools about to be established.

The Society does not grant books gratuitously for the purpose of being given as premiums.

It is expected that books obtained from the Society, either gratuitously, or at reduced prices, shall be used by scholars actually attending Sunday schools. They may be given to such gratuitously, or they may be sold to them, either for the prices charged by the Society, or for less, according to circumstances, but when the scholars of Sunday schools use the books in daily schools also, they should be required to pay the price charged by the Society.

Bibles cannot in future be granted gratuitously, but they will be sold to Sunday schools at reduced prices.

School Arrangements.

It is particularly recommended, that the hours of attendance at Sunday schools should in no instance interfere with those usually set apart for public worship.

It is earnestly requested that the schools should, when possible, be opened twice in the day, that is to say, in the morning and in the afternoon, the labour will thus be lighter on teachers and scholars, and more time gained for the purposes of the institution.

It is highly desirable that some arrangements should be made, for visiting and relieving children when sick, and procuring clothing for the most necessitous. As the committee decidedly disapprove of teaching writing and arithmetic on Sundays, they would suggest the expediency of opening a school on some day during the week, for the purpose of instructing the Sunday scholars in these branches of education. The privilege of attending this school might be given as a reward for general good conduct, and good attendance on Sundays. The committee would also suggest to the teachers the necessity of watching over the conduct of the children during the week, visiting them at their houses, and by every kind and conciliatory method, endeavouring to win them to the paths of religion and virtue.

It is recommended that the conductors of schools should attend to the preservation of the books; the too great and premature eagerness of the children to gain a new book should be checked, particularly in the case of Testaments. The spelling-book, N^o 2, will be found for a considerable time to be sufficient for a child, as it contains copious reading lessons both from the Old and New Testament; and thus affords to the teacher ample opportunity for much practical explanation. It is of great importance that the children should have the use of their books during the week, and that they may possess this advantage without pressing too much upon the funds of the school; and that both children and parents may be induced to take better care of the books, the committee would advise the conductors of schools to put some small price upon the books, except when actual poverty may prevent, or where such a measure might otherwise prove injurious to the school, and to appropriate the proceeds thereof to the general purposes of the schools, or to remit them to the Society. In cases where parents or scholars are unable to pay for the books, they should be only lent to them in the first instance; should the scholars continue to attend regularly for a considerable time, the books may be then given to them gratuitously. When the books are thus lent, or given gratuitously, the name of the school, and of the parish in which the school is situated, should be written on the title page, or otherwise affixed to each book. Thus, should the books be improperly withdrawn from the school, its conductors may have it in their power to recover them.

The conductors of the schools are requested to keep accurate registries of the admission and attendance of the scholars, roll books, account books, &c. making the most accurate statements as to the number of scholars receiving instruction in the school, and stating their progress and conduct, and other circumstances, in the simplest manner; and to conform, as far as they can, to the principles laid down in the "Hints for conducting Sunday Schools."

The committee would advise, when the schools are broken up in winter (a measure to be avoided if possible,) that the conductors and teachers should either invite the children to assemble at their houses, or else collect them in some neighbouring houses, or visit them at their own homes; thus whole families might be benefitted by the visits of teachers; parents perhaps might be themselves instructed, and induced to instruct their children. But whether this be found practicable or not, lessons should be given to the children before the separation of the school, or some other plan devised for the purpose of keeping up habits of attention and study during its recess.

The increasing demands on the Society render it peculiarly incumbent on the conductors of Sunday schools to use their utmost exertions to procure private resources for their several schools, by annual subscriptions from the neighbouring gentry, by penny-a-week societies, charity sermons, and charity boxes placed in the school-room, and in private houses. Funds thus obtained, would excite an interest in the neighbourhood for the welfare of the school, enable the conductors to provide many conveniences, lighten the burthen on the Society, and, in some instances, after thus supplying the wants of the individual school, might enable its conductors to promote the general education of the people, by contributing an overplus to the funds of the Society.

It is to be observed, that no pecuniary assistance whatsoever is granted by the Society to any school.

Schools:

The total number of schools now in connection with the Society, (after deducting those which have been discontinued), is 1,702, attended by 12,837 gratuitous teachers, and 150,831 scholars.

There has been an increase of schools and teachers in each province, during the past year, as follows:

In the province of Ulster	-	-	29	-	-	-	21

In Munster, an increase of	-	-	-	-	-	-	1,018
								1,051
								6,353

From the foregoing statement it will be seen, that there has been a reduction in the number of scholars in the schools in connection with the Society, since March 1824, of 6,353.

This reduction in the number of scholars, is to be attributed to the following causes, viz.

First, More accurate information of the state of the schools (obtained through the medium of parochial maps, prepared by the Society), from which it was ascertained, that several schools retained on the Society's list had failed, but the failure of which had not been reported to the Society by their several conductors.

Second, An improved system in the management of schools, in consequence of which their conductors have furnished more accurate returns of the number of scholars in actual attendance.

Third, The principal cause of reduction, however, it is conceived, has arisen from the general establishment in the past year, of schools held on Sundays, in the Roman Catholic chapels, which measure has withdrawn from the neighbouring Sunday schools many of the children of that communion; and also the general unwillingness of the Roman Catholic clergyman to allow the children of their communion to attend any Sunday school in which the Scriptures are read.

It will have been observed, that there has been a considerable increase of scholars in the province of Munster; this increase has chiefly taken place in the counties of Cork and Limerick.

With regard to the decrease of scholars in the province of Connaught, it may be mentioned, that two other societies for promoting education, (the London Hibernian, and Baptist Societies) carry forward their principal operations in that district. The former society has also directed its attention to the formation of Sunday as well as daily schools.

Under

Under this head it may be remarked, that the general increase of schools and teachers, already stated, may be considered as a symptom of continued life and energy in the Sunday school system, and that the assurances of unabated zeal and unchanged resolution to persevere, which the Society has received from the conductors of the schools, in all parts of the country, may lead to the persuasion that the reduction in numbers will not only be temporary, but that an increase may be expected.

The Society has endeavoured to ascertain the number of adults, of male and female children in the schools, and of those pupils who are reading the Scriptures; owing to imperfection in some returns, they are unable to make a precise statement; they have received information that 22,256 adults, above the age of 15 years, are in attendance; that there are 62,993 scholars reading the Scriptures; and that as far as their returns enable them to judge, the number of males and females in the schools is nearly equal. On the subject of adults, the Society would state their opinion, that a large proportion of the number consist of those who have for some time been attending the schools, and still continue, for the purpose of receiving religious instruction; the number of those adults who commence the rudiments of learning, is comparatively trifling.

Books issued:

The entire issues from the depository during the past year, was as follows:

1,996 Bibles.
15,796 Testaments.
36,825 Spelling books.
8,931 Alphabets.
3,462 Freeman's Card.
109 Hints for conducting Sunday schools.

The number of Bibles issued during the past year, exceeds that of the preceding year by 1,386; this increase may be chiefly attributed to a further reduction of price, which was made at the beginning of last year, with the view of bringing the Bible more within the reach of the schools.

There has been a decrease in the number of Testaments and spelling books issued during the past year, when compared with that of the former year, as follows:

Decrease in the issue of Testaments - 4,001
Decrease in the issue of Spelling books 8,892

This reduction may be accounted for as follows:

First, A misapprehension which has taken place in the minds of some of the correspondents of the Society, owing to a circular letter transmitted to them in the latter end of 1823, relative to the low state of the funds of the Society, which induced several of the Society's correspondents to conclude, that gratuitous aid could no longer be afforded to the schools by the Society.

Second, Where the above misapprehension did not take place, many of the conductors of the schools, from the representation of the low state of the funds made in the circular letter above mentioned, submitted to inconvenience from the want of books, rather than apply to the Society for them.

Third, A greater distribution has been made of the spelling books of two other societies, one of which has also granted Testaments, and directed its attention to the affording aid to Sunday as well as daily schools.

Under this head it may be remarked, that there has been an increase in the number of books sold during the past year, when compared with that of the preceding year. It may be also mentioned, that this increase may in some measure have arisen from a feeling which the Society has endeavoured to cherish in the minds of their correspondents, to wit, that they should purchase books at reduced prices, instead of making applications for them gratuitously; it being the wish of the Society, that the schools should depend, either in whole or in part, on their own resources, and not exclusively on those of the Society.

Appendix, N° 242.

Examination of Captain George Pringle, on Oath; Friday 7th January 1825.

ARE you a member of the London Hibernian Society?—I am.

Have you been so from the first institution of the Society?—No, only lately.

For what length of time have you been a member?—In August 1823 I came over to this country, in the office I now hold, of superintending inspector.

Was that a new office, created at that time, or did any body hold it before you?—No, it was a new office; an application was made to me to come over and hold it, and I undertook it on trial.

Have you been in Ireland ever since?—I have.

Is it a part of your duty to travel about various parts of the country, to see the schools, and superintend the individuals whose duty it is to inspect them?—Yes; to see the schools and superintend the persons whose duty it is to inspect them, and promote the interests of the Society, by making it known to the clergy and gentry to get them into connection with it, and to promote its objects.

Where does the Society hold its meetings?—In London; its annual meetings.

Do the committee, which is formed of the principal subscribers, meet only once a year?—The committee meet twice a month.

How long has the Society been established?—I think seventeen or eighteen years.

Has the Society any other object than that of establishing schools?—The circulation of the Scriptures. We have also another branch of readers for reading the Scriptures, principally the Irish Scriptures, amongst the adult population.

Is it strictly the same society, and the same funds, that are applied to the three objects of paying for the schools, for the Scriptures to be circulated, and for the readers?—Yes.

Is there any Bible society that is connected with it, or that is upheld by the same individuals?—No, we get the Scriptures as a grant from the British and Foreign Bible Society; they give them as a grant for the use of the Society.

Do you distribute Bibles and Testaments in the English language, as well as those in the Irish?—Yes, we do.

Do you know what number has been distributed by the Society?—It is mentioned in the Report, 2,005 English Bibles, 12,297 English, and 2,000 Irish Testaments; making a grand total of 16,302 copies within the year, and 108,902 since the commencement of the institution.

Will you describe the duties of the Scripture readers?—To read the Testament; to call the minds of the people simply to the obvious meaning of what they read, and not to enter into controversial points, if they can avoid it.

How many of them are employed?—Thirty-three.

What is each reader paid?—From 2*l.* 12*s.* to 5*l.* a year; those are local readers. We have also cursory inspectors, who go round the schools and call at unexpected times; and if they have any leisure time, they read the Scriptures when not engaged with the schools. But their time has been so much taken up of late with their duties with the schools, and calling unexpectedly, it occupies their time almost entirely.

Have you any persons whose duty it is to act as inspectors entirely, whose duty it is not to read?—Yes, eleven of them.

How many cursory inspectors have you?—Twenty.

Is it a part of the duty of those whom you call readers to inspect the schools?—No, it is not; but of the cursory inspectors it is distinctly a part of their duty. We should expect, however, that those readers, if they found any thing going on wrong, would give us notice of it.

Are the persons whom you employ in either of the three capacities described, inspectors, cursory inspectors, and readers, all of the Protestant religion?—I think some of the readers of the 33 are Roman Catholics; but very few, if any; the others are all Protestants.

Do you know whether those who are Roman Catholics continue to go to mass, and continue to confess, and continue to conform to the usual practices of the Roman Catholic worship?—They do not go so strictly through all the rules; some of them are deprived of what they call the rites of the church, but they consider themselves as belonging to that church, though the priest will not receive them till they discontinue the occupation.

Do they not go to mass or confess?—Yes, occasionally; but not generally, I believe.

What do you mean by the rites of the church?—Confession and absolution, and the sacrament.

Would the priest, if they happened to be married, church their wives, or baptize their children?—I do not think he would baptize the children; I cannot answer as to the other.

Are any of the persons employed in those three capacities converts from the Roman Catholic religion?—Yes, there are some.

Can you state how many?—No, I cannot: I think I can state the number; out of eleven inspectors, there are five.

Has the society established schools for adults?—Yes, it has.

In what manner are they taught?—Just upon the same principle as the day schools. The first thing is, the inspectors are directed to class them according to their present attainments; they are expected to make a certain proficiency at the end of four months, which is the period of the night schools.

What number of them are there?—They are still in operation; they have not been inspected, and will not be till March, and then the number will be returned; they have rather decreased this year, in consequence of the circumstances of the country. It was thought better not to establish them, except with great caution.

Are those that have been already established fully attended?—Yes.

In what parts of the country do they exist?—Mayo, Sligo, and Donegal.

Are they in the same school-rooms in which the children are taught in the morning?—Yes, generally.

Are they taught by the same schoolmaster?—Yes.

Are they charity schools, or do they pay any thing?—They are on charity altogether.

Do you know enough of them to be able to tell, whether the persons who attend them succeed in learning to read and write, or do they attend to get instructions in the Scriptures?—To learn to read; we do not admit any person upon the roll that can read; or if he can read English, he may attend to learn Irish.

Are

Are there many who can read English, desirous of learning Irish?—Yes, a great many.

Do you know the object?—It is a satisfaction to them to be able to read the language and also to read the Scriptures; that refers to the adult population.

Do the adults learn to read as well as to write?—I am not quite sure, but they will not be received upon the roll simply to learn to write, the object is to teach them to read.

Do they learn arithmetic?—If there is time they will; there is no objection that I know of to it, but it will fully occupy their time for the two or three hours, to learn to read in three or four months.

Does it take a longer time to teach an adult to read than a boy?—No, not so long, we expect they will make double the proficiency in the same time.

Do you know what is the oldest person you have attending in those schools, as adults?—We have had grandfathers in the schools, and fathers and sons and grandsons, all in one school.

Are there any adult schools for women?—No, we do not admit them.

Do they, in many of the adult schools, commit the Scriptures to memory?—Yes, they do.

Are there any other books used in the adult schools than spelling books and Testaments?—None provided by the Society.

Are they at liberty to bring them if they like?—If there is any thing that is likely to interfere with any particular tenet of their religion they would not.

Do you know whether any other books are used in the school?—I do not think there are; if they were to bring a book in arithmetic it would not be objected to.

Are Bibles or Testaments distributed to the persons who attend the adult schools?—Those who are reading the Testament get a gift of the book; and if any of the adult population were to apply to any agent authorized to give the Testament, and he were satisfied they would make a good use of it, it would be given them.

Have the goodness to describe, as accurately as you can, the duties of a Scripture reader?—To endeavour to get an entrance into any house; to get a hearing from the people, and to read the Scriptures to them and draw their attention simply to them, and to avoid getting into controversial points: the cursory inspectors; their duty is to make surprise visits of the schools, to mark upon the roll any thing that they see in reference to the school, and to send monthly returns of their visits; if they have any spare time, (but their duties in connection with the schools are such they have very little), they are expected to read the Scriptures, but not in the school on any account.

Do the other readers principally employ themselves in reading in the Irish Testament?—Yes, principally.

Do they travel in those parts of Ireland chiefly in which the Irish language alone is understood?—Not exclusively, but it is generally in those places they are appointed.

Can you state from your knowledge of it, over what portion of the surface of Ireland the Irish language is spoken?—I have met with it in Cork, in Clare, Kerry, Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Leitrim, Donegal, and the mountainous parts of Derry, Limerick, Tipperary, and Waterford, in those districts it is not exclusively spoken; in general they can understand English a little.

Do you know whether your readers are eagerly listened to and easily admitted into the cabins of the poor?—They have always told me they are better admitted at the second visit than the first.

Do the people assemble at the houses where they go?—Yes, they appoint meetings when they regularly return.

In what way do you understand they can explain the Scriptures to the Roman Catholic population without entering into something like controversy?—They go on reading those parts where these points do not occur; I have frequently read their journals, very often without any thing of the kind appearing; the people hear them with interest.

What sort of explanation do they give?—A simple explanation, arising out of what they have read; the literal meaning of what they have read.

Are their discourses in the nature of preaching, or merely comments upon and explanations of the portions they read?—Mere comments and not preaching; we forbid them to preach.

Are they ever opposed by force?—I believe there have been instances of it, but I cannot speak from my own observation; I have heard of it.

Have you ever heard of any of them being maltreated?—Yes, I have heard of one or two.

Can you state under what circumstances?—I have so imperfect a recollection, that I cannot state the particulars.

Has it happened lately?—No; they meet very often with opposition when the people are stirred up by the priests.

Do they go about the country?—Yes, a great number are local readers and are attached to one spot; they read in their own neighbourhood on Sundays and holidays.

What places do they select for reading on Sundays and holidays?—Wherever they can fall in with the people and get into conversation with them, or by going into one of their cabins.

Do you know whether they are most listened to by youths or old people, or men or women?—I have not had an opportunity of distinguishing by observation; as my residence is not at Sligo, I do not hear of these matters and of the opposition referred to, except as they are told me occasionally.

Can you state to what extent the instruction given to the Roman Catholics by those readers has an effect upon their religious tenets; does it produce many converts or induce any

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,

any persons who continue Roman Catholics to pay less observance to what, as a Protestant, you would consider the superstitious practices of the Roman Catholic worship?—I think I have observed according as the Roman Catholics get Scriptural information, their respect for the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion is lessened.

From the experience you have had of the effects produced by those readers, is it your opinion, that in proportion as they succeed in giving to their hearers instruction in the Scriptures, in an equal degree they lessen their observance of the peculiarities of the Roman Catholic worship?—Yes.

Have many in consequence of the instruction of those readers actually become converts, and abandoned their communion with the Roman Catholic church?—I have heard of some occasional instances; I cannot say I know a great number through these agents.

Are the persons who actually become converts exposed to much personal annoyance from the Roman Catholics whose faith they have abandoned?—Very great.

Can a convert remain quietly in the country he formerly lived in?—No, he is exceedingly molested.

Do they venture to remain there at all, or do they always change their residences?—Some of them venture to remain, and some change their residences; if their friends and relations oppose them, then they change.

Is it generally found that those persons who have been instrumental in producing upon the mind of a Roman Catholic, a change to induce him to abandon one religion and adopt another, are disposed to protect the individual and more or less to provide for him?—No, not at all.

Does the convert find it more easy to get employment after his conversion than before?—No, it is much more difficult afterwards to get employment.

Is he better received by the Protestant population than he would have been before?—Yes.

Is he not looked upon with shyness by his new Protestant friends?—Yes, for a certain time till they see the soundness of his principles and reality of the change.

Do the converts principally conform to the established church, or to any other denomination of Protestants?—I have known some of both; some have gone to the established church and a good many others to Protestant dissenters, the Independents and Baptists.

Have the greater number become either Independents or Baptists, or members of the established church?—Of those I am personally acquainted with, the greater number have become Independents.

Will you state as nearly as you can the whole number of Roman Catholics who have been converted to the Protestant faith?—I could not give any accurate idea.

Is it a hundred?—I should think full that.

Is it two hundred?—I have not been in the way of getting information upon the subject; I have met with a great number of instances myself of persons who, from reading the Scriptures, have renounced the Roman Catholic religion, and I have heard from Mr. Blest, that a great number had renounced it to his knowledge.

Have you known many instances of children in the London Hibernian schools renouncing their religion?—The children are not sufficiently grown up to judge for themselves, but of those five inspectors that were Roman Catholics, three were pupils in the schools and grew up as Protestants, and are Independents.

Have you known instances in which the children, while children in the school, have renounced the Roman Catholic religion and become Protestants?—No, I have not.

In the grown up persons you allude to, is the change announced in any public form of recantation, or do they quietly pass from one to the other?—They quietly pass from one to the other.

You have not known of a regular recantation?—No.

Of the converts, are the majority men or women?—Principally men I have met with; I have come more in contact with them.

Have such as you have come in contact with been perfectly sincere, as far as you could judge of the human heart?—I have met with some I doubted of; I had not the same confidence in them as others; but I have thought they were generally sincere.

Have you any doubt the majority were sincere?—No.

Of the cursory readers who were not Roman Catholics, what number are of the established church, and what number dissenters?—I do not know them; I do not make any inquiry.

Are there any you know that belong to the established church?—Yes; I think one that I recollect belongs to the established church. I never attend to the point or make inquiry.

What is your own religion?—A Presbyterian of the church of Scotland.

Are there any readers, Presbyterians of the church of Scotland?—I do not know of any.

Then it would follow, they are of different classes of Dissenters?—Yes, as far as I know.

To what circumstance do you attribute it, that when those Roman Catholics have made up their minds to renounce the Roman Catholic religion, and to adopt the Protestant, that they prefer that of the Dissenters to the established church?—I think from there being at Sligo a zealous independent minister whom they hear, who is anxious about religious matters; they go to him, thinking to get more information from him. I mean Mr. Urwick.

Do you think, if they considered the ministers of the established church in that part of the world equally zealous and anxious to afford them such information and explanation,

that

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,

that they would be equally disposed to go to them, as they are now to the independent place of worship?—I have no reason to think the contrary, if they were equally zealous.

The principal persons of the Hibernian Society at Sligo, and that neighbourhood, are of the different denominations of dissenters?—The only person is Mr. Blest, who is the agent; he is an Independent; he is the principal person there. Mr. Urwick has no connection with the Society; he happens only to be a minister there.

Are not the major part of those connected with the management of the Society in the vicinity of Sligo, members of the established church?—The patrons of the schools are in great numbers of the established church, and clergymen of it.

Is the appointment of the inspectors, and such persons, very much in Mr. Blest?—Yes, it is; but he listens to recommendations; he is very much influenced by the recommendations of persons connected with the Society.

Do you think that Mr. Blest, ceteris paribus, prefers the appointing dissenters to members of the established church, as the inspectors or readers?—No, I do not; I think he is anxious to get readers and inspectors of the established church; the last we appointed was of the established church.

To what do you attribute that?—That they would be more useful.

Why so?—That the clergymen of the established church will have the preference to them.

With that view, and that preference, how does it happen they are not of the established church?—They have recommended themselves in subordinate situations, for those situations they now hold.

With all Mr. Blest's prepossessions, there is only one officer of the established church?—There are two now among the inspectors, besides what may be among the other agents.

Do you happen to know whether the readers have been as much attended to as heretofore, or whether there has been any increased jealousy?—They have been much more opposed.

Do you know whether that opposition has been successful, or do they obtain hearers still?—They proceed with more caution, but they proceed uninterruptedly in their own course; the people are afraid sometimes to receive them, in consequence of the priest's threats.

Do they discourse in the open air principally?—It is generally in the cabins; but in the open air sometimes, according to circumstances.

Are they ever in the habit of attending in the neighbourhood of chapels, and reading to people as they come away?—They meet with them; they know they will meet them in their road home.

Is not that thought a very hazardous experiment?—The readers know what they are to expect; they have considered that before they engage in the duty. In some places they are afraid to be out late at night.

Do you conceive they have any thing to apprehend from the people, except in instances where the Roman Catholic priest has particularly denounced them, and pointed them out as particular objects of pursuit?—No.

Did you ever hear an instance of the people, except under the stimulus suggested in the last question, having offered any violence or insult or annoyance, to the readers?—No, I do not recollect any; it has generally been owing to the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergymen pointing them out.

In about how many instances have you ever heard of actual personal annoyance being offered to the readers?—I have heard, generally speaking, a great number of instances; I have heard Mr. Blest say, in the course of conversation, and the impression on my mind is, that in many instances, during the course of the experience of the readers, they have met with many instances of annoyance.

Have they ever been severely beaten or injured?—I think one or two were severely beaten; one was by the priest, who was obliged to come and make concessions, or legal proceedings would have been taken.

Was he struck by the hand of the priest?—Yes.

Was any weapon employed?—He was kicked, I believe.

Has any instance occurred, in which a reader has desisted in consequence of the annoyance?—I do not recollect any; but I am not so intimately acquainted with the details of the readers.

Is that duty you are alluding to, any thing except reading?—No; reading and making a few comments.

What is your opinion as to how far the curiosity of the people is excited or depressed by the interdictions with respect to the Scriptures that proceed from their clergy?—I think in many cases the curiosity of the people is excited; but in some cases it is overcome by the threats of the clergy.

Do you think their anxiety to see the Scriptures has increased by the contention that has lately existed upon the subject?—Yes, decidedly; but my information goes more with respect to the schoolmasters and the children, than with respect to the readers.

Are you aware, whether of late there has been any increased demand for the Scriptures amongst the people in consequence of the disputes there have been upon the point?—Yes, I have heard from several quarters it has been so. I met, the other day, with a gentleman from the neighbourhood of Carrick on Shannon where he mentioned it had been so; and there was another discussion at Esky, when the same thing has followed; that the people were exceedingly anxious to get information, and to read the Scriptures, and get possessed of them; and one man having expressed his opinion respecting the discussion rather freely, some of the Roman Catholic people came to the house to beat him.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

Do you know whether it was a voluntary act of the people, or recommended to them?—
I do not know that it was recommended.

Do you find the peasantry acquainted with the form of the Scriptures; the meaning of the question is, whether they would know a New Testament if it was presented to them?—
No, I have met with a great many who never saw or heard of the Scriptures.

Can you state, upon any such occasion, what you may have said to them, or they have said to you, about the Scriptures?—Yes, there were two persons I met when inquiring about a school in Tipperary. I asked about the school; they seemed unwilling to give me information respecting it: I did not quite understand what their feeling was. They then told me where the school was, and I asked them some questions respecting it; they said it was an improper school. I asked the objection; they said, their clergy objected to it. I said, is it the spelling-book? they said no, the New Testament. I took them to the school; I asked them if they had seen the spelling-books or Testament? they had not. I asked them if they could read? one of them said he could; and I read a part of Luke, recording the Annunciation of the Virgin Mary, which he recognized. I told him to take the book, as I should be engaged some time; when I had done, I asked them if they saw any objection to it; they said no: their countenances were quite changed; they seemed satisfied with the book.

Do you know what meaning such people affix to the word Bible; the question supposes they can have hardly escaped hearing the Bible mentioned?—I do not recollect; I have met with some who did not know what I was speaking about when speaking about the Bible, or the Scriptures; and at last they said, 'Oh, yes; you are speaking about the black book.'

Who do such persons suppose was the author of the black book?—Some of them think that Luther was the author it.

Are there not actually branches of the London Hibernian Society that have, in some respects, an independent existence?—The Cork Society is no expense to our funds, except in the matter of inspectors and books.

Is it managed by the same individuals who direct the schools of the general society?—It is managed by their own local committee.

Do you conceive that you have any duty yourself with respect to the schools of the Munster Hibernian Society?—Yes, I think they are required to conform to our regulations.

Do your inspectors visit those schools, and regulate them in the same manner as those which are not supported by the Munster Hibernian Society?—Yes, exactly; except that they use the Douay Testament in the Cork Society.

Is that the only distinction that is made?—Yes, that is the only one that I know of; the committing the Scriptures to memory is the same.

Are the funds of that branch of the Society at all applicable to the payment of the Scripture readers, or cursory inspectors?—No, they are not.

Have they any Scripture readers of their own?—No, none.

Do the Scripture readers employed by the Society generally act within the district of the Munster Hibernian Society?—Some of them have been lately in Limerick and Kerry.

Do the cursory inspectors overlook the schools of that branch society?—Yes; I believe some of the schools in Kerry have been visited by one of them.

Have they any inspectors of their own?—No they have not.

Is there a separate committee for the management of those schools?—Yes; it is the local committee of Cork, and the secretary.

Have they authority to give what directions they please?—Yes, upon the reports of our inspectors, which we send to them.

Could they give any directions inconsistent with the rules of the London Hibernian Society?—That would lead to a disjunction between the two societies.

Are the Scriptures distributed by the schoolmasters and other persons connected with that branch of the Society, in the same way as they are by those who are paid by the other society?—Yes, they are.

Do you know of any instance in which the rules of the Society were supposed to be complied with in a school supported by the Munster Hibernian Society, in which the children did not learn from the Testament itself, but from that selection known by the name of Mrs. Trimmer's selection, which had been altered at one time in such a way as to obtain the sanction of Dr. Troy?—Yes, the school at Lismore; the male school has got it to repeat from; but the females have the Testament. I reported this matter; I thought it a deviation from our principles, and I reported it to the patron Colonel Currey, and he said it should be rectified as soon as possible.

Can you state from recollection or any documents you have, the number of schools at present supported by the society?—674 in the last quarter, day schools.

I see in page 9, of the eighteenth Report, as a summary of the foregoing transactions, "we present the number of schools 1,072," how does that differ from the number you have just stated?—The annual account differs from the quarterly; by taking in all the new schools and enumerating those that have been given up within the year, as they appear on the vouchers for the expenditure of those particular articles granted to them; the whole schools through the year that have had any connection or existence with the Society must be returned, and in the same time the children got a certain degree of instruction during the time they existed.

When you say that 674 schools are now maintained by the Society, have the goodness to describe

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

Describe what is the extent and manner of the assistance given?—The master gets payment according to the number of pupils who pass the quarterly inspection.

Are we to understand that in the 674 cases the masters receive payment in some shape or other?—Yes.

In the 674 cases are the school-houses provided for at the expense of the Society?—It is very seldom done; sometimes in particular situations they give assistance for the hiring of a cabin.

There appear to be 398 schools which have received in the year to which the eighteenth Report applies, assistance of a lesser amount than the 674 you have described, inform us, as nearly as you can, what has been the nature and extent of that assistance?—Some of them are night schools and Sunday schools; the 1,100 included every kind.

Is there any other description of school; are there for instance any schools to which you have given assistance of books only, being day schools?—Yes, there are some under one of the London Companies, the Fishmongers Company, to which we give inspection; they pay for the books that we have provided, and they pay the master also, upon the report of our inspection.

How many are there?—I think there are ten.

Where are they situate?—In the county of Derry.

In those schools are the rules of the London Hibernian Society followed with the same exactness as in those maintained at the expense of the Society?—Exactly.

Is the system of instruction in all respects the same?—Yes, exactly; there are a few of Erasmus Smith's schools that are also put under our inspection, but they conform to the regulations.

How many?—Very few; I do not know the number.

Do you know where they are situated?—In the neighbourhood of Cook's Town.

Is the school at a place called Drumshambo, one of them?—I do not know.

Do they amount altogether to half a dozen, or more?—I should think that would include the whole.

What is the nature of the assistance you give to those schools?—Inspection and books.

Are the rules of the Society equally followed in those schools?—Yes.

From whom do you obtain authority to establish the rules of the London Hibernian Society in schools maintained by the governors of Erasmus Smith's charity?—From the gentlemen connected with them; the local committee.

Has it been given by the gentlemen of the local committee in each instance, or has it been a general permission from the governors of the Society?—No, I do not think it has been a general permission.

Was it given in writing?—I rather think an application was made through the inspector when visiting that part of the country, or to Mr. Blest.

Have the goodness to state what you know of such application, and the answer made to it?—The only thing I know correctly is, that the application was made and Mr. Blest agreed to it.

Was it made by the governors of Erasmus Smith's charity themselves?—No, it was not; it was by the local committee as far as I know.

To what inspector was it made?—It is sometime ago, when I was in a different part of the country, and therefore cannot say.

Have the Society at any time published a list of their schools, specifying where each school is situate?—No, they have not.

Would it be possible from the books of the Society to shew where the 1,072 schools said in that passage of the report to have existed, were actually situated?—Yes, quite so; I have got a list of them.

Do the Society dislike to make public the situation of the schools?—Yes, they do, for fear that where the Roman Catholic clergymen have not opposed, orders to oppose the school might be sent to them.

Is that the reason why the Society do not like to publish the situations of the schools?—Yes, that is one of them; there may be others, such as their liability to change of place.

Are the regulations established in 1,072 schools?—Yes, they are.

Are the 674 schools day schools only?—Yes, they are.

Are the schools of the Munster Hibernian Society included in the 674?—They are.

Can you state what number of night schools you have?—No, I cannot at present.

Can you state the number of Sunday schools?—No, I cannot, our wish is that there should be a Sunday school connected with the day schools; and that is the condition we make with our masters.

Are the Sunday schools fully attended?—Yes they are.

More fully than the day schools?—Yes, in some places by the adult population going to them, who cannot attend in the day schools.

Is the system of instruction in the Sunday schools the same as the day schools, or is the religious instruction more extensive?—Yes, there are not the same restrictions.

Do they comment upon the Scriptures?—They might give a more enlarged explanation than in the others.

Do you allow explanation in the Sunday schools?—Yes.

Do you wish it to be given?—Yes, if there is a good local superintendant qualified to do it, we should wish it.

Do you allow the master to make comments and explanations upon the Scriptures?—We should always wish him to be restricted to the grammatical meaning; we do not think him altogether capable of commenting.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

If he was inclined not to limit himself to the grammatical meaning, would he be allowed to comment upon and explain the Scriptures?—That would depend upon the character of the man.

Are the Sunday schools of the London Hibernian Society always attended by a master, or taught by gratuitous teachers in the same way as the schools of the Sunday School Society?—They very often get the assistance of gratuitous teachers.

Are they attended by children of all persuasions?—Yes, the Roman Catholics have a greater objection to them than the day schools.

Do fewer Roman Catholics attend them?—Yes, fewer.

Is any catechism taught in them?—Not any.

Are catechisms forbidden to be taught in them?—They are.

What books are used in them?—The two spelling books of the Society, and the Testament.

Are other books admitted if the children choose to bring them?—No, I do not think they are; I would myself object to it in a Sunday school.

Are any prayers read in the Sunday schools?—Not that I am aware of.

Do the children commit the Scriptures to memory, or repeat the portions they have committed to memory at other times, in the Sunday schools?—Yes, they do; they are required to learn four chapters for the quarter; they go on with those four chapters in the Sunday school which goes to the matter of the quarter's proficiency.

Is any inducement held out to the children to attend the schools other than the education; is any clothing given?—Not by the Society; the Society sometimes give them a premium, a Bible, and the patrons of the school sometimes give them clothing as premiums but that is rare.

Have you any rule with regard to the masters, are they admitted of all christian denominations?—Yes, they are.

Have you any preference with regard to their religious opinions, do you prefer them Roman Catholics, or church of England men, or dissenters?—I myself prefer Roman Catholics; I do not know what the Society does, they leave it to Mr. Blest and myself a good deal.

Of what religious persuasion are the majority of the masters?—Roman Catholics I should suppose by far.

Of the Protestants, which are the majority, church of England, or dissenters?—I should think church of England, but I cannot speak decidedly.

Among the masters are there many persons who have become converts from the Roman Catholic church to the Protestant communion?—Yes.

State what number, as near as you can?—Indeed I could not; I have met with several occasionally that have changed, and Mr. Blest has told me of a good number, when I mentioned the number of 100, I included those.

Have you not reason to believe, that of those persons many of them are affecting a compliance with the forms of the Protestant worship for the sake of being continued in your schools as masters?—No, for it is against their interest to do so; the children would be withdrawn immediately.

Why so?—It is a greater cause of opposition among the Roman Catholic clergy and population if they leave their own church, and it is a very good test of the schoolmasters principle.

Do you remember a man of the name of M'Cosland who kept a school in the neighbourhood of Westport?—I have seen him at Sligo; I have not seen his school.

Do you call him a convert?—I recollect the character of the man which was very indifferent; he was dismissed and re-appointed by the recommendation of the clergyman; we attend very much to the recommendation of the patrons of the schools in the appointment of the teachers; we cannot know their character at a distance, but he is a man that there was no great confidence placed in.

Do you recollect the circumstance of the inspector, Mr. M'Ewin, saying the school he possessed was one of the best he had seen?—No, I do not; Mr. M'Ewin is an old man, and one of the most inefficient inspectors.

Fond of seeing things in their best light?—Yes.

Do you find in general you can rely upon the reports of your inspectors?—On some I can with great confidence, on Mr. M'Ewin I cannot; and on that account he is generally kept near Sligo.

Do you believe you have any schoolmasters in your employ who are incapable of spelling?—Some of them are exceedingly deficient and that I have reported particularly; the reason is, we give so very little remuneration we cannot employ persons of a higher class in life.

Would you believe that in a school belonging to your Society in which 80 children were present, that amongst them they could not produce above three or four tattered copy books, and that in those the greater part of the copies were incorrectly spelt?—In matters of writing and arithmetic in several of the poor schools they are very defective; they have not the means of writing nor the accommodation.

Would you believe in a school of that character, that no child was found who could say the multiplication table?—I believe there are some schools where they neither learn writing or arithmetic; there are several schools I have met with in the north of Ireland that I recommended to be discontinued from the incompetence of the master and the inefficiency of the school; in Donegal that took place.

How do you account for their having been ever established, if they became in such a state?—

a state?—It was from the fault of the person who recommended the schoolmaster without sufficient inquiry.

Do you venture to appoint a master upon recommendation, without ascertaining his qualities?—Yes, we do; we do not see the man till I go round; but we rely upon the patron a good deal, if we have known him in connection with the Society.

Do you think you are much deceived in the report made of the attendance in the school; does it ever happen that this deceit is practised upon you, that the children take the Testaments home and learn portions by heart without attending in the school, and that they only attend on the day they are to repeat what they have learnt in the presence of the inspector, and in that way to entitle the schoolmaster to his reward?—In the north of Ireland we have been informed of it, and have taken measures to prevent it by cursory inspectors, who make six reports, and we take the average; that refers to the north of Ireland where there are other schools, or where the children have got education in Sunday schools; in the south we have not met with it.

Speaking generally, it is known to you that instruction in arithmetic is particularly desired by the population in Ireland?—Yes, quite so.

Does it appear to you that the children taught in the London Hibernian schools acquire proficiency in arithmetic?—Yes, they do.

Do they in general?—Yes, in those schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society they have got the materials, and have made very great proficiency.

The question is now confined to those schools in connection strictly with the London Hibernian Society?—No, we do not furnish the means.

Do you think you furnish the means of instructing the children in writing?—Not fully.

Is not the instruction you principally give to the children, scriptural instruction and adequate proficiency in reading?—Yes.

With regard to their scriptural instruction, do you think they retain in their memory the portions of the Scriptures they learn quarterly, or whether the portion they learn in one quarter does not tend to put out of their heads what they had learnt in the preceding quarter?—It may in a certain respect; they cannot repeat the former quarter's portion accurately, but they retain the general impression of the sentiment.

Have you ever tried to make a child repeat the portion of the Scriptures it had got two or three quarters back?—Yes.

Have you found they were able to do it?—Yes, some of them, and others not.

Do you conceive that an impression of the subject may be made upon a child without being able to repeat the words?—Yes, certainly.

Do you think the religious instruction the children acquire makes a serious and permanent impression upon them, or is it acquired by rote merely?—I think it remains with them when they grow up; I have met with some pupils who have been educated in the school, and I have found it so.

Do you think that they learn to understand that the commands and doctrines of the Scriptures are really applicable to their conduct in this life, and influential in their hope of salvation hereafter?—Yes, generally speaking, distinctly.

Do you think it tends materially to make them more virtuous and respectable individuals?—Very much so; I have met with instances myself, and have heard it confirmed from other persons; I received a communication from a clergyman of the church of England of the name of Armstrong respecting the effects of scriptural education upon the mind of one of the pupils; "I was much pleased with the remarks of a boy taught in one of our schools near Drumkeerin, in the county of Leitrim, with whom I fell into conversation a few months ago, as I travelled along the road, and as the particulars must afford you pleasure as well as every friend to scriptural education, I shall briefly communicate them to you; I asked him his age?" he answered "sixteen." "Did you ever go to school?—Yes, sir, I go to one of the free schools near Drumkeerin." "What did you learn?—The Testament, sir." "What does the Testament teach?—The way of salvation, sir." "What is that way?—Jesus Christ is the way, sir." "Can any man forgive sins?—No, sir." "Who alone can?—God, sir." "Is the country about you quiet?—It is, sir." "Is it any sin to break the King's laws?—Yes, sir." "How does that appear from your Testament?"—In reply to this the boy repeated very accurately from memory, the thirteenth of Romans, and the second chapter of the first Epistle of Peter. "Is drunkenness a crime?—Yes, sir, a very great one." "Prove this from Scripture?"—The boy here repeated the latter part of Paul's fifth chapter to the Galatians. "Is it any harm to make potteen whiskey?—Yes, it cheats the King to whom custom and tribute are due." And I have had this example confirmed by my own experience.

What have you had occasion to observe?—I have asked them respecting their moral and social duties, and found satisfactory answers.

What do you know with regard to the attendance at the schools?—I can state the quantity of the children now upon the roll for the last quarter in the 674 schools—we insert the last quarter's number.

How many scholars appear to have attended at the 674 schools you have described?—50,750 upon the roll; those who passed the inspection and whom the master was paid for, 29,760; this quarter has been very unfavourable to the attendance of the children from it being the potatoe season and bad weather.

Can you give a similar return for the preceding quarter?—No, I cannot; I am not furnished with it.

Were any children in attendance in the schools, not included in that 29,760?—In the night schools and the Sunday schools.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

Can you give any account of the attendance at the Sunday schools?—No, I cannot; a good number would be duplicate attendance and others adults.

Does not that amount to a reduction of near 30,000 since the corresponding period of last year?—No, not so much.

Of the number 29,760, what proportion do you think are Roman Catholics?—I cannot say; there are many schools that had Roman Catholic children in them, and I find that they are returning.

Has any great change taken place lately in the attendance of the Roman Catholic children in the schools?—The opposition became more determined and systematic about May last.

What are your impressions of the proportion of the 29,760, that are Roman Catholics; are there three-fourths or seven-eighths, or what proportion?—I am not able to form an estimate.

The question does not seek an answer professing any thing like accuracy; you must have some general impression upon your mind from what you have seen, of the probable number of Roman Catholics in attendance, out of the number of 29,760?—Indeed I should think half are Roman Catholics.

Do you think two-thirds are?—There are some schools that kept up their attendance very much, and others that did not, they declined directly.

Do you imagine you have any thing like 10,000 Protestant children at this moment in your schools?—There are a great many in Tyrone and in Donegal.

Are we to collect that your general impression is, that a decided majority of the 29,760 are Roman Catholics?—Yes.

Is it your impression that they amount to within a half and two-thirds?—Yes, I should think rather above two-thirds, but I am not in possession of data to enable me to form a correct judgment.

Is that number upon the decrease?—No, upon the increase.

Do you mean that they are returning to the schools?—Yes, they are now returning.

In what manner do you ascertain that?—From my own questions to the masters of the schools, the reports of the inspectors and gentlemen connected with the schools.

To what cause do you attribute that disposition to return?—The dread of the priests is in a certain degree abating.

What has abated it?—I think the first storm of it has gone past, and when the priest does not speak in the same way about it they return immediately.

Have you any doubt the priests will continue to oppose as strenuously as heretofore?—I think they have not carried it on in the same violent way.

Do you think, if they should be disposed to continue the opposition in future as strenuously as for some time past, that the opposition will not be equally efficacious in keeping the children out of your schools?—No, I do not think it would.

Explain the nature of your impression upon that point?—I think the desire for education is such they will return, and in the schools the priests have established lately, they have required them to pay—the children finding that, have come back to the schools where they can get it free, and some of those schools to which they have returned have been more efficient and more attention is paid to them.

We have understood that the schools established by the Roman Catholic clergy, as rivals to the London Hibernian Society, have been free schools?—They have not in all cases; they were free for the first quarter, and then the children were required to pay something.

Do not the Roman Catholic children who return come clandestinely?—They would be glad to evade the observation of the priest.

Do you not think that that tends to habituate them to deceit and clandestine proceedings?—They do not approve of the proceedings of the priest in opposing the school.

Do you not conceive it has a bad influence upon the minds of the children being constantly in the habit of coming to a school that they do not dare openly to avow, and has it not a bad influence upon the minds of their parents?—I think any disadvantage of that kind will be overcome by the advantage they get in the school.

Does not it in a very considerable degree neutralize it?—No, I think not; they do not approve of the principle of the priests in opposing it.

Have you not found instances in which the people in order to avoid the displeasure of the priest, and yet to obtain the benefits of education, have had recourse to deceit and falsehood?—I do not think they practise deceit when it is asked; I do not think they could conceal it.

Are you not aware that any children have said an untruth when asked whether they had been at such and such a school?—I think it is a likely thing they might do it, but it has not come to my knowledge that I recollect.

Of the 674 schools you have described, how many are in connection with the other societies?—I cannot exactly say.

Have you any schools in connection with Kildare-place?—Yes, a good many.

Have you many in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Very few.

Have you any in connection with the Baptist Society?—None.

Have you any in connection with the Sunday School Society?—Yes, if there are any Sunday schools established we join them, and the master gives what assistance is required of him to the Sunday school.

Do you doubt that of the 674 schools, above one hundred are in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—There must be much more than that.

507
Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

Do you think it approaches nearer to 300?—Yes, indeed I should think so.

Is it a connection that you seek?—Yes, individually I do.

Have the goodness to describe in what way it tends to assist your objects and forward the views of the Society?—The training the masters is an improvement, it gives the means of teaching them to write and cypher; there is also the school accommodation, desks, and enlarging the school-house, and additional encouragement to the master if he deserves it, so that it raises the character of the school generally.

Are the rules of the London Hibernian Society as implicitly followed in the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society, as if they were not?—There have been few instances of interference by their inspectors, but it has been rectified.

How have they interfered?—Rejecting some as readers of the Testament in the Testament class, who were promoted to it, and restricting the use of the Testament, and not permitting them to take it home; but it has been rectified.

In what school did that happen?—Strabane.

In your schools is the Testament read and used as a class book?—They take the book home to learn the chapters, and use it as a class book in the school.

Do the little children learn to read out of the Testament before they are old enough to be likely to comprehend the meaning of it?—No, it is contrary to our rules; they must be a twelvemonth in the school and promoted to the senior class.

In what way have the rules of the Kildare-place Society come in collision with your rules, so as to have produced the effects you have described?—I do not think it was from the rules, but the misapplication of the rules by the inspectors.

State in what way the application of the rules produced a difference in the practice?—It was rather the misconception of the rules by the inspector; he had been recently appointed; he restricted the reading of the Testament to once in the day, not allowing them to take them home, and if that had been enforced it would have prevented the committing them to memory.

Did he prevent as many of the children from reading in the Scriptures, as according to your rules would have read in them?—Yes, a number had been promoted into the Testament class by the inspector, and by the two clergymen the patrons of the schools, and he rejected them.

Have the London Hibernian Society prevailed in that object in establishing the reading of the Scriptures, and the children taking them home according to their desire?—Yes.

Where did this occur?—At Strabane.

Did it occur at any other place?—It was attempted.

Did Mr. Hamilton at Strabane, take any part in it?—Yes he did, and his curate said it was a grievance.

Does not the practice of the Kildare-place Society admit and encourage the reading of many other books besides the New Testament?—Yes, it does.

Does that interfere with the rules of your Society?—No, it does not.

Do you encourage in your schools the general study of other books than the Scriptures?—We do not provide any other, but to such books as the Kildare-place Society's reading books we do not object.

Do you prefer them being in the school?—No.

If you had a choice, should you prefer their not being there?—Yes, we should.

Is the attendance in the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society greater upon the average than the attendance in the schools that belong solely to the London Hibernian Society?—I think it is an encouragement to the children to attend, when they have the assistance that the Kildare-place Society gives, slates and pencils.

Have you any doubt that the attendance upon the schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society is upon the average one-third greater than in those schools that are in connection with the Hibernian Society alone?—I think it would always prevail in a competition between two schools; that being in connection with the Kildare-place Society would be a security in getting a greater attendance.

Do you doubt it does produce that effect in a very considerable degree?—No, I do not.

Are the catechisms taught after school hours in any of the schools connected with your Society?—I have received no express directions from the committee upon the subject; I would rather wish it to be taught at other places to keep the school distinct.

Does it happen in point of fact?—Yes, in some places after school hours only.

Are the schoolmasters at liberty to break up the school when they please?—No.

Do you fix the hours?—Yes.

What hours?—Ten till four.

How are you enabled to enforce that rule?—By the cursory inspectors visits and reports.

Are there any of your schools that are in connection with and derive benefit from Erasmus Smith's fund, and also in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—No, I do not think they are in connection with the Kildare-place Society; I have not seen any of those schools in connection with Erasmus Smith's charity.

Are not most of your schools, that are unassisted by the Kildare-place Society, held in very poor cabins?—Yes, most of them.

Is it not one of the most direct and immediate effects of the assistance from the Kildare-place Society, to give you a good house of stone and slate, in lieu of one of mud and thatch?—Yes.

Do you not consider that a very substantial benefit?—Yes, I do.

Do you conceive it also has the effect of marking out your school more ostensibly to the opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy?—In some particular cases it will; but I do not think it is of very great consequence. They will find them out without that.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
7 Jan. 1825.

Do you think that, ceteris paribus, parents are more inclined to send their children to a respectable looking school-house, than to one held in a mean hovel?—Yes, I think they like the respectable schools.

Is it a rule of the Society, that children should be made to commit portions of the Scriptures to memory in the school?—No, out of school.

It is the wish of the Society that it should be done out of the school?—Yes; that they should take the books home.

Do I understand you to say, you have no school in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—No, I think we have some.

Do you know it to be the rule of that Society, that the catechism should be taught in the school?—In those cases it is suspended, and taught on Saturday, after school hours, or on Sunday.

What reason have you to believe it is suspended?—I have made inquiry, and that is the answer.

Could not the books the Society has in its possession, shew what schools are in connection both with your Society and the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Yes, the returns require the inspector to state the aid, and the quarter from whence it is procured.

Are there any schools aided by your Society that have received assistance from the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—Yes.

Are they numerous?—There are a good many that have come within my own observation.

State, as nearly as you can, how many?—Indeed I never made a memorandum of it; I have just heard the patrons say they got assistance from this fund or the other.

Do you know whether the expenditure of the Society will prove to be larger in 1824 than it was in 1823?—Much about the same.

Is the expenditure about nine thousand pounds?—Yes; several schools have been knocked up, and new ones erected. There were twenty-seven knocked up by the priests' opposition, thirty-five discontinued from different causes, and one hundred and eight new ones.

Are there any Roman Catholic priests who still avowedly and openly support the schools in connection with your Society?—Yes, Mr. Hardigan, in the county of Galway; and I believe, Mr. Ryan, of Limerick.

Are there not some in the county of Tipperary?—Yes.

Has not Dr. Armstrong, of Tipperary, nine schools in a flourishing state, in connection with your Society, and supported by the Roman Catholic clergy?—Yes, I believe they are so. The Rev. Mr. Ryan is the priest there.

Is the school of Castle Lambert in the same circumstances?—I do not know the particulars of that school.

Does not it appear in the report?—Yes, it does.

Are the whole of the children attending that school Roman Catholics?—Yes; there are some that do it secretly, and others directly in opposition to their own body; and some, that had very freely given them their approbation, have turned round and opposed them.

In consequence of superior orders?—Yes, I suppose so; it could not be a change of sentiment.

In your last report, you stated twenty six schools were under Roman Catholic priests; do you think as many are now under similar superintendence?—Some of those individuals have relinquished their support, and others who do it, do it secretly: they would not like their names to be brought forward. The clergymen I have mentioned would have no objection to it.

Do you think that the character of a proselytising society fairly attaches to the London Hibernian Society?—No, I do not.

Do you not think that it may be the tendency of your schools to induce the Roman Catholic children to become Protestants?—I think the tendency would be to point out the discrepancy between the Roman Catholic tenets and the Testament; but not from any means we use of any particular nature to induce it.

Do you mean, if conversion takes place, it will be chargeable upon the Testament and not upon your Society?—Yes; we leave it to its own operation.

Do the Society afford any reward or encouragement to the children who express a change of religion?—No, not any.

Do you not understand, that a great many of the Roman Catholic clergy in Ireland are peculiarly hostile to the schools of the London Hibernian Society?—Yes, they are.

At what time do you conceive that hostility first exhibited itself?—About April and May in the last year, the more decided opposition; I think the principals of the body generally were against scriptural instruction; but it did not come out so generally as in last May.

Have they not opposed the efforts of the London Hibernian Society, and that pretty strongly, in every year, since its operations commenced?—Yes.

Is it your impression, that in the present year that opposition has been greatly increased?—Yes, it has.

To what do you attribute that circumstance?—To the expectation of the Commissioners sitting, and to make their authority appear in its full force; and also to endeavour to get schools of their own.

Do you think if this commission had not sat, the opposition would have been as great as it has been?—No, I do not; I think they had in prospect the petitioning government to get schools of their own, to get a sum of money to carry on schools; and they wanted it to appear that nothing could be done but through them, for the education of the country.

Is it your own impression, that opposition will die away, supposing this commission was not to interfere in any way?—Yes.

SPG
 Examination of
 Captain
 George Pringle,
 7 Jan. 1825.

Do you think your schools would be as flourishing as they were before?—Yes.

Supposing this commission to be extinguished without any immediate result, in what period do you think your schools would again resume as great an appearance of prosperity as they ever possessed?—If they had no expectation of getting assistance from government to excite that opposition, as well as the commission, I think it would, in the course of six months, or perhaps longer than that, subside. I find now the children are returning; that very few schools have been altogether knocked up; the masters are standing out, and it is an unpopular measure with the people—the opposition to the schools.

Have many of the Roman Catholic masters deserted you during the late pressure?—Twenty-seven.

You say, that the children are beginning to return; have they as yet returned in any considerable numbers?—Yes, to some schools.

Would you measure by hundreds or thousands, those that have returned during the last summer?—Ten to each school, I should say.

Do you think six or seven thousand have returned?—No.

You having 670 schools, ten to each school would give that number?—Yes, it would; I think that is about the average I have considered myself. I found in one school twenty-five had returned; in one in Sligo, twenty-four had returned; and indeed a great number had returned in some places.

What has been the nature of the means resorted to by the Roman Catholic clergy?—A denunciation from the altar against the parents.

What do you understand to be the nature of those denunciations?—Calling the name out of the chapel, and then proceeding to deny them the rites of the church, confession and absolution.

Have you ever known the priest personally to interfere in those schools; that is, to go among the children, and take any particular steps to withdraw them?—Yes; he has spoken to the children, and when he has been at the school, making inquiry for the Commissioners, he has spoken to the children.

Have you ever known of any personal violence being offered by any of the Roman Catholic clergy to the children, masters or parents, in order to clear the school?—There was one schoolmaster who had been beat in consequence of opposing the clergyman who came to the school.

By whom?—Some persons who came to the place.

Have you ever known the priest himself use any violence towards the children?—I have heard of a horsewhip being used in driving the children away; I heard lately, that when children were going to school, the priest rode against a child and drove it into a ditch; it was a Protestant child, and the parents went to him and made him make an apology.

Was the child hurt?—Not much, but it might have been.

Where was the place where you heard the priest had used a horsewhip for the purpose?—I do not remember; I can mention the place where the circumstance occurred lately; I have heard very general accounts of it having been done so.

Can you state what meetings of the London Hibernian Society have been held in the South of Ireland during the course of the last summer and autumn, and at what dates?—No, I do not think I can give the dates; one at Ennis, Cork, Tralee, Limerick, at Clonmel, and Waterford.

Which of those was the earliest in date?—Ennis was the commencement.

Do you recollect the time?—I think about July.

What was the date of the meeting at Cork?—I think August.

Would you wish to add any thing to the observations you have made?—I should wish to read a letter from a schoolmaster, that would give some idea of the feelings in regard to the opposition of their clergymen; it is dated Blennerville, 8th March; the man had been employed by me about ten days previously to writing this letter:—"Sir, on yesterday I got " a severe and unjust reprimand in this parish chapel; I had the pleasure of being present
 " during the time the Latin prelate preached from the altar against myself and the scholars,
 " and commenced proving to the flock that the intention of the Society was to proselyte the " rising generation, and unless their own vigilance and the priests prevailed, in a short time
 " the community would become Protestants, swaddlers, &c. &c.; after service, I took the " liberty to ask his reverence in what manner he could prove that the charitable intentions
 " of the Society were to proselyte children; his answer was, that the perusing of the Scrip" tures would do it, and which perusal he, and all his fraternity, would oppose during their " lives; this morning another of the fraternity called on me, and requested of me to fall into
 " my former place, or that I should beg, as they were determined on setting up another
 " schoolmaster here, and that all the societies' schools through Ireland, would be dispersed
 " before the expiration of three weeks; but I gave him a plump denial, and shall keep my " word if I only have three scholars, as I consider I have the word of God on my side; I do " not fear what father Egan can do to me; I am certain he will deprive me of the greater part " of my scholars, but some I will retain, I hope; but if he gave me three or four weeks space,
 " I should so impress the utility of this school on the parishioners, that it would be impos" sible to suppress it afterwards; the parents of the scholars are to be denounced in Tralee
 " on Sunday next; may I live to hail the day that the veil of darkness and ignorance will " be dispelled from my deluded countrymen; it is no admiration that murders, rapine, and " disloyalty should be so prevalent in this country, when the rising generations are pre" vented from reading the word of God." Signed, "J Kirby."

In the report of the Society for 1824, it is stated, that there are in possession of the committee, and the Society's principal agent, several hundred copies of voluntary attestations, shewing the good faith that the institution has kept in their schools; what is the nature of those attestations?—I have got two here as specimens, we have got between three and four hundred of the same kind at Sligo.

Upon what occasions did you procure those attestations?—It was after the stir was made about education, and the petition of the Roman Catholics to Parliament, alleging that the system of education in the country was not suited to the circumstances of the country, nor to the disposition of the people.

What is the attestation?—"We, the undersigned parents of the children who receive education in the London Hibernian Society's free-school, situated in Curry, parish of Achonry and county of Sligo, having been called on by James White, teacher, to express our opinion of the merits of said school over which he presides, do acknowledge with gratitude the obligations we are under to the Society for the opportunity they have so humanely afforded for the education of our children, and do freely and solemnly testify, that although reading and committing to memory the holy Scriptures, without note or comment, is required of the reading classes by the printed regulations of the Society, no inspector, agent or schoolmaster, in the employment of the Society, has, at any time since the formation of the school, by any means directly or indirectly, sought to proselytize our children, or attach them to any religious denomination whatsoever; we further testify, that the Society's regulations, which grant payment to the master only for such of the pupils who manifest the required proficiency in the quarter previous to the day of inspection, has, in our opinion, ensured to our children a more efficient progress than they would have attained in any school we could have sent them to, had we been in circumstances to pay for their education."—[Here follow sixty-two signatures.]

How many signatures, on the average, are there to each of those certificates?—Fifty or sixty signatures, I should consider, but I have not examined them.

In what manner were those testimonials supplied to the parents of the children in those respective schools?—They were sent to the schoolmaster to go round and get them, and after he had got them, he was to make this affidavit.

Was there any inducement held out to the parents?—No, not the least.

What does the affidavit say?—"The schoolmaster of the free school aforesaid, came before me and made oath, that the printed paper, at the head of this sheet, has been read by, or in the hearing of all, and each of those whose signatures are attached to it, and that they individually signed the same, or affixed their marks."

Do you mean that each of the returns was headed by an affidavit in that manner?—Yes.

Do you not conceive that the Roman Catholic clergy of those parents would be extremely angry at them for joining in such testimonial?—Yes, they were, but the thing was done.

Did the parents sign it without consulting them?—Yes, upon their own spontaneous feeling.

Did you hear of any declining to sign it?—No, not one; I heard of one schoolmaster declining to do it, because the Society had not paid him according to his estimate of his merits.

Were those signed by persons of all religious denominations?—Yes, it mentions them.

Is it your impression that about 20,000 of such signatures were given to those testimonials?—Yes, I should think so, but I have not examined the attestations themselves; I have merely the same data that the Commissioners have.

Do you think the parents fully understood what they were doing in signing that testimonial?—Yes, distinctly.

Do you think that many of those persons who signed those testimonials, had withdrawn their children at the mandates of their priests?—No doubt.

Do you think they were willing agents in it?—I am sure they were not; it was merely by the threats of the priests.

It appears that the signatures to this are all Roman Catholics, is that generally the case?—Yes, it is.

Do you think that the denunciations of the priests have the effect of making the parents afraid of the Scriptures as a bad book, a book that may do them mischief?—I think till they see the book and are acquainted with it, they are afraid of it, but that is very quickly removed when they read it.

Have you known of any instances of adult peasantry, upon first seeing the Scriptures, declining to look further at it, or examine it, or take it in their hands?—Yes, I have.

What harm do you conceive they think it might do them?—In the first place they are afraid of disobeying the priest's injunctions, and doing a thing they must declare, upon confession, which is contrary to his direction, and having penance imposed upon them; one lad of nineteen told me, "if we read that black book, the priest tells us we shall be visited by thunder and lightning."

Are you not aware that the Roman Catholics, generally speaking, object particularly to that mode of using the Testament which is adopted in all your schools?—I think they more object to our use of it than other institutions, because it requires committing it to memory.

You are aware that they object to the using it as a task book at all in schools, without reference to your's or any particular Society?—Yes.

And a still further objection to the getting it by heart?—Yes.

Which are the two modes in which it is used in your school?—Yes.

Do you know whether they go so far as to say, that is a step towards proselytising?—In the the letter of the schoolmaster it is so stated, that it has been so considered; they say the Scriptures themselves will do it.

That the use of the Scriptures, as employed in your schools, is considered a step to proselytism?—Yes.

Are any members of the London Hibernian Society, members of the society established for the purpose of propagating the principles of the reformation?—Yes, I think one of them is; I think Mr. Gordon is one.

Gentlemen,

Dublin, January 13th, 1825.

As I find I have omitted in that part of my examination, relative to the religious denominations of the agents of the London Hibernian Society, to mention a class whose valuable assistance the Society enjoys gratuitously, in paying the teachers in the several school districts, keeping depôts of books, and otherwise advancing the objects of the institution, I would beg to be permitted to add it to my testimony; as for the circumstance of gratuitous labour from highly respectable gentlemen, principally clergymen of the established church, and magistrates, and only three of the thirty-five being dissenters, it must have an important bearing on the character and proceedings of the Society. I beg to accompany this letter with a list of their names and places of residence.

Appendix, N° 243.

Further Examination of Captain George Pringle, Thursday 13th January 1825.

IS there any thing particular you wish to mention with reference to your examination on a former day?—I omitted to mention the district agents, whose duty it is to pay the masters in each of their districts, and also to keep depôts of books.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
13 Jan. 1825.

Is this in explanation of any answer you gave in your preceding examination, or in addition to it?—In addition to it; there was one part of my examination that went to ascertain the religious denomination of the agents of the Society. I was asked, why so large a proportion was dissenters, and this I consider to have an important bearing upon that matter; these gentlemen are principally clergymen of the established church, and only three dissenters among them.

How many from the class you have been speaking of?—Thirty-five, and three out of them are dissenters.

Are the other thirty-two of the church of England?—Yes; I have sent in a list, specifying their names and their places of residence.

How would you describe the class you are now adverting to; what do you call them, and what are their duties?—They are district agents; they pay the masters of the schools who teach in their particular districts; they keep depôts of books, and otherwise forward the objects of the Society.

By books, do you mean the Testaments and spelling-books?—Yes, and the rolls and class papers.

In what manner do those clergymen become connected with the Society?—Their own offer.

Do you apply to them in the first place?—Yes; they are persons who have shewn an interest in the Society, and then we apply to them; sometimes they have come and voluntarily offered.

Is your object in making that explanation in order to mark, that there is not an exclusive preference in the Society for dissenters?—Yes it is.

Have you any other explanation you wish to give?—With respect to the proportion of Roman Catholics in attendance at the schools, I said, rather under two-thirds; my impression, from consulting some documents, is, that it is rather above two-thirds.

What do you conceive is the actual number in attendance on the schools of the Society of all denominations?—Very near 30,000.

Which do you mean; that that number is probably this day in the schools, or upon the rolls?—No; there are 50,000 upon the rolls, and 30,000 were at the examination last quarter, and the masters were paid for them; besides those, there were some absentees from the inspection, who were in general in attendance, and some rejected for want of proficiency.

What proportion of the 20,000 that were absent had been withdrawn by the Roman Catholic clergy; of course the question does not consider it possible to obtain an answer with any thing like accuracy, but we wish for your general impression?—I should think, an average of ten to each school, would include them; I mean the difference between those who passed the examination and those in actual attendance, but who do not appear, because they were rejected, or were absent the particular day, although they had been in the school in the quarter.

The question is, what proportion of the difference between the 30,000 and the 50,000 do you conceive have been withdrawn by the efforts of the Roman Catholic clergy?—Probably, about 14,000.

You think 14,000 of the 50,000 have been withdrawn by the Roman Catholic clergy?—Yes.

What number do you conceive was on the rolls of the Society this day twelvemonth?—Seventy-one thousand, I think it was.

What then have become of the 21,000 that constitute the difference between the 71,000 on the roll this day twelvemonth, and the 50,000 now on the rolls?—The 50,000 took in only the day schools; there are some that have been struck off the list, that have got articles and books, and the masters have been paid, and the pupils have got a certain degree of instruction; they must go with the account.

Suppose that a statement of the attendance during the last year, was constructed upon the same principles and in the same form that give 50,000 as the result at present; what would the attendance appear to have been a year ago, as nearly as you can state?—Very nearly the same number.

Do you conceive there was a greater number upon the roll this day twelvemonth, than there is at present?—No, I do not think there has been a greater number; I think there have been a good many new schools added, that more than counterbalance those that have been struck off.

Are we to collect that it is your impression, that during the last twelve months the schools have not lost above 14,000 pupils by the interference of the Roman Catholic clergy?—Yes; that is my impression.

Are the Sunday schools included in that number of 50,000?—No.

Is there any thing further you would wish to state as supplemental to your evidence upon the last day?—Not in direct reference to the proceedings of the Society.

Is there any further communication you would wish to make to us?—I would mention something I have met with, with respect to the conduct of the Roman Catholic clergy towards myself and the schools; a question was asked, with respect to the deficiency between the twenty-six schools in connection with the Roman Catholic clergy formerly, and the small number in connection now; several of those gentlemen approved to myself of the principles of the Society, and then they turned round and shifted, which has impaired my confidence in them, generally.

Did they assign to you any reason for that change of conduct?—No, they did not; I had intercourse with them of a particular nature; I was at the house of one for a night, and we entered entered very generally into the proceedings of the Society, and the plan of it; he expressed his high approbation of it, and wished to have a third school established in his parish, and subscribed to the Society for that purpose, and now he has turned round.

At what period did he express his approbation?—In March last.

Did he subscribe some of his own money?—Yes, he did.

You cannot doubt then the sincerity of any approbation he had intimated?—I cannot doubt it, because we had a good deal of familiar intercourse.

Do you not think his subsequent conduct may have arisen from the positive orders received from his superiors, though his opinion may have remained unchanged?—No; because I understand he has spoken from the altar against the Society, in a way which he must have known not to be correct; he said, the children were taught the Scriptures when they could say b a, ba, which the people exclaimed against.

Where was this?—In the county of Kerry at Ardfert.

Is the school of Ardfert in existence at present?—Yes.

Have you any means of stating how many children are in attendance upon it?—No.

That was one of the very best schools of the Society in Munster?—Yes, it was one of the most efficient.

Have you a good opinion of the master now in charge of that school?—No; he has been dismissed.

The master whom the Commissioners found there in the month of September last, has he been dismissed?—I do not exactly remember the time he was dismissed, I only heard of it from the inspector, his name was Fevier; he was dismissed.

For what cause?—The inspector left his pocket book in the school, and missed it, and returned after he had been absent a very short time; the man said he knew nothing of it, and afterwards it was discovered he had taken it, by offering a note that was recognized.

Was that the sole cause of his dismissal?—Yes.

Has any successor been appointed?—Yes.

Have you any means of knowing whether there are any Roman Catholic children in attendance at the school at Ardfert?—Yes, there are some.

Do you suppose there are ten or twenty?—There are twenty, I should think; I have a document that will explain what I have been stating; this (producing a paper) is a letter from a Roman Catholic curate, who applied to me to get a school established in connection with the Society, to which he and the priest were to subscribe; he had objected to the schools, but from experience of their operation, had come over to be a friend to them; after this school, for which he applied, had been established, he wrote to the inspector under me at the time, this letter, of which the following is an extract:

“ And now permit me to say how much personal regard you have inspired me with, and the warm wish I feel for a wide diffusion of the principles of your benevolent Society. I have heard sinister constructions put on their establishments and motives, but I could see nothing in this but a puny narrow-minded spirit, that would sacrifice a great public good to imaginary evil; yet, probably, there is some remote foundation for the apprehension entertained respecting English benevolence; it is very rare with poor Ireland to receive any thing but injury and infliction from England, and from a series of harsh treatment, we can scarcely deem the present aid sincerely intended for our good. I often try to persuade my poor countrymen, that a new era is commencing of liberality and kindness, and may we all witness its rapid progress!”

What is the date of that letter?—5th of March 1824.

What is the name of the place of residence of the writer?—Gunsborough, in the county of Kerry; it is signed “ W. Walsh.”

The Commissioners do not comprehend with sufficient clearness, in looking back to your former evidence, what is your own impression as to the extent of the number of instances in which adults have renounced the communion of the church of Rome, and embraced that of the Protestant religion?—It is very difficult for me to state the exact number; the general impression is, from what I have met with myself, quite unexpectedly, and what I have heard from Mr. Blest, the number may amount to 100; but I wish to be very cautious upon that; I have taken no note of it.

In what district of country were those individuals principally found?—Principally in Connaught and Ulster, and there was one in Cork; in explanation of the letter I have read, I would just state that that gentleman is now a violent opposer of the schools.

Is any reason assigned for it?—No, not the least; the master was of his own appointment, and the school was held in the chapel; he established an opposition school in the chapel, and turned the man out, who would not connect himself with him, but who is in connection with the Society, and has about 50 pupils.

What did he get from the Society?—One shilling for each child who passed the quarterly examination.

No lumping sum?—No; we do that when the school is very much reduced, not from his own fault, to support him.

Have you any converts in that neighbourhood?—No.

Is the master a Roman Catholic?—Yes.

Do you know whether the master continued to perform his duties as a Roman Catholic?—I cannot answer that.

You would not disapprove of him if he had ceased to do so?—No.

Is it your wish through the medium of these schools, that Roman Catholics should become, according to your view of their present situation, more enlightened?—Certainly.

That they should cease to be Roman Catholics?—My wish is, not that they should cease

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
13 Jan. 1825.

to be Roman Catholics without conviction or reason for it; but if they should be convinced from Scripture, that they should follow up the conviction from this sentiment, whatever it may lead to.

Is it your wish they should become convinced they are at present in error?—Yes.

Is it one of your objects to give effect to that wish in establishing schools?—Merely in the general way of Scripture information.

I am not considering the means but the end you seek?—My wish is, that a person should be brought from error.

And you think making Roman Catholic children read the Scriptures, and commit portions of them to memory, without learning any catechism, may produce the end you seek?—I think so, from the discrepancies between the tenets of the Roman Catholics and the Scriptures.

That it may make the Roman Catholics become Protestants?—Yes.

What species of Protestant do you wish them to become?—I have no wish upon that point.

Whether Protestants of the church of England, or of the Presbyterian church of Scotland, Protestants professing Arian principles, or otherwise?—I should wish them to adopt what I consider nearest the truth.

Which do you consider nearest the truth?—I belong to the church of Scotland, and have a preference for that; but I have no doctrinal objection to the church of England. I would rather they became members of the church of England.

Are you aware that a considerable number of persons who call themselves Protestants in Ireland, and who may have been Roman Catholics, profess what is called Arianism?—Yes.

Would you wish that the Roman Catholics, by reading the Scriptures, should become Arians?—No.

Which would be most desirable, that they should become Arians, or remain Roman Catholics?—Remain Roman Catholics.

Is there any particular doctrine you would wish them to embrace, from reading the Scriptures, in exchange for the doctrines they profess?—I should wish they should have clearer views of the character and the work of the Saviour, and rest more upon him than upon the particular ground they do rest upon.

Do you understand what the ground is that they do rest upon?—Those I have spoken to, depend a great deal upon the absolution they get from the priest.

Do you understand what they consider an essential condition of that absolution?—They have told me they must make confession.

Any thing else?—They say repentance.

They have told you also repentance?—Yes; but repentance connected with penances.

Have they told you also, it would be necessary for them to make satisfaction to those they had injured?—I have understood so generally.

Are you aware of the doctrine of the church of England as to absolution?—I am aware of the absolution at the beginning of the church service.

Are you aware of the absolution in the service, for the sick?—I am.

Are you aware of any difference between that absolution and the absolution given by the church of Rome?—I have never heard of an instance where that absolution has been given to any person in the church of England.

I am not asking what may have been given, but the principles upon which the church teaches it may be given?—I have not considered the subject sufficiently to state the distinction which I think there is.

Are you aware of any distinction between the two churches upon that point?—I think there is a most essential difference between the doctrines of the church of England and the church of Rome.

I am speaking of the doctrine upon which you consider the Roman Catholics particularly in error, and which you stated as the first, upon which you wished to enlighten them; are you aware of any difference in the doctrine of absolution as taught by the church of England, and that taught by the church of Rome?—The church of England requires no penances.

Do you consider that penance is an additional requisition in the church of Rome?—I do.

Do you consider in any other respect there is any difference between the church of England and the church of Rome, upon the point of absolution?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the doctrine of the church of England to answer that.

You have stated you wished Roman Catholics to become members of the established church, and you have stated the doctrine of absolution as one of those grounds upon which you wished it, wishing them to change, upon the ground of that doctrine; what do you conceive to be the doctrine in each church, or what do you conceive to be the difference in doctrine that makes it essential for you to wish them to change?—The dependence that the Roman Catholics put upon the priest, from the idea they have of his character, gives quite a different character and complexion to the doctrine of the church of Rome, in that respect.

Do you know in point of fact, what the doctrine of the church of England is?—I have read over the absolution in the service for the sick, that you allude to, but it is so very obsolete, that it is not regarded.

Have you read the visitation for the sick, or a book upon the visitation of the sick, published by Doctor Mant, a bishop of the church of Ireland?—No; I have merely read that in the Prayer-book.

Do you mean to say you have any means of knowing that the clergy of the church of England

Captain

England do not pronounce that absolution?—I have made inquiry, and have understood that they do not.

Have you ever examined into the doctrine as explained in the Roman Catholic church?—Not very minutely; the impression I took up is from my intercourse with the people.

You have stated that you rather preferred having Roman Catholic teachers?—Yes.

Why do you prefer having Roman Catholic teachers?—Because they are a great deal more acceptable to the people, and it takes away the handle of the priests when they say the Society is a proselyting Society.

But many of your teachers become Protestants, and then you continue them?—Yes, or they become readers; they generally lose their school.

Do you not conceive, that a Protestant who has become so after being a Roman Catholic, is much more obnoxious to the Roman Catholics than if he had never been so?—Yes.

Do you not generally hope, that the Roman Catholics you employ as masters will become Protestants?—I should wish them to get a clear view of the doctrines of the Scriptures, and to follow them conscientiously.

Do you not wish them to become Protestants?—I do not wish them to become nominal Protestants.

Do you not wish them to become convinced they are in error as Roman Catholics?—Yes.

Then how do you reconcile the wish of having persons who were Roman Catholics, in order to please the Roman Catholics, with the wish of having converts, who must become more disagreeable to them than if they were originally Protestants.

It is not a necessary effect that they should become so, and it is generally some time before they do; the school is carried on for a considerable time in that way, and people go to the school and become acquainted with it, and then they are able to judge for themselves of its merits.

If they would originally object if the person was a Protestant, do you not think when your wishes are effected by the person becoming a Protestant who was a Roman Catholic, they would object more strongly than before?—Yes, to that person they would.

Do you not in some degree, in wishing to have Roman Catholics appointed masters, contemplate the conversion of those persons through their connection with your Society?—Yes, I do.

Is not that in some degree an operating motive in your mind in wishing to have persons who are Roman Catholics appointed masters to your schools?—Yes, it is.

Have you had any correspondence or communication with a Society lately established in Ireland for promoting the principles of the Reformation?—No, I have not.

Has your Society had many meetings in Ireland lately?—Yes, it has.

During the present year?—Yes.

With a view to the extension of your system?—Yes, generally.

Did those meetings take place in the months of August and September last?—Yes, about that time; I am not in possession of the dates.

Were there any gentlemen deputed by the Society in England to attend those meetings in Ireland?—The only two gentlemen that attended were Mr. Noel and Mr. Gordon, but I am not aware that they were officially deputed.

Those gentlemen proceeded through the country, and attended different meetings?—Yes, they did.

Did they proceed to attend those meetings about the period at which the Commissioners before whom you are at present, were proceeding upon their tours for the purpose of visiting the schools through the country to ascertain the state of education?—It was in July they began, and I am not exactly aware of the time the Commissioners were on their tour.

Are you aware it was immediately after the issuing of this commission?—Yes, I am.

You have stated, that some of the Roman Catholic clergy who originally were friendly to your Society, have subsequently become hostile to it?—Yes.

Do you conceive their hostility may be in any manner attributed to the knowledge that your Society had been active in the way of making converts?—That has been the general reason assigned for it.

Do you conceive that that may be the cause why persons who originally supported the schools afterwards opposed them?—I think that, in some of the instances I have alluded to, those gentlemen were perfectly aware of the principles and proceedings of the Society, and there has been no alteration since, therefore I do not think that could have been the reason.

Did you avow to them that your object was to make converts?—No, I did not, I put them in possession of the rules of the Society, and mentioned the proceedings, and invited them to become visitors.

Was it ever stated to them, that in framing those rules, and establishing schools, you expected to promote the conversion of Roman Catholics?—No; I do not think it was.

You publish reports from year to year?—Yes.

Are the reports published in Ireland precisely the same as those published in England?—There are no reports published in Ireland.

Are there any accounts of your proceedings of any nature published and circulated in Ireland, different from those circulated in England?—There are some smaller reports that have not the appendix.

Do the reports published in Ireland contain the letters which appear in the reports published in England, with accounts of conversions?—All the reports are published in England, some having the appendix, and some without it; those without the appendix are more generally circulated in Ireland.

Do those reports which are generally circulated in Ireland, contain the letters, giving an account

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,

account of the conversions?—Those reports having the appendix, are those that have the letters containing the conversions; those are not so generally circulated in Ireland as those without the appendix.

Which are most generally circulated in England, the reports with the appendix, or the reports without the appendix?—I should think the reports with the appendix; I have not been in England since I have been connected with the Society; I have got some with me to take over to Scotland without the appendix.

Do you know the reason of the difference in the circulation; why one should be prepared for English, and the other for Irish circulation?—In the first place they are a great deal too expensive, and in the next place they would excite a great deal of prejudice against the Society.

If it was known, you mean, what effects were produced by the proceedings?—Yes; if those letters as to the conversions were circulated in Ireland it would create a prejudice.

You have stated that several of your officers were converts from the church of Rome?—Yes.

Are any of them converts from the established church to the Independent congregations?—I believe Mr. Blest himself, when a young man, was of the established church.

The question alluded to your inspectors?—Of the inspectors I do not recollect any; there are eleven inspectors.

Or readers?—I really do not know one; I cannot very distinctly give information upon the point.

Of what description of persons are your inspectors generally composed?—Some of them have been schoolmasters; a good many of them I think about that class of life.

Have you ever had occasion to remove any for misconduct?—Yes, we have.

Were those persons any of them converts?—Yes, one was a convert I think; but it was before I was in connection with the Society; it is what I have heard only.

Have the persons who have ceased to be Roman Catholics been received into the established church, or into the Presbyterian church, or into any church having any particular confession of faith?—Yes, they have, a number of them; others have not I believe.

Into what churches have they been received?—Some into the Established church, some into the Independents, and some into the Baptists.

In what way would a Roman Catholic, ceasing to be a Roman Catholic, desiring to be received into a church of Independents, be so received?—He would be examined by the clergyman and by the deacons, as to his belief.

Would he then sign any declaration of faith?—Intimation would be given that such a person would apply for admission; the thing would be intrusted to those deacons, in conjunction with the minister; and after they had satisfied themselves, an intimation would be given that they were satisfied, and they would request him to be admitted.

Have the Independents any particular confession of faith?—I do not know of any one published.

Have they any one not published?—I do not know.

Have they any catechism?—No.

What are the doctrines touching which the Roman Catholic convert is examined?—In reference to his own personal views as a sinner in the sight of God, and as to the ground of his hopes of salvation.

How is the Roman Catholic to ascertain what are the doctrines which, as an Independent, he is to profess, before he becomes an Independent?—Either by hearing one of their ministers or conversing with him, or conversing with some of the members themselves.

You do not know that the Independents have any particular articles or creed?—No.

Are you aware of any difference in doctrinal matters between the Independents and the church of Scotland?—No, not one.

You have said that the conversion of a Roman Catholic from error to truth would give satisfaction to you and to your Society; probably it is your wish that every person whom you consider to be in ignorance or error, of whatever religious denomination he may be, should, through the instrumentality of the Society, particularly by reading the Scriptures, be brought to a knowledge of the truth?—Yes.

Is it your opinion that members of the Established church or Presbyterians may individually be in error and ignorance as to what you consider to be the truth declared in Scripture?—I think there are a great many nominal Christians among members of the Established church and the Presbyterian church, and I should wish them to be brought to a knowledge of the Scriptures.

You mean that those who should by ignorance entertain false conceptions of the truth as individuals, and not as members of the Protestant church, that they equally with Roman Catholics should by those means be brought to a knowledge of what you conceive to be the truth?—Yes.

You conceive that a Protestant being a bad man must be in error?—Yes.

You have spoken repeatedly of conversion; explain what you mean by the term?—To be led to take right views of the character of God as he is displayed in the person of his Son.

According to that definition do you think that there are some members of the church of Scotland who still require to be converted?—Yes.

Do you think the same of members of the Established church?—Yes.

Do you think the same of the members of the Roman Catholic church?—Yes.

Do you use the word conversion in reference to any one of those churches in a sense different from what you do to the other?—No, certainly not.

Do you conceive the church of Scotland to be right in her notions of God?—Yes.

You

*Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
13 Jan. 1825.*

You therefore consider that all faithful members of the church of Scotland have a right knowledge of God?—Yes.

Do you conceive the same of the church of England?—Yes.

Do you conceive the same of the church of Rome?—No.

Then a man who is of the church of Rome, to be brought to a right knowledge of God, must, according to your notions, abjure his church?—Yes.

Then the conversion of a Roman Catholic necessarily means the abandonment of the Roman Catholic religion, the conversion of a Protestant means the abandonment of any errors he may have been subject to, but does not necessarily imply a change of church?—Yes, but I would explain; I think there may be persons who remain nominally in the church of Rome who do not hold all the errors in the very palpable way in which they appear to me; I would answer the other directly, and at the same time I would qualify it in that particular respect.

You conceive the church of Scotland does not teach any errors?—Yes.

You conceive the church of England does not teach any errors of doctrine?—Yes.

But you conceive the church of Rome does teach errors?—Yes.

And therefore when you seek the conversion of a Roman Catholic, you wish him to abjure what you conceive to be the errors of the church of Rome?—Yes.

Would you conceive the conversion of a Roman Catholic was perfect while he continued to seek the aid and intercession of saints?—No, I should not.

Would you consider a Roman Catholic who left the Roman Catholic church and joined the Protestant church, necessarily thereby became a convert in the sense which you entertain of that term, that is to say, a convert to the full knowledge of the truth as it is in the Scriptures?—I should not count him as a convert.

Suppose him to have left the church of Rome, but to have become a nominal member of a Protestant church, would you apply the term convert to that person?—No, I would not.

You would consider that a perfect Protestant strictly adhering to the doctrines of the church of Scotland, or the church of England, did not require conversion?—Yes, I should.

But you would consider a Roman Catholic strictly adhering to all the doctrines of the church of Rome, would require conversion?—I should consider that persons belonging to the churches of Scotland and England would require conversion, because many of them are so nominally, and their minds have never been instructed.

The question was, whether you would consider that a member of the church of England, or the church of Scotland, who faithfully adhered to the practices and doctrines of either of those churches, would require conversion?—No.

Would you consider that a member of the church of Rome, who faithfully adhered to and practised the whole of the doctrines of the church of Rome, would require conversion?—Yes, I should.

Do you consider that a very considerable number of members of the church of Scotland deserve the appellation of unconverted persons, or would you apply the term unconverted to the religious state of a great many individuals of your own church?—I would apply the term unconverted to a very considerable number of the members of my own church.

In the sense of the word unconverted, as applied to many members of your own church, what, precisely, would you mean by it?—I think that they have no right knowledge of the leading tenets of the church of Scotland.

What are the tenets of the church of Scotland, which, speaking of those persons as a class, you would say they were deficient in the knowledge of?—Of themselves, as guilty in the sight of God; the evil of sin; the threatenings of God; the consequences of sin, and the way of salvation through a Saviour.

By conversion do you mean they are brought to a right knowledge of those particulars?—Yes, I do; by conversion such a man is enabled to form a right estimate of his own character and of the character of God, as displayed in his Son.

When you speak of the conversion of Protestants of the church of Scotland, or of Protestants of the church of England, you speak of the conversion of persons remaining in one or other of those churches?—Yes.

When you speak of the conversion of a Roman Catholic, you speak of the conversion of a person giving up the particular doctrines of the church of Rome?—I should think that would follow.

You do not conceive that a Roman Catholic can be said to have been brought to a knowledge of the truth while he holds those peculiar doctrines of the church of Rome, that the church of Scotland and the church of England consider to be errors?—No, I do not.

Does that opinion arise from your view, that those particular doctrines of the Roman Catholic church are not conformable to the Scriptures in your understanding of the Scriptures?—Yes.

Is it a direct and great object of your Society to spread a more general knowledge of the Scriptures among all classes of persons of whatever denomination?—Yes, it is.

Can you state any doctrine held by the church of England which you as a member of the church of Scotland object to?—No, I cannot.

Can you state any doctrine of the church of Scotland which, as far as you know or conceive, a member of the church of England would object to?—No, I cannot.

Do you mean, then, that the difference between the churches is limited to matters of church government and discipline, and not of doctrine?—Yes, I do.

Would you extend the same observations, so far as you are acquainted, to the relation in which the church of England and the Independents stand as to each other?—Yes, I would.

Are we to understand that you mean that all those three churches, according to your notions,

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,

notions, agree in all matters of doctrine and all differ from the Roman Catholic church?
—Yes.

Do you mean, that all those points upon which the Roman Catholic church differs from those three churches are, according to your notions, essential errors?—Yes.

Do you conceive, in order to complete what you call the conversion of a Roman Catholic, that any formal recantation, or any formal acknowledgement of the doctrines of any of those three churches, is necessary?—No.

Do you know whether, in point of fact, in the instances of the conversions of adult persons, to which you have already more than once referred, such recantation has been usual, or at all existed?—I do not think it has at all existed, and I think some of them remain in the church of Rome, but do not go through all the forms of that church; they do not hold the particular doctrines which I have alluded to, as, in my opinion, essentially erroneous; they do not go to mass; they do not confess.

Do they not go to communion?—No, they do not.

They do not invoke the aid of saints?—No.

They do not hold the doctrine of transubstantiation?—No.

In short, they cease to be Roman Catholics in spirit, although in form they continue?—They have not joined any other church.

They attend no place of worship?—No; I believe they meet among themselves.

Do you believe that any of those persons still affect to profess the Roman Catholic religion?—I do not think it is really affectation; I think they have not come to a distinct resolution upon the matter.

They do not avow themselves Protestants?—No; they do not.

Though they have ceased to be Roman Catholics?—Yes, in the way I have mentioned.

Did you mean to convey, by your answer to a former question, that any individuals who had ceased to be Roman Catholics, and had become Protestants, had formerly read a recantation?—No.

What did you mean when you talked of being examined?—I said, they were examined to ascertain whether they were in a state of mind to authorize the persons of that church to admit them into communion.

Must they not, in order to shew that they were in such a state of mind, disclaim those doctrines of the church of Rome which Independents consider erroneous?—I am not sure that that would follow; I do not think it would be asked them; the impression on my mind is, that they just ascertain the state of mind of the person with respect to moral feelings.

Do you conceive a Roman Catholic would be admitted a member of an Independent church while holding the doctrine of the invocation of saints and of transubstantiation?—No, I include that in the moral state of the mind.

Would you not consider it very shocking hypocrisy on the part of any person who had given up those doctrines in his heart, to profess himself, for worldly purposes, a Roman Catholic?—Yes, if he did it to deceive; but if the man's mind was not made up, I should not say so.

Would you not also consider it very shocking hypocrisy if he held those doctrines in his heart, that he should profess himself an Independent?—Indeed I should.

Do you not think there are many persons who have great difficulty in severing themselves from what they consider the ancient mother church, and yet have come to a conviction in their own minds, that in the long process of time she has become subject to error and corruption?—Yes.

May not such then, as much as hypocrisy, be in fact the motives of persons in the situation you have described as hesitating in the step they should take?—Yes, I think that is one of the great causes of hesitation.

You do not conceive that any persons in connection with your Society continue outwardly to profess the Roman Catholic religion, with a view to being considered such by their neighbours, and treated as such by them?—I do not know of any individual who does so.

I ask as to your suspicions?—I have met with some persons whose sincerity, as to moral sentiment and feeling, I had not a perfect confidence in; what their object was I could not say; I do not think their object could be that of self-interest; as to the schools, they get no advantage from them.

Would not a Roman Catholic, who professed himself a Protestant, be likely to lose his school?—Yes.

Might he not then continue to profess himself a Roman Catholic, when he was in his heart a Protestant, to prevent prejudice against him?—Yes.

Do you not think that that feeling, as much as any other, induces persons to appear outwardly Roman Catholics, when they have ceased to be so in their hearts?—The dread of the opposition they would meet with from their priests has a great influence upon them.

Do they continue Roman Catholics outwardly, when they are convinced in their hearts of the errors of the church of Rome?—Yes.

On the other hand, have you not known or had cause for suspicion that persons who have been retained by you as schoolmasters have, in truth, remained members of the Roman Catholic church, after having persuaded you they had seen the errors of that church, and were heart and soul in your service, for the same purpose of deceit, although, for the particular purposes of the employment, it was not convenient for them to avow the change?—Yes, I have.

And who have endeavoured to persuade you and the Society that they were changed, although although in fact they remained just as they were originally?—I have not met with any that endeavoured to persuade me or the Society; it is a point I do not inquire into.

Do you mean to say you have known any and what instances of Roman Catholics pretending to be Protestants, who really were not such?—Yes.

Describe the occasions upon which you have met with such persons, and the motives you ascribe to them?—I cannot call any particular instance to mind to furnish me with an example; I think the thing may have taken place; I have heard of persons being deceived.

Have there fallen within the scope of your own observation any instances of Roman Catholics who professed to have become Protestants, but still remained in the Roman Catholic church; and in case any such instances have fallen within your observation, what motives you attributed to such persons?—I do not recollect any such instances.

Then, what do you mean by your answer to a former question, that you conceived the instances not to be infrequent?—From general impression; I have heard persons say there is a convert, but he does not appear to be sincere.

What do you mean by sincere?—His motives are not pure.

What motives do you conceive were by such conversion attributed perhaps tacitly to such person; what object do you conceive he had to advance by an outward profession of faith he did not really feel?—I speak without reference to a particular case, but there might have been such with respect to a parish school.

Do you mean a parish school connected with the London Hibernian Society?—Yes.

Do you think they might imagine they would be more agreeable to the Society if they were converts than Roman Catholics?—No; I think it was for the sake of getting the situation. Mr. Walker's school is a parish school.

And to which aid would be afforded by the clergyman of the parish?—Yes; I do not think they consider they would serve the Society by becoming Protestants.

Have you any Roman Catholic inspectors?—No.

Have you inspectors who were Roman Catholics and are converts?—Yes.

Have you ever appointed any persons whom you believed to be sincere Roman Catholics?—No.

Have you appointed converts?—Yes, because they have recommended themselves in subordinate situations.

Have you employed any readers from among the converts?—Yes.

Have you employed any readers to act as readers, while they continued sincere Roman Catholics?—They must have shewn a disposition for reading the Scriptures, and an anxiety to read them for themselves, and to circulate the information of the Scriptures.

In point of fact, are there any persons whom you believe to be sincere Roman Catholics, holding the doctrines of the church of Rome, and practising them, now employed by you as readers?—There are some still Roman Catholics, but I do not know to what extent they hold the tenets; there is a difference in that respect as to the Scriptures; they seem anxious to read them and make them known.

Are there any Roman Catholics who continue to practise the doctrines of the church of Rome, and attend the sacraments of the church of Rome, employed by you as readers?—I think the priest's opposition would prevent them receiving the rites of the church, if they remained in that employment.

In point of fact, are there any persons employed by you as readers, who, according to your belief and judgment, continue members of the church of Rome, holding all the doctrines of that church?—My acquaintance with the readers is not very intimate; my residence is very short at Sligo. I hear of these things in a general way in reading over the journals. I have met with one or two in a casual way, who said they were Roman Catholics; they said they read the Scriptures. I put questions to them, and they answered me as to their proceedings.

From the answers they gave you, do you conceive they continued to hold all the doctrines of the church of Rome?—I do not think they hold the character of the priest in the same sacred light that other persons do who have not read the Scriptures.

Do you think that the people, who have not read the Scriptures, think that the priest has a greater power than those who have read the Scriptures?—Yes; I think the people who do not read the Scriptures, consider that he is the deputy of God on earth.

What particular powers do you suppose the persons who have not read the Scriptures attribute to the priests, which those who have read the Scriptures are disposed to doubt?—In the first place, they attribute miraculous powers to them; they believe they can affect their temporal state and eternal happiness.

Proceed to enumerate any other powers you conceive such persons attribute to the priests?—That they could change them into a goat or a hare.

Have you ever met with any well authenticated expressions of those opinions?—Yes, I have met with them myself; that of being changed into a goat or a hare.

In what manner did these circumstances fall under your notice?—I endeavour to get into conversation with the people, to ascertain their sentiments, and get a knowledge of what they think of the Scriptures, and then this information has come out.

Do you conceive, that such of the peasantry as have read the Scriptures with any degree of attention, do not believe that the priest could turn them into a goat or a hare?—Yes; I have been surprised how soon their opinions have been changed.

Will you describe the rank in life of the persons who have held such extreme opinions as to the power of the priest you have referred to?—The peasantry generally of the country that I have come in contact with; persons who probably had very small farms.

Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
13 Jan. 1825.

Do you think those persons were in general able to read and write?—Not in general; some of them could. The peasantry in those places generally could not.

Do you mean to say, that this impression is general in the district?—I think it is very general.

Did you pick it up in a general way, or from any particular individual?—I have asked questions of the same nature in different counties, and I have found the same thing existing.

As to the same particular power?—The same expressions were not mentioned, but the feelings they had in their minds were very similar.

That the priests could change them into goats and hares?—Yes; that he had a miraculous power that could affect their substance in any way.

Do you believe that to be the impression of the peasantry generally?—Yes, I do.

Do you mean to extend it to all parts of the country?—I have met with it in Cork, Waterford, Kerry, Galway, and in Clare.

Do you conceive the county of Mayo to be more enlightened than the counties you have mentioned?—I have not asked the question there.

Would it be disagreeable to you to state the particular occurrence of any such conversation with an individual?—I will mention the first. In going to the Isles of Arran, at the mouth of the bay of Galway, I found the people there generally in a very ignorant state; one man, the captain of a hooker, who was taking me from one island to another. I got into conversation with and told him the nature of the school; he was exceedingly indisposed to send his child, in consequence of the priest's opposition. I wished to reason him out of attending to the priest in that matter; but he said, it was a great advantage to himself and his family. He spoke of the priest's power, and what he could do. I doubted it; he said, the other day, when he (the priest) was going from one island to the other, a sudden surf arose, and nearly swamped his boat; and the priest sat upon the stern of the boat, and baled the boat dry with the word of his mouth.

Can you mention any other instance?—I met a lad between the counties of Waterford and Cork, and I got into conversation with him; he was about nineteen; he could not read. I spoke to him about the Testament; to know whether he had ever heard of the book. From some conversation, and endeavouring to instil some principles of a religious nature into his mind, not in reference to proselytism from one creed to another, but to enlighten his understanding, he discovered I was asking him about the Bible; he said, you are speaking of the black book. I was shocked at his using such an expression, as applied to the Bible. He said, the priest tells us if we read it we shall be visited with thunders and lightnings. He also said, the priest could change him into a hare or goat upon the spot.

Have you known of any instances in which they attribute particular powers to their clergy over the success of their crops in husbandry?—I think, generally, they have an idea that the priest's curse would affect their substance, whether in reference to crops or cows; or if going out in a boat, that the boat will sink with them.

Has it fallen within your experience to observe what particular powers they attribute to their clergy as to their own final admission into heaven?—I think they depend upon the absolution of the priest as a passport to heaven; they have told me why; how can we do any thing further; he will allow us to die like pigs.

Do you conceive that any educated Roman Catholics entertain the notions you have now stated?—I think persons who can read do. I do not immediately recall a particular instance of a person of a higher description: I think there are some who have a very superstitious feeling in that respect.

Do you think the notions you have stated to prevail among the general body of the peasantry of Ireland, prevail among the educated parts of the Roman Catholics of Ireland?—My intercourse with them has not been much, and I have not had an opportunity of ascertaining their views. My feeling is, that of the educated, many would not feel that; but at the same time I have felt surprised at persons holding the opinions they stated to me.

Have you ever found among the Protestants any superstitious feelings as to the clergymen or ministers?—I recollect speaking to one man, a Presbyterian, who thought that the priests had that power; but I am certain he had not the idea that his own minister had. I do not recollect any other instance.

Have you ever seen the lives of the early followers or ministers in connection with John Wesley?—No, I have not.

Have you had any opportunities of observing the opinions of the people as to the power of the priest over evil spirits?—No; but I have distinctly over diseases, not over evil spirits.

Over what particular diseases?—I think I have met with persons who had that idea.

Are there any particular diseases you have found them suppose the priests' to possess an influence over?—I have met with them, having that sentiment in reference to several diseases. It seemed to me to be the general idea in all diseases.

Is it your meaning, that you suppose that many persons, who hold such extravagant notions as you have above stated, as to the power of the clergy to turn them into hares and goats, are persons who have learnt and are able to repeat the Roman Catholic catechism?—Yes.

Is that distinctly your opinion?—Yes.

Have you ever seen a Roman Catholic catechism?—Yes, Butler's.

Have you ever examined any of those persons who had those strange notions about being changed from manhood to goathood in the catechism?—No.

Why do you suppose that those persons understood the catechism?—They appeared to be acquainted with it.

21
Examination of
Captain
George Pringle,
13 Jan. 1825.

The particular individual who supposed the priest could turn him into a hare or a goat?—The persons I had conversed with.

Did the persons who told you they thought the priest could convert them into hares and goats, converse with you upon the subject of the catechisms?—No.

Do you think there are any Roman Catholic children in those districts that are unacquainted with the catechism?—Most of them, I think, knew it partially.

Do you think the knowledge of the catechism is inculcated more generally than reading?—Yes.

In what manner is it taught to those who cannot read?—They go to chapel, and learn the catechism there, and also in some of the schools. I have seen greater attention paid to the catechism than reading. I have inquired for the regulations, and I have found there were regulations for the catechism, without any reference to any system of reading, or the enforcement of the other parts of school instruction.

Have you any means of knowing, and of course of stating, what are the feelings of such people as the extremely ignorant that you have described as to Protestants and the Protestant religion?—They think that the Protestants are heretics, and enemies to God and man.

What is the idea they affix to the term heretic, so far as you can state to us?—It is generally a person that does not belong to their communion.

Do they consider them as Christians?—No, they do not.

Do they think they can be saved?—No.

Have you any means of knowing that?—Yes.

State the means you have of knowing that?—I have asked repeatedly their ideas of a Protestant dying out of the Roman Catholic church, and their opinion seems to be that they cannot be saved.

You are giving still the opinion of the illiterate?—Yes, of the peasantry; they are not so illiterate but that they can read.

Is it your belief, that the persons to whom you have referred holding those superstitious notions, are generally in the practice of attending service in the chapel on Sundays and other days?—Yes, decidedly; I think those are some of the most zealous.

Does the catechism you mention as having seen, teach correct notions of the Godhead?—It teaches the abstract doctrine of the Trinity, but the application of it, in connection with the displays of the Trinity in the New Testament is incorrect.

Does it teach the history of the birth, the miracles, the sufferings, and resurrection of our Saviour?—I am not so intimately acquainted with it as to state that.

Have you never read it?—Yes, several times; but it has gone out of my head, and I would rather decline speaking upon that point without reference to it.

Have you ever conversed with the lower orders of the Protestants in this country?—Yes.

What is their opinion of the Roman Catholics, as to their security in point of religion?—Their notion is, that they are exceedingly ignorant and mistaken in their opinions.

Do they conceive them to be idolaters?—Yes, certainly they do.

Then the lower orders of Roman Catholics consider the Protestants heretics, and the Protestants consider them idolaters?—Yes.

Is the notion among Protestants, that the Roman Catholics are idolaters confined to the lower orders?—I should think any person who has exercised his mind upon the subject of the worship of the Roman Catholics would have that idea.

It is your own?—Yes, it is.

Do you think idolaters can be saved?—I do not in that state.

Do you think that is the feeling of the Protestants in general in Ireland?—I think there are a great many Protestants who are indifferent very generally to the subject of religion, either as to the tenets of their own church, or those of the Roman Catholics.

Do you consider it uncharitable in the Roman Catholics, to consider the Protestants heretics?—Yes, because they do not belong to their communion.

Do you consider it uncharitable for the Protestants to consider the Roman Catholics idolaters?—Not if they can state a distinct reason for it.

Supposing the Roman Catholics stated, that they considered the Protestants heretics, because they did not hold the doctrines that they thought essential to salvation, and the Protestants said they considered the Roman Catholics idolaters, because they thought they held doctrines that they considered inconsistent with the Scriptures, and that each therefore thought the others were likely to be damned; do you think the Roman Catholic would be justly charged with a want of charity, and the Protestant be at the same time free from any such charge?—I can explain that better by an example; in travelling in Kerry, I went into a house expecting to find a family of the peasantry of Kerry. I was surprised at the difference in the appearance of the cabin, and found it was inhabited by a family of the water guard from Cornwall; the woman told me she was in want of opportunities for the instruction of her family; and that she and her husband intended to give up the situation and return to their own country; the children were exceedingly orderly, and the woman intelligent, and as far as I could discover from conversing with her, impressed with the doctrines of the Scriptures; another reason she gave for wishing to change her residence was, that the children were enticed to dancing schools, and upbraided with being heretics, and the only reason they could assign for such an appellation was, that they ate meat on the Friday, and I think in that case there was great bigotry, because the person could give no reason for his dislike to the tenets of one church more than the other; those who object to the Roman Catholic doctrines, can give an intelligent reason for such objection.

damned according to the goodness of the reason in your estimation which the person can assign for his opinion?—I think unless he could assign some reason, it would be quite intolerance and bigotry.

It is not uncharitable if he had a reason you thought a good one?—I do not think it is.

You do not consider it uncharitable in a Protestant, to consider that a Roman Catholic is an idolater, but you do consider it uncharitable for a Roman Catholic to consider a Protestant a heretic, inasmuch as according to your notion the Protestant is right in considering the Roman Catholic an idolater, but a Roman Catholic is wrong in supposing a Protestant a heretic?—He gives no intelligent reason.

A Roman Catholic may think he gives a very good reason; do you think the principle of charity depends upon the goodness of the reason?—I should make a distinction, that the one would give a reason for so considering the subject, and the other do it merely from some prejudice.

You think a Roman Catholic considers a Protestant a heretic, because he is under the influence of prejudice; but a Protestant considers a Roman Catholic an idolater, because he is an enlightened and liberal minded person?—Because he can give a reason for his opinion.

A Roman Catholic may give a reason satisfactory to him for considering the Protestant a heretic, and which is just as satisfactory to him, as the reason of the Protestant for considering the Roman Catholic an idolater?—I am speaking of the peasantry; the peasantry can give no intelligent reason.

Would you consider it uncharitable in a peasant, to believe that the Protestant is a heretic, but not uncharitable in an enlightened Roman Catholic, who considered there was reason in Scripture for thinking so?—I would not.

You would not think it uncharitable in an enlightened Roman Catholic?—No, if he gave me a reason.

Satisfactory to yourself?—No, to himself.

If a Roman Catholic stated there was only one church, and that out of that church there was no salvation; would you consider him a charitable man?—No.

If a Protestant told a Roman Catholic that he considered the invocation of saints idolatrous, would you consider that Protestant a charitable man?—I think it is so palpable a thing, the invocation of saints, that it does not require any further explanation.

Do you conceive, that the error of the Roman Catholic church is the want of charity, or that it is not want of charity, but an erroneous view of general doctrines?—It is a fundamental error in doctrines and opinions; charity, I pay no attention to.

Is it your feeling, that considerable irritation has been produced, among the minds of the peasantry and the middle orders of the Roman Catholics, by the late meetings that have been held in the country, for the purposes of the London Hibernian Society; we advert particularly to those at which Captain Gordon and Mr. Noel took a part?—I think the people have heard that their priests object to it, and that they unite with them, and their minds are more incensed against the persons connected with that Society now than they were.

Do you conceive that any considerable irritation or animosity against the persons connected with that Society, has in fact been called into action by the circumstances of those meetings?—I have not been in those parts of the country since the meetings. I know in one part, where I was travelling myself, the priests had denounced the schools, and I was recommended by a person connected with the Society, not to go much that way, for it was not safe.

Do you conceive the operations of the London Hibernian Society produce that sort of irritation in the minds of the peasantry, that is likely in its consequences to endanger the public peace?—No, indeed I do not think so.

Do you conceive that it has followed, as a consequence from those meetings, that there is any increased examination of the Scriptures, and the nature of the authority of the priesthood among the lower orders of the peasantry?—Yes, I have heard from different sources, it has; it has caused a great enquiry into the Scriptures, and a desire to possess them, that they might enquire for themselves.

Is it your own impression, that for some years past, say three, four, five or six years, the curiosity of the people upon the subject of the Scriptures, and the desire to read them, has been stationary, or has been increasing?—Increasing, very much.

Within what period?—Within the period of eighteen months; and I think previously, from the accounts I have heard, it has increased considerably.

Do you mean among the lower ranks of the Roman Catholics?—Yes, I mean among them.

Do you conceive that such a change can have taken place among them to any considerable extent, without the Roman Catholic priests being fully conscious of what is going forward?—No, I think the Roman Catholic priests must get intelligence of it.

Have you any means of knowing whether the Roman Catholic priests limit their exertions to preventing the use of the Scriptures as a school book, or that they extend them to prevent their falling into the hands of the adults among the peasantry?—The general impression is, that they prevent the peasantry from reading it; I have been endeavouring to recollect a particular instance, that I might speak more accurately; I have endeavoured to examine the houses to see if I could find a Testament; I never found a copy of the Testament in the town of Cork; one I found in a shopkeeper's house near Cork.

How do you reconcile that fact of your not being able to find a copy of the Scriptures with their anxiety to have them?—The fact was given in illustration of the disposition of the Roman Catholic clergy towards the general distribution of the Scriptures. The Testament I found at Cork was a Roman Catholic one, with short notes. I have found persons in many parts of the country in possession of copies of the Scriptures circulated by Protestants.

When did this occur?—In February and March I think.

Appendix, N° 244.

Examination of James Edward Gordon, Esq. on Oath; Tuesday, 22d February 1825.

HAVE you lately returned from Ireland?—Yes, on Friday morning.

For what period were you in Ireland?—About seven months.

What parts of the country did you visit?—Most parts of it; the first part of the time was spent in the south, and the latter part in the north and north-west.

Of what Societies connected with Ireland are you a member?—I am a member of the Hibernian and Sunday School Societies.

Are you a member of any other?—I believe not; there are so many societies of which I happen to be a member, that I cannot at this instant positively say.

The name of Gordon appears in the list of members of a Society for promoting the principles of the Reformation?—It is one to which I belong, but that is not the title of the Society at present; it is now designated a Society for promoting Religious Enquiry.

How long has it borne that title?—About three months.

Under what title was it originally formed?—A Society for promoting the principles of the Reformation in Ireland.

When was it formed under that title?—I cannot particularly call to my recollection the date of its formation; something more than twelve months since.

For what reason was the title changed?—In consequence of the establishment of another Society professing a proximate object, a Society for promoting religious discussion. The objects were conceived to be similar in their nature; and, in consequence of a communication between the respective members, an amalgamation of the two Societies took place.

We understand the name was changed in consequence of that incorporation of the two societies?—Yes.

What do you consider to be the objects of that Society?—As shortly as I can state them, they may be comprehended under two heads; the first, for promoting religious enquiry, by drawing the attention of the population to the Scriptures, and to such discussions upon the subject, particularly the right of the laity to read them, as may be calculated to discover the reasons for and against the practice; the second head I would describe as consisting in an endeavour to establish, upon authentic information, what is precisely the moral condition of the peasantry of Ireland.

Does that enquiry necessarily comprehend an investigation into their religious knowledge and principles?—It does.

It would be necessary to ascertain the state of their knowledge in religious matters, in order to understand their moral principles?—It is necessary, to understand their religious opinions, to understand their moral condition, and that comprehends an enquiry into the existing practices of the country, such as pilgrimages, and the attendance upon holy wells; whatever, in short, is calculated to authenticate the existing state of belief and practice of the lower orders in the country.

Do you consider the object and principles of the two Societies to be the same?—They are comprehended within the original design.

The original Society, bearing the name of the Society to promote the principles of the Reformation, must be understood to have for its object the establishing of the Protestant religion instead of the Roman Catholic, do you understand that to be a part of the object of the Society?—It may be so defined. The intention of the Society for promoting the principles of the Reformation in its original form, was, certainly, the intention of promoting the circulation of those principles by which the Reformation was accomplished; in other words, what are considered the great doctrines of the Reformation, as they are stated by the reformed churches; and in order to adapt those principles to the existing condition of society, it was considered necessary to ascertain the religious belief and practice of the lower orders.

Have the meetings of the Society been frequent?—The Society has held no public meetings; they have been confined to meetings of the committee.

Of whom does the committee consist?—I am not at present prepared to state; I can furnish a list, if requisite.

What persons are the more frequent attenders of the committee?—Those I have most frequently met have been Mr. Synge, Mr. Steward, Mr. Hogan, Sir Francis Bloss, Mr. Singer of Trinity college, and Mr. Digby; my memory does not serve me with other names at this moment.

When was the last meeting held at which you attended?—About a fortnight previous to my leaving Dublin.

How frequent had the meetings been before that?—I am not so well acquainted with the regulations of the committee as to be able to state their regular days of meeting, but I think once in a fortnight; I have been but seldom in attendance since the Society has been formed.

Has the Society excited, in any considerable degree, the dislike or the jealousy of the Roman Catholic body?—I do not think that it is extensively known; I have not met with the knowledge of its existence among Roman Catholics, if I except the circumstance of its being mentioned at one or two meetings of the Association, where some of its documents were read.

Was it thought that the name that the Society first bore, that of promoting the principles of the Reformation, was one that was likely to be more obnoxious to the Roman Catholic body than the one it now bears?—Yes; and for that reason I proposed an alteration, which was not adopted until the establishment of the other Society suggested the amalgamation of the two; it was then considered that its present title was a more appropriate designation.

Have the goodness to state in what way it proposes to effect those objects?—In its present form; I think I have already stated it under two heads.

The question applied to the modes in which it proposes to accomplish those objects?—The modes would consist, first, in obtaining correct reports of the statements and speeches made at public meetings; secondly, in defraying the expense of such agents as may be employed to receive such reports; in the third place, I should state the publication of such reports, in the shape of a pamphlet, or any other form adapted to popular circulation; in the fourth place, I should say, that correspondence with intelligent individuals in different parts of the country who might be supposed to be in possession of the existing practices of society, with the publication of monthly extracts of such correspondence; also selections from the standard works of the Roman Catholic church, as used in Ireland, and occasional accounts of the superstitions of the lower orders, as they appear in their pilgrimages to Lough Derry and Bal.

Is it intended to connect the operations of this Society with schools or places of education?—I believe not.

Is it intended to circulate those printed documents in schools?—Certainly not.

Are the funds of the Society large?—They are not; few exertions have yet been made to increase the funds.

Is it connected with any other Society, either in this country or in Ireland?—It is not.

Are you a member of any Bible Society connected with Ireland?—Not connected with Ireland.

Strictly speaking, is the London Hibernian Society a School Society or a Bible Society, or both?—Its object is of a complex nature; it may be considered, in a primary sense, a society for the promotion of education, but it also circulates the Scriptures, and employs itinerant readers of the Scriptures.

Was the object of your last visit to Ireland principally to promote the views and forward the operations of any one in particular, or of all those societies; or was it for any other, and what purpose?—My object in visiting Ireland, on the last occasion, was the same that governed my visits to Ireland for the last five years, not to promote the objects of any institution in particular, but to promote the moral improvement of the country by any means that seemed best calculated to effect that end. I am no further a friend to the Hibernian Society, or the Sunday School Society, or the Society for promoting Religious Enquiry, than I perceive that they are calculated to improve the moral and religious condition of Ireland. My last visit was perfectly distinct from the objects of any particular institution; both myself, and the gentleman by whom I was accompanied, visited the country in a private capacity.

Did you, in point of fact, attend any other meetings except those connected with the London Hibernian Society?—Yes, I attended two meetings of the Church Missionary Society, and I attended one meeting of the Hibernian Bible Society.

Where was that one meeting held?—I find I am confounding this year with last. I attended no meetings of the Bible Society this year; I remember having attended two of its meetings in a former year.

Is it a fact, that on your last visit in 1824, and throughout that year you did not attend any public meeting of the Bible Society?—I did not; I can distinctly state that my visit to Ireland did not contemplate the objects or interests of any particular institution; I was entirely at large from such obligations.

Did you in the course of your progress, make any report or any communication to any of the societies?—I did; I made a report, if it may be so called, to the committee of the Hibernian Society, in consequence of being unexpectedly implicated in discussions which involved the principles and objects of that institution; but the meetings to which I allude, were not undertaken in consequence of an arrangement between Mr. Noel and myself, and the Hibernian Society; they were undertaken, in connection with the wishes and exertions of gentlemen in the different districts and counties where they were held as a suitable mode of promoting education in such districts.

You did, in fact, attend several meetings at which the object declared, was to establish schools on the principles of the Hibernian Society?—Yes, I did.

The Hibernian School Society is a branch of the Hibernian Bible Society, and one and the same body?—No, quite distinct.

Do not your reports state, that the Hibernian Society consisted of two branches, one for the circulation of the Scriptures, and the other for promoting schools?—Properly speaking, it consists of three branches, schools, readers, and the circulation of the Scriptures. The objects of the Society, as stated in the reports, comprise five heads; first, day schools, second, Sunday schools, third, adult schools, fourth, itinerant readers, and fifth, the circulation of the Scriptures; the Scriptures circulated by the Society, are obtained from the British and Foreign, and not from the Hibernian Bible Society.

The title of your last report, is “the Eighteenth Annual Report of the London Hibernian Society, for establishing schools, and circulating the holy Scriptures in Ireland?”—I would briefly state, that the Society at its commencement, combined the establishment of schools with preaching. It was soon, however, discovered that the two objects were incompatible, and the Society struck out that part of the design which related to preaching, and confined itself to the establishment of schools; it was shortly after discovered, that the Society could, with advantage, employ readers of the Scriptures for the benefit of the adult population, who did not come within the provisions of the school department, and this superinduced duced upon the original plan a new branch, namely, itinerant readers; the circulation of the Scriptures grew out of the practice of leaving them with children in attendance upon the schools; and a discretionary power was afterwards vested in the itinerant readers and inspectors, of giving copies where they met with an anxious desire to receive and use them; the present title was applicable to the Society before the adoption of itinerant readers.

The plan is this; the first resolution is, that the designation of this Society be the London Hibernian Society for establishing schools, and circulating the holy Scriptures in Ireland, that is sanctioned 8th of May 1824?—It is conceived, that under that designation, is comprehended the different heads given in the detail of the report.

The general governing head is what has just been stated?—Yes.

Was not there a meeting attended by you at Clonmel?—Yes.

What do you consider that meeting to have been, was it to forward the objects of any particular Society, or for discussion only?—It was to establish a branch of the Hibernian Society for the county of Tipperary.

To establish schools and circulate the Scriptures?—To carry into effect the objects of the Society in that county.

Had either the British and Foreign Bible Society, or the Hibernian Bible Society, any privity or connection with that meeting?—None whatever.

Are you a member of the Hibernian Bible Society?—I am not; being a member of other Bible Societies, I should state that there is only one feature of similarity between the London Hibernian and Hibernian Bible Societies, which is, the distribution of the holy Scriptures.

When the meeting for promoting the objects of the London Hibernian Society was held at Clonmel, did it not lead to discussion?—Yes.

What were the objects discussed?—The discussion took such a wide range, that it would be difficult to describe them.

Did it discuss the propriety of distributing the Scriptures, or the relative merits of the Roman Catholic and Protestant religion?—The promoters of the meeting proceeded in the usual manner, with a statement of the objects for which it was convened; that statement was opposed by the Roman Catholic clergymen in attendance, who introduced discussion upon a variety of topics which were altogether irrelevant to the design of the meeting.

Was not there a meeting at Cork?—There were two meetings.

Were those meetings held to promote the views of the London Hibernian Society?—I should state that the noblemen and gentlemen of the county of Cork, have established a branch of the Hibernian Society, called the Cork Auxiliary Hibernian Society; the anniversary of that branch was held, and in the usual course of proceeding, opposition was given to the objects of the meeting, and afterwards more seriously resumed at a meeting of the Ladies Association; the ladies composing the association, had previously formed themselves into a distinct branch for the establishment of female schools, upon an improved principle.

In the course of your last visit to Ireland, how many meetings did you attend, the object of which was to promote and forward the views of the London Hibernian Society?—Six.

Have the goodness to state at what places they were held?—Ennis, Tralee, Cork, Clonmel, Waterford and Sligo.

Was considerable opposition expressed by the Roman Catholic body at all of those meetings?—Only at Cork, Clonmel and Waterford—opposition was offered at Ennis, but it was very feebly expressed.

In the course of your last visit to Ireland, did you attend any other public meetings than those you have described?—I attended two meetings of the Church Missionary Society.

Where were they held?—Clonmel and Fethard.

Do you think that the public clearly discriminated between the two societies?—I think there was a confusion in the public mind about the identity of the Hibernian Bible Society, and the London Hibernian School Society.

Was there also a confusion between those two societies, and the Church Missionary Society?—No, I apprehend not; the distinction is too clear.

Has not the London Hibernian Society excited, to a very great degree, the dislike and jealousy of the Roman Catholic body, and did not its proceedings both generally, and in detail, encounter the most determined opposition from the Roman Catholics?—It has.

Have the goodness to state what you believe to be the grounds, as you collected them from your communication with the Roman Catholics, upon which that jealousy and hostility rest?—The opposition to the Hibernian Society is founded upon the introduction of the Scriptures into its schools, and according to the proportion that the reading of the Scriptures may happen to bear to the stated reading of the school, will be the measure of opposition urged against the Hibernian or any other institution. I should also state, that the Hibernian Society, by the machinery of its regular and cursory inspection, is enabled to guarantee a closer attention to the Scriptures than will be found in the practice of other institutions, so close an attention as to render it the constant practice of the school, and that circumstance is the main cause of the opposition which has been so powerfully urged against it.

What do you understand to be the reason why the Roman Catholic body feel so strong a dislike to the Scriptures being put into the hands of the children in the London Hibernian schools?—The reason, I apprehend, is, that they are unwilling the children should become acquainted with the contents of the Scriptures.

What reason do they give for that unwillingness?—Because the contents of the Scriptures, unaccompanied by notes and comments, sanctioned by the Roman Catholic church, and

and the instruction of the pastors of that church, are considered unfavourable to the tenets of their faith.

When you say unfavourable to the tenets of their faith, do you mean to go so far as to say they are inconsistent with the tenets of their faith?—Certainly.

Is that the view Roman Catholics entertain?—I am convinced it is; I have heard it so stated, both by clergymen and laymen.

That they considered the doctrines of the Scriptures unfavourable to the tenets of their church?—Yes, if unaccompanied by notes and comments.

Do you mean the use of the Scriptures, or the doctrines of the Scriptures?—I identify the use of the Scriptures with the doctrines they contain; the impression, in other words, that would be made upon the mind of a reader of the book who should be left to the influence of its truths, without the interference of human authority. I would beg also to state, that in repeated conversations with Roman Catholic clergymen, they have distinctly and unequivocally admitted this conclusion; and that the same principle has been publicly avowed at the different discussions where I have been present, both by the clergy and laity.

What they have avowed, according to the manner in which you have expressed it, I should understand to be, not that it is necessary to know something more than is in the Scriptures, to hold the doctrines of their church, but that the Scriptures, taking the Scriptures alone, are inconsistent with their doctrines?—They have avowed that something in addition is necessary, not merely explanation, but additional information.

Do you find, that an opinion is entertained by the Roman Catholic body that it is the object of the persons who promote the schools of the London Hibernian Society, to interfere with and unsettle the belief of the Roman Catholics in their religion?—In answering that question, I must make a distinction between the pastor of the Roman Catholic church, and the classes of society who are contemplated by the objects of the institution. On the part of the clergy, as far at least as my acquaintance extends, I have never discovered an exception to unqualified opposition; it has sometimes rested on one ground, and sometimes on another, but it has always existed. With respect to the bulk of the peasantry, I have not met with any thing but the most cordial approbation of the system; and in proof of this statement, I would refer to a case in which the Society made an experiment to ascertain the feelings of the lower orders, by proposing for signature a certificate from the parents of the Roman Catholic children in attendance in the schools; upwards of 400 copies of this document were signed by Roman Catholics, and probably three times that number would have been procured, had not the Roman Catholic clergy discovered the design, and repressed the signatures. I should also state, that I have met with nothing but sincere gratitude on the part of the lower orders, for the provisions that the Society has extended to their offspring; they have considered the system rational and fair, and the practice of the schools above board, and so far from any objection to placing their children at such schools, there is an eager desire to profit by the opportunity, until the school is denounced by ecclesiastical authority.

Do they think the object of the Society is in any way to promote the reformation in Ireland?—I do not think that the peasantry look beyond the mere object of education.

Have they any suspicion that there is any such object in view?—I cannot positively say; but I should think not.

Is there any such object?—There is no such object on the part of the institution; the design is simply to enlighten the children and adults, coming within the sphere of its operations, in the fundamental truths of Christianity.

In enlightening them in the fundamental truths of Christianity, is the object to make them Protestants?—The object is not to make them Protestants, but Christians; the Society entertains a distinction between a Protestant and a Christian; the distinction is, that a person professing the Protestant religion, may be totally ignorant of the fundamental principles of Christianity.

Do you conceive that Roman Catholics, holding all the doctrines of the church of Rome, including the invocation of saints, are Christians, in the sense in which you use the phrase?—That depends upon the sense in which these doctrines are defined by the Roman Catholics holding them; I am satisfied that a Roman Catholic may be a Christian, but in the popular sense in which those doctrines are held, they are incompatible with Christianity as I understand it.

Do you wish to make the Roman Catholics cease to hold any of the doctrines of the church of Rome?—We do not contemplate the church of Rome, or any other church, in our plan; our object is simply to bring Roman Catholics acquainted with the fundamental truths of Christianity, leaving it to themselves to choose what church they please.

Will you describe what you take to be the fundamentals of the Christian religion?—That question requires I should enter upon a confession of what I believe to be the faith of Christians.

Do you believe that the fundamental principles of Christianity are set forth in the Apostles Creed?—I do.

Do you think the Roman Catholics hold that creed?—I feel it difficult to say; I believe they hold it, but in the popular definition of their system, they hold tenets at variance with that creed.

Do they hold the doctrines of the creed?—They profess to hold them; but I cannot reconcile the creed with what they profess to hold in addition.

According to your notions of their doctrines, you do not consider they hold that creed?—
They

They may hold it; but if they do, I apprehend they must hold in a different sense to what I do the dogmas of their system.

You mean, that they do not hold it as Christians do?—I should say that they could not hold it as Christians do, holding with it every other part of their system.

What are the other doctrines?—The doctrines of human merit, and the worship and invocation of saints and angels.

When you wish to enlighten the Roman Catholics, do you not wish they should cease to invoke saints and angels?—If the invocation of saints and angels is understood by the Roman Catholics in the sense in which I understand it, I should certainly say yes.

You know the sense in which the Roman Catholic church teaches that doctrine?—I know that they differ in their statements of it; I consider that the invocation of saints and angels in any form, is inconsistent with Christianity.

Is it not necessary, in the system of instruction pursued in the London Hibernian schools, that the children should read the Testament, and commit it to memory, and that they should be left to interpret and ascertain the meaning, as well as they can, according to the powers of their own understandings?—That is the practice of the system; but it is not objected to, that clergymen and other patrons should have access to the schools upon such occasions, and under such circumstances as they may think proper, for grounding the children in a knowledge of what they are employed in reading.

In point of fact, does such instruction take place?—It is very limited.

If such instruction be given as the Roman Catholic priests would give, in interpreting the texts of Scripture, would it not prevent the children from becoming enlightened Christians?—The Society, at the same time that it allows the patron of the school to ask questions upon the general principles of the Christian religion, does not admit of controversy; it admits of no reference to the peculiar tenets of the Roman Catholic church, or any denomination of professing Christians.

Have they not an opportunity of reading the Scriptures, and ascertaining for themselves the meaning of them, without receiving any guide, interpretation or explanation, from the Roman Catholic priests?—That is in fact the case; the Society does not exclude Roman Catholic priests, but priests being generally opposed to the plan of the Society, refuse their superintendence of its schools.

Is not such a mode of teaching the Scriptures to children of Roman Catholics contrary to the rules and discipline of the Roman Catholic church?—I believe it is.

Do they not hold, that if the Scriptures are read, they shall be read by such persons who from the state of their understandings, are likely to comprehend the meaning of them, and that they shall be read under such circumstances as shall enable the Roman Catholic priests to tell them, or have them told, what they mean?—In the first place, I believe they have a decided objection to the introduction of the Scriptures into the schools under any circumstances; as to the extent to which they permit their use in other respects, perhaps that does not come within the scope of the question; in speaking of the adults in the schools of the Society, I should say, that the objection to the Scriptures was just as great upon the part of the Roman Catholic clergy, as it is in the case of the children.

Is that objection because it necessarily leaves to adults the right of free interpretation?—The Society invites the adults both to read the book, and to exercise their judgment upon its contents; but it sets before them no particular form of faith.

Leaving the adults to ascertain as well as they can the sense of what they read?—Yes.

And to deduce their understanding of the Christian doctrines in that manner from the text of Scripture?—Yes.

Do you not understand that practice to constitute one of the main differences between the Roman Catholic and Protestant churches?—It does; it involves the right of private interpretation and the exercise of private judgment.

Do you believe that, on the part of the Roman Catholic priesthood, a general opinion is entertained, that it is the object of the London Hibernian Society and its promoters to interfere with the religious belief of the Roman Catholics, and to produce gradually a change in the practice, doctrines and tenets of the Roman Catholic religion?—I believe it is the conviction of the Roman Catholic clergy, that where the Scriptures are read, without note or comment, it will interfere with the belief of their flocks; and that the Hibernian Society, adopting that as a fundamental principle of its system, is calculated so to interfere with them.

Have you any doubt that considerable uneasiness is produced in Ireland by the persevering efforts on the part of the London Hibernian Society, on the one hand, to carry into effect its system of education, and the resolute efforts of the priesthood to prevent the children of their flocks attending the schools?—I have no doubt that such uneasiness does exist.

In matters connected with their religion, do not you believe, that the class of persons to whom this description of education is particularly applicable, consider that the priests have entire authority in that matter, and have power to regulate their conduct in religious matters as they think right, and that the individuals had themselves very little knowledge or power to guide themselves upon these subjects?—I should state, in answer to this question, that it has been proved in experience that the priesthood do not possess such a power to the extent which is generally believed.

Have the exertions of the priest to prevent the children of the Roman Catholics attending the schools been, generally speaking, successful?—Certainly not.

Have they, to any considerable degree, prevented the children of the Roman Catholics attending the schools of the London Hibernian Society?—They succeeded during the most serious period of the opposition in thinning very considerably the attendance upon the schools of the Institution, but there has been a general return of the pupils, and I should suppose, that at the end of the year, the Society will present a greater return of Roman Catholics than it reported upon the list of last year. I should state that this view is to be taken in connection with a continuation of the opposition.

Do you mean, even if the opposition continue, that will be the result?—It has been realized in a great measure already.

Do you consider that the opposition is as vigorous as it was six months ago?—I consider that it is just the same; there is a difference in the effect, not so much from a diminution of the opposition as from a failure of the opposing authority.

Is it your impression that the Roman Catholic clergy are likely to continue that opposition on their part?—Yes; for the reason that the principles of the different institutions against which it is directed are unchanged while their progress is increasing, and if the Roman Catholic clergy considered at the outset that their principles were in danger from the influence of those institutions, they will naturally continue their exertions in opposition.

Do we understand you right in stating that it is your impression, that notwithstanding such continuance of opposition, that the schools connected with those institutions will be fuller than they have hitherto been?—I would make a distinction between the schools being fuller and their number increasing—the average of pupils will probably be greater, but that may be owing to the multiplication of the schools and not to the increase of the attendance on schools individually.

Would it not necessarily follow from your view, that in each of those schools there must be a considerable number of Roman Catholic children attending, not only under the disapprobation but also in defiance of the priests?—That is actually the present state of the attendance. The greater part are remaining in opposition to the declared disapprobation and denunciations of the priests.

What do you conceive to be the probable result of such a state of things, what would be the consequence of it?—I conceive that it will grow into a rejection of the authority of the priesthood, as it respects the education of the youth of their communion. If they should continue to oppose their authority, parents will determine for themselves in retaining their children at the schools.

The Commissioners have understood, and they would be glad to know what may be your impression with respect to it, that the rites of the church are actually denied to parents who persist in sending their children to those schools?—It is true; and the practice has a twofold effect upon the bulk of the population; in many instances they make no application to their clergy until the children have been taught to read at the schools, but in a greater number of cases they consider the denial of those rites to be harsh and unmerited, and they are beginning to lose the dread of those consequences, which a few years since would have decided the same individuals in a course of obedience.

Are we to understand that, without any reference to what might be the consequences of this principle of education, that it is your impression that the mere circumstance of the resistance to that education does diminish or endanger the influence of the clergy over their flocks?—It does; and it has gone much further to diminish their authority than the influence of the education to which it is opposed.

Do you think the Roman Catholic clergy are of that opinion?—I think in many instances they are acquainted with the fact.

Have you known an instance in which the determined opposition of the priests to any school has not been successful?—I am acquainted with hundreds of such instances.

Notwithstanding the most determined opposition on the part of the priest, the school has flourished with Roman Catholic children?—Yes, in hundreds of instances.

Have you known any instances of the parents of such children having, in consequence of the interdict and refusal of the rites of their church from the priests under such circumstances, becoming converts to the reformed religion?—I am not personally acquainted with such instances, but I believe that many such have occurred; I believe so upon authentic information; and in a greater number of cases, although the parties have continued in nominal communion with the church of Rome, they are nevertheless convinced, that the conduct of the clergy has been both oppressive and improper.

Has that led them to condemn the individual clergyman or the religion itself?—The clergyman more than the religion.

Do you think at this moment there are a considerable number of Roman Catholic parents who are out of the communion of their own church, although not in communion with the Protestant church?—Yes, a considerable number; and a still greater proportion is in a situation intermediate between that class and a belief in the dogmas of their system.

Have the goodness to explain the situation in which the persons are, whom you describe as not being in communion with that church?—I should not conceive it correct to call them Protestants, inasmuch as they have not protested against their own church; the term Protestant implies a preference for some particular creed as opposed to another, and I conceive there are a great number of Roman Catholics who have received sufficient light to discover a discrepancy between the general information of the Scriptures and the tenets of their own church, but who are either lingering within her pale, or if they have passed its outward limits, have not yet entered into any other communion.

Do those persons attend any place of worship?—They sometimes attend one place and sometimes another.

Are they persons above the lowest class of life?—No; they are persons in the lowest class of life, but including respectable farmers.

Do they receive the sacrament according to the forms of the Roman Catholic church?—In reference to the class which may be considered the most advanced in the secession, they have given up the sacraments; the surrender of them will depend upon the strength of their conviction with respect to the errors of the church.

Are you speaking at present of the class of persons who have been interdicted from the sacraments by their clergy as a punishment for sending their children to the Hibernian Society's schools, or what other class?—I am not speaking of the class which has been interdicted by the clergy, because such persons continue Roman Catholics in belief; the suspension of the sacraments is not only contrary to their feelings, but amounts in many instances to a denial of what they consider necessary to their salvation, although even under that impression they will often persevere in sending their children to the schools.

Describe the class to which your two or three last answers have reference?—There is a numerous class, who from reading the Scriptures, have received as much light as has fixed a distinction in their mind, between the truths of Revelation and the tenets of the Roman Catholic church; and they have either forsaken that church, or from political motives such as the dread of persecution, are continuing in nominal connection with her, at the expense of a satisfactory conviction of the discordance of her doctrines with those of the Scriptures.

Is it in any particular description of schools that the class of persons of whom you are now speaking are to be found?—It is chiefly among the adults.

What may be your idea of the extent of this class of persons, and where are they to be found?—In every part of Ireland where the system of scriptural instruction has been active. I cannot speak as to the extent of the class; but such a description of persons is well known to the schoolmasters and readers of the Society; and also to clergymen and others who have access to the lower orders.

As a matter of conjecture, would you estimate their number by hundreds or thousands?—I should say many thousands; it is widely extending in operation.

You have spoken of this as being the result of a system; what do you mean by a system?—I mean in this instance, the combination of religious instruction in the schools, with reading and circulating the Scriptures out of the schools.

In one of your former answers, you were understood to say, you did not attribute this growing change of opinion to any instruction in the schools given by the Society, but to the operation upon the minds of the adults?—I of course include the adult's schools; the Society has 12,000 adults in those schools, and the instruction to which I refer, has necessarily a full effect upon that portion of its attendance; there is also an effect produced upon the juvenile part of the attendance, a great many instances have occurred, in which children from reading the Scriptures, have left the Roman Catholic communion.

Children of what ages?—Between fourteen and eighteen; and I have known some instances as early as twelve.

Are there many instances of children in your schools between fourteen and eighteen?—There are a great number of such instances, but fewer than formerly; the proportion has been altered by the opposition; but there still remain a considerable number.

When you spoke of the 12,000 adults, do you mean they are collected in schools where none but adults are educated, or that they are scattered among the schools where there are children?—They are in schools exclusively for adults.

There is not a mixture of adults and children in the same schools?—No.

Are you yourself surprised that the Roman Catholic clergy should oppose schools that produce the practical result you have stated?—Not at all; I should be very much surprised if they did not oppose them.

Do you conceive that the parents of the children are equally conscious with the clergy of those possible results?—I consider that the parents are not under the influence of the same principles which govern the clergy; the people are willing to receive their religion from the Scriptures if they were permitted, and they have a much more intelligible notion of the religion which they receive from this source than of that which is taught by their church, a great deal of which consists in mystery.

The question is, whether the parents in any particular district would continue to send their children to an Hibernian Society school, if they were conscious it had been the result of that school to change the religious views of the persons who had passed through it?—Certainly not; and this will be best explained by the fact, that parents have frequently objected to the attendance of their children upon the schools, previous to their own acquaintance with the Scriptures, who have afterwards re-placed their children at the same schools from whence they had been withdrawn.

Do you think it is a frequent consequence of a child attending the scriptural school, to introduce the parents to the Scriptures?—Yes.

How does that arise?—The Scriptures that the children use in the school are carried home to the cabin; and parents who dare not receive copies for their own use, avail themselves of their being thus brought within their reach; it is from reading these copies or hearing them read, that they obtain views of religious truth, which are incompatible with the views they originally held; and I believe that the progress of conviction, as I have already described it, is mainly owing to the use of such copies.

You have spoken, in one of your answers, as if you considered there were Roman Catholics, who were not Christians, have you the same opinion as to members of the established church; do you think there are any members of the established church who, in your view of the term Christian, are not Christians?—There are many such.

Will you explain your views of the state of a person in connection with the established church,

Examination of church, who is not a Christian in your acceptation of the word?—I should say, that all members of the established church, who are incapable of giving an intelligent view of the first principles of Christianity in connection with the evidence of a practical obedience to the obligations which such principles involve, were without the pale of what I should distinguish by scriptural Christianity; and with respect to the peculiar doctrines of the church of England, it is too notorious that many of her members are not even acquainted with her articles.

Are we to understand you are taking a distinction with respect to the Roman Catholics, and also the members of the church of England, between real and nominal Christianity?—Yes; I should lay that down as the first distinction; but I would further observe, that I conceive there is nothing in the standards of the church of England that is opposed to scriptural Christianity, while in the popular definition of the doctrines of the church of Rome there is that difference.

Is it your impression there are any or many of the Presbyterian church of Scotland, who in the same sense are not Christians?—I am convinced of it.

Would you say the same of Independents?—I should say the same of every denomination.

With respect to those quasi converts, do you find most of them inclined to go, or do they in fact go, to the united church, or the Presbyterian, or any other place?—They are withheld from such attendance by the dread of consequences; there may be a strong inclination to attend places of Protestant worship, when it is overcome by the dread of persecution.

Supposing that to be withdrawn, to which place would they go?—I apprehend they would join the united church, as its forms and worship make an approximation to the system to which they formerly belonged.

As this supposed conversion is attended with no outward proof, no visible change of conduct, do you not think the persons you have described, namely, your inspectors and readers and those dependant upon the Society for support, and who are likely to be popular in proportion as they are successful, are extremely likely to deceive themselves as to the reality of this change?—The reality of the change does not depend upon their testimony; such testimony may be considered a part of the proof that authenticates the change, but it is not dependant upon it; with respect to their motives, they are persons, generally speaking, who have afforded practical proofs of sincerity; persons who have given evidence of their principles, consistency and fidelity, before they have been admitted into the situation either of inspectors or readers.

Are not the readers frequently chosen from a very low class?—No, generally from the more intelligent schoolmasters.

Is it not known to the persons who regulate the affairs of the London Hibernian Society, that they are sometimes mistaken as to the character of the persons who manage the schools?—I should conceive that a Society, comprehending thirty counties in its sphere of operation, was very likely in some cases to be deceived. I am not aware of any such instances having been discovered, but I have no doubt that such exist.

Would it at all change your opinion of the inspectors, if you were to be told that one of the Commissioners had seen an inspector who could not tell whether the copies of the children were correctly spelt; that there was no child who could say the multiplication table; that only two could write upon paper, and that those copies were not correctly spelt?—It would change my opinion; and such an inspector, I apprehend, would be instantly dismissed.

Have you ever heard, that your inspectors are in the habit of drinking with the masters?—No, and I am assured that such a practice would subject them to dismissal; there is a rule of the Society which provides against their receiving any attention from masters.

Are you acquainted with many inspectors?—I have met four of them lately.

Are you acquainted with many of the readers?—I do not know above a dozen of them.

Are any of your inspectors Roman Catholics?—None of them.

Were any of them originally?—Most of them.

Do you not think, that individuals living in the state you have described, of inward conversion, but still conforming to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church outwardly, must be in a most painful situation?—Certainly, but many persons will make such a sacrifice of consistency, from the dread of temporal consequences.

Looking at their situation, can you tell which party they are deceiving?—I should state, in the first place, that much respecting their situation may be gained from private communication with their associates and instructors; in the next place, we are furnished with a better criterion, which is the sacrifices they make; there are a number of the persons I speak of, who have not gone the length of joining the Protestant church, who have nevertheless withdrawn from attendance upon Roman Catholic chapels.

Have those persons also ceased to attend confession?—That is a natural consequence of their withdrawing from the chapel.

Are not those persons in the situation rather of abandoning all sort of worship, than exchanging a bad one for a better?—I should say, that few, comparatively, have abandoned all sort of worship; they would, no doubt, prefer the form that should subject them to the least inconvenience, and where they have forsaken form, they have not forsaken religion; the sincerity of their principles is ascertained by the sacrifices which they cost them.

What are the ceremonies of the church of Rome they cease to conform to?—They cease to attend mass and confession, and this is often done when they have not the courage to become members of a Protestant congregation, from the persecution to which it would subject them.

831
Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
22 Feb. 1825.

To what clergymen do those persons apply, when they want their children christened, their daughters married, or their wives churched?—That would depend upon the character and strength of their religious conviction at the time; they would in many instances apply to the priest.

Would the priest perform any of those rites for an individual who had ceased to attend mass, or any of those ceremonies?—Generally speaking, he would not.

Then, are not those persons you describe as half converted, in a situation in which they must abandon the Roman Catholic church, or conform to the Protestant church?—Their conformity to the Protestant church will very much depend upon the conduct of the priests, it is not often the case, that these will proceed to such an extreme in applying the discipline of their church, as shall oblige the persons alluded to to take such a decided step.

Do you believe there are thousands of persons in an intermediate state between Catholicism and Protestantism?—I do.

Do you think those persons, in the event of approaching death, would seek the consolations of religion from the Protestant clergymen?—In a great majority of instances they would seek consolation from the Bible, and not from the Roman Catholic church, having lost their faith in the virtue of her sacraments.

Would they apply to the clergyman of the Protestant church?—If they were in connection with the established church they would; but if they have not reached that length, they would not apply to her ministers for an administration of her rites.

You have stated, that many of those who ceased to be Roman Catholics, were prevented by fear from conforming to the established church?—Yes.

Do you think that fear would operate upon their minds, at the hour of death?—Many of these persons having no intelligible view of the sacraments and doctrines of the church of England, they would not, I should think, make application to her clergy, they would not be deterred by fear but by ignorance, and having received the light from Scripture, which enabled them to discover the distinction between Christianity and the doctrine of the church of Rome, they would no doubt repair to the same source for support and consolation.

You consider that those thousands are in a floating state, not being members of the church of England nor members of the church of Rome, nor of any other church?—They certainly are not in connection with the church of Rome, if we consider that such connection implies conformity to her ritual; I regard them as persons holding the doctrines of Christianity as they are laid down in the Scriptures; and although they derive no benefit from the rites of the Roman Catholic church, they are not without the consolations of religion.

Is it your impression that the authority of the priests is at present greater or less than it was five years ago, over that other portion of their flocks who have not begun to enter into that state of secession you have lately described?—I think it is not so great with any class.

Do you think it materially less?—Yes.

What do you attribute that to?—To the liberty with which religious topics are discussed among the lower orders, and the effect of such discussions in eliciting knowledge on the subject; I consider also that the contest between the priesthood and the body of their followers, occasioned by resistance to education, has brought their principles and motives into popular disrepute. The recent discussions have likewise had a very important effect; they have given an impulse to curiosity and inquiry, and led to an interchange of sentiment upon the subjects of Scripture and education, and to a liberty of canvassing the opinions and conduct of the priests, which are peculiar to the present period.

Is it not your opinion that the meetings at which you took so leading a part a short time ago, produced a considerable degree of irritation in the minds of the Roman Catholic population who attended them?—They did at the time, but the irritation was not produced by any reference to the subject of education or the Scriptures, but by the introduction of political topics; and when that irritation subsided, the same individuals I have no doubt, recurred to what had been stated with respect to education and the Scriptures; where I happened to be present the people were not excited to passion and tumult so long as the speeches of their clergy were confined to the objects of the meeting; on the contrary, while they were confined to those subjects, there was a general silence observed; and it was not until the speakers appealed to their worst passions that symptoms of irritation appeared.

Did the people appear to take much interest in the theological part of the subject?—I conceive so, by the attention they gave to it.

Have you any impression on your own mind as to which side they thought had the best of the argument?—That depended very much upon their previous feeling; the meetings consisted of two classes who attended under the influence of very different motives; the one class to support the priests, the other for information; in the first case, the advantage was of course supposed to lie on the side of the Roman Catholic clergy; in the other case, they judged, I have no doubt, by the merits of the argument.

What do you conceive to be the amount of the Scriptures distributed annually by the London Hibernian Society only?—Sixteen thousand three hundred and two copies of the Scriptures were distributed last year, and this year I expect there will be an increase on that number.

Have the Hibernian Bible Society made presents of any portion of that number of Scriptures to the London Hibernian School Society, to assist them in their operations?—The Hibernian Bible Society has made no such presents, but the British and Foreign Bible Society has.

It appears by the Report that no less than 43,000 copies of the Scriptures have been given to the London Hibernian Society by the British and Foreign Bible Society?—Yes, that is the case.

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
22 Feb. 1825.

Explain why out of that number so small a portion was given out?—The rest are in the depository of the Society.

Cannot you get more in circulation in the course of a year?—Yes, the grant in question has reference to the circulation of two years; the supply of 43,000 copies was prospective, and the circulation of 16,302 was actual.

Had you any authority from the London Hibernian Society to go to Ireland?—None.

Or from any other Society?—None whatever.

Was it perfectly your own movement?—Yes.

But being there, you were ready to assist the views of any of those societies that have been mentioned?—Yes, and conceiving the plan of the London Hibernian Society to be the most applicable to the existing state of society in Ireland, I preferred exerting my occasional endeavours in promoting its extension.

Not going there with that view?—No, I left myself entirely at liberty in that respect.

But being there, you did apply yourself to establish Branch Hibernian School Societies?—Yes, I was partly so engaged.

How many tours have you made in Ireland?—Five.

In what year did you first visit Ireland?—I think in 1819.

Had all your five tours an object of the same nature?—The general object was that of promoting the moral improvement of the country.

Have those tours carried you into every part of Ireland?—Into most parts of it.

Have they afforded you opportunities of conversing with the Roman Catholic people?—Yes, with the people and also with their clergy and bishops.

Have you observed much change in their opinions upon the subject of education between 1819 and the last year?—Yes, a very great change.

Have the goodness to describe the nature of that change?—I should describe it as consisting in the disposition to give that resistance which is now so generally offered to the authority of the priesthood, when exerted in opposition to the instruction of themselves and their children; had the same opposition manifested itself five years ago, I think it would have been effectual in restraining the attendance of children upon schools where the Scriptures were in use; popular attention has been drawn to the subject of education, and there has been a great deal of inquiry which has resulted in the perception that not only is the education which we offer adapted to their circumstances, but that it is reasonable and accompanied with no design of withdrawing them from their religion.

How do you account for the Roman Catholic clergy not employing the same opposition in 1819, that they have employed in 1824?—I believe, that in 1819, they were not generally informed either of the extent to which scriptural education had proceeded, or the effects which it would have upon the faith of their people.

The opposition has never been so violent as in the last year?—Never, it was both increased and organized by the appointment of the commission.

Is it your opinion that the appointment of this commission has tended to increase or diminish the efficiency of the London Hibernian Society?—I believe it has tended to increase it in one sense and to diminish it in another; it has tended to diminish very considerably the attendance upon its schools, for although there will probably be an increase upon the numbers of last year, it is certain that this increase would have been much greater but for the opposition that originated with the appointment of the commission; on the other hand, that opposition has produced discussion upon the subject to an extent that has excited very general resistance upon the part of parents; they have examined the subject and are satisfied that there is no sin in sending their children to school, and upon this conviction has been founded a determination to continue them there.

We are at a loss to determine whether it is your view that the resistance of the Roman Catholic clergy to those schools, is beneficial or injurious to the views of the London Hibernian Society?—I consider it beneficial to every society, inasmuch as the number of children now in attendance upon scriptural schools may be viewed as the effect of a deliberate purpose upon the part of the parents; they have been driven by the resistance of the priesthood to examine and discuss the subject, and they have been decided by reasons which were perfectly intelligible to them, that there is no real danger in keeping their children at such schools.

We wish for a distinct expression of your opinion, whether you conceive that the directors of the London Hibernian Society ought to consider the opposition that has prevailed for the last six months, and still prevails, as a circumstance of self congratulation or apprehension, or an intermixture of both sentiments?—I am not aware of the light in which the directors view it, as I have not lately had any communication with them; I consider it a decided advantage.

Have you often had conversation with individuals among the peasantry upon the subject of the Scriptures?—I have.

Have the instances been numerous?—Yes; I have taken repeated opportunities of ascertaining their feelings upon the subject, and particularly with a reference to the designs which are entertained by the societies.

Have you ever talked with individuals who had never seen the Scriptures?—I have talked with individuals who had no definite idea of what the term Scripture meant, and had never heard of such a book.

Or the Testament?—No.

Or the Gospels?—No.

Can you recall to your recollection any such conversations?—I believe I could furnish the particulars of many such, from notes which I have made at the time.

833
 Examination of
 J. E. Gordon,
 Esq.
 22 Feb. 1825.

Do you not recollect at present any particular conversation you may have had of that nature?—I cannot at this moment select the instances, from the extent and variety of five years experience; but the impression is upon my mind, that I have met with numbers unacquainted with the existence of the Scriptures, and who had no intelligible idea of Bible, Testament, or Scriptures. I do recollect one individual who produced me Butler's Catechism, as containing the rule of their faith, in the words of Jesus Christ. He was a man about 70 years of age, and there was another person present who happened to be in possession of a Douay Testament, to which the man was opposing his catechism as the word of God; he said it was the true word, and what taught their religion, and he asked whether it (the catechism) was not written by Christ; when the other informed him that it was written by Dr. James Butler, he seemed in great astonishment; as to the Testament, he had never heard of it.

Does that catechism profess to be written by Dr. Butler?—Yes; but I remember that the title-page of this particular copy was torn off. I can state another instance: A friend of my own offered a Douay Testament to a Roman Catholic servant in the house, who was very much pleased with the book, but had no notion of its being the word of God; she thought that there were a great many Bibles, and that it was, in short, a name for every good book.

Were those persons who were in the habit of attending mass?—Yes.

Is it possible for a person to attend mass without hearing parts of the Gospels read?—They may hear them read, but they do not understand that they are parts of the Gospel; they have no idea of the distinction between the divine and human parts of the service.

Are there not parts of the missal that point that out?—There are, but a large proportion of the lower orders are very ignorant of the missal.

Do you mean, that they confound the prayers of the day with the Gospels?—They do. In an investigation which occupied nearly three whole days, during which I entered as many cabins as that time would admit, only one copy of the Scriptures was found, and it was a copy of the Protestant Testament that belonged to a child in attendance upon a Protestant school; very few of the persons had any notion of the meaning of Scripture.

Where was it this investigation took place?—In the county of Wicklow.

Have you ever met with an educated Roman Catholic who was ignorant of the existence of the Scriptures?—No.

What do you mean by an educated Roman Catholic?—Any Roman Catholic having received the advantage of a liberal education.

You do not mean a person who had been educated in a common country school?—No.

In those cabins you visited, how many people did you find who could read?—There were not, to the best of my recollection, more than half a dozen cabins in which any of the adults could read.

You found only one Testament?—Yes, and the persons in the cabin were afraid to touch it; they handed it down upon a board.

What was their motive for not touching it?—They considered it an heretical book.

Is it the result of your observation, that the Roman Catholic clergy have more or less objection to the use of the Scriptures by the adult peasantry who can read, than they have to children reading them?—They have the same objection, but it is different in its effects; they are not so successful in keeping them out of the hands of the adults as the children; that is, the adults who attend the schools.

Do you think that the Roman Catholic clergy do object to persons possessing education such as you have last alluded to, reading the Scriptures?—I believe that they would rather they did not read them; but in the case of such persons, their authority is not sufficient to deter them from the practice, if so inclined; their opposition to the use of the Scriptures proceeds upon the general principle that its discoveries, when unaccompanied by the notes of their church, are fatal to the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion.

In your opinion, do the Roman Catholic clergy object to the laity who are well educated reading the Testament with notes?—I should conceive they would not object.

Have you observed many instances in which rival schools have been founded by the Roman Catholic clergy in the neighbourhood of the London Hibernian schools?—I should state from general experience, that the first movement produced by the establishment of a new school, is that of decided opposition; when that expedient fails, which it generally does, the second step resorted to is the establishment of an opposition school, and these schools are invariably of such a character as clearly indicates that the object of their patrons is rather to interfere with the attendance of the children upon the schools opposed, than to supply a substitute.

Is the education in such rival schools gratuitous?—That depends upon circumstances; few masters will be found to teach gratuitously, and it is seldom the case that funds can be raised from voluntary subscription to uphold a master; they proceed generally in enforcing a compulsory stipend, which, although very badly paid, does, in fact, uphold a great number of inferior schools, in opposition to those upon the scriptural principle.

Can you say which the parents of the children prefer, the London Hibernian schools, or the free schools set up by the Roman Catholic clergy?—The Hibernian schools, without doubt.

What means have you of knowing that?—Extensive observation, together with information received from the inspectors, readers and schoolmasters of the different societies.

What are the means the Society has?—A numerous and most respectable body of the gentlemen and clergy of the country state their own experience in their communications with the Society, which so far is independent of the information of its own agents. One valuable source of intelligence is the information received from the patrons and visitors of the schools, who are under no temptation to misrepresent facts.

Are the Scriptures used in those rival schools?—I have never met with a copy, except in two instances; one in Boyle, and the other in the neighbourhood; the Scriptures were in the schools, but only used in one instance; in the other, the master confessed that he could not use them.

What are the books used in those rival schools?—There is a difference between the books used at present and the books which were used a few years since; the appointment of the commission produced a general research, which cleared the schools of what was most objectionable; but previous to that investigation, the general reading of the common schools consisted in such books as the Irish History, the History of Rogues and Rapparees, and Moll Flanders, with pieces of newspapers, and any thing they could obtain.

Have you seen all those books in use?—I have seen these, and many more of the same description, with the exception, I think, of Moll Flanders.

Do you think these books exist in a less degree now?—I believe they do in a much less degree, in consequence of the general search which was instituted by the Roman Catholic clergy.

In what manner had those books been supplied?—I suspect by the parents.

You do not mean to say that the Roman Catholic clergy authorized them?—No; for the reason that the Roman Catholic clergy had no connection with the schools in which they were to be found before the appointment of the commission.

You are now speaking of hedge schools?—Yes.

Could you define or describe in any manner to the Commissioners, the sort of notion you have found the peasantry to entertain as to the limits of the power of the priesthood in temporal matters?—It varies as to situation; there is, if I may so speak, a geographical variety in their ideas upon this subject; they have a different conception of it in Munster to what they have in Ulster. In many parts of Munster and Connaught, they believe that the priest is armed with powers of life and death; that he could strike them dead, if he was so minded; in other parts, they believe that he could afflict them with sickness, make their hair fall off, kill their cattle, and blight their crops.

In Ulster do the people believe it?—Not generally.

To what do you attribute that difference?—To their intercourse with more enlightened society; there is a superior tone of moral feeling in Ulster to what we meet with in Munster or Connaught; the Protestant part of the population being generally educated, a different standard of sentiment and habit exists, which has an influence upon Roman Catholics, and they fall to a certain extent into the popular views and feelings of society.

What is your impression as to the notions the people entertain upon those topics in the province of Connaught?—Some parts of Connaught are more superstitious (if we except Kerry) than perhaps any part of Munster; in Galway, Mayo and Roscommon for instance, they are very ignorant; and just in proportion to the extent of their ignorance, is their belief in the supernatural powers which the priest is able to employ in their government.

Have you ever found that any of the people thought the priests could turn them into hares and goats?—I am not personally acquainted with any such instances, but I have no doubt that they exist.

Have you ever met with instances in which they have thought the priests had influence over their crops?—Yes, it is a very general belief.

Did you ever hear the expression, "the priest's curse"?—It is very general.

What do you apprehend to be the meaning they attach to it?—It has a very wide meaning; some conceive it will affect their health, their cattle and their crops.

Is it their impression that the priest ever goes the length of pronouncing his curse against any individual?—They believe it no doubt; and I am sorry to say, that their belief in this respect is fortified by the conduct of the priests themselves.

In what way has it been so fortified?—By reference, upon the part of the priests, to the providential distresses and calamities of persons who have opposed their authority; I have met with the most barbarous instances of such attempts at connecting domestic misfortune with ecclesiastical disobedience.

Mention any one or two of them?—I would mention one as a specimen of the worst class; it was the case of a poor woman; I think a widow, but I am not certain; she had two children at the school of a lady with whom I am acquainted, and they were continued at that school in opposition to the declared will of the priest; the woman shortly afterwards lost her mother suddenly, and on returning from her funeral she found one of the children burnt to death; the priest soon afterwards called, and finding her in great distress, he enquired into the cause, when the woman had acquainted him with her situation, he simply observed to her, "did not I tell you that you would repent of it;" I should have stated, that he had informed the woman she should have cause to repent of her conduct when she refused to withdraw her children; he then left her, having merely called for the object of connecting her disobedience with her bereavement; I am aware that this is a very common practice.

Is the priest's curse synonymous with excommunication?—No; I think they conceive the priest's curse consists rather in a general malediction, than in a formal excommunication; it may be fulminated from the altar, but it may also be uttered in his closet; it consists rather in his ill will than in ecclesiastical anathema; I would beg to state an instance, which shews the difference between it and a fulmination from the altar, in a case with which I am acquainted; the priest was in the habit of getting intoxicated, and there was a ditch very near his residence, where he very frequently had the misfortune of finding himself when when he grew sober; no Roman Catholic would approach him at such times, and the office of assistance was generally left to the Protestants who lived in the neighbourhood; the reason given was his habit of cursing in such circumstances, and the consequent dread that it might affect the parties who were present; this was reported as a fact which could be authenticated.

What means have you of ascertaining that?—The well known report of the neighbourhood, founded upon the testimony of persons who had assisted him.

Did you ever see that priest?—No, he was removed afterwards for inefficiency.

Was it in any part where you happened to be residing?—It was where I have visited.

Do you conceive, in any given districts in which the scriptural schools have been introduced, that those notions of the excessive power of the priests are found practically to diminish?—They do diminish just in proportion as the people become acquainted with the Scriptures.

Which do you conceive to be the most efficient means of education; the London Hibernian Society, or the Kildare-place Society, each taken singly by itself?—I think there is no comparison as they stand; the Kildare-place Society with its resources, and the London Hibernian Society's machinery would amount to what I should conceive a perfect system of education; and I should also state, that the Hibernian Society, with its principles and regulations, and the Kildare-place Society's resources would produce the same system; the principles in a great measure the same; but the one possesses the power of enforcing its principles by means of guards and securities, which the other institution certainly does not possess.

Supposing each of the two Societies to have an equal income, say 10,000*l.* a year, which do you conceive would produce the most good?—I think the London Hibernian Society would, for the reason that the machinery of its inspection is such as to afford every guarantee that could reasonably be demanded for a faithful adherence to its principles.

Are there not many schools which have contrived to belong to both Societies?—A great number.

Do you think that a fortunate circumstance generally?—I do, for the following reasons; a clergyman or gentleman in the country who is not able to build a school-house, is assisted by the Kildare-place Society in the preparation of the school; while the system of the Hibernian Society enables them to secure a general attention to the principles upon which he wishes the school to be conducted, the Hibernian Society being unable to sustain the expense of building and furniture; the connection is certainly desirable, particularly as there is no clashing of principles.

Should you consider it a circumstance to be lamented, if the Kildare-place Society's aid were to be withdrawn generally from all the schools referred to in the preceding question, or is it your impression that the schools could dispense with that aid?—I think it would operate very injuriously to the country; a great number of the Kildare-place schools were established by the Hibernian Society; the patrons of those schools readily availed themselves of the aid which the Kildare-place Society affords, but I am satisfied that they would be very sorry to transfer those schools to that Society's management; at the same time that the withdrawing of its aid would leave them in circumstances of considerable embarrassment.

Suppose those schools were left to their option, with which Society would they connect themselves?—From principle they would certainly prefer the Hibernian Society, but from necessity they would in many instances adhere to the Kildare-place Society.

Why would they prefer the London Hibernian Society?—Because it supplies so many securities for the conduct of the schools upon principles which the promoters of scriptural education generally prefer; the inspections of the Kildare-place Society and the Hibernian Society are widely different; the one is quarterly and regular, in addition to cursory inspections, constantly surprising schools, while in the other case it occurs only once in twelve months, or of late perhaps somewhat more frequently; still if the patron of the school is not able to extend his personal observation to its management, it is conducted as the master pleases.

Do you think the mass of people prefer the Hibernian Society's schools?—I confined my answer to the gentry of the country.

Do you think there are any considerable number of Protestants in Ireland fit for education, who are not in a course of education?—I think there are a great many Protestants in Ireland as ignorant, or more ignorant if possible, than the Roman Catholics.

The question alluded to ignorance as to reading and writing?—Yes.

Is there any opposition made by the Protestant clergy to your schools?—None to the extent of my personal knowledge.

Can you account for there being so many Protestants without education?—There are many parts of Munster and Connaught which are not supplied with the means of education in any form; there are tracts of country, comprehending 10 and sometimes 20 square miles, where schools are not to be met with.

Have you visited different parts of Ireland?—Yes.

Have you visited the north?—Yes, but not so generally as the south and the west.

In your opinion where does education prevail most?—Certainly in the north, although the difference is not so great between the north and the south as is generally supposed; it is a difference rather in the quality of the education, than in the number attending the schools.

Is there a greater number of children in a course of education in the north than in the south, out of a given population?—I should say there were.

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
22 Feb. 1825.

Do you think there are any considerable numbers of Protestants in the north who have not the benefit of education?—Not so many as in the south and west.

Do you think there are many Protestants in the rural population of the south and west of Ireland?—Yes.

Amongst the class of labourers?—Yes; there are many Protestants to be found in the neglected tracts of country which I have described, who are yet unreached by the effects of benevolent exertion.

You do not conceive there is any unwillingness on their part, to derive the benefit of education from the Hibernian Society?—There is no actual unwillingness, but there is a greater indifference among the Protestants of the south than the north; the desire to obtain education will always bear a proportion to the intelligence of the population; and the population being more intelligent in the north, there will naturally be a difference in the demand for education.

Would you be very much surprised if it turned out, that the number receiving education in the south was greater than in the north, regard being had to the population?—I think it not improbable that the number is greater, although there are parts of the south where it cannot be the case. In some parts of the provinces of Munster and Connaught, I should be very much surprised to find, that the gross of the children in attendance was greater than in the province of Ulster; but I believe there are parts of those provinces where the number may be greater.

The gross population of Ulster is 1,998,000; the gross population of Munster is 1,935,000, would it surprise you, if in the population of Ulster, which exceeds the population of Munster, there was a less number in a course of education than in Munster?—I should be surprised at it; I believe that the difference is not so great as is generally supposed, but I should calculate that there was a difference in favour of the north.

Are the objections which are made by the Roman Catholic priesthood, to the system of education pursued in the Kildare-place Society's schools, as strong as those you have stated to exist on the part of the priests to the London Hibernian schools?—Not in all cases, for the reason that they are able to evade its principles, and that constitutes the only difference.

Can you state how they are able to evade them, and what principles they are which they evade?—The interval between the inspections of the schools, and the principle admitted by the Kildare-place Society, of a qualified use of the Scriptures instead of enforcing their daily and stated perusal, admit of a latitude which is taken advantage of by the opposition, and the Scriptures are not in fact the principal reading of the schools.

In the Hibernian Society they read the Scriptures every day?—Yes; they consider the practice essential to the object contemplated by scriptural education, and therefore they are read daily.

Do you think that the Roman Catholics distinguish minutely between the two societies?—I do not think that the Roman Catholic poor are aware of the distinction.

Both societies agree in excluding catechisms?—Yes, and all books of controversy.

And no provision is made in either of them for religious instruction, beyond the reading of the Bible?—That is the plan of both institutions.

And all explanations are forbidden in both cases?—Not in the case of the Hibernian Society; it does not interfere with the practice of patrons, in questioning the children upon the literal meaning of what they read, and also of affording in particular cases doctrinal explanation; but it does not permit them to advert to points of controversy.

Are you acquainted with any school supported by the Baptist Society?—Yes.

Are they objected to by the Roman Catholics as strongly, or more strongly than the Hibernian schools?—I have not found that the lower orders entertained very clear distinctions between the different societies; their object is education; and whatever society offers the greatest facility for accomplishing that object, meets most readily with their approbation.

With regard to the priests, what should you say of their feeling towards that Society?—The more decidedly sectarian the character of the society, the greater their opposition; and in regard to the Baptist Society, they are furnished with a plausible objection by the designation which it bears. They are able to say it is conducted by sectarians, and they give the people very distorted notions of what sectarians are, as well as the objects which they have in view.

Further Examination of James Edward Gordon, Esq. on Oath, Tuesday, 12th April 1825.

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
12 April 1825.

IN the regulations for the government of your schools, there is a scale of proficiency used?—Yes.

Do you find the progress of the children in general correspondent with this scale?—That depends upon circumstances; particularly upon whether they have been at liberty to attend for the time included; in the majority of instances it does correspond, the standard being fixed so low as to render it attainable by the average of children.

In general, would you consider, that children whom you would think were deriving fair benefit from the school, did make a progress correspondent with the scale?—I think the experience of the Society proves it, and I should also state, in proof of how attainable the standard is, that children detached by opposition from the schools are very often found to possess the required proficiency at the quarter's inspection, from the attention paid to their their tasks in the cabins, where application must be more interrupted and more unfavourable than if they were attending at the schools in the intermediate time.

Has it not been found, that this mode of paying the master, according to the proficiency of the children, has led to a particular abuse, similar to what you have pointed out; that if the children have studied at home or elsewhere, and had only attended at the days of examination, that the master has been paid for children who have not attended during the quarter?—Sometimes that is the case; but the form of the class paper, and the other rules adopted by the Society, are so much against the practicability of subterfuge and evasion, that it can be discovered whether a child has prepared itself at a different school; if, however, a child has studied in the cabin, and acquired the requisite proficiency, it is admissible at the quarterly inspection, for the reason that the children who are not at liberty to attend the school, or who have been withdrawn in consequence of the opposition, would otherwise derive no benefit from the system; in the mean time they have been stimulated by the influence of the master and the quarterly inspection to study in the cabin, so that what is attained under such circumstances, is an advantage traceable to the regulations of the Society.

Does not it appear from that, that the master is paid for children whom he has not had the trouble of instructing for that particular quarter?—He is.

Must it not happen in an opposite direction from your system of paying the master, that he frequently has the trouble of instructing children for whom he is not paid, who have attended during the quarter, but from negligence or want of talent are unable to acquire a due degree of proficiency, so that the master has the trouble and not the pay?—That is very true.

Does that happen in many instances?—Yes, it does; as there are many children mentally unable to attain to the standard fixed by the Society (although that standard is rather low than otherwise), the master has often the expense of his trouble without any remuneration.

Can you conjecture what the proportion in any school would be so dull of talent as not to be able to make the proficiency you state; one in 50?—A much greater number; between incapacity, the interruption occasioned by the opposition and other causes, there is probably one-third subtractable from the gross attendance.

Would the children who are deficient in one quarter, ever come forward in the next, and shew such a proficiency as would entitle the master to payment, or is he ever paid in a succeeding quarter for a child who has been deficient in the preceding quarter?—The Society sometimes allows it; there is, I believe, a regulation or power vested in the inspector, by which the master may be paid at a subsequent inspection for failure in the quarter preceding, provided the child has attained to the limit which the Society prescribed as attainable at the end of the six months.

Does that happen often?—Not often.

Do you think, if a child was for any reason so little proficient for four successive quarters, that the master obtained no payment for him, that the master would continue that child upon the list?—Certainly; he is under an obligation to continue every child upon the list; he is not a free agent with regard to the dismissal of children, and there are such guards upon his practice in this respect, as to render it impossible he could exercise the power.

Would he take the trouble of teaching a child for four quarters, without receiving payment for him?—He would; the contract is between the master and the Society, and not between the master and the parents of the children.

Has the master the power, in any case, of striking a child off, even though he should make nothing by him?—He has no power of the kind.

In whom is that power vested?—It rests with the Society, but it is a power which I should say was seldom if ever exercised, as the Society proceeds upon the general principle, that a child may derive good by attendance upon one of its schools, although not the amount of good calculated upon by the scale of proficiency; on the supposition, however, that it is actually deriving good, the master is under an obligation to give his attention to it.

You have said, that of the children on the roll, you think the master does not obtain payment for more than two-thirds, and that for one-third he gets nothing, for some reason or other; either their want of sufficient talent to acquire the requisite proficiency, or a want of sufficient industry, in which you include the attendance?—Yes.

Which is the most frequent cause, the want of attendance or the want of talent?—The most frequent cause is the interruption produced by the opposition; there are comparatively few whose talents would not enable them to arrive at the prescribed limit.

Then, where two-thirds only are found to pass the examination, it may be concluded that the remaining third have been prevented by the opposition from attending the school?—Yes, generally so, but there may be other causes.

Do you find the parents of the children most disposed to let the children attend schools, without paying any thing, or that they would rather pay something?—Schools without paying any thing, because they accommodate themselves most to the impoverished condition of society in which they are established.

There is a notion that the lower orders of people are disposed to pay something?—In the north I have found that such a feeling actually exists, but in the south and west I have not discovered it; I refer to the very poor.

It is mentioned in one of your reports, that the parents of the children sometimes pay a halfpenny a week?—That is the case, particularly in the north-west counties, and extending to the north; but I have observed a very marked distinction between the south and the north, with regard to such a disposition.

Is there any activity used by the Society to procure such subscriptions or contributions, or

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,

are they voluntary?—If there is no local patron who will undertake to pay the sum stipulated by the Society of 6*l.* or 3*l.* annually, for the school or schools established, the practice is, that the master is generally charged with it, and in that case it is supposed to be paid by the parents of the children; it is subtracted from the salary of the master, on the understanding that he is so paid.

In the accounts of the Society, credit is given annually for sums received from the parents of the children; those sums are received by the Society?—Yes, they constitute a supposed part of the master's stipend.

They pass into the funds of the Society?—Yes.

Do you consider that those sums were voluntarily contributed by the people as free offerings, or that the people were induced to give them from a zeal and anxiety to procure education?—It is partly in consequence of the master's influence with the parents of the children, and partly the result of a voluntary disposition on the part of the parents.

Do you consider that the sum so received affords a criterion of the disposition of the people towards a school?—It certainly does.

And the general attendance upon the schools?—Not so much a criterion of the attendance as the disposition; we attempted to carry the regulation into Mayo and Galway, and several of the southern counties, and failed; the consequence was, that we were obliged to make that allowance to the masters by the Society which in the north and north-west had been made by the parents of the children. The attendance in the south and west was at the same time equal to the attendance in the north.

Is there not in each school a roll, containing the names of all the children?—There is; there are two documents in the school, the one entitled the school roll, and the other the class paper.

Opposite the name of each child, is there not a series of small divisions, in which the schoolmaster can mark the attendance of each child on each successive day?—Yes.

Who is the individual who exercises the delegated authority of the Society of striking out and inserting names upon the rolls?—The master may insert in the school-roll the name of a pupil entering the school, but I am not aware that the Society ever assumed the necessity of such a regulation as should provide for the striking off the name of any child disposed to attend the school. In cases of very bad conduct, the child would no doubt be reported to the quarterly inspector by the master, or the master might erase the name, although the justice of such erasure would come to be examined by the inspector at the general quarterly inspection.

How often is the list adjusted?—It must be adjusted every quarter by the quarterly inspection, and it is intermediately adjusted by the cursory inspectors as often as they may enter the schools.

If a child has attended the school but once during the quarter, is its name continued on the roll?—It is continued on the roll, with the regular notice of the days of non-attendance.

Supposing a child has not attended at all during the quarter, is its name continued upon the roll?—It is, until the end of the quarter.

So that no name is continued upon the roll of any child who has not attended once at least during the preceding quarter?—I must, in reference to that question, distinguish between the class paper and the school-roll. The name of the child may remain on the school-roll beyond the quarter; but, as the class-paper, which presents the most accurate exhibition of the attendance is completed at the end of every quarter, it is there discovered whether a child has really attended within the quarter or not.

Is there any comparison of the school-roll and the class-paper?—There must be a regular quarterly comparison, as the children, at the quarterly inspection, are mustered by the school-roll.

According to the mode in which the school-roll is regulated, it may happen that the name of a child who has not attended for the preceding quarter, may still appear on the school-roll?—Yes, in consequence of the probability that it will resume its attendance in the ensuing quarter.

What limit would you assign to that probability; would it extend to one year or two?—I am not prepared to say.

Do you think it possible that a child that has not attended for two years, if there is a reasonable expectation that it may return to the school, may have its name continued upon the roll?—Certainly not more than one year; I am not prepared to speak particularly as to the manner in which the school-roll is regulated by the quarterly inspection, but there are such comparisons as would prevent the appearance of the name of a child who had not attended for twelve months.

According to the scale of proficiency, do you think it likely that any child of average faculties could attend one-half of the school days in the quarter, and not entitle the master to payment?—That depends upon the use it makes of its time upon the absent days.

Do you think there are many who attend half the time for which the master does not obtain payment?—There are many who attend more than half the time, for whom he does not obtain payment, and many also who attend the whole quarter, for whom he does not receive payment.

Is it the inspector who decides upon the proficiency of the child, and the payment to the master?—Yes; but it is generally in the presence of the visitors and superintendents of the school.

By the 14th report of the Society, published in the year 1820, it appears that the contributions from the parents of the children, during that year, amounted to 1,075*l.*; by the 15th report, it appears that the contributions for that year had fallen off from 1,075*l.* to 1,031*l.* It is stated in the body of that report, that the Society in that year had met with more

more opposition than usual, and that the number of pupils had been reduced from 58,202 to 54,520; do you think that explains in any degree the cause of the falling off?—Yes; I should say that it affords a probable explanation.

The 16th report, which you have furnished to the Commissioners, does not contain the usual account at the end?—That is a consequence of its being the only copy which I could procure; the Society always publishes a report of the year's transactions previous to making up the appendix, and that report has often a tolerably extensive circulation before the appendix is added.

By the 17th report, for 1823, it appears that the contributions from the parents had risen to 1,359*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* It appears that there was in that year an increase of 55 schools, and 5,217 scholars. By that report it appears that you had then, altogether, of schools, 628; and that you had then of scholars, 57,443. In the report of 1824, it is stated that you had an increase during the preceding year of 101 schools, and 9,548 scholars, yet the number of schools returned is 653, and the number of scholars is 61,387; how do you make out, therefore, that there was an increase of 9,548 scholars, and 101 schools?—Assuming the accuracy of the scholars, I should account for it by the increased attendance upon the existing schools, the increase of attendance being in a larger proportion than the increase of the schools. The attendance upon the same schools fluctuates according to circumstances; for example, many schools were reduced last year, by opposition, to nearly one-half of the attendance upon the same schools at this moment.

Do not your annual reports state the gross number of persons who pass through the schools, or are in attendance upon the schools during the year, without regard to their attendance?—They do.

Then how can the fact that they attended, or did not attend, affect the question?—The entries determine that; the number of schools established, with the number of entries in the schools previously established, determine the increase of the year.

Do you not profess to give all the result of the documents furnished by your agents?—Yes.

If it appears by the documents furnished to you in 1822, that there were then 628 schools having 57,443 scholars in the year, and it appears by your report in 1823, which report is made upon the same principle, you had 653 schools, and that there were 61,387 in attendance, does not it follow that the increase was rather under 4,000, instead of 9,548?—I apprehend that the error will be found in the addition of the schools of the preceding year, as the returns presenting the increase may be depended upon, and are far more likely to be correct than the total of the schools in the preceding year.

Then you mean to say it is probable that there were not so many as 57,443 during the preceding year?—I think so.

It appears that the contributions for the year ending 1823 amounted to 1,468*l.* 14*s.* 2*d.*, and it appears that the contributions for the year 1824 amounted to 838*l.* 7*s.* 1*d.* from the parents; do you account for the falling off of the contribution in the last year, by the falling off in the attendance of the scholars from the opposition?—It may be accounted for otherwise, and is capable of being explained by supposing, that the contributions are transferred from the parents to the clergymen and gentlemen who patronize the schools. In that case, it would be subtracted from the account of contributions paid by the parents, at the same time that it would not indicate any diminution in the attendance; and this explanation is probable, on the ground that there is an increasing interest in education among the resident gentry of the country. Many of the schools that have hitherto remained dependent upon the support of parents, in connection with the stipend paid by the Society upon quarterly inspection, are now patronized by clergymen and gentlemen who become responsible for the sum of 6*l.* annually in part payment of the teacher's salary.

How do you account for the parents not contributing so much last year, if the attendance was as great?—By their contributions being transferred to the gentry of the country, or paid by the Society.

Do you mean that the gentry have contributed an increase in proportion to the decrease from the parents?—I think it probable, for two reasons. There is an increasing interest in education, upon the part of the resident gentry, which is procuring for schools without patronage the active support of a number of respectable individuals who have hitherto stood aloof from the subject; the second, is the reason that in many parts of the country, where schools were reported as dependent upon the contribution of the parents, they are now wholly supported by the Society.

In the county of Sligo it appears there was a falling off in the contribution and subscription of the parents; how do you account for that?—It may be accounted for by the opposition to the schools, and the decrease in the number of schools, or for the causes already stated.

It appears, that the total of subscriptions from counties for the year ending 1823, amounted to 349*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.*; that the total of subscriptions for the year ending 1825, amounted to 422*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* making an increase of 72*l.*; while your contributions for the year ending the 5th of February 1824, amounted to 1,468*l.*; and the total of your contributions for the last year amounted to 838*l.* Thus there was a falling off, in the way of contribution, of 630*l.* and an increase in the subscriptions of only 72*l.*; how do you account for the difference otherwise than by the falling off in the attendance?—Satisfied of the fact, that the attendance has considerably increased, I can only account for it by supposing that the Society has taken upon itself the entire payment of the masters, where the parents were unable to assist.

The contributions, as far as the patron goes, would remain the same, but the contribution from the parents would not remain the same. A parent will not contribute where his child

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
12 April 1825:

is not attending the school, though the patron must; does not then the falling off of the subscription by the parents, shew there was a falling off in the attendance?—It is not a certain criterion, because the contribution by the parents is not regularly paid; it is often a mere nominal value. There is frequently no contribution paid; but where it really stands, it is supposed that it is paid, and the master is debited with it, whether it is paid or not.

Then it would make its appearance here?—If the contribution is discovered to be merely nominal, it may be transferred to the Society; and in that case it would neither appear nor serve as a criterion of attendance.

If between the contribution from the parents and the subscription from the patrons, there must be a certain sum made up for each school, and we find that the total sum made up amounted in one year to 1,000*l.* and in the other year to 500*l.* must there not have been a falling off in the schools, particularly having regard to what you have just stated, that whether the money be paid or not by the parents of the children, or the patrons, it is charged to the master, so that it must come into the pockets of the Society, if the schools be existing and the children there?—If transferred to the Society on account of nonpayment by the parents, there would appear to be a diminution in the contribution, without any real diminution in the attendance. Transferred to the Society, means that the Society undertakes to make good what the parents were unable or unwilling to contribute. The schools have increased, and therefore I cannot otherwise account for the decrease of contribution upon the part of parents. I observe again, that the contribution paid by the parents, in the case of a particular school, is no criterion of the attendance, inasmuch as the master, with an attendance perhaps of 200 children, may not receive a sixpence, when he is debited with the full contribution. It stands to his account, and he sustains the loss.

And the loss does not fall upon the Society?—No.

If the masters are charged to the Society, with reference to the whole sum that would be payable to them, independent of the subscription and contribution (which is what is done), the Society is on the other hand credited by the amount of the subscription and contribution; and if there be a considerable falling off in the amount of the subscription and contribution, how is that to be reconciled with any other fact than a diminution in the schools?—Upon the face of it, it would appear to indicate a diminution in the schools; but for the reasons I have stated, the contribution, upon the part of parents, can be no criterion of attendance.

If the expenditure of the Society, in respect of Schools be increased, ought not the receipts of the Society to be increased, if there has been an actual increase of the schools?—They ought, if the contribution of parents were a necessary condition of opening a school. Increase of expenditure is a certain criterion of increased attendance; but it has no connection with increase of contribution. I should observe also, that the condition of granting a school to a clergyman or gentleman, willing to promote education upon the principles of the Society, has been modified; it was formerly 6*l.* annually, but it has lately been admitted, on the part of the Society, that 3*l.* will entitle to a school, where 6*l.* cannot conveniently be paid. The alteration was dictated by the circumstance, that clergymen or gentlemen in the country wishing to establish more schools than one (sometimes four or half a dozen), could not conveniently pay 6*l.* for each school. This may account for an apparent diminution of subscription when compared with the reported addition to the schools.

That would apply to subscriptions?—Yes.

Not to contributions on the part of the parents?—No.

Perhaps you will look into that?—I shall be able to give particular information upon the subject; but I believe I am correct in the meantime in stating, that the Society now generally makes good to the masters the contribution of the parents, where it is a nominal contribution, which will present the difference; that whereas it was nominally paid by the parents, it is now actually paid by the Society. This would subtract from the general list of parents' contribution all cases in which they were merely nominal payers; and it would indicate a corresponding diminution in their subscription, but without indicating any decrease in the attendance. The Society has also been induced in some cases, by the pressure of opposition, to secure to the master a stipulated sum; and if it is not in part obtained from the parents or patrons, it is paid by the Society.

Then the master receives, whether there be an attendance or not; there is no reduction made in consequence of the falling off from the amount of attendance?—The actual attendance is regulated by the quarterly inspection, and the master is paid accordingly. The sum then decreed by the inspector is made up of the quarter's contribution, by the parents or patron, and as much more upon the part of the Society as shall make it equal to the number of scholars passing the examination. If the parents cannot pay, and there should be no patron, the whole is paid by the Society; but if the school has been very much reduced by opposition, the master is then encouraged by temporary allowances, which are independent of his scholars.

If you consider there has been a falling off of the attendance, producing a falling off of the contributions through the year, through the violence of the opposition, you do not charge the master with the amount of the deficit?—No; but it should be observed, that the contributions are seldom found to bear any proportion to the attendance of the children.

In the letter received from you by the chairman of the board, you state that the returns for the last year, 1824, when compared with those of the former year, discover an increase of 75 schools, and 5,563 scholars; and then you state that this result shews, that during the first and most successful efforts of an opposition, unexampled in the history of Irish education,—an opposition, stimulated to the furthest stretch of ecclesiastical authority, and still

J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
12 April 1825.

still unrelaxed in its efforts, have not materially impeded the progress of the Society's operations; do you mean that the schools increased during the opposition, and that the number of scholars increased during the opposition, or subsequent to it?—I have stated there, that the efforts of the opposition are unrelaxed; consequently the increase must have taken place under the opposition. The opposition still continues, as every day's experience is teaching us, and that too in the case of almost every school; but it does not produce the same effect upon the parents of the children, as it did six months ago.

Does this statement in your notion, or according to the intention of the framer of it, mean to convey to the Commissioners, that pending the opposition, there was an increase of 75 schools, and 5,563 scholars?—I should say, during the opposition.

In point of fact, is not this supposed increase of 5,563 scholars, an account of all the additional scholars who came into the schools during the year, without shewing what number was withdrawn during the year?—I am not able to answer with certainty upon what authority the increase depends, although I believe that it is taken from the inspectors returns for the last quarter. The inspectors returns present the average of the children in attendance upon the schools, distinguishing the exact number who pass the inspection; and I have reason to think that the increase there shewn, is taken from their last quarter's reports.

The letter refers to a document transmitted with it; and by that document it appears, that the highest number in attendance upon any school during any one quarter of the year is the number stated in the return as the attendance upon the school; the result, therefore, as we should understand it, which this document affords, is that if in the month of January last, there were in attendance upon the schools 80,000, and that between January and December, there came into the schools at different places, and in different schools, 10,000; but that during the same period, there left the schools 20,000, it would appear from that, there had been an increase of 10,000 during that period, instead of a diminution of 10,000; look at the return for the county of Kerry; you will find, that in the school at Bleneville, there were in February, for the quarter ending the 24th of May, 122; that there were for the quarter ending the 1st of January 1825, only 17, in that school; there was a falling off of from 122 to 17, yet 122 is the gross number carried out; therefore, so far as any information is afforded by the gross return, it would not appear that the opposition had produced any falling off in that school, though, in point of fact, something produced a falling off from 122 to 17?—Yes; I observe, that it states the greatest number; consequently this document would afford no criterion.

Are there any other documents that would afford a criterion?—Yes; the inspectors returns would afford a certain criterion, and upon those returns, I apprehend, the quarterly lists are founded.

Could you supply to the Commissioners an authenticated return of the number of children in actual and real attendance on the schools of the London Hibernian Society, in each of the last eight quarters?—I have no doubt but I could.

What would you define as actual attendance?—I would define actual attendance to be the number actually present on the day of inspection; as this is the number in connection with the school during the quarter.

[The witness was directed to furnish such return as soon as possible.]

Have you any means of knowing whether the opposition on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy has been equally strong from the 1st of January to the present time, as it was during the autumn of the last year?—I have uniformly learnt from various sources of information, that the opposition continues the same, without, however, producing the same result.

Will you describe the extent of the difference in the effects to which you allude, as between the time that has elapsed since January and the present time, and the last autumn?—I would describe it to consist in a general return of those children who were detached by the first efforts of the opposition; and I apprehend, I am correct in stating generally, that the attendance of the schools at present equals, and in many instances surpasses the attendance previous to the opposition.

At the periods of the greatest success of the opposition given to the schools, what do you consider to have been the number of children withdrawn from the schools of your Society, according to the best means of calculation you possess?—Speaking from such information as I possess upon the subject, I should say it was between fifteen and 20,000.

Can you offer any opinion, with tolerable confidence to the Commissioners, as to what proportion of those fifteen or 20,000 children have since returned, and are now in attendance (assuming that some are in attendance) upon the schools?—I should give it as my opinion, that the greater part of the number has returned, although the average proportion cannot of course be stated distinctly.

Do you conceive more or less than half have returned?—More than half.

Then are we to understand that you conceive there are other Roman Catholic children who were never in the schools before January, that have become pupils in the schools?—Numbers undoubtedly have.

Can you form any accurate notion of the number who have become pupils since January?—I could only speak generally in the absence of the inspector's returns; these documents would give the general increase in each school.

What is your present impression, and we do not seek it unless you can state it with some degree of confidence, as to what may be the accession of Roman Catholic children, to the schools of the Society since January, who never belonged to them before?—I should hesitate in giving a particular answer. I am only aware of the fact, that the numbers in attendance have been considerably increased within that period.

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
12 April 1825.

Do you express your opinion, without any shade of doubt, that whatever may have been the amount of secession of Roman Catholic children from the schools, during the autumn of the last year, that the major part of those children have returned?—I have no doubt of it whatever.

Upon what data do you found that opinion?—Upon the state of the schools during the different periods of the opposition. I have had access to the inspector's returns, stating the condition of the same schools during different regular and cursory inspections; and by these records it would appear, that schools which had been reduced to perfect skeletons, have filled up to their original numbers, and some even beyond them.

How many schools were totally suppressed in consequence of the opposition during the last year?—Between October 1823 and October 1824, there were 39 suppressed.

Have any of those been re-opened?—Several of them have; but I should add, that 168 new ones were opened in the same period.

Have any of the thirty-nine been re-opened?—I have stated, that several of them have; I suspect most of them.

Besides the 168?—Yes.

Will you describe in what manner you conceive that the parents of those children who were withdrawn from the schools, and whom you suppose to have returned at present, settle the matter with their clergy, whom you also suppose to be unrelaxed in their opposition?—The parents are becoming more generally persuaded, that opposition to the education of their children, is an oppressive and unfair exercise of the priestly authority; and they are beginning also to suspect, that the curses denounced in consequence of disobedience in this particular are inoperative. They are far more than ever disposed to think, that the priest has no right to stand between them and the benefit of that education which is so freely offered them.

Are we to understand, that you mean, that the priests, speaking generally, continue to withhold the rites of the church from those parents, and that the parents are indifferent to this proceeding, or that the priests do not, in fact, adhere rigidly to the withholding of those rites in the manner you suppose was the case in the last autumn?—In many cases the priests do not withhold the rites of their church, from the fear of proceeding to such an extreme as would prove dangerous to their authority; but in other cases where they actually do withhold them, I believe the parents have become comparatively indifferent about the result. From recent information, I am inclined to think that the priests are enforcing, with greater rigour than ever, the penalties of disobedience in this respect.

Do you mean in proportion as they are increasing the rigour with which they withhold the rites, the Roman Catholic parents are becoming indifferent to those proceedings?—When it is insufficient to enforce submission, it will naturally produce indifference. In many instances it is leading to a partial separation from the communion of their church, and in other instances to a permanent separation.

As to those you suppose that are withdrawing themselves permanently, are they attaching themselves to any other communion of Christians?—Some are, and some are not; it will chiefly depend upon the degree of religious information which they may happen to possess; as whether, for example, it was religious conviction, or the mere object of education for a child, which had most influence in producing the separation. Wherever there is a concern for religion, they will attach themselves to some other communion; but where there is no such concern, and they have been driven to the step by the severity of clerical opposition, it is not likely that they will immediately join other communions.

Does not it occur to you under these circumstances, that the continuance of this state of things, if urged to its full extent, must lead to the total destruction of the authority of the priests?—I am satisfied that it will do so. The most fatal step which they have ever taken is the step of determined opposition to education in the shape in which it has been presented. The disposition of the parents to receive it, and the anxiety of the children to attend the schools, combined with the influence of its patrons and promoters in the country, is decidedly an overmatch for the resisting authority, and will eventually lead to its destruction.

Do you offer this communication founded upon facts that come in an authenticated form to you?—Entirely upon facts within my own knowledge, or resting upon the authority of competent judges.

Are the facts authenticated in the same way as those that led you to believe that the people thought the priests could turn them into goats or hares?—The one I believe to be very uncertain; the other rests upon such authority as I have described.

You stated upon your former examination, that you believed the fact that the people thought that their priests could turn them into hares and goats?—I believe that many do.

Have you any better evidence for that belief than for the facts you have now stated?—I should say, that in the one instance they take a strong practical resolve, and by so doing, they give a practical proof of what is really their conviction; in the goat case, we depend upon the mere report of conviction.

Have you any other evidence of the one fact or the other, than reports made to you by your inspectors, readers or schoolmasters?—We have the report of competent judges, who are independent of any Society, the gentry and clergy of the country; but the most conclusive testimony which we could point out, is the testimony supplied by the conduct of the persons referred to; their daily practice is the best proof of their conviction.

Would you have any objection to state the particular district in Ireland in which you have heard of those changes?—I have not visited any district in Ireland where cases of the kind have not come under my observation; and I would instance as one evidence of the truth as well as the extent of such changes, the fact that a considerable portion of the readers and schoolmasters employed by the societies generally through the country, are converted Roman Catholics, converted in this sense, that they have been confirmed in the Protestant religion by the power of religious conviction; I specify these persons as one class.
and

Do you apply your observations to persons of that description, or to society in general in Ireland?—I should apply it first to the persons I have, as furnishing the strongest illustration, being so many instances of individual proof; in its application to society generally, it is discovered more in the expression and effects of a relaxed and hesitating belief, than in those very decided instances of conduct which cross the line of outward demarcation.

Do you believe in Galway there has been any relaxation among the people in the observance of their rites and duties?—I am very partially acquainted with the county of Galway.

Do you believe there has been any such relaxation in the county of Mayo?—Yes; there is a very considerable relaxation in some parts of Mayo.

Do you think there has been any such relaxation in the county of Sligo?—Yes, I believe there has.

Do you think that your Society has succeeded in the county of Sligo in the last year between January 1824 and January 1825, notwithstanding the opposition of the priests, in increasing the number of its schools and scholars?—I believe it has succeeded there as it has done elsewhere, but I am not able to speak particularly as to those dates; between October 1823 and October 1824, I find that it opened twelve schools, and had six closed by the priests.

In the point of the attendance of scholars?—The attendance of the scholars is certainly greater than at the commencement of the year; I have reason to know this from particular enquiry into the state of the Sligo schools when at Sligo last year.

You consider, that in the counties of Mayo and Sligo there has been a perceptible reduction in the number of the Roman Catholics to the gentry of the country?—I am not prepared to speak as to a sensible reduction; I am prepared to say, that there has been a considerable influence exerted upon popular feeling and belief; and that the effect of education, combined with the circulation of the Scriptures, and the recent discussions, has produced an actual although not perhaps a very sensible reduction.

Do you conceive there has been, from the information you have received amongst the Roman Catholics of Sligo and Mayo, such a change of conduct with respect to their religion as to be observable by the gentry of the country?—With respect to education I should say decidedly so.

With respect to the attendance upon their religious rites?—The one may be expected to influence the other; education has produced the secession of several, and the relaxation of a still greater number.

To such a degree that you think it must be a matter of public observation?—To those who possess opportunities of observation, and are disposed to improve them.

Do you know any thing of the Queen's County, or the county of Carlow?—No.

If the Society were successful, as you seem to consider, in Sligo, during the last year, how do you account for the falling off, both in the subscriptions of the patrons to the schools, and the contributions of the parents of the children during that year?—With respect to contributions on the part of the gentry, there is only one contributor in the county; and as to the children, it may be accounted for by what I stated a short time since; that what was merely a nominal contribution to the master before, may be made a real one by the Society transferring it from the parents to itself.

You stated, that it was in consequence of the children not attending through the opposition?—And also for the reason that we cannot obtain masters for the same salary which would have satisfied them some years ago.

Do you mean to say, that the sum actually contributed by the parents for the year ending 1824, although it appears to be considerably less than the sum contributed in 1823, was in point of fact as much?—Probably it was more; the difference presented by the list might merely prove, that the Society had made substantially good to the master what was nominally good to him on the part of the parents; in this view it would not stand upon the list as a contribution from the parents, but it would be actually paid by the Society; and in such a case it would appear, that there was a diminution in the contributions upon the part of parents, when at the same time there was no diminution in the attendance.

You have stated, that finding there was a diminution of the contribution owing to the diminution of the attendance, you thought it would be severe to make the master feel the consequences injuriously to him, and therefore you determined that the master should not feel it?—The diminution to which the Commissioners are referring, is a diminution in what the master is entitled to upon the inspection of his school; it is the decrease in his salary from the Society, occasioned by the failure of the attendance; and in many cases the Society has found it necessary to credit him with sometimes sixty scholars, in a school where there have not probably been more than a dozen in actual attendance.

You stated it also as to the amount of the contribution?—I have stated two particulars respecting the contribution; the one is a case in which it may be transferred from the parents to the gentry of the country; and the other is a case in which it may be transferred from the parents to the Society.

It is a credit given to the Society for the sum received from the parents?—Yes.

Then in the account for the year ending February 1824, the credit given is 1,409*l.*; the credit given last year is only 800*l.*?—That would be accounted for by the supposition of its ceasing to be a contribution by the parents but paid by the Society, owing to the circum-

Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.
12 April 1825.

stance that while it stood as a contribution on the part of the parents it ceased to be paid, and that now it is paid by the Society and does not appear at all.

It appears by the report for 1817, that the contributions which were to be received from the parents of the children, were to be carried substantively and distinctly to the credit of the Society, without any charge being made in respect of them to the master?—These contributions do not now stand as a part of the payment of the parents, because they have ceased altogether to exist, but the sum is actually paid by the Society to the master, instead of being subtracted by the Society from the master's payment.

Do you mean to say that the Society, before the last year, made the master account for the contribution from the children whether he received it or not?—In the cases I refer to, the parents were supposed to contribute 6*l.* annually, in support of particular schools, and this sum was accounted for in the settlement whether they received it or not.

When was that rule established that the parents should contribute 6*l.*?—Very early in the history of the Society it was established in the case of schools where patrons did not contribute.

If you had one thousand schools, there must be according to your last answer 6,000*l.* in the way of contribution?—If the condition was complied with.

Then in the report for 1818, how does it happen that the amount of contributions for which credit is given is only 1,468*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* and that the number of schools returned as day schools is 653, and the adult schools in which the contribution also takes place?—

A considerable number of these are schools to which the condition does not apply; the clergy and gentry who have established them relieve in many cases both the Society and the parents from the condition, by subscribing the full salary, and the Society in such circumstances has only to introduce its regulations and guarantee their observance by the quarterly inspection. I find, however, that I am incorrect in stating that 6*l.* is at any time insisted upon in the case of parents, in schools where there are no patrons; the master was once accountable to the Society for this sum, but it has been reduced and is now 3*l.*

Should you at this moment consider it a misfortune, or otherwise, that so far as relates to your schools already in existence, that the future aid of the Kildare-place Society should be withdrawn from them?—I should consider it a misfortune, and a great one too.

State the nature of your views upon that subject?—The great desideratum in the system of the Hibernian Society is the want of sufficient funds to improve the school-houses and afford such salaries as should enable the institution to command a superior class of teachers; in both those instances the assistance of the Kildare-place Society is extremely valuable, inasmuch as it enables the Society in cases where it is without the support and co-operation of the gentry of the country to improve its buildings and employ a more efficient description of schoolmasters.

Do you not find that the Kildare-place regulations somewhat conflict with the activity of your own operations?—Not in the least; the only point in which they really conflicted was the point of oral exposition; clergymen and gentlemen conducting some of the schools will not surrender the right of asking their children such questions as the nature of the instruction received may happen to suggest; and this liberty the rules of the Hibernian Society will admit, although they do not tolerate the introduction of questions of controversy; the Kildare-place Society upon the other hand, does not allow of any questions being asked during school hours, other than such as are grammatical, but it admits of one day in the week being appropriated for any purpose that the conductors may think proper, provided they give due notice to the children, and on such days the patron or visitor of the school may ask such questions as he pleases; this regulation harmonizes the practice of the two institutions.

By what class of teachers are your Sunday schools administered, is it by your ordinary schoolmaster or are there a number of people who patronize them and take part in the instruction?—That depends upon the situation of the school; it is conducted by the master in circumstances when we cannot obtain better assistance, otherwise it is taught by ladies and gentlemen resident in the neighbourhood.

Do you pay the schoolmasters for their attendance upon the Sunday?—Never.

Are your Sunday schools connected with the general Sunday School Society of Ireland?—No.

What is the reason of that?—There may be no particular objection to it, but as we can carry forward the plan of Sunday school instruction independent of that Society, it would be unnecessary to burthen its resources by our claims.

Are you aware whether it is a feeling of the Sunday School Society of Ireland, to be averse to such a connection, or would they desire it?—They would desire I believe to report our Sunday schools, as they consider their institution in one sense a general registry of Sunday schools through Ireland, but they would prefer I apprehend, that we should be at the expense of our own schools.

Do you conceive that the average attendance upon the schools connected at once with the London Hibernian Society and the Kildare-place Society, is greater or less than upon those which are supported by the Hibernian Society alone?—I should say generally that it was greater in the joint schools; we are able by the help of the connection to give greater encouragement to masters, and there is no doubt an influence exerted by this consideration; in the union consists the efficiency of both the systems.

State what is the number of schools at present that are actually connected with both societies?—I have forgotten the number of schools, but there are about 16,000 scholars, independent of the Cork Society, which presents about 8,000 more.

If those schools were put to their election as to which Society they would belong, assuming

245
Examination of
J. E. Gordon,
Esq.

assuming for the purposes of the question that they could not belong to both, which Society do you think they would prefer to continue in connection with?—That would depend upon the sentiments of the conductors; whether, for example, scriptural education or general education was considered of the greatest importance; I should conceive that in the majority of instances they would prefer the Hibernian Society, because in a majority of instances scriptural education is the object of the promoters.

Do you think the conductors of the Munster Hibernian schools would be of that opinion?—If I may judge from the declared sentiments of some of the most influential members of that committee, I should say, they would prefer the Hibernian Society; when a proposition or a recommendation was submitted that some of its rules should be relaxed or dispensed with, the members I allude to intimated their determination in such a case to leave the Society.

Do you conceive that the majority of the conductors of the Munster schools would prefer a union with the Hibernian Society to a union with the Kildare-place Society, supposing they must choose between them?—In speaking of the majority, I think they would be put to a strait, but by carrying with them the plan of the Hibernian Society, they might upon a principle of pecuniary interest be induced to connect themselves with the government of the other; I think however that they would hesitate in consenting to a decided separation from the Hibernian Society upon any grounds.

We are aware that the Hibernian Society consider the scriptural plan of education as incalculably the most important part of their system, but we should wish to know from you whether it is your impression generally that that supplemental sort of instruction to be derived from the moral and entertaining books published by the Kildare-place Society, forms a desirable adjunct to that scriptural education, or otherwise?—I really would not undertake to express the feelings of the committee upon the subject, for the reason that our schools in connection with the Kildare-place Society do actually use such books in a number of instances, and the Society makes no objection to the practice; there is no rule or regulation against their introduction, nor has an opinion been yet decidedly expressed upon the subject, one way or another. The committee would certainly prefer that their use did not interfere with those attainments in the knowledge of Scripture, which are prescribed by the rules of the Society, but their occasional perusal has been found in practice to be perfectly consistent with such attainments, although it must always be understood in a very limited or secondary sense.

They do not object to miscellaneous instruction being added to their scriptural education?—No, provided it does not interfere with it.

Are we to collect that where a school belongs both to the Kildare-place Society and the London Hibernian Society, it has belonged in the first instance to the Hibernian Society, and not vice versa?—Almost in every instance.

You have not engrafted your system upon the Kildare-place Society, but the Kildare-place Society upon yours?—I believe this has been almost uniformly the fact; there is not one school within my knowledge in which the contrary has been the case, but there are no doubt many schools which have been founded upon a joint application.

What do you conceive is the actual proportion between the Protestant and Roman Catholic pupils attending the schools of the Society?—The Roman Catholics are at present about two-thirds at least.

Is that opinion formed from actual returns?—Yes, upon a very particular form of return lately adopted for the inspection; we can express it to an individual child; it is I believe upwards of two-thirds considerably.

Appendix, N° 246.

Further Examination of James Edward Gordon, Esquire; Saturday, 16th April 1825.

THE Commissioners, referring to the minutes of evidence when last you were before them, would beg to ask, with reference to a particular question and answer, whether you wish to give any explanation respecting it; the question was put to you in these words:—It appears that the total of subscriptions from counties for the year ending 1823, amounted to 349*l.* 8*s.* 5*d.* that the total of subscriptions for the year ending 1825, amounted to 422*l.* 3*s.* 11*d.* making an increase of 72*l.* while your contributions for the year ending the 5th February 1824, amounted to 1,468*l.* and the total of your contributions for the last year, amounted to 838*l.*; this leaves a falling off in the way of contributions, of 630*l.* and an increase in the subscriptions of nearly 72*l.* how do you account for the difference otherwise than by a falling off in the attendance?—I had just left a meeting on very important business; my mind was naturally engrossed with what it had been occupied about, and consequently was not prepared to answer with that distinctness of recollection which I would have done in anticipation of the subject.

Is there any explanation which, on further consideration, you are desirous of giving upon the subject of that question?—I should state, that being satisfied of the fact that the attendance has considerably increased, I can only account for it by supposing that the Society has taken upon itself the entire payment of the masters, where the parents were unable to assist.

Do you mean that the Society has, in point of fact, taken those payments upon itself, or that you suppose it?—I am supposing that.

Do you mean to suggest, that the Society may have taken those payments upon itself, and and that this circumstance, if it occurred, may account for the difference, or do you mean to say positively that the Society has done so?—I mean to say, that it may have done so, that that affords a probable explanation of what I should otherwise be unable to account for; I am the more disposed to think that is the case, from the Society having done so at previous periods. *

Do you mean previous to the last year?—Yes.

Was there any new rule made by the Society on the subject within the last year?—No rule that I am aware of; but as the pressure of the opposition, as bearing so hard upon the masters, rendered it necessary that the Society should be more liberal in its support of particular schools, that might be considered a sufficient reason.

Was there a rule of your Society, previous to the last year, that the schoolmasters must obtain contributions to a certain extent, from the parents of children in each school?—No absolute rule; it was considered desirable to stimulate the masters exertions, by making him accountable for such subscriptions, as well as to attain the very important object of bringing the peasantry into a subscribing habit, however small, and on those grounds the master was generally laid under the necessity of procuring that part of his salary from the parents of children; but I am not aware that any particular rule on the subject exists.

Does each master receive a salary independently of what he receives, depending on the numbers which pass the inspection?—That depends on whether the school is in connection with a gentleman who will make the master a separate allowance, or is wholly dependent on the Society. In some cases gentlemen make the master a considerable present beyond the allowance of the Society; in other instances, that allowance extends to the whole of the master's salary, they are very happy to receive that assistance, and that may be the only tie of connection with the institution.

Do the Society in any case give a fixed salary to the master to whatever amount?—In no case whatever; it proceeds upon the general principle of identifying the interests of the master with the proficiency of the scholars.

How is it that a deduction should have been made from the master, with reference to contributions from the scholars; if there be no salary out of which the amount of contribution is to be deducted?—The contribution upon the part of parents prescribed by the Society, is considered a part of the allowance made to the master by the Society. I believe, in some cases, the master is at liberty, or I should say in general cases, the master is at liberty to receive pay scholars to a certain amount.

Is there any established rule of the Society, or was there at any time an established rule of the Society, that the masters of the respective schools should collect contributions to any particular amount from the parents of the scholars?—I am not aware that a positive rule upon the subject ever existed, but that it has been generally the practice of the Society, I have no doubt.

Do you mean that it has been the practice of the Society, to expect that the master should collect, wherever he could, contributions from the parents?—It has been the practice of the Society to lay the master under the necessity of doing so.

To what amount?—Three pounds, with the exception of cases in which the patrons of schools become answerable, the regulation, refers of course, to schools where we have not the benefit of patrons.

Has that rule been varied at any time?—I think that at one period the contribution was greater. If my recollection serves me, it was once 6*l*.

The first year in which the subject was mentioned at all, was in the year 1817, and then it was mentioned that the parents shewed a disposition to pay a halfpenny a week, and that by those means, and by contributions from parents, you got three guineas a school, and that money is carried to the general account, but there is no notice of it taken in the subsequent reports?—It is now carried to the general account whenever it is received.

Does it appear that the payments to the master by the Society, are minus that, or does it appear on both sides of the account?—It appears that the payments to the masters are minus by that sum, if, on the examination of a particular school, the master is entitled to 6*l*. for the number of scholars which pass inspection, and that school is yielding the sum of 3*l*. annually on the part of the parents; there is a subtraction of a fourth part of 3*l*. for the quarter.

Referring then to the account, in which it appears that 1,075*l*. in one year, was given credit for as contributions by parents to the masters, does that comprehend the total amount paid by the parents to the masters, or are there still other payments not accounted for?—There are no other payments on the part of the parents not accounted for; there may have been during the year a greater amount of children in attendance, denominated pay scholars, whom the masters are at liberty to receive to a certain extent, (I am not prepared to say how far) but there is nothing else stipulated for on the part of the parents.

Are not those contributions on the part of the parents quite voluntary?—I believe it is a stipulated agreement on their part, but I should also observe, it is by no means a real value to the amount of 1,075*l*. I should consider that sum a stipulated agreement, with perhaps not one third of it paid.

It appears as an amount carried to the account by the treasurer?—I am induced to think it

* The decrease in contribution upon the part of parents, I have since found to be owing to a combination of the cause stated in the evidence, with a decrease from six to three pounds in the sum required from schools individually. The principal agent informs me, that the sum stood at six pounds generally before last year.

it is a stipulated contribution, from the circumstance that nothing appears distinct from it; I am aware of the fact, that in a great number of schools, the parents, or the master on their behalf, agree for 3*l*. and as that sum is not recorded in any other form, I should suppose that they are identically the same thing.

Do the returns which are made to the Society, shew the different classes of scholars in respect to their religious persuasions?—The present returns do, but I should add, that the present form of return has not been in use more than six or nine months.

Have you the means of stating what is the present proportion of Roman Catholics, that are attending the schools of the Society?—I should say, speaking very generally, between two-thirds and three-fourths are Roman Catholics.

Do you form that opinion from an examination of the returns?—From an examination of the returns; a great many schools are exclusively composed of Roman Catholics.

Are you led to think that the Roman Catholic children have returned in any considerable numbers to the schools in the county of Cork?—I am satisfied that they have returned to very nearly, if not entirely, their original number. I had a letter from the secretary the other day, which warrants the statement.

Can you at all state in round numbers, to what number you think they had been withdrawn, and to what amount you think they have returned?—To the best of my recollection, the general return of the schools, before they were affected by the opposition, presented about six thousand children; when I examined the documents of the Society last year in Cork, they appeared to have been reduced to between four and five thousand, consequently, if they have returned to the original number, there must be an increase recently of between one and two thousand.

Were you secretary to the Society for promoting reformation?—I was nominally secretary while it existed in that form, and I have had some share in its operations since it altered its designation.

By the documents which were issued by the Society, did it appear that you were one of the secretaries?—It did.

Which do you think of your schools are most flourishing, those in the north or the south at present?—I should imagine in the north, but I am not positively prepared to say that it is the case.

In what part of the north?—The counties of Tyrone and Donegal; I do not recollect the other counties which stand next in the scale of proportion.

Examination of the Most Reverend Dr. Kelly; Monday, 4th April 1825.

YOU are an archbishop of the Roman Catholic church?—I am.

You reside at Tuam?—Yes.

Are you acquainted with the counties of Galway and Mayo pretty extensively?—I am acquainted with both counties pretty extensively.

Are you able, from your knowledge of the poorer orders of the people, to form an opinion with respect to their notions in general of religion?—I think I can form a tolerably accurate notion upon that point.

In your opinion, do the lower orders of people of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland in general believe that the priests of the Roman Catholic church possess supernatural powers, that they can change them into animals, or produce any such effect?—I never in my life met with an Irish Roman Catholic who believed that a priest or bishop, or any other clergyman of any denomination or persuasion had power to change him into an animal, or produce any such effect, or in any degree suspend the ordinary laws of nature.

According to your belief, from your own experience and general knowledge, does any such opinion in general prevail among the lower orders of Roman Catholics in Ireland?—By no means whatsoever; I look upon them to be too intelligent and too sagacious to form so ridiculous an idea.

Do you think they believe more than that spiritual censures will produce spiritual consequences?—I am persuaded that they do not consider that ecclesiastical censures affect them in any other way, except that of depriving them of the rites and spiritual comforts which our church administers unto them, and the graces consequent upon them—that they have not the power to call down the vengeance of heaven in any other sense.

If a Roman Catholic died whilst under excommunication, what benefits would he believe himself to be deprived of by that circumstance?—A Roman Catholic believes that if he dies under excommunication, he dies out of the pale of the Catholic church, that thereby he is deprived of those spiritual comforts and graces which would aid him in obtaining eternal mercy.

Do the common people of Ireland in general, believe that the priesthood have any power over unclean spirits that are supposed to possess individuals?—No further power than that they can offer up prayers to God for the relief of the spiritual and temporal wants of persons supposed to be so possessed.

Sir,

Copy of a Letter
from J. E. Gordon,
Esq. to T. F. Lewis,
Esq.

IN compliance with a request addressed to me by your secretary, I have the honour to present a complete series of the reports of the London Hibernian Society, commencing with its establishment in 1806. The delay in complying with this requisition has arisen out of the circumstance of there being only a part of the set in the possession of the Society, and the consequent necessity I was under of extending my inquiries to private individuals.

In submitting these documents for the examination of the Commissioners of Education Inquiry, it has been considered necessary, by the committee of the Hibernian Society, to accompany them by such explanations and elucidatory statements as may be likely to obviate the unfavourable impression which an exclusive attention to the reports themselves would produce; many of them being at variance with the present practice of the Institution, and all of them, with the exception of the last two, defective in the statement of what constitutes the principles and regulations which form at present its distinctive characteristics.

They are not objected to by the committee, as an authenticated record of the Society's proceedings within the periods which they severally embrace, but they are collectively inadmissible as a representation of the Society's existing practice. This objection to their being received as a standard of reference to the character and objects of the Institution, the committee conceive to be fully authorized by the facts of the reports themselves, as corroborative of a continued improvement of the system from the first year of its formation to the present period; an improvement involving, at every step of the process, such omissions, amendments, and additions as were prescribed by a careful attention to the Society's objects on the one hand, and an increasing acquaintance with the circumstances of the country upon the other.

The Hibernian Society, like most institutions of a similar description, traces its origin to the Christian sympathy of a few benevolent individuals, whose deep concern in the lamentable ignorance of the great bulk of the Irish peasantry, prompted them to the adoption of steps which led eventually to the appointment of a deputation to that country.

The report which was presented upon the return of this deputation, will satisfy the most cursory reader, that the gentlemen comprising it were fully competent to the duties which their appointment devolved; but the brief and hasty survey of the country which the shortness of the opportunity allowed, was no more than sufficient to present them with the external features of its destitution, and little information that was practically serviceable to the object, could be deduced from their exertions. The first steps which were taken towards the accomplishment of such measures as were recommended by this report, had reference to the selection and appointment of agents, who were intended to combine the office of religious instruction, by preaching, with that of promoting the establishment of schools, when it was found practicable; and the connection of these two objects constituted for some years the plan by which the Society attempted, to the extent of its limited resources, the religious and moral improvement of the lower orders in Ireland.

Experience, however, the guide to which the conductors of the Society have uniformly yielded their own judgment, soon discovered the inconvenience of such a connection in a system that was intended to combine the public of different religious persuasions in one great scheme of national utility; and it was consequently resolved to separate the object of juvenile education from that of adult instruction by preaching.

This separation, as the Commissioners will perceive, took place during the year 1814, and from this period the employment of preachers has been wholly discontinued in the practice of the institution. It is almost unnecessary for the committee to observe, that the system of education pursued by the Society professes a religious adherence to the word of God as its substance and foundation, and claims, on that account, to be regarded as an essentially Christian education. The design of the institution, by whatever variety of method it may have been distinguished in practice, is the general instruction of the peasantry, upon principles which shall introduce them to an acquaintance with the truths and obligations of the Christian religion; and although education abstracted from its subserviency to this design, is to a considerable extent provided for by corresponding regulations, it constitutes, in a separate view of its utility, but a subordinate object with the directors and supporters of the Society.

To the principle of statedly employing the Scriptures in the schools of the institution, was closely allied the plan of diffusing the same Scriptures through the general population of the country, to the extent, at least, that the opportunities possessed by its agents might discover to be practicable; and as all reference to controversial commentary and sectarian distinction of creed was provided against in either case, the Society conceived that it had so far divested its system of such objections as do not apply to the right of private judgment in the use of the Scriptures themselves.

While upon the subject of alteration, the committee would also notice the relaxation of a principle which continued for some time to regulate the Society's practice in the employment of school teachers. As the use of the Scriptures in the schools was known to be contrary to the principles and discipline of the Roman Catholic church, it was considered inexpedient to employ teachers who were spiritually subject to the authority of that church, and for a considerable time none but Protestants were admissible to the office of school-master.

It was seen, however, that this restriction was so general a barrier to the extension of the system,

Copy of a Letter

Esq. to T. F. Lewis,
Esq.

system, in districts where the Roman Catholic religion prevailed, that it became necessary to suspend it; and the appointment of masters from that period has taken place without any reference to religious distinction in their creed.

The next circumstance in the history of the Society which the committee conceive to be important in the present statement, is the employment of itinerant and local readers of the Scriptures. This branch of its system was designed for the benefit of that part of the population which had derived no advantage from early education, and were consequently dependent for their acquaintance with the word of God upon the exertions of such as were qualified to read it in their hearing. The experiment was found to be practicable, and in addition to those benefits of a religious and moral nature, which were ascertained to result from the practice of reading in families, the exertions of the readers were of incalculable use in promoting a disposition upon the part of the adult population to receive instruction through the medium of schools. As soon as this disposition was satisfactorily ascertained, the transition from an assembly of anxious listeners in the cabin to the same assembly of equally anxious learners in the school, was natural and easily effected, and the practice resulted in adult instruction, which constitutes one of the most important departments in the Society's operations.

The last addition to the system which the committee consider it of consequence to notice, is the establishment of Sunday schools, which has already been carried to the extent of 265 schools, and 20,661 children.

In this cursory review of the principle objects and practice of the Society, the committee abstain from going into a more particular description, and they would refer for general information to the two last reports, which were framed with a view to the explanation of the Society's established practice.

With regard to those plans of inspection and internal management, by which the operations of the Institution, in all their extent and variety, are governed, it may be sufficient to observe, that a steady regard to the advancement of scriptural education as the object, and to experience as the best guide, has enabled the Society's superintending agents to frame and digest a plan of practical regulations, which, upon comparison with those of other institutions, will probably be found to excel any thing which the improvements of modern education have discovered. The committee are but too well aware, that the effects which these regulations are calculated to produce are not in all cases realized, and that many of the schools of the Society present an appearance which is greatly deficient of what might be expected from regulations professing to combine the greatest possible stimulus in the case of the master, with the utmost practicable degree of efficiency in the progress of the scholar; but they have also the satisfaction to know, that such instances of failure are a consequence, not of blame or mismanagement upon the part of the Institution itself, but of the incapacity of teachers in its employ, or in other words, of that deficiency of means which prevents it from securing the services of properly qualified agents, instead of leaving their nomination to patrons of schools, and the parents of children; but it may help to account for the appearance of most of the schools in question, if the committee advert to the fact, that many of the common hedge schools of the country have been incorporated with the Society's system, in situations where no visitors of respectability reside.

These schools, in substituting the word of divine truth for the lessons of profligacy and sedition, have become, in numerous instances, the channel of dispensing a moral alterative to the diseased constitution of society around them; but it could not be reasonably expected that masters of the description which is common to such schools, should appear to advantage in their new situations.

The committee have been induced to offer these statements in explanation of the objects and plan of the Society, by a conviction of the difficulty of collecting them from a state of general diffusion over the surface of 17 reports, presenting, for the most part, little more than the detached parts of the system in the succession that they have been discovered by experience; and even in the latter numbers, where these parts are produced in combination, there are omissions of what it is now considered important to offer for the consideration of the Commissioners.

In the progress of an undertaking, which discovers one continued process of improvement from its first commencement up to the present period, it is not to be expected that the report of one year should present the plan and the experience of the next. This circumstance, if it speak to the ignorance of the Society at the period when it entered single-handed upon the discharge of a great national obligation to Ireland, should be permitted also to speak to its docility, in the willing and practical surrender of its original objects, to the dictates of a more enlightened experience. The Society combined in its first form the efforts of the few individuals who were active in the discharge of an important christian duty to Ireland, and is consequently to be regarded as the pioneer of scriptural education in that country. The committee, however, have no disposition to connect the idea of merit with the fact of priority, in the discharge of a long neglected obligation to the ignorance of Ireland; but they conceive, that they may be reasonably permitted to claim for their predecessors in office the consideration that is due to the first conductors of a new and untried experiment, in a state of society where there is not only every thing to learn, but every thing also to apprehend, from the prevalence of discordant sentiments, inflamed by sectarian jealousy and ungoverned passion, without precedent or example, and with no other knowledge of the wide and uncultivated territory on which it entered, than the knowledge that it abounded with opposition on the one hand and indifference upon the other, it is less a cause of surprise that the Society should have erred in the first efforts of an anxiety to do something, than that it should have afterwards recovered itself, and continued, so successfully continued, to adjust its means and its machinery to the wants and increasing demands of the country.

With respect to the objections which are commonly urged against the proceedings of the Society, the committee feel that they are called upon to offer a few observations, which they would premise by laying down a distinction between objections directed against scriptural education in the abstract, and such objections merely as apply to the mode in which it is attempted to be communicated by the London Hibernian Society.

On the first objection, as it is of a general nature, and applies to every institution engaged in promoting Education in Ireland, the committee have nothing further to remark, than that it constitutes the real ground of hostility to the Hibernian Society, and that the force and injustice with which it is urged, will ever be found to bear an exact correspondence to the proportion which the use of the Scriptures may happen to bear to the stated reading of the schools which are opposed.

The first, and most popular of the objections to which the committee would advert, is the objection which charges the institution with the design and practice of proselytism; and a precipitate and indiscriminating zeal, has pretended to rest the justification of this charge upon the published statements of the Society; but more particularly upon the extracts of correspondence which are usually given in the appendix to its reports. Before the committee make any observations upon the justice of such a charge, or the extent to which it is supported by the publications of the Society, they beg to define the sense in which they understand the impression; and this they are enabled to do in the language of their last report to the public. Proselytism, as confined to a mere external change of religious profession, "forms no part of the Society's system. No interference with ritual distinction is permitted in the schools; no attempt at such interference has come within the knowledge of the committee; and there is not probably a school in the Society's connection, where the parents of Roman Catholic children in attendance, would not readily bear testimony to the good faith which has been kept by the institution, in the observance of this understanding."—To these, may be added the sentiments of the committee of 1811, delivered in the report of that year, referring to the "Divine energy of true and vital religion," the committee observe, "without this holy and saving energy, should the greatest numbers be converted to the name of Protestantism, such proselytes would receive but little benefit from the change. They would bring no blessing to the Society; and as large experience has taught, they would almost without exception relapse into Popery."—As far, therefore, as proselytism includes a reference to a particular creed, the committee would discharge the idea from both the intention and practice of the Society; but in conveying more distinctly to the Commissioners their understanding upon the subject, they would lay down the broad and intelligible distinction which subsists between proselytism, in the sense in which they have disclaimed it, and those changes, or more properly conversions, which in the language of the same report, "are as applicable to the Protestant as the Roman Catholic, and uniformly described to consist in a religious and moral transformation of character, never in exchanging the mere ceremonial of the one church for that of the other."—Instances of such conversion as this, will ever be found to be a consequence of the unrestricted use of the Scriptures; and as they owe their reality to the divine efficacy of that word, so will society be indebted for their numbers to the extent of its free circulation. Such conversions as these, the committee unequivocally associate with the plan and designs of the Society; and if the question should be asked, as it not unfrequently is, whether such conversions involve an abandonment of the Roman Catholic church; the committee, in speaking from experience, will candidly avow their conviction that they do.

The evidence then, which is founded upon the fact that the Society makes proselytes from the Roman Catholic communion, amounts to nothing more than the proof that its practice is consistent with its avowed profession, of introducing the minds of its pupils to a general acquaintance with the truths of Scripture.

With respect to the particular class of proofs which are said to be discoverable in the correspondence of the Society, the committee would draw the distinction between instances of reported conversion, and cases of practical interference with the tenets of the children in school. Cases of the description which are usually stated in the report, are facts of conversion wrought by the simple efficacy of divine truth, not by interference upon the part of the Society with the religious peculiarities of the scholars; and however the policy of such statements may be questioned by some, the statements themselves supply no proof of improper deviation from a strictly neutral practice in the schools.

The second particular on which the committee would take leave to offer a few observations, is the employment of itinerant and local readers. It has been said of the employment of such agents, that it is practically at variance with the simple object of education; and where efforts have failed to found a charge of sectarian interference upon the practice of the schools, the same inference has been built upon the assumption, that the employment of readers is strongly indicative of the intention of proselytism in the cabin. On this assumption, the committee have to offer two remarks.

The first is, the fact that the readers generally, form a necessary and most effective part of the machinery of education; and that the part of their practice which is taken up with reading the Scriptures, is rather to be viewed as the filling up of a more stated vocation than the vocation itself. The readers of the Society constitute what is termed the cursory inspection of the schools, a species of supervision which is found to exert the most salutary influence upon the system, and to constitute by far the most accurate medium of information as to the character and condition of its component parts. In addition to this duty, the readers constitute for the most part the teachers of adult schools; and between the employment of cursory inspection, and the instruction of such schools, their exertions are necessarily demanded by what in strict propriety must be termed the superintendence of education. If this connection with the schools should be conceived to afford any facility to the violation of that neutrality which has been already adverted to in school instruction, it is answered, that the duties of the agents described are limited to inspection and report, and never permitted to trench upon any regulation which was intended to provide against interference with the internal management of the system. But the committee have no disposition to conceal from the Commissioners, either the fact that the readers are otherwise employed, or the precise nature of the duties in which the additional employment consists.

the

It is not only enjoined that they should read the Scriptures within the districts which are severally assigned to their exertions; but it is moreover permitted them to answer such questions as may be asked by the hearers, whether of doctrine or controversy. In as far as mere reading is concerned, the committee can entertain no distinction between reading the Scriptures to such as are incapable of reading for themselves, and teaching them to such as can be prevailed upon to attend the adult schools. The plan of reading the Scriptures consists simply in the attempt to effect that for the ignorant peasant in his cabin, which the Society is effecting for his ignorant offspring in the school; and the same obligation which has decided the use of the Scriptures in the juvenile and adult schools, is conceived to dictate the only practicable method of conveying a knowledge of their contents to such as have outgrown the benefits of the one, and cannot be collected in attendance upon the other. With respect to the expediency of discretionary power in the interpretation of the Scriptures, or the consideration of how far it would be consistent in the practice of the Society to tolerate inquiry, and the species of domestic discussion which will invariably spring from the disclosure of information to which the population of Ireland are so entirely strangers, the committee conceive that the utmost stretch of prohibitory regulation which any society or individual ought to impose in such circumstances is, the repression of that preaching or openly aggressive attempt at instruction, which would be likely to carry the instructor without those limits which are prescribed by the voluntary inquiries or desires of the recipients. Within these limits the committee consider that the practice of explanation is not only allowable, but unobjectionable; and as those who have reached the years of adolescence are regarded by the Society in the character of free agents, and the sole judges of such questions as they may think proper to propose, so the agents employed, must be left at liberty to frame their answers and their explanations in such a manner as the particular circumstances of the occasion shall dictate.

The committee have considered it their duty to be thus explicit upon those parts of the Society's character and practice which they apprehend to be least understood, and therefore most liable to misapprehension; and they are not less anxious to submit for the Commissioners information, the effects of those principles during a period of conflict which has been new in the history of the Society's proceedings.

The committee are not ignorant of the extent to which the Commissioners are acquainted with the general state of the Hibernian Society's schools; but they are sensible at the same time, that the most important results which have been developed by the operation of these schools, have not reached the Commissioners possession.

By the communication of the usual annual returns of the Society from Ireland, the committee have been put in possession of the particular condition of each school, up to the commencement of the present month; and as these documents exhibit an authenticated muster of the attendance, the committee consider it a duty which is owing both to Ireland and their constituency, to submit their contents for the information of the board of Education Inquiry.

These documents contain in a distinct and plenary form, every thing which relates to the position, attendance and local support of the schools individually; and it is only necessary further to remark, that they have reached the office in the usual course of annual transmission, without any reference whatever to the present communication.

In presenting the Commissioners with an analysis of the information which the returns contain, the committee would submit the following heads:

1st.—A list of schools in each county, including position, patrons, schoolmasters, gross of pupils, number who passed the inspection, with the amount of payment to the teacher.

2nd.—Local contribution in support of schools individually, with the names of the parties from whence it is derived.

3rd.—Gross number of day, Sunday and adult schools, in the several counties, with their classification as it regards visitors, and the communion to which the visitors belong.

4th.—Schools receiving aid from the Kildare-street Society, with the county, barony, &c. where situated, and the nature and amount of the aid derived.

But what it is chiefly the object of the committee to notice, is the fact that these returns, when compared with those of the former year, discover an increase of 75 schools, and 5,563 scholars; a result to which they feel most anxious to procure the attention of the Commissioners, for two important reasons. The first is the desire which they naturally feel that the Commissioners should possess a much more accurate acquaintance with their system than it was possible to obtain either from returns or observation, during the first and most successful efforts of an opposition which was unexampled in the history of Irish Education. The second and most important reason, is the information that an opposition stimulated to the farthest stretch of ecclesiastical authority, and still unrelaxed in its efforts, has not materially impeded the progress of the Society's operations.

This is a fact which the committee consider of infinite importance in a practical estimate of

Copy of a Letter
from J. E. Gordon,
Esq. to T. F. Lewis,
Esq.

of the real value of the Society's system, inasmuch as it discovers the principles upon which that system is conducted, to be practical principles.

But it is the least important part of the discovery, that it proves these principles to be practical in the application; it demonstrably establishes the conclusion, that the peculiar opposition with which scriptural education is doomed to contend, stimulated as that opposition has been by the adventitious circumstances of the last nine months, is totally unequal to the task which it has undertaken.

In hazarding this statement, the committee confine themselves within the scope of their own operations, and would not be understood to extend the conclusion to the experience of other institutions; but having the satisfaction to think that the fact, as they have stated it, applies to the most scriptural, and consequently to the most obnoxious branch of the system, and that the resistance opposed was incapable of greater efforts, so they are bound to conceive, that it could in no case be productive of more unfavourable consequences.

These observations upon the part of the committee, have been prompted by the feeling of a deep and important sense of the obligation which is due to the cause of scriptural education in Ireland, on the one hand, and to that most respectable, numerous and daily increasing class of the christian and benevolent public, which it is their privilege to represent, upon the other. They do not presume to anticipate the Report which the Commissioners may consider it their duty to lay before Parliament and the country, or even the character which the Hibernian Society's operations may assume in such a Report; but as the Commissioners have considered it necessary to make these operations a subject of inquiry, the committee were of opinion, that they should be wanting in justice to themselves, no less than to the object of the Commissioners, if they did not thus officially present the character, motives and experience, of an institution which occupies the largest space* in the system of weekly instruction in Ireland.

I have the honour to be, on the part of the committee, Sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant,

(signed) J. E. Gordon.

Appendix, N° 249.

Examination of the Rev. John West, on Oath; Tuesday, 4th January 1825.

Examination of
Rev.
John West,
4 Jan. 1825.

YOU are secretary to the Baptist Irish Society?—I am; and the treasurer in Dublin.

Where does the parent society hold its meetings?—In London.

Do you consider the Irish Society a branch of the English?—No; it is an English society in London established for the benefit of Ireland.

What do you consider to be its objects; in what way does it tend to effect the benefit of Ireland?—In the establishment of schools and employing Irish readers to read the Scriptures in the Irish language in the cabins of the poor, and we have seven itinerant preachers in the English language.

Do the preachers attend in any way, or connect themselves with the schools of the Society?—The preachers generally attend to superintend the schools; we have seven Irish readers, who have each of them a certain district of schools to superintend in their tours, for reading the Irish Testament, and all the preachers have schools under them, which they inspect, and they send up quarterly reports of the state of the schools.

Will you be so good as to describe the nature of their superintendence of the schools?—The nature of it is this—they go and they hear the children read and spell, and call upon them to do some sums in arithmetic, and they request a certain number of chapters to be committed to memory, and they hear the children repeat those chapters, at least every quarter, that they have committed to memory.

Are they in the habit of giving the children any instruction themselves; do they preach to the children or explain the Scriptures to them?—They do not.

Are they forbidden so to do by the rules of the Society?—I do not know that they are forbidden, but it is the practice for them not to do so; they may when the children are reading the chapters suggest the ideas contained in that chapter, but not to any extent.

To what congregations do those preachers preach?—There is one Mr. M'Keg, of Ballina; he preaches in the town of Ballina, and occasionally when he goes to inspect the schools at different villages.

And in the school-rooms?—Yes; or the court-house, very frequently.

Are the school-rooms of the Society frequently made use of as places of worship?—No, they are not.

Is it a practice which the Society have an objection to?—The school-rooms in general are

* This estimate supposes a subtraction of the Society's schools from the list of the Kildare-street Society.

are not sufficiently large; our itinerant preachers in general, when they go to a town, can obtain the court-house to preach in, and that is what they do in general when they are from home.

By whom are the schoolmasters selected?—By the agents; those preachers in general; they inquire respecting their abilities, and they have recommendations of different persons of their character; they are the persons that employ the schoolmasters generally.

Are the masters all of the same religious persuasion?—No; I suppose half or more than half are Roman Catholics and the others Protestants; the Society make no difference; it is the good character and qualification of the man that is the only recommendation.

What number of schools have you established?—We have about ninety schools, with a few night schools; there are upwards of one hundred, but ninety-two are week day-schools.

In what counties are they situate?—In the counties of Sligo, Mayo, Leitrim, Longford, Westmeath, Tipperary and Carlow, but more particularly in the counties of Sligo, Mayo and Leitrim.

Are there amongst them many schools for girls?—There are, I suppose, upwards of twenty schools entirely for females.

Are females admitted into the schools where the boys are taught?—Not generally.

Are they entirely free schools, or do the children generally pay any thing for their instruction?—Entirely free; they do not pay any thing for books or any thing.

By whom are books supplied?—I have books printed, and supply them with the first and second spelling-books, and sometimes we purchase Testaments and Bibles, but very frequently we have a grant from the London Hibernian Bible Society.

What books do you supply besides Bibles and Testaments?—The first and second spelling-book; we have not any catechisms in the schools.

Is any catechism permitted to be taught in the school?—Not any; for I suppose that we have nearly 9,000 children daily educated, and nearly 8,000 of those are Roman Catholic children, and consequently the catechism in the school would only tend to ruin the school.

Are the children of the Baptist congregations generally taught any particular catechism?—There are catechisms that they are taught, in general Dr. Watts's.

When you say 8,000 out of 9,000 educated in the schools are Roman Catholics, of what religious persuasion do you believe the remaining 1,000 to be?—I am not adequate to answer that question; I suppose some are Presbyterians, some Methodists or Independents, and some of the established church.

Are there many of them children belonging to the Baptist connection?—There may be a few, but very few.

Are there many persons belonging to the Baptist congregation in Ireland, who reside out of Dublin?—Not a great number.

Do the numbers of your congregation increase?—I do not know that they do; not much, however.

In what part of Ireland do those persons reside, belonging to your congregation, not in Dublin?—We have a congregation at Westmeath, another at Abbeyleix, another at Cork, Waterford and Clonmel, and different places I do not immediately recollect.

Have you a regular place of worship at each of those places you have mentioned?—Yes.

About what number may the congregation at Abbeyleix consist of?—One hundred or a hundred and twenty, not more.

How do you know the number there?—I have been there, and preached there myself, and I know the number; I receive a letter every month from a person resident there, of the state of the congregation.

Do any persons attend the preaching of the Baptist minister, who repair from another place out of curiosity, who do not belong to the congregation?—I dare say there are.

Not estimating the number at Abbeyleix by those present when you preached, can you tell how many are in communion with the Baptist congregation at that place?—I should suppose not twenty.

In what way do you distinguish individuals belonging to the Baptist congregation from any other class of dissenters?—We consider that the New Testament is the proper ground and rule for our conduct, and we consider, that according to the plan of the New Testament, that no persons were baptized but adults, and adults after a profession of faith in Jesus Christ, and as such, as Baptists, we do not baptize our children until they grow up to a proper knowledge, and give evidence of their being pious characters and believers in Christ; that is the distinguishing character of Baptists; as to our sentiments in religion, we are the same as the established church, except the matter of baptism.

Are you aware of any point of doctrine in which you differ from the established church, except the matter of baptism and discipline?—No, I am not; there is not one solitary instance in the New Testament in which infants were baptized, only adults, and those adults professing faith in Jesus Christ.

Persons of the established church who become of your Society are baptized anew?—Yes.

Do they, upon that occasion, make any profession of faith?—Yes; but we are friendly with all good men of the church of England, and wish them prosperity; we have no prejudice against them in any way whatever.

What is the profession of faith made?—We make a profession of faith similar in general to the doctrines of the church of England.

When a member of the church of England becomes a member of the Baptist society, is he

Examination of

he required to make a new confession of faith?—No, not particularly so; the only evidence we require is the evidence of true piety.

Your rite of baptism consists in total immersion?—Yes.

What is the extent of your congregation at Waterford?—I have not been there lately, and have not heard lately; probably about one hundred people.

Do you think that the schools have a tendency to increase the number of the congregation?—No, not at all; they have nothing to do with it, it is quite separate.

Do you ever, in point of fact, inculcate the peculiar tenets of the Baptist congregation in your school?—No; the children in the schools do not know any thing respecting our peculiar sentiments; our great object is to give them education, and to make them commit the Scriptures to memory; there is nothing of a sectarian kind attached to in the schools whatever, that is an invariable rule in the society.

Do your Society ever circulate any tracts?—Very few.

Have you ever seen that tract?—[Handing to the witness a tract, entitled, "True Religion exemplified in the History of Mary."—I believe I have.

Is that one of the tracts?—No; our tracts generally are upon the impropriety of sabbath breaking, drunkenness, swearing, and so forth; all of them go through my hand from the Tract Society, and I choose those that respect morality.

Would you consider it consistent with the rules of your Society, that this tract should be circulated by one of your masters?—The tracts I send, are not circulated among the children of the schools, they are circulated among adults in different parts of the country where they travel; we do not make a point of circulating them among the children; our itinerants and preachers circulate them among the grown people where they go, but not among the children.

Are the persons employed to visit your schools as itinerant readers, otherwise employed to circulate tracts?—No, not particularly; now and then I buy twenty shillings worth of tracts, but I always buy those most calculated to promote morality; when they go round they now and then give a tract to a person.

Do you recollect ever giving any copies of that tract that has been handed to you?—I have seen it; I have never read it, that I know of.

The reason for asking you these questions is, because this tract was given to one of the Commissioners by the master of one of your schools; have you ever seen this pamphlet?—[Handing to the witness a pamphlet, entitled, "An Address to the Roman Catholics of the Diocese of Killala and Achonry, stating the conversion of fifty persons from the errors of Popery."—No, I have never seen it, or heard of it.

Did you ever hear of a letter written by Mr. Nelligan, of Kilmactigue, a Protestant clergyman, stating the number of converts made?—I have.

Did you ever see the letter?—I did, a year or two ago.

Did he state in that letter, the conversion of above fifty persons from the errors of popery?—I do not recollect the precise number; I do not know that it mentioned the number.

You mentioned to the Commissioners, previously to leaving town on their tours, that a letter had been printed by Mr. Nelligan?—Yes.

The pamphlet shewn to you is that letter, and it states several conversions as having been wrought by readers of persons employed by the Baptist Society, and likewise the Hibernian Society?—Yes, I recollect it.

Have you heard of those conversions?—I recollect hearing or seeing that pamphlet, I know very well; but the precise number I do not recollect.

Were many of the persons who are now employed by you as cursory readers or inspectors, originally Roman Catholics?—Yes, a considerable number.

Do you rather prefer employing persons who were originally Roman Catholics?—No, there is not any choice upon that subject; I know the recommendation for any situation is a good character and proper abilities to discharge the duties of their office.

Do you recollect this having been stated in any letter published in any of your reports from your agents, that it was desirable that Roman Catholics should be employed, because the employment of them tended to make them Protestants?—I do not recollect it; it might possibly be the case, but I cannot tell; I have always understood that there was no objection to a Roman Catholic, nor did they covet them, it was their eligibility for the situation that was the principal object.

Is it an object of your Society, to promote the conversion of Roman Catholics to Protestantism?—No, not particularly so; we wish to convert them to become pious characters, that is all, we do not want to proselyte any of them; by having the children taught the Scriptures, and committing them to memory, we hope it will be instrumental in enlightening the mind and promoting true piety in them.

Have any members of the established church become members of your Society of late years?—I do not recollect that they have.

Have you heard of any having been received by Mr. Thomas, of Newmarket on Fergus?—No, I have not.

Are any reports ever made to you of such conversions?—I receive all the letters from the agents every month and every quarter; but I do not recollect any thing of the kind, it may possibly be so.

Is there a person of the name of John Thynne employed by you in any way?—There is no such person under Mr. Thomas, of Newmarket.

You were asked, whether many of your readers had been converted persons, and you said they were?—Yes, several of them.

Do you mean that they have ceased to be Roman Catholics, and are Protestants?—I do.

When

 Examination of
 Rev.
 John West,
 4 Jan. 1825.

When a letter writer states in the report, that a certain person, naming him, "has been brought to the knowledge of the truth by means of attending your reading meetings," do you mean by that a conversion to Protestantism, or a new man?—We consider that popery is an error, and having been brought to the knowledge of the truth, they certainly will not remain Roman Catholics.

Do you ever use that expression, as applied to bringing over any other class of persons than Roman Catholics?—Yes, if a person has been a wicked character, whether a Protestant or dissenter, he is destitute of a proper knowledge of divine truth, and when convinced of the impropriety of his conduct, he is brought to the knowledge of the truth.

In your view, can any person, being a Roman Catholic, be said to be brought to the knowledge of the truth, and continue in the church of Rome?—I would not say there are no Roman Catholics who remain such that have not a knowledge of the truth; but we consider, generally speaking, that the Roman Catholics are in error, and if they are convinced of those errors they will forsake them.

According to your acceptance of the phrase "being brought to the knowledge of the truth;" are we to understand, that you consider there are many individuals now in the established church, who have not yet been brought to a knowledge of the truth?—Yes, and among dissenters of our own denomination, a large number who attend regularly a place of worship, and are not truly pious characters.

Are we to understand, you could apply the phrase to a member of the established church, who should become a serious and devout character, although he should not become a member of the Baptist congregation?—Certainly we should; any person who has led an improper life, if they become serious pious persons, we consider them brought to a knowledge of the truth, whether from among ourselves or Roman Catholics, or any others.

Suppose a Roman Catholic who had been leading, what we should call an immoral life, were brought to lead a very moral life, but at the same time to practise the peculiar tenets of his church, praying to saints, and so forth, would you consider that person as brought to the knowledge of the truth?—We should not.

Have many instances been reported to you, in which the children of Roman Catholic parents, who have been educated in the Baptist schools have afterwards ceased to be members of that communion?—Not particularly; I have not heard any thing of the kind.

Have you heard any thing at all of the kind that you consider not particular?—No, I have no recollection of any instance of the kind of adults; certainly by reading the Scriptures they have been convinced of the errors of the Roman Catholics and have changed; I do not recollect any children in the schools particularly.

The question applied to persons who had been educated in schools, and whose conversion might be expected to have taken place after they had left the school?—I do not know of any particular instances that I recollect.

Is it a consequence, that the members of the Society consider as likely to follow, from the mode of education pursued in the schools?—No doubt they do.

Is it a consequence they wish?—I have no doubt they do wish it.

Do they actively interfere in the schools, with a view to promote it?—There is no interference of a proselytising nature in the schools, the Society absolutely forbid it; we wish to give the children instruction with respect to the Scriptures, and to commit them to memory without note or comment, and there to leave it and let it take its own course.

Do you know Pat Brennan?—I do.

Is he one of the readers?—He is.

He was converted, was not he?—That was before he was employed by us.

Had he been educated in a Baptist school?—He appeared to see the errors of popery when he was a very young lad; he appeared to be a promising lad, and our Society put him to one of the readers who understood English, for one year, to be taught to read and write the English language; and that is all the schooling he has had from our Society.

What situation does he hold under the Society?—He is a reader and under inspector of schools, at a salary of about 30*l.* a year.

Does he teach in the schools?—No, he does not; in the circuit he takes in reading the Irish Testament, he has a certain number of schools that he inspects in his tour, and he reads in the cabins of the poor.

Your readers are principally employed in reading and explaining the Scriptures to the poor?—We have seven of that description, and about sixteen Sabbath readers that merely read in the villages where they reside, in their houses to people who wish to hear the Testament.

Do they not also explain the Testament?—They may for aught I know; probably they do; their principal business is to read the Testament in Irish; they are sometimes asked questions while reading, and then they give answers to them.

Have you ever known it occur in any of your schools, where you enjoined the reading and getting by heart the Scriptures, that in order to keep the school full, the master has not insisted upon the Roman Catholics doing that to the extent required?—No; I know it is the general rule for the children attending the school, whether Roman Catholics or Protestants, to commit a certain portion to memory.

That, in order to keep his school full, for which he gets his remuneration, he has omitted that in the instruction of the children?—No, if it had occurred, and the inspector found it out, that man would be dismissed.

Have you had any report of a school at Newmarket on Fergus, kept by a man of the name of M'Namara?—Yes.

Is he keeping that school now?—I do not know, I have not the names of the schoolmasters, but the names of the places where the schools are held; I see there were sixty persons present when it was inspected in December last.

Have you got the inspection of the quarter before that?—Yes.

Would it be the duty of Mr. Thomas, if he found it necessary to dismiss a master for improper conduct, to report the fact to you?—Certainly it would.

Has Mr. Thomas reported to you, that he dismissed a master of the name of M'Namara, in consequence of improper conduct, discovered by the commissioners when visiting the school at Newmarket on Fergus in October last?—I do not recollect; he might have done it, because when I receive letters every month, I send those letters off to the committee in London, who meet every month; I think I have some recollection of his dismissing the master, but I do not think he said in consequence of any thing that was observed by the commissioners. I think I have some recollection of it, but I will not be positive; whenever a master is dismissed from the school, it is their duty to send me an account of it; and whenever a school is established in any other place in lieu of it, it is their province to give me notice of it.

Do you think, if Mr. Thomas had stated to you, that a master of your school had publicly perjured himself, and that his perjury satisfactorily appeared to Mr. Thomas, and that in consequence of that opinion expressed by the commissioners, he had been dismissed; would so material a circumstance have escaped from your recollection?—I think not; I think it was not mentioned.

Has it ever been reported to you by Mr. M'Keg, that parents had been compelled to send their children to your schools, in consequence of their cattle having been impounded by their landlords?—No.

Has it ever been communicated to you, that in point of fact, any cattle had been impounded, with a view to make the people send their children to the schools?—No, not any.

Is there any understanding between your Society and any of their inspectors or officers, that letters shall be written for the purpose of publication, and other letters, which are not to be published?—No, I do not know that there are; it is entirely left to the discretion of the committee in London respecting what letters shall be published, and what shall not be published; I do not recollect ever seeing a letter, in which the person who wrote it requested it might be printed; they are always written and sent to me, and I send them to London, where they are examined, and such as the committee in London think proper to print, are printed, and others not.

Is there any correspondence direct with the London committee, except through you?—Very rarely; there have been some persons who have written to London; some of the readers, but very seldom.

Has the Rev. Mr. Nelligan, who has been alluded to in the examination, any connection with the Baptist society?—Not any.

Does he patronise any of your schools?—I do not know that he does.

Do you recollect having mentioned to the commissioners, before they left town, or any of them, that there had been a paper published by Mr. Nelligan, shewing the number of conversions that had been made through the exertions of persons employed by you and the Hibernian Society?—Yes, I do; but we have no connection with Mr. Nelligan whatever.

He is a clergyman of the parish of Kilmactigue?—Yes, and a magistrate.

And the conversions in question took place in his parish?—Yes.

How many schools have been added to the number supported by your Society in the course of the year 1823?—I do not think there have been any added.

Are your schools increasing in number upon the whole?—They have not increased in the last year; the expenditure was near 3,000*l.* a year, and our funds would not allow of an increase.

What allowance do you make to the schoolmasters?—That depends upon the number of children, and the progress of the children; when the principal inspector goes round once a quarter, he fixes the salary according as he judges what he ought to have; some have 2*l.* 10*s.* a quarter, others 3*l.*, others 4*l.*, and one or two 5*l.* a quarter.

Has the Society expended much money in the building of school-houses?—They do not expend any money in that way; they are generally held in cabins, except a few that the Society in Kildare-place have erected and established for them.

How many schools have the Kildare-place Society been good enough to erect for you?—I question whether more than half a dozen.

Where are the half dozen situate which they have erected?—One in Limerick, another in the county of Westmeath, I forget the name of the place; I cannot say that I recollect the particular names of the places; I think not more than half a dozen.

Are you sure of it?—I think there are not.

Have you any documents that will enable you to ascertain?—No, I do not know that I have; they are mentioned by letters, and so on, that pass through my hands.

Could you ascertain upon investigation?—I certainly could make inquiry.

Are there any other societies with whom you are in connection, and from whom you have received aid, but the Kildare-place Society?—No, not any; there is another place at Gainagh Hill, near Leighlin Bridge, in the county of Carlow.

Was the school there erected by the Kildare-place Society?—Yes.

Are any of your schools in connection with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—No, they are not; they are quite separate.

Have any of them any benefit from Erasmus Smith's charity?—No; we have no benefit from any charity, except the benefit we have received from the Kildare-place Society; now and then, when the inspector goes round, and finds a very good school, he allows the schoolmaster 5 l. extra, we pay the salary as usual; our Society is entirely supported by voluntary subscriptions.

Would the Kildare-place inspectors make their presents to the schoolmasters, without an application had been in the first instance regularly made to the Kildare-place Society, to induce them to take the school under their protection?—Yes; they would confide in the inspector to give four or five pounds to the schoolmaster when he found the children had made great proficiency.

Have the goodness to mention one or two instances in which that has taken place?—It has in the school before mentioned, at Gainagh Hill, near Leighlin Bridge; and it has been done, I believe, in a school at Limerick; but I am not quite confident of that; I know it has in the school under Mr. Thomas.

Were not those schools to which they had granted money for the purpose of erecting a school-house?—It is not confined to that; they do not always give to the school where they have erected the school-house, but other schools where they find them particularly good.

Are you sure in the the two cases you have named, no application had been made to the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, I am confident of it, at least I never heard of it; we have received also this aid from the Kildare-place Society, in educating a considerable number of our schoolmasters.

Have they been educated in the model school in Kildare-place?—Yes.

How many of them?—I cannot say how many, but a considerable number of them have.

Have you many schools in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—Not any connection with them, we are quite a separate Society; though we have both the same objects in view—our agents and their agents are upon the most friendly terms; if a school of theirs happens to be established too near one of ours, they remove it, and we do the same, so as not to interfere with each other.

Are there any of the ninety schools you have named which have the rules of the London Hibernian Society, hung up in them that are visited by the London Hibernian inspector, or the masters of which receive payments or rewards from the London Hibernian Society?—I do not know that there are; I never heard that any thing of the kind was hung up in our schools; our inspectors have a knowledge of the rules of the Society, and endeavour to enforce them.

When you say a knowledge of the rules of the Society, you mean your own Society?—Yes.

What are those rules, what system of instruction do you follow?—The system of instruction is this; reading is taught, writing, spelling, arithmetic, and the Scriptures to be committed to memory. Not any catechism used in the schools, nor any thing of a proselyting nature exercised.

Are any other books permitted to be read in the schools except the Scriptures?—The first and second spelling book.

Any other than those?—Not any that I know of; not according to the rules of the Society.

Would the Society object to any others being read?—I am persuaded they would.

Would they object to the books circulated by the Kildare-place Society?—Yes, some of them they would; they have a very great variety.

Did you ever know of a lending library being established in any of your schools?—No.

Would such a loan be considered acceptable by the Society?—I do not think it would; I have never heard any thing of the kind mentioned; I know we have not any such thing.

Do the children attain a considerable proficiency in arithmetic in the schools of your Society?—I do not know the degree; I have not visited a school for some years. There is a variety in such a number of schools; some make greater proficiency than others, no doubt, of the same age.

Have considerable exertions been made by the Roman Catholic priests to prevent the children of their flocks from attending the schools of your Society?—Yes, very great.

Have they been successful or otherwise?—In many instances they have, and in others not.

Have they been long continued?—They have been, from the very first establishment, in some places; some priests have opposed it, and others have made applications to us to establish schools in the parish, and we had one or two schools held in Roman Catholic chapels.

Do those schools still continue in existence?—No.

How long have they been discontinued?—A year and a half, or two years; but within the last six months their opposition has been greater than ever.

To what do you attribute that?—I suppose it is in consequence of the dissemination of those principles respecting the injurious tendency to the children of Roman Catholics reading the Scriptures; and, as they are read in our schools, I suppose it arises from that.

Have many instances occurred where children have returned to the schools after they have been taken away?—Yes, a great many schools have been reduced to 20 children; and in the course of two or three months they have most of them returned again, and the school has been filled.

What do you think of the opposition of the priests; will it, upon the whole, attain the object for which it is intended?—I find, by the last report, that the number of children in the schools is considerably less, schools that had 60 children in them; there is a very great reduction, more than ever I saw before.

Is it likely to continue?—If the opposition of the priests continues, it will no doubt.

State the amount of your annual income?—The report states that it is nearly 3,000 l. a year.

Do the subscribers reside in Ireland or England principally?—The principal part in England; we have a great many in Scotland. We collected last year but 380 l. in Ireland, and that was the most that had ever been collected.

Irish Society for promoting the Education of the Native Irish through the Medium of their own Language.

Examination of
H. M. Mason,
Esq.
22 Jan. 1825.

YOU are secretary of the Society called the Irish Society?—I am.

You act gratuitously?—I do.

What paid officers have you for transacting the business of the Society?—We have, for transacting the business of the office in Dublin, a young man, whose salary has hitherto only been 40*l.* a year; we gave him last year a gratuity of 20*l.*; and on Friday last we raised his salary to 100*l.* a year, on account of his services and the increase of business; we have under him a youth to whom we pay 20*l.*

When had the Society its origin?—I think our next annual report will be the seventh; about seven years ago.

You do not receive any aid from government?—We do not.

Your funds proceed, we are to understand, entirely from voluntary subscription?—Yes, from that kind of contribution.

What may be about the amount of your annual income at present?—£.929. 6*s.* 1*d.* last year, and this year probably above 1,000*l.*

What are the objects of the Society?—The object of the Society is simply to make use of education in the Irish language, with a view of putting the Scriptures into the hands of the people; I conceive that it is the simple object of the Society to promote the scriptural education of the people.

Do you found schools?—We do; but we have changed our system in that respect; we found in Ireland, that the schools for teaching in the Irish language exclusively did not thrive, because the parents prefer in general having their children taught English.

Is the English language taught in any of your schools?—It is.

Is it taught as much as the Irish?—I should think not.

Is there any circumstance that distinguishes your schools from other schools, except that the Irish language is taught in them as well as the English?—We have a system of teaching different from any other in Ireland.

What is that system?—Young men, the sons of farmers, or others who are fond of the language, get a number of adults, whom they instruct for a certain remuneration, which we pay to them per head.

Do they instruct them in schools?—Not all, but in various ways; the majority of teachers in our establishment teach, however, in schools.

How many establishments have you strictly of the description of day schools into which children are admitted?—I could not answer that with any degree of certainty at this moment.

Is it your impression that they exceed or fall short of fifty?—They are about that number, I think, or rather more.

Where do you find books in the Irish language?—We print elementary books ourselves.

Do you print them in Dublin?—Yes.

Where do you find the type?—I induced Mr. Goodwin, the printer, to bring over a fount of types for that purpose, and there is another fount of types in this city.

What books have you printed in the Irish language?—The Society has printed an elementary book, and I am printing with the same types a Book of Common Prayer for the Prayer Book and Homily Society, which I have now nearly finished. I have also printed for the same Society the second and third Homilies, and I printed at my own expense, aided by James Digges Latouche, esq. Robert Newenham and others, a selection of about 100 collects and prayers of our church, to be distributed gratuitously.

We are speaking now of the Irish Society; what publications have they been the means of producing?—Nothing, strictly speaking, but elementary books and the Book of Proverbs.

Is that a reading book or spelling book?—It is something of both.

Does it contain any portions of Scripture?—It does.

Does it contain any considerable portions of them?—Yes, in proportion to its size; there are several of the parables at the end.

Has your Society the means of distributing the Scriptures in the Irish language to any extent?—To a large extent.

In what manner are you supplied with those copies?—Gratuitously, by the British and Foreign Bible Society; besides portions of the books of Genesis and Exodus, which were stereotyped in England, and purchased by the Society; and also I would add, that we printed an edition of the Book of Proverbs about two years ago.

Are the copies of the Scriptures you distribute principally, the Bible at large or the New Testament?—Exclusively the New Testament, except those portions I have mentioned.

Do the Hibernian Bible Society supply you with any copies of the Scriptures?—No; but they have, at the suggestion of the Irish Society, agreed to publish a pocket edition, which they have agreed to stereotype.

259
 Examination of
 H. M. Mason,
 Esq.
 22 Jan 1825.

Is that edition to be a different one in size and form from the edition of the New Testament supplied to you by the British and Foreign Bible Society?—Yes, smaller; it will be twenty-fours, and in minion type.

Do you conceive the people will be as eager to read that as the other?—Yes, I have no doubt of it.

We do not quite understand why, if you have the liberality of the British and Foreign Bible Society open to you for one edition, you should think it necessary to cause a second edition to be published, of a different form and character, by the Hibernian Bible Society?—There are three answers to be made to that: one is, the British and Foreign Bible Society only supply us with the New Testament, and this is the whole Bible; another is, that we have no reason to look to them for a supply for all our demands, and thus to exhaust their funds; and I am convinced, that there are ready to receive copies of the Scriptures in Ireland, more than a sufficient number of persons to consume any fair number of books we could expect to receive from the British and Foreign Bible Society.

To what extent have you already experienced the liberality of the British and Foreign Bible Society; what number of copies have they given you, and at what periods respectively?—To the best of my recollection, they gave the Society 1,000 copies of the Irish Testament in 1820; and we received from them 2,000 in 1821; 2,230 copies in March 1824, and 1,280 in October 1824.

Have you been able to distribute the number you say you have received from the British and Foreign Bible Society?—We could distribute them amply, but we are always obliged to prevent our running completely dry; the demands are sufficient to exhaust very soon the entire of what we have on hand. To prove the great out-going of the portions of Scripture, we have been compelled to divide a large number of the New Testaments, sent to us by the British and Foreign Bible Society, into five portions for each copy.

Do you mean to distribute each part separately?—In general, we give the parts together to the schools, and let them distribute them as required.

Of course, if you had a sufficient supply of Irish Testaments it would not be your wish so to divide them?—Unless circumstanced as we are, I am rather inclined to think that we would not.

Why?—Because I think that the common people do not like to receive the New Testament by portions; they would reverence it more if the whole came as one volume.

Then we are to understand, in every point of view it would be your object not to cut up the Testament in that manner if you could have a sufficient supply of it?—Certainly it would not be my object, but with one exception; I should wish, in the first quarter of teaching, that we should have a sufficient number of single Gospels, to put into the hands of the early scholars.

Have you any notion in your own mind, as to the extent of the expense that the British and Foreign Bible Society have hitherto incurred in editing the Irish Scripture?—No, I have not; they stereotyped the New Testaments, and I think they were at a greater expense in proportion, than we are likely to be here.

How much do you conceive the edition of the Irish Scriptures you are contemplating is likely to cost the Hibernian Bible Society?—We shall have the plates composed and stereotyped under 500*l*.

Having the plates once provided, in the manner you have stated, how much per thousand, or five thousand copies, do you conceive you will be able to produce the Scriptures in Irish for?—Supposing the Bible to run to 30 sheets, and the edition to be 5,000, the press work will cost about 120*l*. and the paper about 480*l*.; the 5,000 copies will probably not cost above 1,100*l*.; but I cannot be accurate as to this.

Are we to understand it is your impression, that the British and Foreign Bible Society have not incurred a materially greater expense than that you have now stated in producing the Testament in Irish?—I should think, in composing and stereotyping, they have not exceeded 500*l*. nor any thing like it.

Are you tolerably conversant in the practical part of the publication of books, and in the various operations of printing, and dealing with booksellers?—There are very few gentlemen in Ireland have had opportunities of knowing it so well. I have been an editor of books, and gratuitously a corrector of the press for now ten years.

The reason the Commissioners ask you the question is, that they have heard statements that the British and Foreign Bible Society have been at the expense of 80,000*l*. in editing the Irish Scriptures; they would wish you to afford them the best information you can upon oath, as to the utmost expense they have hitherto incurred?—I cannot answer as to that; but they are now printing a large octavo edition of the Irish Bible, and there are to be 5,000 copies of that edition. I think it is totally out of the possibility of things that it should cost them a pound a volume; and my impression is, that they have not expended altogether on the Irish Scriptures above 10,000*l*.

When the Irish Scriptures shall be sent out, edited by the Hibernian Bible Society, do you conceive they will sell them in such a manner as to make a return to them of a portion of the expense, or merely give them away?—Certainly, I think their present intention is to sell them; it is a principle of the Bible Society to sell where they can, although they make gratuitous grants to a great extent.

Will they sell at a loss?—Probably not, at first setting out; for on the part of the Irish Society I have bespoken a thousand. I have the money in the bank, the principal part of which I collected myself. I feel confident that the Hibernian Bible Society must hereafter bear a considerable loss in their sales of the Irish Scriptures.

The Commissioners would wish particularly to know from you, what extent of persons you conceive there are at this moment in Ireland, who can read the Irish in the Irish character?—It is an answer that must be merely one of opinion; in the year 1806 Dr. Stokes made a computation, grounded upon the number of copies of the Roman Catholic catechism that were printed in the Irish language for some years, and he computed that there were at that time probably about 20,000 readers of Irish in the kingdom, and with the operation of the education societies since, particularly our own, I should suppose I might guess there are at least 30,000 persons now. I have also a fact, to prove the great number of readers, namely; the circumstance of our having divided the copies of the New Testament as aforesaid, and the demand in our schools and elsewhere for them. Another fact is, that I can answer for it myself, if I can depend upon the people engaged with our Society, that we have taught a large proportion of that number. I should think that a large majority of these readers use the native or Irish characters.

Examination of

How many do you conceive you have taught?—We have been much imposed upon at different times, and I would rather answer only for the last year. I should think we have taught 1,000 in the last year to read the Irish language, who could not read it before. Another fact, to prove that the Irish language is read by a large number of persons, is the publication of THIS [producing a copy], and other Roman Catholic Prayer-books, with an Irish prayer at the end of them.

What do you conceive are the practical inducements that cause any common person to wish to learn from you to read the Irish character?—I think the chief inducement is the attachment of the people to their ancient language, which exists in Ireland to a degree of enthusiasm, and perhaps is as strong a feeling in their minds as any other prejudice they possess. I also think that the adults find that mode of education to be the only way by which their understandings can become enlightened in things which they consider to be of importance.

Do you consider that the circumstance of the Scriptures being the book they are to read, operates in a way of exciting their desire or curiosity to become acquainted with the Irish language?—Yes; and I have reason to suppose that the other publications in the Irish language, “Thomas à Kempis,” “Think well of It,” and others, create less interest in their minds.

Do they in general understand when an opportunity is afforded to them of learning to read the Irish, that the result it will lead to is, that they will have an opportunity of reading the Scriptures, or is that subsequently submitted to them?—It is always, in the first instance, made known to them; at the same time I should state, that I think there is a great enthusiasm abroad to have the language revived, and that it operates wonderfully; but we never encourage that feeling.

Is it your object to revive or extend the Irish language?—Certainly not; as a classical person, I would speak the sentiment of Dr. Johnson, I should be sorry to see any language destroyed; but looking at the benefit of my country, I should wish the Irish to be abolished, and that I think I may assert to be the general feeling of those acting with me.

Do you conceive, that the operations of your Society teaching persons to read Irish who could not read it before, and printing books in the Irish character, that would not otherwise be printed, have the effect of extending the Irish language, or leading to its extinction?—I am convinced, from the experience I have had, and the correspondence of the last year has increased that conviction, that the natural tendency of teaching the people to read Irish, will be to lead them to learn English, and there is scarcely an instance of our schools being in steady operation for any period of time, where such has not been, by the accounts of our superintendants, the result in some school or other of the district. It is a result that is agreeable to the conjecture of Dr. Johnson—he foresaw, that the teaching of the Gaelic would lead to the spreading of English, the same thing has taken place in the Highlands and in Wales, and in other places; I need not dwell upon these instances, but speaking of my own experience in Ireland, such has been the result.

Do you think your having taught Irish to certain individuals, has led those individuals afterwards to learn English, who would not otherwise have learnt it?—I could state many instances of the fact, always taking for granted the truth of the evidence of those with whom I correspond, and to whom I would give credit.

Where the Irish peasant understands the Irish and English, which language do you think it probable his children would apply to with most energy?—That depends upon the country; if a man lived much in mountains and bogs, which we have found to be the great places for speaking Irish, in consequence of his living in those fastnesses, the Irish is generally the language of his cabin, and the children will get into the habit of having their thoughts thrown more into the channel of the Irish language, for all colloquial communications; but where there are any great advantages held out of commercial intercourse, they will naturally get into the more frequent use of English; and I think the English is gaining ground on Irish perceptibly.

Supposing two parents, who can speak no other language but Irish, with a large family of children; suppose another family living contiguous, who can speak Irish and English, which do you think, the children of the first or second family, ceteris paribus, will be most inclined to learn English?—I think the children of both would be desirous of learning English rather than Irish.

Which would have most opportunities of learning the English?—The children of the parents speaking English; that I allow, for there is a great difference in the case of children and of parents; the children are more desirous of acquiring English than the Irish, and their their parents also are desirous that they should do so; but that is not the case with adults, their understandings and their hearts are with the Irish as their native language.

Are you acquainted with any districts in which the rising generation are much better acquainted with the English language than the generation passing away; do you know any districts in Ireland where the parents speak Irish very well and understand English very imperfectly; and where, on the contrary, their children speak English very well, and Irish very imperfectly?—I do, but rather on a large scale; and from information more than from minute and personal experience; I think also that any man who has gone the circuits, will observe that the adults require more frequently an interpreter than the youth in almost every place.

Supposing the total number of schools in Ireland to be about 10,500, in what proportion, is it your impression, that the Irish language is at all taught, whether by your Society or any other?—The schools of the Baptist and London Hibernian Societies I am not at all acquainted with.

How many schools have you in which it is taught?—We have not perhaps many more than fifty, but we may have above one hundred masters of which I have official knowledge. I cannot be accurate until our annual returns come in, which will be in about a month.

Do you mean persons who teach the Irish language?—Yes; either who have schools in their houses or in regular schools.

What are your impressions as to the number of hedge schools kept for pay by individuals, in which the Irish language is taught?—It is almost impossible to state any facts to which I can answer upon oath upon that subject; I cannot always depend upon the reports of our inferior agents; there is one man who has reported to us that he has given portions of Scriptures to 28 schools in Kerry and Cork; and I am inclined to believe him.

Do you believe, in those schools the Irish language was taught, before he gave those books?—Yes, and it appeared from some investigation in Connaught, that a system existed of schools for teaching the Irish language, from manuscript elementaries.

Have you ever had occasion to investigate what proportion of the population of Ireland, so far as you could ascertain, spoke the Irish language alone, and could not understand and read English?—I have looked with every attention to the documents connected with that point of the subject, and I am come to the firm conviction, that there are much above two millions who cannot hold continued discourse of an abstract description in English, and that there are about 500,000 of those at the least that do not speak English at all.

Do you mean that the other 1,500,000 may know enough of English to attend fairs and markets, but cannot hold a continued conversation?—Yes; the greater part do still keep it up as the language of their cabins, and I think in this calculation I am under the mark.

Will you describe the districts in which the two millions of whom you speak are principally inhabitant?—I would in general say, that they are in the mountainous parts, and the recesses of bogs; on the coasts they have acquired a knowledge of English very generally in their smuggling and other maritime intercourse.

Describe it by counties?—It will be readily allowed, that in the six counties of Munster, and the five of Connaught, the Irish language is spoken by a large majority of the inhabitants, say by two thirds; now the population of Munster is returned at 2,005,363, and that of Connaught at 1,053,918, total 3,059,281, the two thirds of which exceed 2,000,000; besides this, Irish is much spoken in the counties of Louth, Meath and Westmeath, in Kilkenny, Carlow and Longford, and somewhat in the south-west of Wexford, in the province of Leinster; in Ulster it is understood I believe by about one half the inhabitants of Tyrone and Donegal, by many in Cavan and Monaghan, and by some in Down and Fermanagh; there are also some few speakers in most of the remaining counties; looking therefore to the population returns, and to what I have said of Munster and of Connaught, I feel quite confident, that I very greatly under-rate the number of persons in Ireland who can speak the Irish language, in stating it to be 2,000,000. I should suppose that the places in which it is exclusively used, are the recesses of Munster and Connaught (but chiefly in the latter), some of which are exceedingly populous.

Have any instances come before you of either repugnance or apprehension, on the part of the peasantry to look at the Scriptures in their Irish dress?—Certainly very few; and I am hesitating to think if ever I knew of even one.

Have many instances come under your knowledge of their evincing a very keen anxiety to possess them in that form?—Several of them the strongest anxiety.

Can you state whether they prefer them in the English or Irish form; we speak of those whom we suppose capable of reading them in both?—Facts have come before us to authorize me to say, that they greatly prefer them in the Irish form; I have known places where the English Testament has been ordered to be given up by the Roman Catholic clergy, and to be destroyed, and have been consentingly destroyed; I have known in that very district the Irish Scriptures afterwards received; and the very people who consented to have the English Testament destroyed, on finding the versions agreed, came to the Presbyterian minister who has given me this testimony, and asked for copies of the books that they had formerly given up to the priest to destroy.

Where has that happened?—In the county of Meath; and I could mention more instances than one where such things have happened.

Are we to understand that it is your impression, that the English Scriptures had been given up by those people under the notion that they were not the genuine Scriptures?—I think the result shews, that in most cases that idea had been put into their minds.

Are we to infer from your answer, that you consider the Roman Catholic clergy better pleased, or less averse to the distribution of the Scriptures in the Irish language than the English?—I think they began with being less averse to the Irish, but I think they are more decidedly opposed to it in the districts where we have been operating for a year, than to the English.

Can you account for that in any way?—I can; the Irish language has an equal hold upon their minds with any other prejudice of the people, and the priests wish to sway them and manage them by their prejudices, and in the way of authority; therefore they do not like the introduction of such a powerful engine upon their minds and feelings as the Irish Scriptures.

Do you conceive, that the Roman Catholic clergy in the districts to which you have alluded, object to the distribution of the Scriptures according to the English Douay translation?—I have not had any opportunity of knowing that; the gentleman who acts for us there has made constant applications for copies of the Douay Testament, but in a way that I have no connection with.

Does not he make applications for copies of the Irish Scriptures?—Yes.

Then the fact of his making application for copies, is no proof that the clergy are disposed to receive them?—I cannot answer as to this, but the applications have been confidentially made, as if they would be received by some of the people at least; however, I have no official knowledge of it; I have scruples against the Douay version.

Have you known instances of the Roman Catholic clergy exerting their authority to take the Irish Scriptures out of the hands of those in whom you may have placed them?—Yes, to a very considerable extent.

State any of those instances?—They have denounced the Irish Scriptures from the altar in Kerry and in Meath, and have called our New Testament, because it is in some instances bound in black, the “Black Book,” and have produced it as such, and exhibited it as such in its black coat, connecting it with the “powers of darkness.”

Do you mean the Irish New Testament?—Yes.

From what kind of authority have you derived that information?—From a respectable minister, but not of the established church, a man who, I believe, tells the truth, and it has been confirmed by the accounts of one of our confidential agents.

To what class of christians did that minister belong?—He is an Independent minister; but I also know of denunciations from the altar, from a most efficient friend of the Society, an excellent man, a Presbyterian clergyman, a superintendant of 40 schools, which he has been the chief means of establishing himself. He was formerly an enemy of the institution; but he saw the good effects of it so manifest in one instance, that he has spread its schools all around him.

In what district are those 40 schools?—In the neighbourhood of King’s Court, in the county of Cavan.

Did you derive any information from him as to the black book, under that name?—No.

Have you any means of knowing whether the peasantry have in any, and what instances, yielded to those denunciations, and given up that black book?—They have, perhaps I might say in one instance in twenty, yielded, and then with great reluctance; but in general they have rather given up any thing than the Irish Scriptures. I know instances of their having, to a considerable extent, given up the authority of their priests rather than the book.

Do you conceive that they merely pride themselves in the possession of this book, or that they actually read it?—I am convinced that they read it.

Have you any means of stating to us whether the individuals merely read it to themselves or their families, or whether the means that one man may have of reading it, become the means of bringing it to the knowledge of several others?—The gentlemen in correspondence with us state that it is the constant habit for them to read it at home in their cabins.

Do you mean merely to their own families, or are there any individuals who assemble to hear it?—There are instances of large numbers coming to hear the Scriptures read in the Irish by adults.

Have you ever heard from your own inspectors or friends any statement of the sentiments of the people with respect to information they found contained in the New Testament, when first brought under their observation?—I think they are very strongly affected; we have many instances of their being affected to tears, and stopped in the midst of strong passions, by reading the Irish Scriptures to them.

What explanation would you give of their being affected to tears; what particular passages would be likely to act on an adult’s passions in that manner?—They dwell upon those passages relating to the sufferings of our Saviour; and I have known an instance of a man being strongly affected by reading those passages. Our officers are in general very cautious; they do not enter into controversy; they are mostly Roman Catholics themselves.

How many agents have you in the service of your Society?—We have one agent, at a good salary, whose duty is to establish schools, and inspect them.

What is his name?—I should mention, that on last Friday we had written a letter to that gentleman, not being contented with his prudence in the county of Cork, and that has suspended our connection with him; it is William Conner.

At what salary does he serve you?—Eighty pounds the salary, and a sum not exceeding 10s. a day for his travelling expenses.

How does he travel?—In a gig.

What were the circumstances of his conduct that excited your disapprobation?—We do not wish to connect ourselves with controversy. He went to the Cork meeting, and made a speech which we did not approve of in an officer of our’s; this laid the foundation of discontent in the minds of several of the committee.

What meetings were they?—The late meeting of the London Hibernian Society.

What

Examination of
H. M. Masan,
Esq.
22 Jan. 1825.

What other paid agent do you employ?—We employ circulating masters, at 30*l.* a year each; we have of these six at present in operation.

And they teach the Irish in the manner you have described?—Their chief business is to establish the schools I have mentioned by inducing young men to teach others at so much per head, and then they must go round quarterly to inspect; in the intervals they teach.

Is Mr. Conner, of whom you have spoken, a Roman Catholic?—No.

Of what religion is he?—He was, I believe, of the established church; but we have been given to understand that lately he has connected himself with some other persuasion.

Are the members of your managing committee all of the established church?—They are; it is a fundamental rule that they should be so.

Does the same rule apply to your vice-patrons or trustees?—No.

Your six circulating masters, of whom you have spoken, to what religion do they belong?—I believe some of them are of the established church, and there is one Roman Catholic.

What description of officers did you refer to, as being Roman Catholics, in a former answer?—The inferior schoolmasters.

Are we to understand there are about 50 of such masters, according to your present impressions?—Yes, more, considerably.

Do they in all cases continue in the communion of the Roman Catholic church?—With regard to the circulating masters, they have not.

With regard to the 50 of whom we are now speaking?—We interfere so little with them in this respect, that I cannot answer fully to this; some of them have stayed away from the chapels in consequence of the denunciations against the use of the Irish Scriptures.

Is it known to you, whether the priest has obliged them to stay away by refusing them the rites of their church?—I cannot answer from my knowledge to this, but we have been obliged to part with masters for this decided reason, lest they should incur the anger of the Roman Catholic clergy.

How is that known?—By their letters, or by intermediate correspondence, they have been obliged to give up teaching.

Is it within your knowledge that the Roman Catholic clergy may have refused to admit such masters to the rites of their church, and that such masters may in consequence either have renounced the Roman Catholic religion altogether, or have continued perhaps nominally Roman Catholics, but without any admission to the rites of their religion?—I am aware of facts that come under the latter description. Some of the circulating masters have quitted the Romish church, and conformed to our's; and others I have known to have become such lukewarm Roman Catholics, in consequence of the conduct of their priests, that they have almost done the same, although not openly.

Have you any knowledge, or have you received such information, as to leave any doubt upon your mind as to what is the effect of those denunciations upon the minds of the Roman Catholics as to the Scriptures?—I think it often creates a strong feeling in their mind against their clergy; and, in most instances, creates a suspicion of something wrong.

Something wrong, on whose part?—On the part of the priest who has denounced them.

Is it a regulation of the Society that the schoolmasters shall be qualified to teach both in English and Irish?—No, we do not make it a rule of the Society; they must teach in Irish, and be capable to instruct their pupils to translate Irish into English.

Is it necessary that the master should understand both languages?—Yes, but we do not make them teach English separately.

If the people should be desirous of learning in the same schools English, is there any thing that can prevent them, on the part of the system of the Society, from receiving that instruction?—None whatever.

Have you not printed some books where the subject is given in both languages?—We have; it was our first principles to print such books.

Do books of that nature continue to be in use still in the schools?—I believe we have exhausted all that we possessed of that nature; they are extremely popular. We conceive it would be desirable to have more; but at the same time the circumstance of additional expense, and various other things, have prevented us from following up our rule in that respect as it is laid down here in the report; in fact, we find, with regard to the Scriptures, which are our chief object, that the transition from book to book can be made with almost as much facility as the transition from page to page. Another reason for our not following it is, that we do not edit those portions of the New Testament ourselves; we are obliged to take what we can get.

Do you believe that many of those who have received instruction in the Irish language from your schoolmasters, have subsequently gone to other schools, where they receive instruction in English, and carry their education to a greater extent?—I do not know any instances of that, nor have I any means of knowing it, further than that it is generally said by our correspondents that learning Irish has created a great desire for further information; and in a particular school, as I have been told by a well-informed clergyman, it has had the operation of assisting the English education in the same school. I will read a letter that is inserted in our report, that bears upon this subject: "There is not perhaps any school, which is much a Sunday school, that has, in proportion to its means, produced more decided effect than the C—— Sunday school. It is now something more than a year since we received aid from your Society, in a donation of elementary books and Scriptures for this school, situated in the most secluded part of the mountains, and removed from any power of communicating its children with other schools, by deep and rapid rivers."

Examination of

Esq.

"rivers. During that period, the numbers attending have fluctuated from 90 to 70 scholars; and of these, I am bold to say, that the progress has been almost unexampled. There are now in this school eight grown persons, who can read fluently the native Scriptures; twelve children in the Gospel of St. John; about six more who can pronounce at sight all the words in the spelling-book, and the rest in different degrees of advancement; but what to me is the most surprising and delightful circumstance is, that in the process of learning the native Irish, they have made such progress in English reading. I may say, with shame, that I was for a long time sceptical respecting the effect of this experiment, and at first gave the school very little attention; but I have been agreeably disappointed and reproved by the event; and now, though it is four miles from my house, I find so much satisfaction in it, that I spend every Sunday evening, after church, there, when the rivers are fordable."

We observe, from the report of the Society for the year 1824, that the number of the schools then existing under the Society, was stated at 76; can you mention whether the number of schools since that time, and the number of scholars attending them, has been on the increase, or otherwise?—Very considerably on the increase; though at the same time as our Society is just at present in a situation of reformation of all its plans, we cannot be considered as having had a fair opportunity, until the last six months, of trying our system. We have had some inferior agents who deceived us, but still we have more than 76 schools. I cannot say how many more until our returns are made in the course of a month.

Are your funds increasing?—Yes, they have very considerably increased, and are every day increasing; and those who are once convinced of the utility of our object, become much attached to it. We have almost all the pious and reflecting gentlemen of the country siding with us now; they almost all of them were opposed to us originally.

Have you any doubt on your own mind, whether you could, in the ensuing year, dispose of 20,000 Testaments in the Irish language, if you had them, to persons who could read them?—I have doubts, on account of the want of agents through whom I could prudently distribute them. I would not like to put them into the hands of persons who would sell them, or distribute them prematurely; but as to the number of persons who read Irish, and who would be also glad to receive them, I should think that there is nearly that number in the country.

Have you any rule of allowing or not allowing your officers to enter into controversies with the people upon the subjects in dispute between the Roman Catholics and Protestants?—We have no rule upon the subject, but we have frequently written to prevent it. Our circulating schoolmasters have a great tendency that way, and we have had differences with our agent upon that ground.

Why do you object to it?—Our simple object is to put the Scriptures into the hands of the people; and however we might individually think in other places that the handling the points in controversy might be ultimately beneficial, we wish to act merely as an education society, and it would greatly impede our progress to interfere in controversy. Besides, we are not on the spot to controul and direct it; and we might be holden responsible for much imprudence, which might destroy our institution. This kind of discussion is quite foreign, in fact, to an education society.

Is it the practice of your officers to distribute the Scriptures gratuitously, or do you receive a price?—What money we have got for the Scriptures hitherto, is inconsiderable; the people with whom we deal are of so poor a character. We have also given them as premiums to some very small extent.

Extracts from the General Rules
prefixed to the Report of the Irish
Society for 1824.

1.—THAT the exclusive objects of this Society be, to instruct the native Irish, who still use their vernacular language, how to employ it as a means for obtaining an accurate knowledge of English; and for this end, as also for their moral amelioration, to distribute among them the Irish version of the Scriptures by Archbishop Daniell and Bishop Bedell, the Irish Prayer Book, where acceptable, and such other works as may be necessary for school books, disclaiming at the same time, all intention of making the Irish language a vehicle for the communication of general knowledge.

2.—That the designation of this Society be, the "Irish Society for promoting the Education of the Native Irish, through the medium of their own language."

3.—That all books distributed by this Society in the Irish language, unless in particular cases, shall be printed in the Irish character, as affording, for many obvious reasons, the greatest facilities in the perusal; and be accompanied, in general, with an English translation in parallel pages or columns, as being a measure calculated to promote the acquirement of the English language.

4.—That the schoolmasters employed by this Society shall if possible, be instructed in the late improvements of education; and that none be engaged but such as are able to instruct their pupils to translate Irish into English.

5.—That the schools encouraged by this Society, shall be chiefly formed on the circulating principle already found so highly beneficial in Wales, and in the Highlands of Scotland.

6.—That the situations selected by the committee for the establishment of schools, whether permanent or circulating, shall be in the remotest and least instructed parts of the country, where Irish prevails most, and where fewest schools of any kind are to be found.

7.—That

7.—That no schoolmaster be permitted to change the station for his school till he first produce a certificate, signed by a clergyman of the parish, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, or by some respectable person in the neighbourhood, that the pupils placed under his care, or the greater part of them, are capable of construing the Irish Testament into English.

The Brothers of the Christian Schools in Ireland.

Appendix, N° 252.

Examination of Mr. Michael B. Dunphy; Wednesday, 12th January 1825.

Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

WHAT situation do you hold?—I am director of the Hanover-street Christian schools.

Who appointed you to that situation?—Mr. Edmund Rice, of Waterford, under the inspection of the Catholic Archbishop of Dublin.

Who is Mr. Rice, of Waterford; what situation does he hold?—He is superior of the Institute, called The Brothers of the Christian Schools in Ireland.

What is the nature of that brotherhood?—They are instituted for the instruction of poor boys.

Are they a religious order?—They are what is called a congregation, not an order.

Do they fall within the description of monks?—No, they are called brothers; monks are persons who assemble together in solitude. This institute consists of persons for the service of poor boys in the way of education.

Have they taken religious vows?—Yes.

What are the obligations of the vow?—They make a vow of poverty, not to possess any thing of their own as an individual property; a vow of chastity; a vow of obedience to the superior of the institute; and a fourth vow, to teach children gratuitously, for their lives.

Are they at liberty to retire from any part of that engagement during their lives, and mix again in the secular affairs of the world?—They may have a dispensation from the pope, or their own bishop, for it, but it is rather a delicate thing, and few would have recourse to it, or risk their salvation in such a case, unless a person for just reasons may get a dispensation.

An individual without a dispensation from the pope could not do it?—No; without a dispensation from him, or one's own bishop.

Could your superior release you from that obligation?—No.

Is he under that obligation?—Yes.

At what time was this order of persons founded?—In the year 1802 or 1804.

By which of the popes?—It was confirmed by the late Pope Pius the 7th.

By whom was it first founded?—Mr. Edmund Rice, of Waterford.

Was it submitted to any preceding pope by Mr. Rice, of Waterford?—To Pope Pius the 6th, and he encouraged Mr. Rice to proceed with it.

In what manner was the pope's sanction given; by a bull?—Yes, by a bull.

From whence do the funds proceed that are necessary to carry the purposes of education into effect?—Partly from the children and partly from subscriptions; the members are supported partly by their own property and partly by friends who help them on.

Are there any funds of any description belonging to the order?—I know of none, except what the members have for their own support.

How many schools have been founded in connection with this order?—Three in Dublin, one in Cork, one in Limerick, one in Carrick-on-Suir, one at Thurles, one at Dungarvan, one at Cappoquin, and one at Ennistymond. The Cappoquin school, although a filiation of the Waterford house, I believe has no connection with it at present.

About what number of children are in each of those schools?—I cannot answer that question, it is too extensive; I am told they have 1,000 at Cork, and 700 in Waterford, and about 500 in Limerick.

You are a director of one of those schools?—Yes.

Where is that situated?—In Hanover-street East.

How many children are educated in this school?—We had 501, or thereabouts, on the last day the Commissioners were with us.

Do you render an account to Mr. Rice of any particulars connected with the administration of that school?—Concerning our own temporals we are entirely under his inspection, and regarding the management of our own affairs.

Does he prescribe the system of education pursued in the school?—He does, and the persons assisting him.

Are there any Protestant children in the school over which you are the master?—I am master of only one of the schools, but I look over the whole in Hanover-street; we have four schools; we have three Protestants on the list, who have been admitted since the Commissioners visited, two of whom were adults and sailors, one of them, a boy, is gone to England. We have not seen so many Protestants applying for admission for some years past, one attends every day regularly.

The Commissioners feel a wish to examine you like all other witnesses who have come before them, under the sanction of an oath, with respect to the administration of the school under your direction?—I do not understand the question.—[The question was read to the witness.]—I do not comprehend it.

Examination of

Mr.

M. B. Dunphy,

12 Jan. 1825.

You see the nature of the examination to be pursued; the Commissioners now propose to administer an oath to you; have you any objection to it?—I wish to oblige you as much as I can, but to take an oath on the subject I feel myself very much embarrassed; I do not like to commit myself upon an oath.

What is the nature of your objection to taking an oath upon this occasion?—For fear I have not sufficient presence of mind upon the subjects you require information upon, and it might be injurious to our institute.

[The witness was informed he should have an opportunity of correcting and re-considering any information he might give under the sanction of the oath.]

We hope that that observation has removed your objection; have you any other reason for declining taking the oath, than the fear of not having sufficient presence of mind, such as you have referred to?—That is the principal reason.

What other reasons have you?—I would like to have a little more time to consider of it.

You will have an opportunity of correcting afterwards any thing you may have said hastily or unadvisedly?—[The witness was asked, whether he felt any reluctance to make a full disclosure of all facts connected with the administration of the schools under the system above referred to, which might be within his knowledge, and he was apprized, if any question should be put to him, as to a matter not within his knowledge, the Commissioners would be abundantly satisfied by his informing them he was not able to give them an answer.]—I am satisfied to give you every information respecting the school, but not on oath; any number of questions you may please to put to me, I will answer them in writing on oath.

[The witness was apprized, that from the nature of the Royal Commission, which the Commissioners were entrusted to execute, they felt it their duty to proceed upon sworn evidence, and such hitherto had been their usual course, and they did not feel it necessary to deviate from it in this instance. The usual oath was then tendered to the witness.]

Do you refuse to take it; is there any objection from its not being the Douay version of the Testament?—Not the least.

Do you enter into any obligation not to take an oath?—No, not the least.

Do you conceive taking an oath, to disclose the truth to the Commissioners, could be considered by possibility as interfering with your vow of obedience to your superior?—By no means, that I declare.

Have you a feeling it would be necessary for you to obtain his permission, before you should give evidence to the Commissioners as to any part of the system under his direction?—On that subject I made a previous communication, saying he was more capable of giving you information upon the subject than I can be.

In the first place, we wish to apprise you, that Mr. Rice is disabled by ill health from attending the board, and has written to us to that effect; in the next place, we have further to communicate to you, that if we had Mr. Rice here to examine, we should wish to examine you as to matters that fall more immediately under your observation, and we cannot, therefore, see any thing in Mr. Rice's situation that should serve as a reason for your declining becoming a witness.—[The oath was again tendered to the witness.]—Do you decline taking it?—I have stated my objection in the beginning, and if I could be allowed a day or two more, till I could reflect, I would do any thing in my power to oblige you.—[The Commissioners apprized the witness that they were at leisure for his examination this morning, but that they had made engagements for the examination of other witnesses on the days to follow, that they could not, therefore, accede to his request.]—I am very sorry.

We can do nothing under these circumstances, but record your refusal?—I would be very sorry to put you to any inconvenience; we have given all the information in our power upon the paper, to which I can swear.

Was that paper sworn that is below?—I can swear to the paper that came from our school.

Did you verify it upon oath?—Doctor Armstrong is responsible for that.

The Commissioners cannot dispense with requiring your evidence at present to be on oath, and the oath administered in the usual manner?—This I am certain of, that there is nothing in our institution, from first to last, in regard to the teaching of the children or respecting ourselves, that we have any objection to make public, if it be necessary.

Would you wish to express a request to us, as proceeding from yourself, to have an opportunity of consulting with the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, or any other person, concerning the propriety of your complying with our wish?—I requested that favour a few minutes ago; I would be guided by my archbishop in any thing.

You requested to have an opportunity of considering the matter till some future day,—that we cannot comply with for the reason stated; if you wish to have half an hour for the purpose it will be granted?—An hour or two hours.

Would it satisfy you to see Dr. Armstrong?—I would wish to know the nature of the oath, I forget it.

To answer truly to the best of your knowledge and belief, the questions that might be put to you; if you are ignorant upon any point, say so; if you are ignorant of the fact, say so; you cannot give a better answer than that you shall truly answer all questions that shall be demanded of you by this commission, to the best of your knowledge and belief; the Commissioners now put it to you for the last time, whether you have any objection to take an oath, to answer truly all questions put to you by virtue of this commission, according to the best of your knowledge and belief, relating to the schools connected with the brotherhood you have described, and which are under your direction?—If you would be kind enough to allow me half an hour, I would embrace it, in order that I might consider of it more.

[The

Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

[The witness was informed that the Commissioners could wait for half an hour, but no longer.—The witness withdrew. The witness returned a little after the time required, and the nature of the oath being further explained to him, he was sworn and examined as follows:]

What number of children are attending the Hanover-street schools under your direction?—Five hundred and one the day the Commissioners visited, according to the calculation a person made that had the care of the lists.

What was the average number attending last week?—I do not know last week: we were preparing for our sermon of last Sunday, on that account we were obliged to dismiss the children the middle of the week.

Do you consider 501 more than the ordinary average attendance during the summer?—We have not that number in general, perhaps the general number might be about 470 or 480; I believe there are about 50 additional to the number already stated, who do not regularly, but who still partake of the benefit of our institution.

Describe the course of instruction that is given within the school?—We have four schools. In the first school the children are taught the alphabet, and words of two syllables, the prayers of the Catholic church, and the small Catholic catechism; in the second school, the children are taught words of two syllables, and progressively to reading the catechism and writing.

What catechism are they taught in the second school?—An abridgement I believe of the catechism.

Is that the same catechism that they learn in the first school?—I believe it is in general; the monitors in both schools learn a different kind of catechism.

Do they learn any thing further in the second school, than what you have stated?—The monitors, or some of them, learn book-keeping and arithmetic; the monitors of the first school also learn English grammar and arithmetic, and one or two are taught geometry.

Is that all the instruction they give in the second school?—The monitors are instructed in the English grammar I believe.

Is that all?—They may have been taught more, but I do not recollect it, and some have been taught geography and mensuration; I mean monitors.

Describe the course of instruction in the third school?—They are taught spelling, reading, writing, and the elements of arithmetic, and mensuration; I believe some of the monitors have been learning mensuration and book-keeping; the catechism also.

What catechism is taught in the third school?—The general catechism, and a few abridgements.

What is the course of instruction in the fourth school?—The children are taught reading, writing, arithmetic, English grammar, book-keeping, mensuration, navigation, algebra, and sometimes drawing occasionally; we do not make it a point as yet to teach them drawing, any further than what they may practice from the geometry they are taught in the schools.

Do they learn any catechism in the fourth school?—Yes; the way they are taught the catechism is this; they are required to commit the task at night, and this task they are obliged to repeat to the monitors, and the monitor reports the boys who omit the task, so that this way of learning the catechism does not interfere with the Protestant boy in the school, and this Protestant boy does not come to the school till the Catholic prayers are over, about ten minutes past ten, and he is dismissed in the evening before the children go to the Roman Catholic prayers. During the time of instruction he is not required to go into the instruction room.

How many catechisms in the whole are taught in the four schools?—Four catechisms.

Mention them particularly by name?—The small catechism, the abridgement, the general catechism, and Fleury's historical catechism.

Are any portions of the Scripture ever read by the boys in the school?—That part contained in the Evangelical Life sold by Murphy, to which is attached the notes of the fathers of the church.

Is the Evangelical Life of Christ then read in the school?—Yes.

In which of the schools?—It is read in the third school, and I believe in the fourth school, and occasionally in the second school; however it is not generally; we keep them for the grown up boys; we change them.

Out of 470 boys (which you consider the average number attending the school) how many do you suppose have read the Evangelical Life of Christ, or any material portion of it?—The Evangelical Life; I do not believe, that in proportion to the other number of books we have in the school, that it is one out of 10 or 20 rather.

Do you mean it is one out of ten of the books, or that one-tenth of the children read it?—I should think about one-sixth; I cannot answer that upon my oath; to the best of my recollection it is one-sixth of the entire books in the school; we have a great many Reeves's History of the Bible.

About what proportion of the children in the school have read the Evangelical Life of Christ, or any considerable portion of it according to the best of your judgment?—According to the best of my judgment, about one-fourth or one-fifth of the entire number of children in attendance.

Who can read?—There are 180 in the first school who cannot read at all, or 170 who cannot read; I should suppose about 90 or 100 might have read it, perhaps more at different times.

Examination of
Mr.

M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

Is it in general use among the best readers?—It is; we change them occasionally; we have different books for the purpose of reading.

Which do you use most, the Evangelical Life of Christ, or Reeves's History of the Bible?—Reeves's History of the Bible.

Do you use that considerably more?—We consider it a more useful book for the children.

Do you use Gahan's History of the Bible?—Some few copies of it.

Do you use Gahan's less than Reeves's?—We have only a few copies of it in the school, yet we consider it an excellent book.

What other reading books do you employ, besides Reeves's, Gahan's, and the Evangelical Life of Christ?—I have given a list of them.

Can you state them from recollection?—They are given particularly in the return, and the number of them, not including the books the boys bring to school.

Are the boys at liberty to bring their own books?—Yes, when they bring a good book we do not object to it; when they bring a bad book we take it from them; when they do not like us to keep it, we send it to the parents, or manage in the best way we can.

Is the Evangelical Life of Christ read on every day in the week by the children?—Yes, every day the school opens.

Is there any copy of the Douay version of the New Testament in the school?—No.

Do the children ever read any portion of the Scriptures in the school, except in the Evangelical Life of Christ?—No; except what may be as extracts in other books.

Are they examined in any way, as to the meaning of any parts of the Evangelical Life of Christ, or do they read it mechanically?—If they want to know the meaning of any difficult part of the book, they have notes in the book that explain the part.

Do they often ask questions themselves as to the difficult passages?—Very seldom; finding the book is recommended by the archbishop, it gives them sufficient confidence in it; they rest easy upon that point.

Do their teachers volunteer in explaining and illustrating the meaning of the passages in the Evangelical Life of Christ, or content themselves with simply hearing it read mechanically?—I do not recollect any instances of teachers explaining it; they may occasionally, or I may have done it, though I do not recollect it myself; they never make it a point to explain it in the schools.

What portion of each day is occupied in teaching the catechism?—It takes half an hour to hear the catechism tasks, and the table book tasks, or rather twenty minutes.

What are the table book tasks?—The arithmetic tables; the children are obliged to commit part of these in the evening to memory.

Is there only half an hour a day appropriated to catechism?—Yes; one of the masters reads a pious book to the children for half an hour each day, independent of that, or some time thereabout.

Do you mean the head master, or the monitor?—The head masters.

What book is usually selected for that purpose?—Doctor Hay's Sincere and Pious Christian.

Is that a controversial work?—It is a work that explains the Catholic doctrine.

Does it impugn the doctrines of the Protestants?—It explains the doctrines of the Catholic church; the nature of the work is to explain the Catholic doctrine; and we all know upon those points the book can be easily consulted upon points controverted by both religions; it speaks what the author considers to be true Catholic doctrine, and is approved of by the archbishop.

When you read that book to the children, do you explain it to them, or examine them afterwards in it?—Most certainly; we explain the Catholic doctrines to the children.

Do you examine them in it, to see whether they have been attentive to your explanations?—In general, I believe, that is not attended to; it has been resorted to sometimes, just to see that the children have been attentive; I cannot recollect all the things.

Are the Protestant children present upon the occasion of the explanations you give of that work?—Never, as far as I can recollect.

Is the rule of the school that they shall go away before that?—They are not allowed to be in; there may have been a Protestant in the six years who might have sat there; we do not allow it.

The custom rather than rule is against asking them to go in?—Yes; we have no positive rule against it, but we consider the matter is so delicate, we would not wish to interfere with the child of any person in that manner.

Are you aware of any child who was a Protestant, and attended your school, having now embraced the Roman Catholic religion?—I do not recollect any.

Did you ever hear of any?—I do not recollect; in fact, we have had very few Protestants—they are well provided for elsewhere.

How many Protestants have you attending the school at present?—Only one, and he is not a poor man's son; he is a sailor, who is taught navigation.

What is the greatest number you have ever had at any one time, as far as you recollect, of Protestants?—I have heard there have been two in the school; I have seen two or three.

Is the system of instruction pursued strictly, the Lancasterian system?—No, I believe not; as far as I can recollect what I have heard of the Lancasterian system, there is a material deviation from it; we use books occasionally; the system of Lancaster did not take in books.

Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

Do you lay much stress upon arithmetic in your system?—Yes, considerably; we pay much attention to it.

Have you many boys who are proficient in it?—Yes, we have.

You spoke of teaching algebra; how many boys in the school understand any thing of algebra?—I forget how many.

Are there ten?—No.

You spoke of mensuration; how many boys are there in the school understanding that?—I cannot tell that exactly; we have a great many learning occasionally, who intend to be carpenters.

Have you twenty or thirty?—No, not at present.

Are there any boys who learn Euclid in the school?—Yes.

How many, can you recollect?—I recollect two, and I forget how many more; I have seen two boys; I have not time to attend to that school.

What class of life are the boys generally from?—Children of tradesmen, labourers, servants, and some clerk's children.

Do any of them pay any thing for their education?—No farther than the penny they pay, and that is put into the fund, and given them back again as a reward.

How long has this school been open in Hanover-street?—It was opened, I believe, in 1814; our report states it at full length.

What are the ages of the oldest boys who frequent the school?—Perhaps about eighteen; between sixteen and eighteen; there are some few sailors, who come to learn navigation, who are older.

What is the age of the youngest?—I cannot answer to that exactly; some are very small, four or five years or six years.

Is there a high state of mechanical discipline preserved in the school?—We consider it so; we endeavour to keep them silent and obedient, and to march orderly home from the school; we seldom have recourse to corporal punishment.

In your instruction to the children, do you ever mention the Protestant religion?—We cannot avoid it, occasionally, in speaking of points relative to the Catholic doctrine.

In discussing the Roman Catholic doctrines with the children, do you advert to what you conceive to be the peculiar errors of the Protestant religion?—I believe it has been done, occasionally.

Do you do it yourself?—Perhaps I may have done it myself; I recollect having done it.

Is it your usual habit, or are we to understand it to be of very rare occurrence?—When we think it necessary to speak to the children upon the subject matter going forward that seems to call for it, we do it; we explain the Catholic doctrine, and that takes in all.

Do you ever explain to the children your opinions, as to whether persons professing the Protestant religion can be saved?—Such a matter very seldom occurs; but when such a thing is mentioned, we always remind the children that invincible ignorance removes any thing of that matter.

Have you ever taught the children any thing, one way or another, as to the possibility of Protestants being saved, except with the reserve as to invincible ignorance?—We explain the Catholic doctrines, and that takes in all those points.

Do you explain the doctrines otherwise than from the Roman Catholic catechism?—We read Hay's works, Dr. Challenor's Meditations, and Dr. Gobinet's Instructions.

Do you ever attempt to give any explanation out of your own head, different from what you find in the books, or in addition to it?—I think that is pressing the matter too far.

We want to know whether you communicate the knowledge to the children through books, or take upon you to instruct them from your own head?—When we instruct them from our own head, we instruct them from books, because we learn from books.

If your head class were to be examined seriatim as to their opinions of the possibility of a Protestant being saved, what do you conceive would be their answer; have you any doubt as to what their answer would be?—If they be instructed in the doctrine of the Catholic church, I expect they would answer according to the doctrines of the Catholic church upon that subject.

The question has reference to the actual state of your present head class; what do you conceive would be their answer, if speaking freely and truly their opinions upon that point?—Oh, gentlemen! I think that is putting me too far; I did not expect you to go into this minutia. We all know that the Catholic children are taught the Catholic doctrines, and any gentleman can know that.

Do you teach them the catechism approved of by the four archbishops?—We do.

Do you teach them any doctrines except what are to be found there?—We do more extensively, as is contained in Hay's book, and Gobinet's and Challenor's.

Do you not teach them, that salvation is confined to one church, as a general principle?—Yes.

But that general principle is subject to this exception, that persons who are in invincible ignorance may be in invisible communion with that church, though not in visible communion?—Yes.

It appears to us material to ascertain the fact, if possible, what you conceive is the result upon the minds of the children from the catechism and doctrines so taught; that is, whether they think any certain number of their Protestant neighbours can be saved or not?—The point already alluded to respecting invincible ignorance, explains the matter sufficiently.

What do you conceive is their notion of invincible ignorance?—I conceive a person so

Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,

situated is incapable of knowing the truth; that he is disposed to make the necessary inquiry for it, and to follow the truth as soon as he would know it.

Do you conceive that is the understanding of the children upon that point?—I believe it is, of those who are well instructed.

Have any histories of Ireland or England been introduced into this school?—Murphy's History of England is introduced into the school.

Are there many copies of it?—A good many.

Is it used in the fourth class only, or in the third also?—In the fourth and third.

Is it simply read, or are the children examined in it?—Simply read.

Is that the only historical book read in the school?—Murphy's Geography is, though not often.

Is there any history of Ireland read in the school, or has there been?—All our class books are stated in the paper very correctly; and for your satisfaction I wish you to refer to it; it would shorten the thing very much.

The paper has reference possibly to the books in use in the past year only; the question has reference to your recollection of the past, since you came in connection with the institution. The question is, whether any history of Ireland has ever been used in that school?—Not in general; it may have been perhaps read for some few moments by one boy or two; but not to be given to the boys in general.

What particular history do you refer to?—Taaffe's History of Ireland.

Is that the only history of Ireland, or the only tract professing to give historical sketches of Ireland, that has been used in the school since you have been in connection with it?—It has not been used to any extent in the school, not as a class book; there was one small book given perhaps to one or two: a small Catechism of the History of Ireland, that perhaps one or two boys may have read a part of once or twice.

How many copies of the Catechism of the History of Ireland may you have seen in the school?—Only one copy.

Was that the property of any individual child?—No it belonged to the house.

Where is it now?—It is in the school-desk, but not given to the children at present; not from any thing hurtful in it, but having only one copy, we do not use it now.

Where is it now?—It is in the school-desk.

Is it included in the returns made of the books?—This book is not used in the schools as a reading book. It may have laid on the desk; and a boy or two might have looked into it, and have read a little of it, and no more, to my knowledge. It has never been given to any boy to read it, that I can recollect.

Is it included in the return of books you have made to this board?—Considering it not a book read in the schools, it is not.

[The witness was directed to furnish the same to the board.]

The copies of Taaffe to which you have referred, were they the property of individual boys, or the property of the establishment?—The establishment got them from some person, I believe one of our brothers brought those books with him, and they were got bound in the house.

Have you ever seen tracts of a political tendency in the hands of the boys while in the school-room?—I do not understand the extent of the question, or what is meant by it.

Have you ever seen any political pamphlets in the hands of the children while in the school-room?—Not that I recollect; the books we use in the school are all mentioned in the paper we have sent in.

Do you mean to say, the return you have made contains a full return of all the books, not merely those that are now used in the school, but all that have at any time been used in the school since you were connected with it?—The books we have returned in the paper are returned as required of us.

The requisition of the paper was as to the books now used in the school, or that had been used, within a certain number of months last past; the present question is, whether any books were used in the school since you were connected with it, except those set forth in the return?—Yes, there may have been some books used in the school before that.

Can you recollect the names of any books of a political tendency that have been used in the school, and that have not been set out in those returns?—We considered the return very fair, giving the Commissioners very general information upon the subject, and as the time is passed so long by now, I consider it an unnecessary question; I would be very glad to oblige the gentlemen as much as I could, but I wish the gentlemen at the same time to confine themselves to questions necessary.

It appears to us a very necessary question, and you must understand the distinction between the existence of the return which called for the books only now in use, and this question, which pointedly refers to works in use, antecedent to the present time, but subsequent to your connection with the establishment?—We made it a point to exclude books that we considered bad, and we do so still, and keep the books from the children.

Who were the judges of the badness of the books?—In the first place, our present bishop, and then the clergy deputed by him to examine the books, and the books in general considered bad are generally known by persons of common information.

Do you mean to say, that all the books that have been used in the school have had the sanction of the bishop and the Roman Catholic clergy?—No, by no means; books may have crept in that we may not have noticed ourselves, in a school so extensive, but the books we detect that are bad, we certainly take them from the children.

J. J.
Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

Do you occasionally detect books that are bad, brought in by children?—Yes, and endeavour to withhold or destroy them, if bad.

You will observe, that the questions recently put to you, refer to books, the property of the Institution, and not to books merely the property of the children, and under that explanation, the question is now repeated, whether the return lately made to the Commissioners, contains a full and true statement of all the books that have been used in the schools since your appointment to the Institution, such books being the property of the Institution?—I do not recollect all the books in use during the time you allude to; we have given a full and satisfactory explanation of our books.

Upon the occasion of making the return, did you take pains to ascertain or examine what books of any nature or kind you had put into the hands of the children?—Yes.

Does the return contain a full account of all such books?—The return contains an account of all such books, according to the requisition of the return.

Have you put any books into the hands of the children other than those contained in the return, within the period of the return?—Not that I recollect.

To the best of your belief, is that return a full and perfect return?—It is, as far as I know.

Do you mean to say, you never put books into the hands of children in the school, except those specified in the return at any time?—I may have put books into their hands before, but I do not recollect the time; I do not know what they were.

Are we to understand that you can or cannot recollect the name of any particular book that has been put by you or any other manager into the hands of the children that is not set forth in that return?—We may have put the Life of Bishop Fisher and Sir Thomas Moore; the Elegant Extracts, I believe, are in the return, I recollect.

Have you ever put into the hands of the children, any book professing to narrate the cruelties practised by Protestants upon Roman Catholics?—Doctor Challenor's Missionary Priest has been lent to one or two boys, or perhaps more, grown up boys; it belonged to our own library; it was lent to some few boys, and that specifies something of that nature, but it belonged to our own library; having only one copy, we could not make a practice of lending it to boys to much extent; I do not know whether we lent it to a second; I forget if we did.

That book contains an account of missionary priests who were put to death during the reign of Elizabeth?—Yes.

Is there no other?—If you mention the particular work, perhaps I could satisfy you; I recollect another work, England's Conversion and Reformation compared.

Was that work written by Wall?—No, it was written by Manning, as well as I recollect.

Can you recollect whether any works tending to illustrate the political conduct of England towards Ireland have been made use of in the school, other than those which have been already named?—I do not know what book you mean; do you mean Mr. Cobbett's books?

Those or any other similar?—Mr. Cobbett's Reformation has not been used in our schools, yet I am not certain but that one or two of our boys may have read some part of the copies of this work which we have purchased for our own perusal; we have used Mr. Cobbett's English Grammar in school.

Can you state whether any works professing to explain the conduct of England towards Ireland, have been used in the school at any time in your recollection?—Nothing further than I can recollect than those books I have already stated; that explains it at full length, Murphy's History of England, Murphy's Geography is lent to the boys; is used in the school; every day we use them; I have sent you a copy of every book we use, but the Catechism of the History of Ireland could be of no importance to any one.

The Commissioners have a particular wish to see that catechism?—It may have been used in the school, but we have never used it.

It is in your desk and the property of the Institution?—It is, but not the property of the school; it is our own property.

Is it a book you put into the hands of any children in the school?—Not by any means.

Has it been put into the hands of any of the children as a school book?—No.

Have you done more than to lend it to one or two boys?—I have not lent it to my recollection; I was looking at it on the desk, and a boy may have taken it up.

Has it ever been used as a school book?—Not to my knowledge.

Has it ever been used by the boys as a book that they were to learn lessons out of?—No.

Subject to those qualifications you will let us see the book?—Yes.

Are those schools supported entirely by the voluntary contributions of individuals and the private funds of the establishment?—By subscription the children are provided with all the necessaries of the school, and perhaps about half of them pay a penny a week; that is explained at full length in our return, so that I would expect to have very little questions upon these subjects.

Such questions must be put to you upon this or any other subject necessary to elicit the truth and to give the information to the state that the state has a right to require as to the education given to its subjects; are you a voluntary Society associated for instructing the poor?—Yes, we give our property and our lives for that purpose; next to our own salvation.

Is it your wish in communicating instruction to them to implant principles of loyalty and fidelity to their sovereign in their minds?—We have reason to do it; I mean we are bound not only in duty, but in gratitude to do this.

Examination of
Mr.
M. B. Dunphy,
12 Jan. 1825.

- Do you do it?—We do it; the duties of the Catholic church require us to do it.
Do you teach charity and good will to all mankind?—Yes.
Without distinction of religion?—Yes.
Do the catechism and Roman Catholic authority require you to do so?—Yes, particularly so.
Are you connected with those small establishments for the same purpose, that are to be found in different parts of this country, such as those at Mount Bellew and at Claran Bridge?—No.
There is a society in Dublin from which those emanate, called the Adam and Eve?—Yes, I believe they belong to the friars of Adam and Eve.
Are all the members of your congregation bound to devote their time to the purposes of instruction, or are there any of them appointed to any particular duties?—Yes, for the purposes of education; except those persons employed in the temporal and necessary affairs of the Institution.
Have you no persons occupied by different avocations?—No; we are all for education.
Do you know the number of brethren of your congregation?—No; Mr. Rice is the person that can give that information.
You do not know in short?—I do not recollect exactly at present.
About how many do you think?—I cannot state it exactly.
Is it 100 or 500?—No, nor fifty, about forty; forty I believe.
The primary object of your institution is education?—Yes.
Of course of those of your own persuasion?—Yes.
And so far as religion is concerned, giving instruction in the Roman Catholic religion?—Yes.
You are not prohibited by your vow from giving common literary instruction to Protestants?—No; on the contrary, we have had some in the schools that did receive instruction.
Have you a lending library connected with the school, for the use of the boys?—We have.
Are the books belonging to that lending library, at present in the hands of the boys attending the school?—Many of them are.
Whose property is that lending library?—It belongs to our institution for the good of the children.
Does the return you have made to the clergyman requiring it, contain a list of the books in the lending library?—It contains a part of it, and we have mentioned it upon the paper.
We will beg of you to furnish to us a catalogue of all the books belonging to the lending library of the institution; does it consist of many?—We have a good many.
A hundred?—More than that a good deal.
Are there 500?—Perhaps there are.
[The witness was directed to furnish a catalogue of all books at this moment belonging to the lending library, and to attend again with it on Friday, at three o'clock.]

Relative to Doctor Walmesley's explication of the Apocalypse (fictitiously called Pastorini) which I have deposited with your secretary, for inspection, please to observe the editions which are of a comparatively old date. We never had more than these two copies; they were purchased as second-hand books, merely for variety's sake. They never had been sanctioned by the Catholic archbishop, nor by any of his priests. I gave directions to have them brought in last spring, when the Catholic bishop wrote against the work. The author was an Englishman. The probable motive of his having written this work may have been to shew that the Apocalypse could be explained with as much reason against Protestants as some Protestant or Protestants have explained it against Catholics. I do not believe this or any other explication of the Apocalypse extant; the Catholic church has never sanctioned it.

As it may be perceived, that the list of books which we have for lending, falls short of 500, the number which I stated on examination, we have discovered, that about 60 Prayer Books have been disposed of to the boys, since the last time we took an account of the library:—

Gentlemen,

Christian Schools, Hanover-street East, January 25th, 1825.

To comply with the wish of your honourable board expressed to me, on the day of my examination, that “you are particularly desirous of eliciting the truth on matters connected with education in this country,” it follows, that as far as I am concerned, it becomes my duty to endeavour to correct every erroneous impression, which any part of my testimony may be considered to make if left unexplained. One of your honourable board having asked me, how many boys we had studying Euclid’s Geometry? to which I answered, two or three; but I find, on inquiry, that within the last twelve months, there have been at least seven boys instructed in that branch in our schools. I have reason to believe, that I have made other mistakes of a similar nature through a want of recollection, as your honourable board may have easily perceived. I did not expect to be examined and therefore made no preparation. I also recollect having answered some of your queries put to me, relative to exclusive salvation; which answers are not as clear on this point as I would wish, for which reason you will be pleased to take the following as an explanation: “Question; What do you mean by exclusive salvation?—Answer; I mean, that there is no salvation out of the true church. Question; Who are in the true church?—Answer; All who are baptized Christians; and until they make a deliberate profession of error;” hence all children thus baptized, till the use of reason and years of discretion; all who are in a state of invincible ignorance; that is, whose situation or circumstances render them unable to discover the truth, and are disposed to make the necessary inquiries for it, and embrace it when known, and all who belong to the Roman Catholic church. You will be pleased to observe, that we consider the latter subject, and those of controversy in general, to be less suited to the wants of our pupils than other parts of the Christian doctrine, for which reason we seldom read things of this nature for them; not because we think it would be any irregularity to do so, but because we judge that our time would be better employed in reading the explanation of the commandments, sacraments, principal mysteries of the Catholic religion, and the four last things, &c.; and in correcting the evil inclinations of the youthful mind, and especially those which are more peculiar to the Irish character.

I consider it my duty to call your particular attention to this subject, in order that you may be enabled to form a correct opinion of our manner of giving religious instruction. Perhaps you may have considered my answers relative to our support, not to have been sufficiently clear. I believe I mentioned, that we were supported partly by our own property and partly by donations from friends. I think it unnecessary for me to say more on this subject, as you may perceive in our return made to your honourable board, that the above has been sufficiently elucidated. Your honourable board having thought proper to require of me a list of the books which are now attached to our schools for lending, which I have given in to your secretary, and believe that you will perceive that few of them can be reasonably considered as objectionable for Catholic boys.

A small portion of them had been given us by way of donation, and therefore have not been of our own choosing. You will please to recollect, that I did not return the Catechism of the History of Ireland, as belonging to our school library, although it had (by some accident) been left in the school desk.* It has happened, that amongst the 415 which are contained in the above list, exclusive of those which have been mentioned as class books, there are two which may perhaps be considered as objectionable, for which I think it necessary here to account. The two books to which I allude are Doctor Walmesley’s explanation of the Apocalypse, fictitiously called Pastorini, which I have deposited with your secretary, for your inspection. Relative to these books, you will be pleased to take notice, that the editions are of a comparatively old date; one being printed in the year 1800, and the other in the year 1815. We never had more than these two copies; they had been purchased about four years ago, as second-hand books, merely for the sake of variety. They have never been sanctioned by the Catholic archbishop, nor by any of his priests. I gave directions to have them called in last spring, about the time the Catholic bishop of Kildare, had written against the work. The author of the book, was an English Catholic bishop, and as he is said to have been a man distinguished for learning, the probable motive of his having written this work, might have been to show that the Apocalypse could be explained with as much reason against the Protestant religion, as some Protestants have explained it, against the Catholic religion. However, as to the motive of the author in writing the above work, I cannot presume to judge, as I do not consider myself qualified nor authorized to interfere with such matters, but merely to give your honourable board more clear information as to my ideas concerning it.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

To the Commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry.

Your most obedient humble servant,
(signed) Michael B. Dunphy.

* I can account particularly for this book, as it lay in my own desk.

Appendix, N° 253.

Examination of His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin; Tuesday, 11th January 1825.

*His Grace
the Archbishop of
Dublin,
11 Jan. 1825.*

Question, N° 1.—IF a system were arranged, that a portion of the week should be set apart to give religious instruction to the Protestants of the established church, by persons qualified and approved of, and who should be also under the superintendence more or less of the clergyman of the parish, in what manner does your Grace think it would be most desirable that the instruction should be given?—In the first place, there should be, I think, a licence granted by the bishop of the diocese, according to the existing law for the Protestant schoolmaster; and there should also be a special licence granted to the clergyman, who is to have the superintendence; I should think in any institution of the kind, a certain portion of two days in the week would be sufficient for the purpose, Wednesday and Saturday might be the days; and upon the number of the children would depend the portion of time to be occupied in each day, from one hour to two, as the number might require.

N° 2.—In what degree and to what extent does your Grace think it would be desirable to give instruction in the catechism?—I feel some difficulty in answering with exactness as to a fixed mode of general instruction. So much must depend upon the teacher, that any specific written form to be necessarily employed by all persons and in all places, seems not the most desirable. The multiplication of catechisms is not to be approved, because it is, after all, only calling upon the memory much in the same way in which it is to be called upon for the original text, unless it be regulated by a very judicious mode of teaching on the part of the master, and if the master be capable of that, he does not stand so much in need of an exact specific form by which he is bound to abide. So that I am not aware of any thing to be said upon this subject, more than that much stress should not be laid upon forms of catechisms. But it is certainly desirable to have some one to be approved of, if there is to be one exact mode adopted throughout the country.

N° 3.—We have met with instances where a series of catechisms, five or six in number, was thought necessary, and we found they occupied a very considerable portion of the time of the children who, after all, answered by rote, without much comprehension of the meaning?—I think a number of catechisms, as I have already said, objectionable. I mean, of course, to speak of explanations of the common church catechism, one good one is sufficient. A good explanation of the catechism may be advantageously made use of, even by the best teacher, as an auxiliary. But so much depends upon a right and judicious mode of teaching, that a licence should be indispensably required for the Protestant schoolmaster; and he ought to undergo an examination before the charge is placed in his hands. The great difficulty is to lead children to think, and comprehend meanings; there is a small work that I mentioned in my former examination, the catechism broken into short questions, that is, perhaps, if rightly attended to, more valuable than any set form of explanations, which is to be committed to memory. In this, after the answer in the catechism is given, it is broken into different members and parts, disturbing a little the order of the sentences, and calling the attention of the children to them, so as to make them replace them again in a manner connected with reasoning and clear perception. I do not mean to say, however, that a form of explanation is not requisite. An explanation may undoubtedly be rendered extremely useful, but it must not be suffered to be learned as a matter of rote, and it is upon the whole, made most useful to the child by being useful to the teacher.

N° 4.—During the time to be set apart for giving religious instruction to the children of the established church, would your Grace entertain any doubt that they should receive instruction in the Testament itself?—Certainly not, I always couple the Testament with the catechism in my view of religious instruction; the Testament, of course, I conclude to have been previously assumed as a book to be taught, and that the catechism alone was that about which there was any doubt; a very good exercise in the Testament as to a child, is enabling it to fortify its answers in the catechism, and to explain their meaning as much as can be by reference to the text of Scripture. There are one or two expositions of the catechism that contribute to assist in this.

N° 5.—Would it be desirable that any notes should be referred to by the children in their reading the Testament, are there any that could be trusted in the hands of the master that they might read?—I do not know that there is any regular complete body of notes upon the Testament, that would be sufficiently elementary for young persons, and at the same time eligible in other respects. Any book of this sort should be introduced into the school, under the direction of the diocesan, such as do exist of this description at present, though not what can be altogether approved, might be corrected and simplified.

N° 6.—Would it not be better to limit the master to give explanation of the chapters from a printed commentary, rather than to allow him to give any explanation he thought desirable?—Certainly; I have had great difficulty upon the subject of teaching children by laymen, unless under immediate clerical superintendence. And that is the reason I look particularly to the precaution of the licence. Under that, I comprehend the general direction as to the course of teaching, and, amongst other things, the books prescribed; these ought by no means to be left to the lay teacher, otherwise a teaching, which is not that of the church of England, may be the consequence. It must run the chance of veering with every every individual judgment, and that, very often, a judgment perhaps but ill informed; and is therefore exposed to the evils of sectarian irregularity, and propagates a sectarian spirit through both the teachers and the scholars.

N^o 7.—Would it, in your Grace's opinion, be desirable to place it upon this footing, that in the attendance which the clergyman of the parish, or the curate, might be able to give, the particular explanation should be given by them, but that any instruction by the master should be from a printed commentary, to be annexed to each chapter?—Yes, that seems very satisfactory. I conceive, also, that it would be very useful to make the week-day teaching of the boys, preparatory to the examination upon the Sunday by the clergyman; of course, there must be an accordance in the instruction, if the boys are to be prepared for the clergyman on the Sunday, and here Sunday schools might come in and be extremely useful; it would also be necessary that the clergyman should attend on other examination days if he were not otherwise employed by professional concerns of importance. He ought to attend the catechising as one of his first duties.

N^o 8.—Does your Grace entertain any doubt that the children might, by an arrangement of this kind, receive a much more efficient religious instruction, than they do in those schools where they are now obliged to read the Scriptures, but under circumstances in which they are not at all explained, and in which schools there is no provision for giving religious instruction or catechetical information?—Undoubtedly the system just described, is one I never have been able to approve of, standing by itself. If connected with another, it may be made to be usefully instrumental; a child may, by reading a certain portion of the Scriptures, be rendered tolerably familiar with the words and subject, as far as it is a matter of history or exceedingly plain instruction. At the same time, there will be, of course, a kind of undefinedness in the minds of young persons, even as to the meaning of simple sentences, that will mislead them if left entirely to themselves. But I am willing to suppose, that in cases where any attention is paid to clerical duties, some religious teaching is superadded to this simple reading of the Testament, either by the means of Sunday schools, or on week days, out of school hours, so as not to interfere with the rules and conditions of the schools regulated under this particular plan of a comprehensive system, which has rendered it necessary to give the Testament by itself without note or comment. If the system were to go no further than this, it would be one which could not be approved of, and therefore it is only to be viewed as part of a scheme, and, in point of practice, the evil has been in a good degree remedied. To return to the point of the question, I can of course have no hesitation in saying there can be no sort of doubt as to the plan of regular catechetical instruction being preferable to the mode which it describes.

N^o 9.—Does not your Grace think it might be a practicable and very profitable auxiliary to the schoolmasters, for the purpose of giving the preparatory instruction that shall qualify the children to receive more particular information from the clergyman, that there should be a series of questions printed, having relation to each of the chapters, and the passages of the Scriptures which it should be intended to introduce to the knowledge of the children, and which would thereby enable the master, in fact, without a commentary, to secure the profitable direction of the attention of the children to all the points contained in the chapter?—I think that would be the mode naturally adopted in the plan I speak of, by a judicious teacher; he would be led to adopt that mode.

N^o 10.—The object of the question, my Lord, was to consider whether it would not be desirable that either the Commissioners or some future authority should provide such an authorized system of questions as might be furnished to each of those schools, and which might perhaps go a great way in qualifying the master to discharge the duties in a correct manner?—If the thing were well done, it must be most beneficial. Yet this mode of questioning as it were by Act of Parliament, presents a new view of things. It would be to be feared, that an apprehension might start up that nothing was to be done but in the exact way thus prescribed; there would be that sort of overpowering authority, that many teachers might be prevented, under those circumstances, from exercising a judgment, or extending their instructions beyond the form thus precisely defined.

N^o 11.—The question, my Lord, assumes, that the most entire liberty shall be left to the clergyman to give such supplemental instruction as he may think proper; the whole object of the question was, whether it might not be desirable to look out for a book containing such questions as might assist a lay schoolmaster in the discharge of his duties?—Yes, in that view, I think, the plan would be very useful; it is one of the most useful modes, and one which, in point of fact, I have already taken some pains to recommend.

N^o 12.—Could your Grace suggest to the consideration of the Commissioners any such book actually existing at present?—There are, I believe, several of that kind. To many of them, however, I object, because their simplicity has been disturbed, in many cases, by a desire to display learning; ingenuity has been sometimes injudiciously exercised in assigning motives where the Scripture assigns none; and in short there has been for the most part too great an ambition to go beyond the written word.

N^o 13.—It was the object of the question to inquire from your Grace, whether you could suggest any mode of procuring or compiling such a fair and plain system of examination in the Scriptures as might exclude all particular notions on the part of the compiler, and have no other object than to extract from the child, in the form of answers, the subject matter in the chapter, as little mixed up with any extraneous opinions as the undertaking would admit of?—I think I mentioned on a former occasion, that there is one which I myself revised, and one which, of course, I must naturally approve; I look upon it as a good sort of specimen; at least it is reasonably adapted for the purpose required.

STT
 Examination of
 His Grace
 the Archbishop of Dublin,
 11 Jan. 1825.

N° 14.—Your Grace means a work edited by your son Mr. Thomas Percival Magee?—Yes; but it is confined to the gospel of Saint Luke.

N° 15.—Would it not be desirable to obtain similar works applying to other parts of the Scriptures?—Yes, certainly. Of this little tract I would not be understood to say, that I think it a perfect model, but it is a specimen of the sort of thing that would be desirable; and I think it is at least blamelessly done.

N° 16.—A work of the nature here suggested, is one that might naturally give rise to difference of opinions. Can your Grace suggest any course to procure such a work as should not fairly be objected to by any persons, least of all by the authorities of the established church?—The only way would be to have a committee, to combine the labour and the judgment of well informed clergymen of the church of England, selected by the bishops, or some of them. I think that a compilation of the kind, prepared by this committee and submitted afterwards to the heads of the church, would be likely at least to meet the general description, as much as any thing I can well conceive to be executed.

N° 17.—Adverting now to the circumstance of so large a portion of the Protestant population of Ireland being Protestant dissenters, does your Grace think that it might fairly be suggested, as a condition of that work, that it should strictly be confined to extract the matter of the text, according to the plain and common understanding, but without the insertion of any matter that would be objected to by Presbyterians?—I think that it would be a part of the discretion of the persons appointed to superintend it, to take care that nothing of this sort should occur, so as to offend. At the same time, I am against a system of neutralizing any important point of the Scriptures; and therefore, as a member of the church of England, and holding the station I do hold in that church, I should not feel myself justified in saying, it should be submitted to Protestants of another description for their approbation, where children of the church of England were to be instructed.

N° 18.—The question was a good deal founded upon the hope, that the accordance in matters of doctrine, as contradistinguished from matters of discipline, was so great between the members of the established church and the Presbyterians, that it might be very easy to construct a work of the description referred to, introducing every matter of doctrine that a member of the established church could desire, without giving such a form to any question as would offend the peculiar opinions of a Presbyterian on the subject of church government?—Certainly, I think it could.

N° 19.—If that object could be attained, would not your Grace think, ceteris paribus, it would be a desirable form?—No doubt; and I think it could be effected.

N° 20.—And that, without any sacrifice that a churchman should have cause to regret?—Yes, I think it could; as far as the Gospels at least are concerned, it is quite clear.

N° 21.—Could your Grace say at present, what number of clergymen you would propose should be appointed for the purpose of executing such a work?—I think about half a dozen; there may be interruptions given to some, and the others might go on. I should think half a dozen might be found properly qualified, who could give their attention to it.

N° 22.—Supposing such schools as those referred to in the commencement of the examination should become pretty generally substituted for the present parochial schools, which are understood to be more or less under the superintendence of the clergymen of the established church; does not your Grace think that the resident officiating clergyman, whether rector or curate, might very reasonably be expected to attend for a certain limited portion of each of the days set apart for religious instruction, to see that the schoolmaster executed his portion of the duty properly, and also to take a fair portion of it on himself?—Yes, undoubtedly; unless where his parish duties called him away, it ought to be a part of his employment.

N° 23.—We have understood, that some of the resident clergy of Ireland do voluntarily, at a very considerable sacrifice of time and labour, give to the instruction of the children in their respective parishes, upon fixed days, and fixed portions of days, considerably more of their time and trouble than the question is proposing?—They do.

N° 24.—It seems also further, that whatever difference of opinion may have existed as to the nature and extent of the contribution under the Act of Henry the 8th, expected on the part of the parochial clergy, it was clearly the principle of that Act to impose upon them the duty of seeing that the instruction of their respective flocks was attended to?—I have always felt it so.

N° 25.—May we collect, that it is your Grace's opinion, that the suggestion of the principles referred to in the preceding question, requiring from the clergy a moderate portion of their own time and trouble in seeing the religious system of instruction administered, would on the whole be not only a reasonable commutation of that very vague and disputed duty with respect to parochial schools, which the present state of the law imposes upon them?—I think it would be a very great improvement, and that they would have no right to complain; they ought to be desirous, under a general sense of their obligations, and the manifest bearings of the law of the land, to extend religious instruction as far as they can; that is one of the prime objects they should attend to.

N° 26.—It was quite our feeling on the one hand, to express an expectation of the performance of that duty within the bounds of moderation, and on the other of supplying to every clergyman an opportunity at present wanting, for enabling him to perform that duty without any reasonable cause of complaint on his part?—It is a very excellent object: I approve of it highly.

N° 27.—Will your Grace be so good as to explain to the Commissioners, your Grace's view of the law at present, with respect to the obligations of the clergy towards the parochial schools?—

Examination of
His Grace

schools?—My view of the duty of the clergy, as growing out of the Act of Henry VIII. is, that there is no obligation imposed on the incumbent of a parish to keep a free school. The law, as it appears to me, has become obsolete, or rather is virtually repealed, respecting certain duties enjoined to the clergyman, such as telling the beads in English, &c. because these duties themselves have passed away. But the duty of keeping, or causing to be kept, an English school, I conceive to be still in force under the statute. The mistake that has prevailed on this head seems to be, that the clergy are bound by this Act, and the oath prescribed by it, to keep a free school; whereas the Act expressly describes the school to be kept, not as a free school, but on the contrary as one in which a stipend is to be paid by the scholars resorting to it; conditioning only, that the stipend shall be such as is usually paid by scholars in English schools in that district of the country; at the same time I conceive, that the clergy are, to the utmost of their power, bound to keep, or see that there be kept, an English school for the instruction of the poor, although they are not bound to see that it shall be a free school; the true intention of the law I consider to be conveyed and enforced in the Act of the 7th of William III. intituled, "An Act to restrain Foreign Education." In this Act it is declared, that the clergy shall in their respective parishes or districts keep English schools, or cause them to be kept, according to the true intent and spirit of the Act of Henry VIII.; and this I conceive sets aside all those minor considerations growing out of the change of times, and brings the matter to the fair honest equity of the case, that the clergy were intended to be the guardians of the education of the country, and to promote it in every fair and practicable way; I have always felt it as such, and considered that the oath imposed upon the clergy at institution, bore broadly upon this, without entering into the minutiae of the legal consideration, which admit of and have led to a great deal of special pleading, but which when gone into even with a liberal interpretation, seem decidedly to preclude the idea that the clergy are bound to keep free schools.

N° 28.—Granting that the statute of Henry VIII. does not impose any contribution upon the clergy, does not it impose upon them the duty of superintendence?—No doubt of it; yet as far as the strictness of the Act goes, they are to be paid for their superintendence, which is much at variance with the notions of the present day.

N° 29.—Their duty is to see that a good day school is kept?—The Act still requires that they be paid.

N° 30.—They are to teach?—They are to keep, or cause to be kept, a school (to use the phrase of the Act) to learn English, if any children come to learn the same, taking for the keeping of the same school, such convenient stipend or salary as in the said land is accustomed to be taken.

N° 31.—That is, if the clergyman teaches in propria personâ, or to the master if he teaches?—The Act itself says, that whether he keep the school, or cause it to be kept, he is to take the stipend or salary; of course if he cause it to be kept by another, he would hand over to him the stipend, or which is the same thing, would authorize him to receive it. But this the Act does not positively prescribe. The kind of school to be kept ought of course to be one in which children should be taught their duty towards God, and their duty to the king.

N° 32.—Laying for the present out of consideration, any obligations which the statute law may impose upon the clergy, would your Grace be so good as to state what you conceive to be the extent of the duty of the parochial clergy of Ireland, with respect to the instruction of Protestant children of the established church within their respective cures of souls?—I conceive it to be their duty to find out, in all the families within their respective spiritual charges, what children will receive from them religious instruction, and contrive the best mode of giving it; I conceive it is the bounden duty of every clergyman in every parish, to go from door to door to know the young persons of the families, and to learn if they can procure their attendance at any proper time and place, so as to give them religious instruction. It is their bounden duty to seek after them, and give them what you are now prescribing modes and facilities to effect.

N° 33.—Of course, if any considerable portion of the Protestant peasantry of their respective parishes, were collected in the schools so described at specific times set apart for that purpose, there could be no doubt it would form a part of the duty of the clergy in your Grace's view of it, to discharge that duty, even laying out of consideration any obligation under the statute?—Yes, most certainly.

N° 34.—Will your Grace have the goodness to explain the nature and extent of the duty of the clergy, as to the catechetical examinations on the Sunday?—I think they ought to encourage the catechetical examinations on the Sunday to the fullest extent they can; as to prescribing the particular length of time, or the particular degree to which this is to be carried on in various places, it cannot be done on account of the duties, and the varying duties of the clergyman, but, generally speaking, the standard should be raised very high as to the quantum of catechetical instruction a clergyman should feel himself bound to give, and it is to be circumscribed only by the other duties of the day that are indispensable. I have always thought it a most valuable part of the clergyman's duty, that he should exercise himself largely in the morning before the commencement of mid-day service, and again after the service is over, in giving general catechetical instruction to as many of the children of the parish as he can get together; and that to render this the more extensively useful, he ought to carry into operation Sunday schools as far as he possibly can.

N° 35.—As a matter of general convenience both to the clergyman and the children in the country parts of Ireland, what hours of the day would your Grace recommend should be be set apart for catechetical examination, before or after morning service?—In the country parts both before and after service, say a couple of hours before and a couple of hours after the mid-day service. Those who are near might find it convenient to attend before service, those who are more distant after service; it might be made advantageous for all descriptions of people; there should be an invitation to all to come and receive instruction; this not confined to those merely of the communion of the church. Where those of a different communion attended, the minister should make a distinction in the species of instruction given in the early part, and in the latter part of the day, rendering, for example, the morning's teaching of that more general nature that might suit all, and confining the more special religious and catechetical teaching to the young of his own communion in the interval after service. This, in the mixed condition in which the country is placed, has been found very beneficial; large numbers have been drawn by this arrangement, and have been much benefited who otherwise would not have attended.

N° 36.—Would your Grace, generally speaking, recommend that the scene of the catechetical instruction should be the church, unless there was a good reason for a contrary practice?—Yes, particularly after service; the instruction after service should always be the religious instruction belonging to the church, and I think it is best administered by having it in the church; the clergyman would also be able to secure such assistance as he wished, for the instruction of the classes, from intelligent and educated young persons remaining from the service, of whom he had a good opinion, and whom he had specially trained and instructed for the purpose; this would do good also to more than the children who were thus instructed, benefiting in addition, not only the teachers, but many who might be induced to remain and listen, and would extend more generally the interest in the instruction of the poor.

N° 37.—Would your Grace approve of the clergyman for the purposes of such examination, associating to himself some of the more respectable of the parishioners, both male and female, or would your Grace rather see it entirely confined to ecclesiastics?—It would be impossible in most cases, to confine it to ecclesiastical hands, the number of children in general would be too great; whereas in towns, it might be practicable—from the number of clergymen, it would be preferable. But in the country parts there is generally only a single clergyman, or at most two, it should, of course, be left to them to judge what aid they should call in.

N° 38.—Your Grace would not disapprove of the system of lay associates?—Certainly not, of the description I have named; I conceive it would be highly desirable, provided they were such persons as the clergyman was satisfied were well qualified to instruct, and especially those whom he had himself instructed for the purpose.

N° 39.—We have understood that there were some clergymen desirous, in fact, of obtaining such aid, but who conceived there was some objection taken by their superiors, to any instruction of that nature being given in the church, except by a clergyman in holy orders; of course, we are to collect that your Grace does not entertain that feeling?—The clergy ought to be the best qualified, and where they are sufficient, in point of number, I would not call in the aid of others; but the thing is impracticable in some cases; the clergyman would, of course, take care that he was not calling in aid that would not be beneficial; and as to any secular objection, I do not feel it to be a just one, if it has the sanction of the ecclesiastic, and if he has the sanction of his superior. With the cautions enumerated, it seems not to partake of a sectarian character, nor is it such as should excite any sort of alarm upon that head.

N° 40.—Are we to understand that it is your Grace's opinion, that it is distinctly a neglect of duty on the part of any clergyman to omit altogether such catechetical instruction on Sunday, if there are Protestant children in the parish ready to partake of it?—Certainly, a very gross neglect; I conceive the instruction of the young to be one of the great objects a clergyman should always hold in view, and one of his most important obligations.

N° 41.—We find amongst the different societies that different rules are established with regard to persons admissible as masters for the purpose of general instruction; we would ask your Grace, whether you think there is any objection to a Roman Catholic master assisting in the general literary instruction of the children of the established church, in schools in which a proper provision is made for their receiving, at other times, from persons duly qualified, sufficient religious instruction in the tenets of the established church?—I answer, without hesitation, that I would not of choice admit a Roman Catholic into the school. I would have no connection with him whatsoever; I am for drawing a distinct line, as far as religious instruction is concerned. When I speak of a Roman Catholic, I mean one sincerely and honestly attached to his religion; in truth, the more honest a Roman Catholic is, the more dangerous he is in a Protestant seminary. When such a person sees a number of young persons running, as he conceives, to certain perdition, he must feel it his bounden duty to stop them; I would not let such a person come in contact with the school. One of the great advantages that the Roman Catholic religion has over the Protestant in its acquisition of influence over the mind is, that the whole judgment must be satisfied in the case of the latter; but for the former, what influences is contained in a nutshell—it can be made to work upon the youngest mind, and in the shortest space of time.

N° 42.—Considering that there are many schools throughout the country in which there are only Roman Catholic teachers, might it not be an improvement to place a Protestant teacher to act along with them?—I would not place a Roman Catholic teacher in a school.

Examination of
His Grace
the Archbishop of Dublin,
11 Jan. 1825.

N^o 43.—Finding that such is the case, and that there the Roman Catholic masters are, might it not be an improvement that Protestant masters should be associated with them in the management of the schools?—I am not able to answer upon such anomalies; if the two religions could manage so as to afford religious instruction separately, to their respective followers, without mutual interference, it would answer all purposes best, and amongst other advantages it would tend very much to charity; each description of teachers would have an opportunity of inculcating, without embarrassment or offence, what they considered vital truth, and I would not consent to sacrifice a jot of that to any consideration.

N^o 44.—Does your Grace go so far as to think, that in all matters of instruction it would be desirable to separate the children?—To comprehend them under one scheme is a contrivance certainly above my comprehension, it requires a wisdom beyond any I can pretend to, to reconcile such contradictions. In my own line, and following my own direct path, I see my way; out of that line, I am unwilling to venture on any experiments.

N^o 45.—One of the Commissioners has visited a particular parish in which there are ten schools, all kept by Roman Catholics, and no Protestant schoolmaster in the parish, while there are Protestant children at every one of the ten Roman Catholic schools, who, though they are insignificant in number in each school in proportion to the Roman Catholics, yet if all collected together, would form a very respectable school; does not your Grace think that a very undesirable and dangerous state of things to those Protestant children?—Certainly.

N^o 46.—We may further state to your Grace, that those Protestant children are not instructed in their own catechism except by a Roman Catholic master, and that the children are not examined in the church, although there is a resident clergyman; would it not be a preferable state of things, that there should be one large school in which the Protestant children could be collected, and in which there might be a very considerable attendance of Roman Catholics also; that there should be two masters, one Protestant and the other Roman Catholic; that under their joint operation, each being subject to the inspection and check which the presence of the other would create to a considerable degree, common literary instruction might be administered to the Protestants and Roman Catholics, and that the Protestants should have the opportunity of being separately instructed in the doctrines of their own religion on two days of the week by the Protestant master, assisted by the clergyman, with the additional advantage of catechetical examination on the Sunday; does not your Grace think that the system contemplated in the latter question would be a very great improvement indeed upon that which exists in the parish referred to, so far as the Protestant children are concerned?—Yes, the one would undoubtedly be better than the other.

N^o 47.—Would your Grace see any objection in principle, to the system latterly proposed?—Where there is a positively bad state of things, in my view of it, any thing that diminishes the evil of that state of things, of course is comparatively good, and there is no question that it is to be preferred to the other; but I do not see any great advantage likely to arise from it; I do not see any great advantage to arise from the mixture of Roman Catholic and Protestant children in the same school, generally speaking.

N^o 48.—The attention of the Commissioners has been a good deal drawn to a work that has been used in the schools as auxiliary to the Scriptures, an alteration of a work called “Mrs. Trimmer’s Selections from the New Testament,” it was prepared originally by the Roman Catholic priest of Bray; and at one time received the sanction of Dr. Troy; the principle upon which it appears to have been prepared is that of not following implicitly either the authorized or Douay version of the Testament, while some parts of the authorized version, which is the basis of it, have received certain alterations in order to make it less objectionable to Roman Catholic children. Your Grace is aware that in schools where persons of the two religious persuasions are assembled together, a considerable difficulty arises in their reading any Scripture extracts, on account of the difference of the versions. We are desirous of preparing, if possible, some work that may be read jointly by the children, not however as a substitute for the Scriptures; and we wish particularly to be permitted to consult your Grace as to the mode in which you think it desirable to get over the difficulty arising from the two versions?—I should prefer the distinct versions being read, by the distinct classes; I do not know much of the work alluded to; I know Mrs. Trimmer’s book.

N^o 49.—If the separate religious instruction of the children were given on two days of the week, would your Grace think that sufficient, or would you not think it desirable they should also read in the school, while assembled together upon the other days of the week, some book containing an account of the Old Testament, and such extracts from the New Testament, as should give them a considerable degree of knowledge of its contents; any such work, however, to be considered merely as an auxiliary, and not at all as a substitute for the use of the Scriptures themselves, upon occasion when they were to receive separate religious instruction?—Yes, when I spoke of two days in the week, I meant for the examination of the children and interrogating them as to the state of their knowledge, and directing and explaining; there must be some preparation for that; that must be left for regulation; there must be other reading to prepare for it; the children would not be capable of receiving the benefit of the instruction offered, unless by previous reading in preparation for it.

N^o 50.—Is the translation of the New Testament, commonly known by the name of the Rhemish version, so inaccurate as to make it objectionable that it should be read in any form, either as extracts or put together as a harmony of the Gospels?—No, I should think not;

SS
Examination of
His Grace
the Archbishop of Dublin,

not; I cannot say I have read it entirely through; I have consulted it very often, occasionally, as I have consulted other versions; there are particular points of difference from our translation prominent in it; with respect to penance, and the church, &c. but that these occur so frequently as to make it in every part a stumbling block in the way of Protestant readers, is certainly not the case; large portions of it might be taken without involving this objectionable matter.

N^o 51.—The objection would be still less if it was put forward not as a translation of the Scriptures, but as an historical work?—Yes.

N^o 52.—Would any danger arise from the use of it, if the children were properly informed, that the differences they might perceive in the volume containing the extracts, and what they read in the New Testament itself, arose from a difference in the translation, and not from any wish to alter the sense?—The chief objection I should have to that scheme would be this: I should think the young mind would not have its judgment so completely satisfied and settled, if it were allowed in the first instance to doubt the propriety of the book it is to look to as the standard; it feels there is a different translation; that the words of Scripture admit of different meanings; and therefore the learner would be liable to a feeling of uncertainty, as to the truth of that which he should be taught not to doubt; however a philosopher might choose to speak of it, as tending to enslave the human mind, I consider that where a Christian is satisfied of the truth, he is to bring on the child with an undoubted conviction of that truth which he is communicating; the making a child a critic in the first instance in allowing it to entertain a doubt of what is put into its hands being the word of God, and strictly true in every part, would certainly be laying a bad foundation for its future profitable perusal of the word of God, and for its receiving the communication of divine truth with an humble and a teachable spirit; in other words for true Christian humility. I feel with respect to the reverence that a child should be habitually made to feel for the Scripture, as an unerring guide about which there should be no question, as a parent naturally would with respect to the confidence he would wish his child to have in him; every parent would naturally desire to bring up his child with the undoubting confidence that he was completely adequate for the child's guidance in every thing; it would be a most unfortunate system that would teach a child, even from infancy, to sit in judgment on every act of its parent, and to exercise a fearless criticism upon his opinions; it is not difficult to say how such a system would terminate in its effects upon the character. In our nature from the good opinion we have of ourselves, generally speaking, unless corrected by a sound and right education, we are sufficiently prone to indulge a scepticism with respect to the opinions of others; this spirit of scepticism we should not then make a part of education; any thing therefore tending to cast a doubt upon the great standard in the education of a child, I conceive should be carefully guarded against; there is a way indeed of considering the matter in the question proposed, to which the objection may not apply; the children must naturally know there are persons who differ from them in religion, and their knowing that, does not alter the impression which the standard ought to make upon their minds. If then the work proposed, be not brought to them as Scripture, but as a work compiled by persons who do not agree in religion with their teachers, here the danger of shaking the authority of Scripture, and their reverence for and submission to that which they consider as Scripture, would not be to be apprehended.

N^o 53.—The question assumes, that they are never to see the Scriptures in the form of a standard, except in their own version, and that they are to see it in that form whenever they are to receive separate religious instruction. The work now submitted to your Grace has been prepared by some clergyman of the Roman Catholic church; it is called "The Evangelical Life of Christ." It contains no words but what may be found in the Douay version of the Testament; and it seems to be a very complete harmony of the Gospels, giving an account of all the principal acts of the life of our Saviour, and the principal doctrines he delivered. It has, in its present form, notes, distinctly conveying Roman Catholic doctrines. We have had it under consideration (always supposing that the notes should be set aside), how far some such work could be adapted to the use of children of both persuasions in schools, as a part of their common instruction, not as a substitute, however, for the Scriptures. The Scriptures, we assume, should be still used in separate instruction for the children, both Protestants and Roman Catholics, on two days of the week. It is the plan of this work to omit nothing that is found in any of the four Gospels, but to weave them into one consecutive narration, inserting what is to be found in one where the others are silent; and where two or more speak of the same transaction, inserting the statement which is the most full and explicit. The Commissioners have had an opportunity of comparing it in detail with Primate Newcombe's Harmony of the Gospels, and they discovered so great a coincidence as to make them suppose, at first, that the compiler of that work had Primate Newcombe's Harmony before him; but they afterwards detected some discrepancies, which, though very unimportant, were just sufficient to lead them to the conclusion, that neither work was a copy of the other. Two questions have occurred to the Commissioners; first, whether the work, in its present form, compiled as it is from the Douay translation, could be at all admissible among Protestant children; secondly, whether, if an exactly similar work were constructed from the authorized version, there could be any objection to the use of it?—That is, whether a Harmony is a useful work in a school.

N^o 54.—Yes, for every-day instruction, and not for the period set apart for religious instruction?—I think there can be no objection to a Harmony as a reading book, especially if constructed from our own version.

Examination of
His Grace
the Archbishop of Dublin,
11 Jan. 1825.

N^o 55.—Does not your Grace think that children, whatever be their persuasion, attending in a school in which such a Harmony was the reading book, would somehow or other acquire a much more distinct notion of religion than they would in a school where the books had no relation to religious subjects?—Certainly.

N^o 56.—And in reference to the actual circumstances of our peasantry, it would be a desirable reading book to be introduced?—Yes, certainly; this is a book from which they could learn a great deal; and if freed from the objections that exist to the Douay Testament, still more if formed from our own version, it would be a desirable book.

N^o 57.—The question supposed that the Scriptures themselves should be employed on two days in the week for the children of each denomination, in the absence of children of any other denomination; the consideration as to the Harmony is confined to the other days of the week, which should be understood to be appropriated to general instruction, but not to religious instruction?—I think it would be very admissible upon that view.

N^o 58.—Would your Grace feel an objection to it in it's Rhemish dress, supposing the passages, in which any doctrinal differences arose between the churches, should be simply omitted; which passages we may nearly particularize in the compass of a question, the word "penance" being substituted for "repentance," in eight or ten instances; and the words, "Hail, Mary, full of grace!" being substituted for "Hail, thou that art highly favoured!" and the passage, as to the image that fell down from Jupiter, which is translated in another manner by the Roman Catholics?—With the particular objectionable parts left out, there seems no reason why it should not be made a school book in those places in which particular circumstances may render it advisable.

N^o 59.—Always understanding that it should not be put forward as the Scriptures, but as an historical view of what is found in the Scriptures?—Certainly.

N^o 60.—And it being further distinctly understood, that the opportunities already suggested would be afforded for particular instruction in religion, both in catechisms and in the Scriptures themselves?—Yes; not to be given as the Scriptures, there seems no objection to it.

N^o 61.—Does your Grace think it liable to material objection, if any prominent passage or passages were to be omitted in a work that should profess to be, if not a harmony, a compilation of the whole substance of the Gospels?—If it was given as a work formed out of the Gospels, there is fair room for exercising a discretion as to partial omissions; if pronounced to be a complete harmony of the Gospels, or professing to be a work of such a nature as to lead to the belief there was nothing in the Gospels that was not there, it would be objectionable of course, leading to the belief of what was not true; but if it were merely a compilation from the Gospels generally, giving a history of the life of Christ, there might be a justifiable exercise of discretion in rejecting parts.

N^o 62.—Under the denomination of Scripture lessons, it would not assume it was a complete history of the life of Christ?—The objection would, of course, not apply.

N^o 63.—In an arrangement of that kind, would your Grace think it desirable to append explanatory notes to it, provided they could be arranged upon a footing that would give no offence to any description of Christians?—If it is meant to be a sort of book to be considered as open to all denominations as a reading book, it is better to leave it simply as it is, inasmuch as explanations of every kind are to be given according to a more accurately adjusted standard.

N^o 64.—At the foot of the page there are references to the prophetic parts of the Old Testament, that bear upon the different passages in the work itself, does your Grace think it desirable to have such references?—I should rather think it desirable to have none, making it a sort of generalized book; the references must be all comments in themselves. I have this moment, in the very page which I have happened to open, glanced my eye upon one which is a point relied upon very much in the Romish church as to the nature and unity of the church; that there are many such, there can be no doubt.

Copies of the preceding EXAMINATION having been transmitted by the Commissioners to the Lord Primate, and to the Archbishops of Cashel and Tuam, in order to ascertain their Graces sentiments respecting the education of the lower classes in Ireland, particularly with regard to the mode in which religious instruction could best be given to Protestant children of the established church; the following ANSWERS and OBSERVATIONS were received from them:—

Gentlemen,

AS I have not had an opportunity of communicating personally with you, I have endeavoured to make my statement so full, as to supersede, in a great measure, the necessity of those explanations, which can be best developed in a conversation.

In all places which I have suffered to pass without comment, I would be understood to concur with the Archbishop of Dublin. I have adverted specially to those passages in which I felt disposed either not to agree entirely with his Grace, or to make some additional observations. I have subjoined also some general remarks, which, although not answers to any of the queries, will, I trust, appear to you neither unbecoming my station, nor nor unsuited to the occasion which has presented itself. As far as I am personally concerned in the correspondence, I have to express my sense of the courteous manner in which you have communicated your wishes.

And am, Gentlemen,

With much consideration,

Your obedient servant,

ANSWERS of His Grace the Lord Primate, to the Questions proposed by the Commissioners on the Examination of His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

IN general my opinions coincide with those expressed by the Archbishop of Dublin. The particular observations which I have to make are as follow:—

Question, N° 1.—I cannot suppose that his Grace meant, that if the superintending clergyman were the officiating minister of the parish, a special licence would be necessary. Whoever is qualified to undertake the cure of souls, is also qualified to superintend a school.

N° 2.—Considering the class of persons who offer themselves for parish schoolmasters, I cannot but think a form of catechetical instruction necessary; and of course, it would be in every way desirable that the same form should be used in all the dioceses; particularly if, as I hope may be the case, a seminary be established for training the schoolmasters themselves.

N° 6.—His Grace says, that the books to be used should by no means be left to the discretion of the lay teacher; I would venture to extend this so far as to say, that it would be well if even the clergyman had not his choice of books. The same set of books might be used through all the schools.

N° 10.—I would deprecate the preparation of an authorized system of scriptural questions by the commissioners, or any lay authority; and I would submit it to the good sense and good feeling of the Commissioners, whether Parliament would not do well to avoid even the appearance of taking out of the hands of ecclesiastics whatever is purely ecclesiastical. A safe and obvious plan would be, to entrust the matter, in the first instance, to a committee of the clergy, whose labours should be then revised and approved by the bishops. This being done, there is no doubt that Parliament would give its final sanction. I could wish that every moral, historical or religious book, to be used in the parochial schools, were determined by Parliament. Thus the State would have a security, that nothing unsound was insinuated into the minds of youth; and all reflecting and well disposed Roman Catholics might be assured, that no sinister acts of proselytism were in contemplation.

N° 17.—It does not appear to me, that any Presbyterians would expect to be consulted upon the preparation of such a tract, or that (if the thing be discreetly done) the attendance of their children at the schools would be at all diminished by the omission.

N° 35.—I fear that his Grace has assigned, except to a very robust man, an impracticable length of time for Sunday catechizing. He will have the clergyman employed incessantly for six hours. Besides, I confess I cannot see how this plan is consistent with the other scheme of Sunday schools, which his Grace has earnestly recommended. But while I am compelled to state this difficulty, I am most anxious for the revival of the true old church of England system of assiduous catechizing; and if the parts of the archbishop's plan are (as I fear they are) incompatible, I would not hesitate to give up the Sunday schools. I should think, were one hour before and one hour after service, allotted to catechizing, both it and the Sunday schools might be retained with advantage.

N° 36.—I approve very much of the system of lay associates in catechizing, not only as relieving the clergyman, but as affording means of safely employing the zeal of religiously inclined persons, who are otherwise in danger of running into some extravagance or irregularity. They are anxious to be useful, but not seeing any path of usefulness sanctioned by the church, they fall into sectarian and schismatical practices. I beg leave to suggest, that in order to benefit fully by the zeal of such persons, as also to train up a body of qualified schoolmasters, it would be expedient to have an enlarged exposition of the catechism for their private use.

N° 41.—Hitherto the questions and answers have related to schools kept by licensed masters, and superintended by the parochial clergy, but here the case suddenly changes; and it appears to me, that henceforward the Commissioners and the archbishop do not understand each other. The cause appears to be, that the Commissioners have not explained whether their feeling is, that all the schools of a parish should be on the same model, or whether there is to be one, and one only, in which the teacher should be licensed, and the clergyman the superintendent. If the former, if all teachers are to be licensed (and, of course, previously examined), if the clergyman be officially the visitor of all, if he have the power of removing (or, at least, of bringing before a competent authority) any teacher who breaks his trust; if the teachers are to have no discretionary power as to Scripture questions, but read their questions from a printed document. Were these conditions to be observed, my objections to a Roman Catholic teacher would be greatly qualified; otherwise my opinion coincides with that of the Archbishop of Dublin. If there is to be one school exclusively for Protestant children, I can see no reason for admitting a Roman Catholic teacher. As to the schools of the different societies, I should regret that they were made the models of the schools to be established for the future.

N° 44.—Were the securities above mentioned given and adhered to, I think the children need not be separated; otherwise they certainly should. The ambiguity I have mentioned prevails here very much.

N° 46.—In the case here supposed, it would be obviously the best way to have two schools, unless the securities I have spoken of be strictly enforced. There is the same ambiguity in this part; I cannot discover whether it is, or it is not, understood by the Commissioners, that the teachers are to be licensed, and the clergymen the superintendent.

N° 48.—From this to the end, I find the same ambiguity. Still further the Commissioners do not seem to have considered, whether the proposed "Harmony" should be that form of the New Testament, which is to be broken up by chapters into scriptural questions, and they made the subject of examination by the teachers. Again, I cannot discover from any part of the queries, whether it is the intention of the Commissioners to propose a provision for the training of a safe body of schoolmasters; and my answers would be regulated very much by a knowledge of the disposition of the Commissioners on this subject. The neglect of this provision I consider one of the two great misfortunes of this country, with respect to parochial education. The other, is the omitting to multiply schools, so as to keep pace with the advance of population, which has increased six-fold since the time of King William. The consequence has been, either that the people remained in total ignorance, or (what, in our circumstances, is perhaps a more dangerous evil); that teachers, every way unsuited to the country and the time, have been suffered to multiply. It now remains for the legislature to remedy these evils.

COPY of a Letter from His Grace the Archbishop of Cashel to Thomas Frankland Lewis, Esq. dated London, March 24th, 1825.

Sir,

Copy of Letter from his Grace the Archbishop of Cashel,
24 March 1825.

IN consequence of my absence from Cashel, your communication followed me from thence to Dublin, and then to England, where I now am (for as short a time I hope as possible), waiting to attend the Committee of the House of Lords, to which I have been summoned. This must be my apology for my not answering your letter before.

I perfectly agree with the Archbishop of Dublin with respect to the great difficulty which must exist in attempting to prescribe a fixed mode of general instruction. And I must add, that I cannot approve the idea of making any attempt to prescribe such a fixed mode under the authority of a royal commission.

The power of licensing parish schoolmasters is already given to bishops by the canon law, if they choose to exert it; but my clergy have suggested to me, that the effect of a licence is to diminish the incumbent's control over the teacher, and to make his removal, if he misconducts himself, a tedious and unpleasant task. I have in consequence licensed none, since I came to the diocese.

Upon the subject of impressing religious opinions upon the minds of children, I certainly do think, that every distinct communion should be left to instruct their children in their own way. To infringe this liberty would, in my judgment, be to infringe the first principle of religious toleration. But it may happen, that in some parishes separate schools cannot be conveniently established. In such cases, compilations embracing the accordant opinions of the respective communions only would be doubtless desirable, where children of different persuasions were educated together; but I must beg leave to express my disapproval of such compilations coming out under the authority of the Royal Commissioners; of what the Archbishop of Dublin properly terms, "a mode of questioning, as it were, by Act of Parliament." Every compilation of the kind should stand alone upon its own merits.

I completely differ from the archbishop upon the construction of the 28th of Henry VIIIth, intituled, "An Act for the English Habit and Language." His Grace thinks, that the object of the Act was to compel the clergy to keep, or cause to be kept, schools of general education, whatsoever might be the language spoken by the children who attended them. I do not. From the whole tenor of the Act, it appears to me evident, that the English tongue was then scarcely known in Ireland out of the English pale; and that its sole object was, to have children taught in every parish the English, through the medium of the Irish, language. The qualifications of the clergy themselves for keeping such schools are, since that period, greatly altered. Then all the clergy understood Irish, but very few indeed (as is manifest from the Act itself) English; but now all the clergy understand English, but very few of them Irish. As one half of the Act, which enjoins the use of the English habit, is become obsolete by that habit's being generally worn; so I conceive is the other half of it, by the general prevalence of the English language, which is now generally spoken.

With respect to what is to be considered as the bounden duty of the Irish clergy upon the point of catechetical instruction, I partly agree with, and partly differ from the Archbishop of Dublin. I agree with him in thinking, that it is impossible to prescribe "the particular length of time, and the particular degree, in which this instruction is to be carried on (every Sunday) in various places, on account of the duties and the varying duties of the clergyman." But I differ from him in thinking, that, "generally speaking, every clergyman should exercise himself largely in the morning before the commencement of mid-day

"day service, and again after the service is over, in giving general catechetical instruction to as many of the children of the parish as he can get together," whom he should collect by soliciting their attendance from door to door in every family within his benefice; that he should thus employ himself "in the country parts of Ireland both before and after service, say, a couple of hours before and a couple of hours after the mid-day service." My reason is, because to require of every clergyman a church duty upon Sundays of almost six successive hours, at all times and in all seasons, when he frequently has perhaps from two to four miles to travel from his glebe house to his church and back again, would not only, in my judgment, prove more toilsome than profitable, but would also during winter preclude the possibility of his reading evening prayer, which the late Residence Act empowers the bishop to enforce, where he thinks it necessary. Besides, the Protestant children in many country parishes are too few to prevent so protracted an instruction from becoming irksome to both parties. And I must also confess, that I do not wish to see the minutiae of mode to be adopted, and the portion of time to be employed, in catechetical instruction prescribed to the Irish, which no one has ever thought of prescribing to the English clergy, or to take away all discretion and responsibility upon such points from a professional character, to which both ought to be peculiarly attached.

With regard to the reading of the Testament in schools, where Protestant and Roman Catholic children are educated together, I should prefer, with the Archbishop of Dublin, "the distinct versions being read by the distinct classes." I see no objection to children's reading the Bible and learning their catechism, by what is called rote, where explanation may be difficult or unadvisable. All children are accustomed to learn by rote. Maturer years will bring reflection; and it will be something in the mean time to give the habit of reading and thinking, and to store their memory with words, passages and scriptural incidents.

Were I to be asked the question, whether I thought, that the disturbances in Ireland were imputable to any defect of education in that country, I should answer. Certainly not; for, as far as my own observation has gone, I am fully persuaded that the peasantry of Ireland are not only quicker of apprehension, and in possession of a greater love for learning, but are also, in point of fact, better educated than the peasantry of England.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Sir,

I WAS last night honoured by the receipt of your letter, accompanied with the examination of his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, upon the subject of the education of the lower classes in Ireland, particularly with regard to the mode in which religious instruction can best be given to Protestant children of the established church, and desiring me to state how far I agree, and in what respects I may differ from the sentiments of his Grace. This appears to me to be a most important document, and one requiring time and much consideration. I shall (please God) devote myself to it, until I can make you the answer you require, which you may rely shall be as soon as the nature of it will admit.

I have the honour to be, Sir, very faithfully,

ANSWERS of His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam, to the Questions proposed by the Commissioners, on the Examination of his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

Question N° 1.—IN order to answer this question so as to make myself intelligible, and so simplify my future observations and replies, I must assume two points as data; first, that in the schools alluded to youths of every religious description are to be educated: and secondly, that the Scriptures of Almighty God are to be sanctioned as a reading book in the said schools. Such being the case, I am of opinion, that the clergymen of the several parishes wherein such schools are situated, should attend for a portion of two days in each week, and question and instruct the children of his own communion, immediately after the general school has been dissolved for the day. Of course the previous reading of the Scriptures in the school hours would form the best preparatory system for the lectures on the church catechism, and explanation on the sacred text.

N° 2.—I conceive this question refers to time and not to system, and therefore answer thus; for the portion of two days in each week and on the Sabbath.

N° 3.—I am not an advocate for a multiplication of catechisms.

N° 4.—See my reply, N° 1.

N° 5.—I prefer the reading of the sacred text without note in the school.

N° 6.—I think the master should not be admitted to explain orally or from printed explanations in the schools. Such mode of instruction should be confined to the clergyman. Let it be always carried in mind, that I speak of those schools as schools not exclusively Protestant.

N^o 7.—I still adhere to my opinion delivered in the antecedent answer, and for the same reason.

N^o 8.—If I were to form a system purely for the youth of my own communion, I would certainly answer in another way, for I would, in such case, recommend explanation; that I approve and permit the master, when qualified, to question and explain, under the controul of the parochial clergyman; but on account of the difference in religious opinions, and with a wish to facilitate a scriptural education for the whole body, it might be expedient to exclude commentary from the schools.

N^o 9.—I would that such could be adopted generally; but as I am apprehensive it cannot, for obvious reasons, I hold to my opinion, to exclude explanation by the master during school hours.

N^{os} 10, 11.—I must again repeat, that for expediency sake, and for the purpose of making the system of education as comprehensive as possible, it might be well if the Commissioners were inclined to reject explanation altogether in school hours; but if it should prove otherwise, I doubt that such explanation could be compiled as would meet the assent of the various denominations interested in this great object; under any circumstances, I could not at all give my concurrence, until I had seen the work alluded to.

N^o 12.—I do not know of any explanation that would be of service in schools constituted as I have pre-supposed.

N^{os} 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21.—Having already delivered my opinion as to the inexpediency of introducing explanation of the sacred text in mixed schools; yet if it is peremptorily demanded of me, whether I am acquainted with any explanation which is calculated to improve youth in the Scripture, or of any mode how such an explanation can be composed or compiled for that purpose; I answer yes, I do. The Abbé Fleury's abridged Historical Catechism for the Old Testament, as sold at Mrs. Watson's, Capel-street, Dublin; and an extract from Cotter's Questions on the four Gospels, and the Acts of the Holy Apostles, both to be corrected and abridged. I am fully convinced, that any work approved of by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, would be not only unexceptionable but profitable; yet not having seen the book alluded to, I cannot, from myself, pronounce as to its merits. As far as Protestants of the established, and Protestants of the Presbyterian church are engaged, I do not think such an object as is contemplated in N^o 19, would be impracticable, perhaps not difficult. If such a work was recommended, perhaps six would be a sufficient number.

N^o 22.—Most certainly.

N^o 23.—Very many.

N^{os} 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31.—His Grace the Archbishop of Dublin has so fully and entirely expressed my opinion on the Act of Henry VIII. that I need not add a single observation to his excellent comment.

N^{os} 32, 33.—I perfectly concur with Grace the Archbishop of Dublin, in his answers to these questions.

N^{os} 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39.—The Sunday School Society has laboured with such industry and universal profit in this most excellent work, that I would be most reluctant to take the business out of their hands altogether; I would give to this society increased facilities and funds if such were requisite; and I would require of the parochial clergy to preside in the Sunday schools in their respective parishes, and to select such teachers as they may deem proper, to further the work of instruction. The clergyman's discretion must always decide upon the times and places, for the performance of this duty; and for the instruction of the Protestant children in the church catechism.

I do not see the objection to laymen teaching within the walls of the church.

N^o 40.—I altogether concur in the answer given to this question by his Grace the Archbishop of Dublin.

N^o 41.—I concur with the Archbishop of Dublin, that from choice I would not select schoolmasters from the Roman Catholic communion; but looking to the education of the Irish people generally, I do not think it would be expedient to exclude Roman Catholic schoolmasters altogether; yet I must be understood, that throughout all my answers, the Scriptures are to be bonâ fide read in the schools, and that no commentary is admissible.

N^o 42.—I would prefer Protestant masters always.

N^o 43.—If the Roman Catholic master already in the school should be qualified, I would not think it profitable to add a Protestant master, merely for the sake of check, nor do I see it necessary under my specified regulations.

N^o 44.—Under the system that I have recommended by my answers, progress has been made in general education without separating the children, but I speak only of Connaught to which province my experience is confined.

N^{os} 45, 46, 47.—Both systems, in my opinion, are exceptionable; I do not approve of rival masters under the same roof, nor do I approve of distinct schools for Protestants and Roman Catholics; the one would generate strife, the other division; adopting the mode of instruction I have ventured to assume throughout all my answers, of an education founded upon the Word of God, a well devised and well regulated system of inspection would obviate every mischief apprehended or contemplated in these questions. I recommend such a system from an experience of its utility, and I am willing to communicate the details of such a measure if required by the Commissioners.

N^{os} 48, 49.—Certainly I would approve of none that was to be used as a substitute for the Scriptures; I must adhere to my decided preference of the authorized version, and could sanction none other; but as I am fully aware, that before children can be advanced to the reading of the Scriptures preparatory books are requisite, I could have no possible objection to such simple extracts from the Bible being compiled, either in spelling books, or in a harmony as might be deemed useful to facilitate the children in their progress toward the ultimate and grand object, the reading of the Scriptures themselves; and here I have to observe, that I have seen an Harmony of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles approved of by Dr. Troy for the use of schools, and printed by Blenkinsop in 1817, printer to the Roman Catholic college at Maynooth; it went through two editions, and this book has my approbation, as a book preparatory to the reading of the Scriptures.

N^o 50.—If the Douay version, first published at Rheims, with notes, is the work alluded to, I think the notes are not to be tolerated; as to the text, it is also erroneous, but not altogether, so as to preclude extracts from it being used with profit.

N^o 51.—Never admitting for a moment that these extracts, under whatever name they might assume, should be a substitute for the Scripture; it may be, that the title proposed might be preferable.

N^{os} 52, 53, 54.—The Archbishop of Dublin's answers to those questions are so conclusive, that I need only add, if in these proposed extracts any controverted passages were introduced, I am clearly of opinion, that the authorized version should be scrupulously adhered to, but I see no objection to a faithful harmony of the Gospels, as auxiliary to the reading of the Scriptures in the schools. I have not seen the book referred to, but as described in the question it must be inadmissible.

N^o 55.—Most certainly.

N^o 56.—I think with the Archbishop of Dublin entirely.

N^{os} 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64.—I do not regret the opportunity thus afforded, again and again to declare, until by frequent repetition it almost grows into a proverb, that it is an education founded upon the Holy Scriptures to which I can give my support and concurrence; I think I can discover the tendency of these questions, and I sincerely deplore it; in the Scriptures only is the standard of eternal truth, and in them is to be found the only adequate corrective for the immorality, superstition, darkness and turbulence which has cursed Ireland since its connection with Great Britain; her population requires the restrictive principles which the sanctions of the Bible can alone produce; the Almighty has given the whole as necessary for his responsible creatures, and hath directed us to keep back nothing, but to communicate his whole counsel to them; and who or what are we, to mutilate and garble the testaments of his word, or to accommodate their sacredness to the paltry passions and prejudices of very mistaken men?—I, for one, will not venture upon a proceeding so rash and presumptuous; and when I observe what has been effected within the last 20 years, by the pious exertions of the clergy, the resident gentry of Ireland, and the many useful societies, both national and otherwise, to spread the blessings of gospel education; when I observe the benefits produced, not only to the young, but to the adult and the aged population, through the medium of such schools; when I know and can testify what a kind reciprocity has been marked out by their means between the elevated and low, and how the children under education, and required to be educated, have established an extension of tenderness and charity in the one, and duty and affection in the other, I would hesitate at the boldness of breaking such a bond of communion, the inevitable consequence, if a system other than scriptural shall be forced upon us.

It is the Gospel, and the love of it, which has created and still animates this intercourse and interchange; take away the Gospel, and the genial current is checked, and returns frozen and lifeless to the heart.

To such a system I could not lend myself, nor could I conscientiously require the clergy placed under my controul to do so, and I am still sanguine in hope (notwithstanding the ominous breathing of the questions before me) that the Parliament of the united empire, King, Lords and Commons, will never countenance any measure, however recommended by a specious plausibility (and least of all a compulsory one) in any sort tending to depreciate the Bible, either by subtracting from its pages or corrupting its text, spread over as it is with the sacredness and sanctity of the Lord, and incorporated as it is in our own authorized version upon the statute law of the realm.

Examination of the Most Reverend Dr. Murray, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin; of the Most Reverend Dr. Kelly, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Tuam; and of the Right Reverend Dr. Doyle, Roman Catholic Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, on Oath; Thursday, 14th April 1825.

IN the course of the last summer, the Commissioners had occasion to inspect very many schools in many parts of Ireland, and in many of them they found, that the children of the Roman Catholic persuasion had been withdrawn, in consequence of the interference of the respective priests; was the interference of the priests at all, in your opinion, connected with the appointment of this commission; and were the children withdrawn in any parts of the country, more or less, on that account?—(Dr. Murray.)—I am not aware of any case in which the children have been withdrawn in consequence of the appointment of this commission.

Dr. Doyle,

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Are you aware of any instances in Connaught, of the children being withdrawn in consequence of the appointment of this commission?—I have known no instance of it whatever; it has been quite otherwise. Since this commission has sat, children have been permitted in my part of the country, to continue at schools from which they would have been withdrawn but for my recommendation and the suggestions of many of the clergy; matters were recommended to remain as they were, until the report of this commission should be made public.

If any one has surmised that there were general orders which emanated from the Roman Catholic bishops of Ireland, immediately prior to, or contemporaneous with, or subsequent to the appointment of this commission, simultaneously to withdraw their children from schools in which scriptural education was allowed, such surmise was founded on misconception and error?—So I conceive.

(To Dr. Murray.)—Is it known to you, that the exertions which were made to withdraw the children from the schools, took place to a greater extent in the course of last summer than they had heretofore?—I have already mentioned that I was not aware of any case in which children had been withdrawn within my jurisdiction during the last summer.

(To Dr. Doyle.)—Is that your impression with respect to your diocese?—From what description of schools?

From any description of schools in which the scriptural plan of education was pursued?—They were withdrawn from several of such schools from other causes; but they have not been withdrawn from any school in my diocese in consequence of the appointment of the commission; on the contrary, I think the attendance of the children at such schools since that period, has rather increased than diminished.

The question is, whether subsequent to the appointment of this commission, whether in consequence of it or not, there has been any increased exertion on the part of the Roman Catholic priests in Ireland to withdraw the children?—Subsequently to the appointment of this commission, I was myself led to use exertions to have children removed from schools connected with the London Hibernian Society, but those exertions had no connection with the appointment of this commission; I looked on the schools very quietly, which were frequented by children of my communion subsequent to the appointment of the commission, and much more so than I would have done had not the commission been appointed; for in that case, I would have felt myself called upon to use more exertions than I did; for this reason, that having petitioned Parliament during the last session, to adopt some measure for giving a generally improved system of education to the poor of Ireland, had I found that Parliament and the Government were totally regardless of our prayer on that subject, I should have felt myself bound to consider them as tacitly approving the system which was in operation; and feeling so, I should have felt myself called upon to use increased exertion to withdraw children from a system in which, in my opinion, not only individuals who could do evil were engaged, but to which the government itself freely lent its aid; finding, however, that a commission had been appointed, my views were changed, and I resolved to pursue the plan I had adopted three or four years ago, and quietly waiting till the result was known, act then as circumstances might dictate.

(To Dr. Murray.)—Has a different course been pursued in the district under your observation?—I was not aware of children having been withdrawn during the last summer, more than at any former period.

Is not the objection generally taken to the attendance of the children, on schools in which the Testament is read without note and comment?—Yes, it is.

And that, whether they are under the inspection of the London Hibernian, or any other society?—There is an objection to it under whatever society the school is placed.

The London Hibernian Society require, that the children shall not only read the Testament, and read the Testament as a common school book, but also that the children shall get portions of the Testament by heart, which portions are to be selected by officers of that Society. The Kildare-street Society require, that the Testament shall be read, but it allows the patrons of the schools to select the passages which shall be read, and to appoint the periods at which they shall be read, and do not require that the book shall be used as a school book; do you not consider that the Kildare-street regulations may, by possibility, be so acted upon as not to be inconsistent with the discipline of the Roman Catholic church; and do you conceive, that the Hibernian Society's principles can be so acted upon?—The system of the Hibernian Society cannot be reconciled with our discipline; with respect to the Kildare-street Society, it may in some places be less obnoxious than others. There are cases in which schools may derive advantage from the Kildare-place Society with less danger than others, and that is where the patron is a Catholic, and where the school is under the superintendence in some degree of a Catholic clergyman, who will deem it his duty to select the passages of Scripture to be read to the children, and not to allow any unfair interpretation to be put upon those passages, and at the same time will have opportunities of giving religious instruction to the children out of school hours. At the same time it is fair to say, that our objections to the Kildare-street Society have of late greatly increased, since we learned its connection with other societies; the object of which is avowedly to proselytise, and since it has avowed itself to be, though not in name, in reality a proselytising society, by putting forward a principle which we hold to be erroneous, and endeavouring to enforce that principle with Catholic children. In the instructions which it gave to its inspectors, I think last September, one of its fundamental principles is there acknowledged to be, that the sacred Scriptures be read in all the schools to which it communicates aid, "that the children who thus read may become acquainted with the " principles

"principles of the Christian religion;" that is, of course, that each child in inspecting the sacred volume, may select such principles of religious faith and practice as he may think he can there discover; and that, by private judgment, with an almost total absence of culture of mind, and before his reason has arrived at maturity. That this child is in this state to make out his religious belief, and practise from the sacred volume, is a principle which we conceive to be erroneous; and as long as that principle is affirmed by the Kildare-street Society, so long we must endeavour to oppose its diffusion. At the same time there are cases as already mentioned, in which it is less injurious than others; where the school-master is a Catholic, and a Catholic priest has an opportunity of attending under the circumstances to which I have referred.

In the district about Dublin, have exertions been constantly made by the respective Roman Catholic priests to prevent the children from attending the schools, or have they been more particularly made at one time than another?—Not more particularly at one time than another; there are very few schools in the diocese of Dublin that are patronized by clergymen, and are at the same time in connection with the Kildare-street Society. I know there have been cases where certain schools have been represented as in connection with the Kildare-street Society, which I believe have not been at all in connection with it; I will mention a fact; a few years ago, reading over the report of the Society, I found, in the list of schools which had derived aid from that Society, the Nuns of North William-street, in Dublin, and the Monks of Hanover-street, in Dublin; I was greatly surprised at this, and I enquired what was the nature of the aid communicated to them; I found, that the ladies whom I first mentioned had sent to purchase some slate pencils at the shop of the Society; and with regard to the other institution, I found that some placards had been purchased at a higher price than they could have been bought for elsewhere, not perhaps at the time, because there were none to be had; but I found this opinion on a statement which was shortly afterwards made to me:—A person of the name of Murphy, a printer, told me that this Society was deriving public aid for the loss it was supposed to sustain in giving those placards under first cost; "whereas really," says he, "at the price at which they are sold, the transaction would yield a very handsome profit; they are sold at 13s. or 13s. 4d. a set, now I could execute them at half that price; and as a proof that I could, I will print some at a lower price than that;" he did do so; he printed his placards, consisting as he said of the same matter, in the same type, and on the same paper, and sold them for half a guinea a set, acknowledging that he had a very handsome profit; afterwards it appeared, that the Society reduced the prices of their placards to something like 6s. 10d. This was his statement.

By placards do you mean the papers usually fixed on pasteboard, and used by the children for learning to spell and read?—Yes; this was the only aid I could find that the other institution derived from the Society, though it was entered as having derived assistance.

Is the Hanover-street school one which derives support from Mr. Rice, of Waterford?—It is in connection with his institute.

Do you recollect in what year this was reported?—I do not recollect the year.

Has any thing similar occurred since?—I do not recollect.

Was any representation made to the Society of the incorrectness of that insertion?—Not by me.

Are the exertions that have been made by the Roman Catholic priests, which the Commissioners understand to have taken place generally throughout Ireland, to prevent the children attending the scriptural schools, made in consequence of a common agreement between the Roman Catholic clergy, or does each individual act upon his own authority?—Each individual bishop acts upon his own authority in his own district; but the feeling seems to be pretty general to oppose the system of the Kildare-street Society wherever a school is not under a Catholic patron, or wherever the Catholic priests have not access.

Did the objection to the plan adopted by the Kildare-street Society, exist in as great a degree at its first institution as it has since, and does now?—I cannot speak as to degrees, but I think there was always a very general opposition to it.—(Doctor Doyle.) For the first few years they established very few schools, and the attempts made by their agents to proselytise, if made at all, were scarcely observed; it was only when their system began to extend itself generally through the country that it excited attention, and an opposition was commenced to it wherever we found it attended with danger. For the first few years it remained unnoticed; I think that during five years from its first establishment, the number of schools connected with it were very few indeed.

In the district with which you are best acquainted, are there many of the Kildare-street schools that are in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—There were a good many, but that connection, as it affected us, has been dissolved; because, during my visitation last autumn, I desired that the children might be withdrawn from those schools, and they were consequently withdrawn; I also desired that they might be withdrawn from some schools in connection with the Kildare-street Society, but I believe only in three instances, and I did so in consequence of a master, who had been a Catholic, having been removed.

The question was, whether there are many schools in connection both with the London Hibernian Society, and the Kildare-street Society, in the district with which you are acquainted?—I do not so much enquire with respect to the schools in connection with the Hibernian Society, whether they were or not in connection with the Kildare-street Society; it was quite sufficient to excite my hostility against them, that they were in connection with the London Hibernian Society; those in connection with the Kildare-street Society I did not so much object to, but rather tolerated them.

Examination of
Dr. Murray,
Dr. Kelly,
and
Dr. Doyle.
14 April 1825.

By the Hibernian Society do you mean the London Hibernian Society?—I do; the Baptist Society is another, which has some schools under its protection; and there is also the Society for discountenancing Vice, which gives aid; to all those schools I am particularly hostile; to the Kildare-street Society I had not been so hostile, wherever (as Dr. Murray states) the schools were so circumstanced, as that I had not any ground for alarm; but I required, in all those schools, that the master should be a Catholic, or that he should have a Catholic assistant; and I observed, that I did cause the children to be withdrawn from some schools where this regulation (which I published in the year 1821) was not observed; for instance, at Fennagh, in the county of Carlow, there had been a Catholic master, who, for some fault, as I suppose, was dismissed from his situation, and a Protestant appointed to succeed him; the matter was reported to me, and I directed the priest to have the children withdrawn from the school, and they were accordingly withdrawn. The patron finding the school nearly deserted procured a Catholic master, and I permitted the children to return. There was another instance, of somewhat a similar kind, in the neighbourhood of Stradbally. Mr. Cosby, of Stradbally Hall, wished to establish a school in connection with the Kildare-place Society, and intended to appoint, as the master of it, a person who was a Protestant; I wrote to him, not having been able to meet him at home, requesting he would either appoint a Catholic master, as the children who were to frequent the school were all Catholics, or if not, to give to the Protestant master a Catholic assistant; he declined doing so, and in consequence, I desired that none of the children might be sent to it, and they were not; the master was employed elsewhere, and a school was provided where the children now attend. There was another school immediately in the village of Stradbally, also in connection with that Society, from which I caused the children to be also withdrawn, because Mr. Cosby, in like manner, refused to appoint a Catholic assistant to a Protestant master, who was there; that rule had been adopted by me, and published in the year 1821, and expressed the conditions which alone would induce me to sanction schools in connection with the Kildare-street Society; and whenever I found that those conditions had been deviated from, I directed the children to be withdrawn. I make these observations, because children have, at my desire, ceased to attend a good many schools during the last year, and I mention the causes to shew that the withdrawing of them was not the result of the appointment of this commission, or in any way connected with it.

Have the goodness to state whether the efforts that have been used under your direction, and with your authority, to withdraw the children from the schools, have been at the time, and have afterwards continued to be successful, or whether, in spite of your desire, the children have attended?—In every instance where I recommend the children to be withdrawn, they are withdrawn. They never return to a school until it is communicated to the people by the priests, in my name or in their own, that they may safely send their children to the school; for the people look to us as the judges of what is safe or not safe for them in matters of religion; and when we point out to them the dangers which attend the sending of their children to a certain school, they immediately withdraw them, and in more haste sometimes than we would wish; for they very often do it in such a hurried way as to give offence to their landlords, and we would wish they should do it gradually; but the people always go before us in their zeal. I have not known a single instance where children of our persuasion remained in a school after it was intimated to them in public to withdraw from it; or if there have been instances, they have been so few as not to have excited my attention.

You mentioned Mr. Cosby; he is in general very much respected by the Roman Catholics, is he not?—He is a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest respect.

And of the benevolence of whose personal views there can be no doubt?—Not the least. There was another school I now recollect in that neighbourhood, where the only teacher was a Protestant, and, on my visitation last year, I did not notice it; but the reason was, it was under the protection of a nobleman who at that time was in England; and as that nobleman is particularly benevolent and kind, and a personage for whom I entertain the most sincere regard, I did not like to interfere in his absence with his school, but rather to await a more favourable opportunity. That was the only school in my diocese brought under my observation which I passed over, if I except one other on the estate of the Earl Fitzwilliam, in the county of Wicklow. There I found that the Protestant schoolmaster and the immediate patron had a dispute, and there was a probability of the former being removed; at all events, the state of the school, as represented to me, was rather disturbed, and I thought it better to pass it over, hoping that in the new arrangement matters might be put into a state to which I should have no objection.

You explained that the children are very readily withdrawn from the schools on your expressing a desire that it should be done; do you know that fact beyond the limits of your own district, or was it principally to your own district you referred?—I spoke principally of the district with which I am personally acquainted, and with which I am so intimately connected; but I can say, generally, that what I state of my own diocese, would be true with regard to the dioceses to the south of me, with which I am best acquainted; such, for instance, as the diocese of Ossory, the diocese of Ferns, the diocese of Waterford and Lismore, and I should think throughout the south. I know very little of the north or west of Ireland, but of Leinster and the south I know a good deal.

Have you collected, in point of fact, that the withdrawing of children from schools in the province of Ulster, has been at all of the description you apply to your own diocese?—I know so little of the province of Ulster, that I do not wish to give any opinion regarding it.

AG1
 Examination of
 Dr. Murray,
 Dr. Kelly,
 and
 Dr. Doyle,
 14 April 1825.

If you should be informed that, in point of fact, there has been scarcely any individual of the Roman Catholic children throughout the province of Ulster withdrawn from the schools of the Association for discountenancing Vice, or the Kildare-street Society, or the London Hibernian Society, could you credit that statement?—From the depressed state of the Catholics in the north, and their inability to have schools wherein their own children can be educated in the manner they would wish, I should think that they might suffer, to a certain extent, abuses which in other countries we would not look at silently for a single day.

Do you feel a confident persuasion that there has been a universal withdrawing of the children of the county of Sligo or Mayo?—The only thing I know of Sligo is, that I saw some time ago in the newspaper a series of resolutions, to which were affixed the name of the Roman Catholic bishop in Sligo, with those of several clergymen in that neighbourhood; and, in those resolutions, they gave a formal contradiction, as I understood it, to what had been reported by the agents of the London Hibernian Society regarding the number of children who frequented their schools. That is the only matter which came to my knowledge regarding Sligo, or the neighbourhood of Sligo, to which I would pay attention; for any other matters which I might state rest only on report.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Is it your impression that the Roman Catholic children are at this moment, in point of fact, universally withdrawn from schools of the description now under consideration, throughout the province of Connaught; for instance, first the county of Sligo?—With respect to the county of Sligo, the only answer I can give, (having no personal knowledge of what passes in Sligo) is, that I met the Right Reverend Dr. Burke, the co-adjutor Bishop of Elphin, on the 13th of March last. We had some conversation on the subject of education. He mentioned to me, that there were efforts made to induce children of the Roman Catholic persuasion to go to these London Hibernian Society schools, and to schools under the patronage of the Kildare-street Society, but that he was perfectly satisfied with his success in withdrawing them from those schools.

You understand him as asserting that he has, in fact, cleared such schools of Roman Catholic children?—Yes, I do. There may be some individual exceptions; but, generally speaking, he considers that he has been completely successful in withdrawing them from those schools.

Did he refer to that period, or an antecedent period?—That period.

Do you know what the fact is in the county of Leitrim?—I cannot speak as to Leitrim.

Can you speak to the neighbourhood of Tuam?—I can.

Referring particularly to Castlebar, do you conceive, during the last summer, the Roman Catholic children were withdrawn from the schools of the London Hibernian Society in that town?—Yes, I understand that to be the fact.

Is it your impression, that there were in the month of August no Roman Catholic children in the London Hibernian schools in that town?—I conceive very few.

Do you conceive that any of the Commissioners can have seen so many as 50 in a school in that place?—My impression is, that there were not so many Catholic children.

Do you conceive there were 20?—I conceive not.

Is it your impression, that the school at Castleblakeney was equally cleared of the children of Roman Catholic parents?—I cannot speak to that with the same precision; but, with respect to the school at Castleblakeney, I have an impression upon my mind, that the proprietor of the soil, Mr. Blakeney, has established a school there; that he uses every influence he possibly can with his tenantry to send their children to the school. I understand the Roman Catholic bishop came to Castleblakeney; that he wished to get admittance into the school to see whether there were any Roman Catholic children of that parish or neighbourhood frequenting the school; and, if I am rightly informed, the master, on observing the Roman Catholic bishop advance towards the door, closed it against him, and would not allow him to enter; and when he was reproached afterwards for his rudeness, he said he acted under the direction of Mr. Blakeney.

Does your information extend to whether the Roman Catholic bishop offered any recommendation to the inhabitants of Castleblakeney as to sending their children any longer to that school where such rudeness was offered to him?—I have been informed there were general directions given by him to the Roman Catholics not to allow their children to attend that school.

Does your information extend as to how far that recommendation was successful?—I cannot say how far he succeeded in it; I understand Mr. Blakeney, by force of threats, compels his tenantry to send their children to such schools, very much against their inclination; but, through a dread of their landlord, they sometimes acquiesce.

Have you ever heard of any act of severity on Mr. Blakeney's part, for declining to comply with his supposed wishes?—I cannot recollect any instance in which he has carried his threats into effect; but I know he has a school in his own farm-yard, at Abbert, and that he induces his tenantry to send their children to it. I know that, by my directions, the Roman Catholic priest of the parish wished to gain admittance into the farm-yard, to see how the school was conducted, and that Mr. Blakeney refused him admittance.

How far does Mr. Blakeney live from Castleblakeney?—I should think about twelve miles. The school I have been last alluding to is contiguous to Mr. Blakeney's house.

Is that school in connection with any of the societies?—I understand Mr. Blakeney's school is in connection with the London Hibernian Society and the Kildare-street Society.

Is it your impression, that landlords, if they chose to exert such an influence as you have been describing, would in general succeed against similar efforts of the Roman Catholic

Examination of

Dr. Kelly,
and
Dr. Doyle,
14 April 1825.

Catholic clergy?—Not in general; I know that in other parts of the country similar attempts have been made, and have proved unsuccessful.

Is it your impression, that the scriptural schools in the town of Ballinasloe have been deserted by Roman Catholic children?—I can only speak of those schools from hearsay; I understand they are not so much frequented as they have been.

Is it your impression, that they are, and have been, during the last summer, pretty full of Roman Catholic children?—Yes; I believe a good many Roman Catholic children frequent them.

Are they in connection with the London Hibernian Society?—I understand they are.

Do you attribute the attendance of the children to the influence of the landlord?—To the influence of the landlord, or rather the means resorted to by the clergyman, the Reverend Dr. Trench.

Does your information enable you to state, with respect to the province of Munster generally, and the county of Cork particularly, how far the Roman Catholic clergy have succeeded or failed in clearing the London Hibernian schools in that part of Ireland?—I cannot speak as to that part of Ireland; I am not acquainted with it.

You have two considerable schools at Westport under your own direction?—Yes; a male and a female school.

Those schools are very numerously attended?—They are.

Are there not some Hibernian Society schools in the neighbourhood of Westport?—There are.

From what you have heard of those schools, do you believe those schools to be so well attended?—Not by any means so well attended as ours.

When you mention that the Hibernian schools are not in general attended by Roman Catholics, do you make that observation subject to particular exceptions?—There are particular exceptions; I speak generally, that the Roman Catholic children do not attend those schools; I believe there are individual exceptions.

You have at Westport two schools under your own superintendence?—Yes.

Your schools are in connection with the Kildare-street Society?—The gentlemen of that Committee are in connection, to a certain extent, with the Kildare-street Society; the committee who have the care of the schools are exclusively Roman Catholics, they have acceded to the wishes of the Kildare-street Society, so far as to admit a version of the Douay Testament, without note or comment, being used in that school, but it is not used or read except under the immediate direction of the Roman Catholic clergyman.

But it is read?—Yes; occasionally passages of it are read.

Can you state how much it is read, and to what extent it is read?—My directions to the Roman Catholic clergyman, with respect to reading the Scripture in those schools, are that the Gospels and Epistles of the following Sunday, or of the holidays which may occur, be read in the course of the week by such scholars as have made a suitable proficiency.

Is the reading limited to that, or is there not a larger range given to the master and mistress?—They may perhaps take a larger range, but this is the rule I have laid down for them.

Supposing it should be found, in point of fact, that the Gospels and Acts should be read in succession by direction of the clergyman, is that against your pleasure?—It is not, to my knowledge.

Do you think it improper, the clergyman having given that permission?—I should disapprove of the clergyman giving permission to the master to select the portion of Scripture to be read by the scholars; I wish the clergyman to make the selection.

Has he gone beyond your views in that respect?—Yes; the master has not followed my views.

Are the Commissioners to collect, that you think it improper for the children to read through the Gospels and the Acts?—Without explanation, I think it is improper; I think no portions of Scripture ought to be read without being accompanied with appropriate explanation and instruction.

There is a very handsome Roman Catholic school in your own city of Tuam?—There is.

Is it in connection with the Kildare-street Society?—Not at present.

Has it received any of their money?—It has received 50*l*.

How came the connection to be dis severed?—The connection was dis severed in consequence of a report made by one of the inspectors of the Kildare-street Society, that the Scriptures were not so generally read as the regulations of the Kildare-street Society required. The secretary of the Tuam committee replied, that the Scripture would not be made use of in the schools under any other regulations, except those pointed out by the Roman Catholic clergy.

How many copies of the Scriptures were in the schools at the time that answer was given?—I am not aware whether there was more than one in each school.

Was there even one copy in each school at the time that answer was sent?—Certainly.

How many children were in attendance on each school?—From 250 to 300; sometimes 180 in both.

Have the goodness to describe how often in the week the Scriptures were employed in the schools at the time that answer was given?—It entirely depended upon the clergyman being at leisure.

Is it your impression, that the Scriptures were read more than once a week at that time?—Once or twice a week.

Are

and
Dr. Doyle,
14 April 1825.

Are you sure it went beyond once a week?—Yes; I am sure it went to the extent of twice a week.

Are you aware whether the committee were, under your directions, guided by the Roman Catholic clergyman as to the extent of the portions of Scripture read in that school?—I left it to the discretion of the curate of the parish, to regulate the portion to be read.

Did the clergyman on that occasion read to the children, or the children to the clergyman?—The clergyman got them to read.

The children read out of the volume of the New Testament?—Yes.

Under all the circumstances you have stated, the managers of the Tuam school feel no difficulty as to retaining the 50*l.* that they obtained from the Kildare-street Society?—They do not feel that they have in the slightest degree deviated from their original proposition to the Kildare-street Society. In reply to the queries sent by that Society, they stated that select portions of the Sacred Scriptures should be read without note or comment in the school; those select portions of the Sacred Scripture, without note or comment, either oral or written, were read by the scholars in the manner I have explained, and therefore they did conceive that they perfectly complied with the conditions proposed by them when they got the 50*l.*

Do you consider their compliance a nominal or a substantial compliance?—I feel that the Society, in giving the 50*l.* were aware that the Scripture would not be read, but under the direction of the Roman Catholic clergyman.

You feel that there has been a substantial compliance with the rules of the Kildare-street Society, in the school of Tuam?—Yes, as far as I have stated.

Have you heard that one of the Members of this Board, who visited the school at Tuam with respect to which you have been now examined, expressed particular approbation of the manner in which the children read the Testament, and the perfect understanding they appeared to have of it?—I have heard with great pleasure one of the Commissioners, Mr. Grant, express in January last, that he was highly pleased with the manner in which the Scriptures were read in his presence, by the higher class in the Tuam school.

Although it was read from one copy of the Testament, which was in the school, passing from hand to hand?—Yes.

Have the goodness to state the parts of Ireland which are comprehended within your district, does it extend to the whole of the diocese of Tuam?—The whole of the diocese of Tuam, consisting of part of the county of Galway, and part of the county of Mayo.

In so large a district have you much personal acquaintance with the state of the several schools?—I have, and particularly with reference to the Catholic schools.

Are there many schools in that arch-diocese not connected with either of these societies?—There are.

Are there many schools supported by the assistance of the London Hibernian Society in that district?—I understand there are some schools in the arch-diocese of Tuam; one at Castlebar; one at Westport; one at Annadown, and some more which I do not recollect.

Any under Roman Catholic patrons?—Only one at Annadown; it is under a Roman Catholic patron, and conducted by a Roman Catholic master.

Are the children permitted to attend at that school?—They are.

Is that school also in connection with the Kildare-street Society?—I am not aware that it is.

Do you know whether the rules of the London Hibernian Society are strictly followed in that school?—I know that they are not.

Have they any other books in it than the Testament, and the spelling book?—The master allows them to bring what books they think proper.

Is the catechism taught there?—It is regularly.

Do they commit portions of the Scripture to memory?—I am not aware that they do.

Is there any other school under the London Hibernian Society, in the same situation as the one you have described?—No, I do not know of any other school under that Society, which is attended by Catholics.

Do you know how the masters got paid in that case?—I have heard that an inspector from the London Hibernian Society, visits the school at stated periods; the scholars read a portion of the Scripture in the presence of this inspector, and this entitles the master to get his salary.

They do not repeat by heart, but merely read?—No.

Can you state in what manner the hedge schools, unconnected with any societies or local patrons, and in which the children pay for their education, are supplied with books?—The parents of the children provide them with books.

Is it your impression that those books are of such a kind as ought to be approved of, or are there very frequently books of a licentious and immoral and improper description, to be found amongst them?—I have made it my business within the last two years, particularly since I heard this reproach brought against Roman Catholic schools, to make the strictest inquiry respecting the books used in those schools, and I could not discover that throughout the whole extent of the arch-diocese of Tuam, there was an immoral or obscene book made use of, except in two instances.

During the whole of the last two years?—Yes.

Did you know of any lives of robbers or highwaymen being found among those books?—No, the clergymen would consider such books as very improper for schools.

Examination of
Dr. Murray,
Dr. Kelly,
and
Dr. Doyle,
14 April 1825.

Is it your impression that such books do not exist in the schools in Ireland, and have not existed within the last two years?—Just so.

Do you think they have ever been prevalent in those schools?—Not within my time, I could not learn that they had been.

(To Dr. Doyle.)—Is that your impression with respect to your part of Ireland?—During the last year, I made particular inquiries as to whether there were any immoral books in schools of that description, in my diocese; and I discovered that there was one, and that was in the town of Ballynakill: it was brought to the school in that town by a child, the son of a Protestant parent who had come to reside in Ballynakill, from the diocese of Ossory, some short time before; that was the only book of an immoral import or tendency, which to my knowledge, could be found in the schools in my diocese.

Your clergy reported upon the circumstance, whether those books were in the schools or not?—They did.

In consequence of special directions from you, did they make that search?—I should rather call them general than special directions; it was about the time, or my inquiries were simultaneous, I believe, with the issuing of the forms of returns by the Commissioners; and I met the clergy at conferences, where they told me the result of their inquiries; but in addition to this, I desired that the returns made to the Commissioners from each parish should be copied, and a fair copy of each sent to me; all these returns I have received, and the greater part of them I have perused, and what I have now stated I collected as much from the copies of returns sent to me, as from the oral communications.

Speaking to the communications made to you upon this subject, should you say that the schools in that part of Ireland, have been equally free from those noxious books?—I think when I was a boy they were not so free from those noxious books.

Do you conceive they were as free five or six years ago, as they are at this period?—I have no reason to think there were immoral books in our schools five or six years ago, but it is possible, there may have been, for I know when I was a boy, there were such books in schools.

Are you acquainted with the books which have been prepared by the Kildare-street Society, for the general reading of their scholars?—Yes; I have seen copies of all of them, or at least of a very considerable number of them.

Have you examined them?—I have looked through every one of them that came into my hands.

Do you think they are well adapted for the purposes of general instruction, setting aside religious instruction?—Singularly well; their spelling book I think an admirable compilation, and their little books in general very good; there are I think one or two of them which fell into my hands, which had extracts from Scripture; those extracts were taken from a version of the Scripture which we do not approve of, and therefore on that ground alone I object to them; I do not say that the passages introduced were not objectionable, inasmuch as taken separately, they might imply a doctrine contrary to that which the context would warrant, or which our church holds; a man might very easily select a series of passages from Scripture, which would go to convey every thing blasphemous, and impious, and abominable.

Do your observations apply to a volume of Extracts that was printed as having received the approbation of Doctor Troy?—Those I have seen, to those I object, but perhaps I have also seen—(I am not quite clear as to my recollection)—I may have seen other extracts also.

Have you seen the book of the London Hibernian Society?—I have seen two books of theirs, both of them small-sized, and to both of those I object.

Have the goodness to state the nature of your objections to those books?—In both of those, but particularly in the second, I found extracts from the Scriptures, one of which I consider as mutilated; I found copious extracts from the Psalms, and there can be scarcely any extracts from the Psalms, from the authorized version, to which I would not object; but what I objected to chiefly, was the canon of the Sacred Scripture, which was there given with the list of the apocryphal books; as there are some books put among the apocryphal which I believe to be canonical; that I consider to be a very material error; I also found in one of them the Lord's Prayer, as it is used in the Established church, and with an addition which I conceive not to have been annexed to it by our Lord, and in a form of prayer which I appreciate so highly, I should not like that a single word were added or taken away; therefore I would object to any book which had that prayer in that form; those are the objections which occur to me at this moment.

Are you aware that the Commandments are given exactly in the same form as they stand in the authorized version of the book of Exodus?—I do not recollect that the Commandments are in those books in any form; but if they be, I am confident that they are in that form which is authorized by the Established church, and to that form I would, and do object, because I conceive that it is not warranted by the Scripture itself, for the first commandment, according to the form prescribed by the Established church, is divided into two, and we are prohibited by that, from making any image of any thing in heaven, or upon the earth, or in the waters, and they omit what should follow, "to adore or worship;" they place a full stop after the commandment, not to make images, so that according to the doctrine of the Established church, it appears to me, that God has expressly prohibited the making of all statues and images and pictures, for whatever purpose or end soever; now that is not the intent or meaning of God's commandment, according to our opinion, but the meaning of it is this: that we shall not make to ourselves any graven thing or image of any matter, whether in heaven or upon earth, or in the waters, or bow before the same, or worship worship it; the latter part being placed as it is in the form of the commandment of the Established church, makes it quite objectionable to me.

Surely you do not mean that the words are omitted in the Protestant second commandment: "thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them?"—I conceive there is a full stop after the order, not to make the image.

Your objection is to the full stop, but not to the omission of any words?—I have no objection to a catechism which will express, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven thing (for thing it ought to be, and not image), of what is in the heavens, or on the earth, or in the water, to bow down and worship it.

To worship it as a Deity?—Yes.

Are you to be understood to say, that the stop so put, affects the sense in such a way as to mislead persons in understanding the true meaning of the commandment?—I think it might mislead persons.

You are aware that the second commandment, as it stands in the catechism of the established church, which is in these words, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, nor the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth: Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them, for I, the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, and visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation, of them that hate me, and shew mercy unto thousands in them that love me, and keep my commandments;" is taken verbatim from the authorized version of the Scripture?—Yes, I believe it is.

Is there not in the Douay version of the Scriptures, a similar portion, though somewhat differently expressed?—There is.

Is that portion inserted at all in the Decalogue?—Yes; it is in our larger Roman Catholic catechism; but in those in general use we seek to abridge all the doctrines of christianity, leaving at the same time sufficient to convey to the tender mind exact notions of the truths which we wish to have conveyed to them.

In point of fact, are the children of the peasantry in Ireland, instructed in any catechism which contains any portion of the Scriptures now referred to?—We have four sizes of catechisms, the first size, the second size, and the third size, and what we call the abridgement of the Christian doctrine; in the three smaller ones, I do not find the entire words, which we find in Exodus, put down at length; but I find that the substance of them is clearly and explicitly put down in the larger or third size, and in the abridgement; but I am not certain the commandments are given at full length, except in the abridgement.

Have the goodness to state the words which you conceive convey the substances of the passages which are omitted in the smaller catechisms; are they any other but "I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt have no other God but me?"—No, I believe not; those are quite sufficient.

You consider those words as commensurate with the second commandment according to the authorized version?—Certainly, I do; for that latter part of the commandment is rather a ceremonial part than one founded upon the law of nature; the law of nature and the positive law of God, forbid idolatry, but the very making of images seems to have been prohibited to the Jewish people, on account of their propensity to idolatry; now when idolatry had ceased throughout the greater part of the earth, and the religion of Christ was established in its place, there was no necessity for inculcating that ceremonial part on a new people, who had been far removed from the revolting idea of worshipping things made by the hands of man; therefore that part which is founded on the law of nature is retained, and that part which was more ceremonial than derived from the nature of man or the wisdom of God, is left out, because no longer necessary for the new people; therefore I conceive that the commandment in its present shape, contains all the doctrine necessary to be conveyed to the people of God, in these our times; and that the addition respecting the making of images, is quite unnecessary now, as a matter of instruction in the faith.

You have spoken of a wish on the part of the Roman Catholic church to abridge as much as possible the commandments, in giving the commandments from the book of Exodus and transferring them into this catechism of which you have been speaking; have they adopted any other abridgement, than merely that in question?—They have abridged the four first; and there is an addition in the book of Exodus, as I recollect, to each of the commandments, for instance, "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage;" and "who visit the sins of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation;" and to the fourth, "Honour thy father and thy mother," is added, "that thy days may be long, &c." We have abridged even this commandment, though that promise is renewed by St. Paul.

Is not the addition to that commandment found in the book of Deuteronomy different from that given in the book of Exodus?—It is somewhat different; but the substance is the same.

You are aware of that portion of Scripture which the Protestants represent as their tenth commandment?—I am.

Is it not, in point of fact, divided into two in the Roman Catholic catechism?—And very justly.

Have the goodness to state the reason of that?—We have the seventh commandment; this seventh says, "Thou shalt not steal;" and the sixth says, "Thou shalt not commit adultery;" here God makes a distinction between that which is a man's property, and a man's wife. A man's wife, which is not to be compared with any other substance that he possesses on the earth, being so much more valuable, and so much dearer to him; the ninth and tenth with us, go to eradicate from the heart those vicious propensities which the sixth and seventh seek to restrain in action; therefore the same distinction which is observed between the goods and the wife in the sixth and seventh, is preserved between desiring the goods and desiring the wife, in the ninth and tenth.

Have the goodness to refer to the Douay version of the Bible, and see whether you have not made the same full stop as you have made the subject of disapprobation in the Protestant catechism?—(The Douay version being handed to the witness.)—I find the stop is here in the same place; but the liability to error, as it regards children, which I apprehend to exist with regard to the catechism which divides the commandment, does not exist here.

In the commandments, as given by the established church, or in the version of the established church, the commandment, "I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt have none other Gods but me," is made one substantively, and then the prohibition as to graven images, &c. is made a second and substantive commandment; whereas in the Roman Catholic church, the whole makes but one commandment; is not the objection to the division of what the Roman Catholic church holds to be but one entire commandment, if cut into two commandments an objection of this nature, that by this division the commandment appears to contemplate the making of images as a separate matter of prohibition, distinct from the injunction to worship God only; whereas by keeping the commandment together as one commandment, the whole means nothing more than this, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and serve nothing made with hands;" the latter words are to be considered as independent of the first?—I should think that is a very just view of the matter.

There is not only a full stop made, but the commandment is divided into two?—Yes, it is; and for that reason I wish to see the catechism of the established church, that I might see the arrangement, as it is a matter I have not considered for a long time.

Was your notion that a commandment which the Roman Catholic church considers and treats as one, that matter which she considers as part and parcel of the first commandment, is in the established church divided into two commandments?—Yes, that is my notion.

[The Abridgement of the Christian doctrine is handed to Dr. Doyle.]

Have the goodness to state whether the full stop you have referred to is peculiar to the authorized version?—I should be glad to see, if it were here, the catechism of the established church, for my impression is, that in it there is a full stop and a period put to the first commandment, at the adoration; and then that it forms into a second commandment, that which is in reality but a mere explication of the first commandment, and which might with more propriety be omitted, at least in small catechisms.

The question at present is, whether inasmuch as this book, called the Abridgement of the Christian Doctrine, states the commandment as follows: "Thou shalt not make to thyself a graven thing, or any similitude of that which is in heaven above or in the earth below, or of any thing in the water under the earth;" and then concludes the sentence and places a full stop, and then goes on in another sentence to say, "Thou shalt not bow down nor worship them." Whether the full stop after the word earth is not precisely the same full stop that you have objected to as improperly used in the Protestant catechism?—The stop is placed in the same place, but the division of the commandment is not the same; if I alluded to the stop particularly, my understanding was, that it terminated the commandment where it ought not to terminate it; I find that here, a full stop is placed in the same position in our version, as it is in that of the established church; but I find also, that the paragraph is not terminated, and that no second commandment could have been understood as included in it; for I find that which is called the second commandment, united with, or contained in, what follows after that first part to the conclusion, "and shewing mercy unto thousands of those that love me and keep my commandments."

Have the goodness to refer to the second commandment in the authorized prayer book, and state how it appears there?—I do not find the commandments enumerated first, second, and third; I find all this in one paragraph, and under one conclusion, "I am the Lord thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, and out of the house of bondage; thou shalt not have strange Gods before me, thou shalt not make to thyself any graven thing, or any similitude that is in the heaven above, or in the earth below, or of any thing in the water under the earth. Thou shalt not adore nor worship them, I am the Lord thy God, strong and jealous, visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, and shewing mercy to thousands of those that love me and keep my commandments." In our catechism, all which I have now recited, forms but one commandment; and I conceive, that in the catechism of the established church, it is found divided into two commandments, and it is to that I object.

Have the goodness to refer to the catechism of the established church, and state whether the Roman numeral letters, II. are not prefixed to the paragraph in question?—Yes, they are, which is precisely what I state.

Is that paragraph to which the Roman numeral letters, signifying two are prefixed, concluded by the full stop in question?—It is concluded by a full stop.

Is it by the full stop which has been the subject of the three or four preceding questions?—I should conceive, that the full stop to which I have alluded, is not understood by the Commissioner proposing the question and myself in the same way; what I understood by it at that time is, that this full stop implied a division of the commandment which ought to be united, and I now find that in this paragraph there are many full stops, and that this paragraph which, in our catechism, forms but one commandment, is, in the catechism of the Established church, divided into two by the numerals to which the question refers.

The Roman Catholic church, according to the manner in which she gives the commandments ments, considers the direction, Thou shalt not make images, and so forth, as explanatory of, and connected with, the first commandment?—As explanatory, and more of a ceremonial nature than any thing founded on the law of nature.

The objection is to the manner in which it is given in the catechism of the Established church, that by making it a separate commandment, it appears to make it a separate object?—Yes, and to violate the manner in which the Scripture was originally given by God, for it divides that which God did not divide.

The Roman Catholic church considers the direction not to bow down and worship images, to be connected with the commandment directing reverence to Almighty God?—Yes, and that it was useful to the Jews to annex it to that part of the commandment, but that it is not essential to annex it in our common catechisms, where we abridge the doctrine of the gospel in seeking to communicate it to weak and tender minds.

And you object to making a separate commandment, because it may appear to be a prohibition of the practice of the Roman Catholic church, which is to have images before the individuals when engaged in prayer, to excite their devotion?—That is one ground of the objection.

Is not your objection to the dividing a commandment, which you consider to constitute one commandment into two, rather than to giving the whole of it in one?—I object to that being divided into two which I conceive ought to be given in one only. I object to this division, because I conceive it is not warranted by the Scripture itself; secondly, I object to it, because it goes to convey an idea to the mind, that there is a special prohibition with regard to the making of images not resulting from the first commandment, or inseparably connected with it, but of a particular kind, and thereby implying, as it were, a censure upon the practice prevalent in the Catholic church respecting images.

The particular objection therefore is to the Established church giving it as a separate commandment, so as to appear as a separate injunction, instead of giving it as a part of the first commandment?—That is the great objection I have to it, and if the commandments were given entire in all our catechisms, I should have no objection to it.

But objecting to the division, you leave out in your smaller catechism the latter part?—We do.

Objecting to the division of the first and second?—Yes.

You leave out what we call the second?—Yes, the entire, and whenever it is introduced with us, it forms a part of what we call the first commandment.

Is there not this distinction between the Ten Commandments as given in the Established church, and the Ten Commandments as given in the Roman Catholic church, that in the Established church the whole of the text of the Scripture, according to the authorized version is given; but that in the Roman Catholic church, the whole of the text of Scripture is not given?—In the Roman Catholic catechism of the larger size, the entire of the commandments as put down in the Scripture, is given; but in the smaller catechisms they are abridged, for the reasons before stated.

The abridgment consisting wholly in the suppression of a considerable portion of the Sacred Text?—Whatever is given is an abridgment of that text.

The question implies, that it is a suppression of the text, as contra-distinguished from an abridgement of it, that a portion of the text is allowed to stand, and that the rest is abridged?—I cannot say whether the other commandments are given in our catechism in the same way; we attend in our smaller catechism to the substance of the commandments, rather than to the precise terms in which they are found in the Scriptures.

Is not the object of the smaller catechism to impress upon youth in the shortest and plainest manner the substance of the commandments?—Yes, it is, and we do not do that by suppression, but we abridge not only one commandment, but more than one, and we leave out also the comminations which are annexed to all the commandments; but in consequence of making two commandments of the first, you are obliged to unite the ninth and tenth, and to break manifestly through the analogy which should be observed between them and your seventh and eighth.

[The Catechism, called an Abridgement of Christian Doctrine, by the Right Reverend Doctor Plunket, was handed to the witness.]

Have the goodness to state what is the first commandment, as it appears from that book?—"I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt have no other God but me."

Have the goodness to state the second commandment, as appearing in that book?—Thou shalt not take the name of God in vain.

Where the commandments are given, so as to divide what the Roman Catholic church treats as one commandment into two, you consider that the principle of the Roman Catholic church is violated, and that of course the children should not be permitted so to learn?—I do.

Does the same objection occur to the books that are used, or to be met with, in the schools of the Association for discountenancing Vice, which you have stated to apply to those used by the Hibernian Society's schools?—In the schools connected with the Association for the suppression of Vice, I conceive there are two evils; one, that the sacred Scriptures should be read indiscriminately in the authorized version, by the scholars; and the other, that the church catechism should be taught. To the reading of the Scriptures in the schools I object, except under circumstances such as Dr. Murray, in one of his first answers, has mentioned; and to the teaching of the church catechism in the school, I object also, because, when taught there at all, Catholic children must be either dismissed without being taught their own catechism, or they must be induced to attend at the teaching of the church catechism, and to their being so dismissed without religious instruction I object, and I object still more strongly to their being obliged to learn the church catechism; I object therefore, to all the schools connected with the Society for the suppression of Vice.

Are there many of them in your district?—Very few.

Are they attended by Roman Catholics?—I know of but one school of that kind in the neighbourhood where I live; then with respect to schools in the more remote part of the diocese reported to me as in connection with it; the clergy, on finding schools connected with any one of those societies, generally deem it incumbent on them to apply to me as to the course they should adopt, and I do not recollect having received from them a report of any one school connected with that Society, so that I believe only one school, and that in my own immediate neighbourhood, is connected with it; and with regard to that, I directed the priest to go among the people and to direct them not to send their children to that school; he did so, and no Roman Catholic children have since attended it, except perhaps a few paupers whom I do not mind, as they often go to get clothes, and afterwards absent themselves, or go in at a time of great distress, that they may be fed; so that with respect to creatures thus circumstanced I do not much trouble myself, knowing that when I have a school prepared, they will attend it without any difficulty at all; besides, they attend at catechism on the Sundays, and there is no danger arising to them; but if it were necessary to withdraw even those few who may linger about such schools in that sort of way, I could do it with great ease.

Does it appear to you, that the reading books published by the Kildare-street Society, with the exception of that containing the extracts of Scripture to which you have referred, have been prepared with a desire to fit them for general reading, and that they have been prepared in such a manner as not to offend against the religious opinions of any class?—If I except those to which I have referred, I think they are so fitted, and that they have been so intended.

Does it appear to you, that scriptural extracts in the spelling books of the London Hibernian Society have been arranged in such a manner as to make an impression on the minds of the children unfavourable to the Roman Catholic church?—Sufficient appears upon the face of the books of the London Hibernian Society to determine my judgment of them.

Are there any schools supported by the Baptist Society in the district with which you are acquainted?—I have known only one which received aid from the Baptist Society.

Is there any thing peculiar in the constitution of that school which excited your attention?—It was also connected with the Kildare-street Society; and it was the master who stated to me his connection with the Baptist Society, that he received something from it; and I do not recollect that he mentioned anything more.

Where is the school situated?—In the parish of Dunleckney, in the county of Carlow.

If the children are not withdrawn willingly by their parents, to what means do the priests have recourse, in order to carry their own wishes into execution?—I have never found it necessary to resort to any other means than merely to recommend, either privately or publicly, to the parents to withdraw the children; and on my doing so or the priest doing so, I have found uniformly that the children were withdrawn, so that finding those means sufficient, I have not had even once occasion to resort to others.

Was that admonition given publicly or privately?—I have often given it myself publicly; if the matter suffered delay, I desired the schools might be left unmolested till my visitation, for it often happened, that they were protected by a landlord or proprietor, or a man of influence; and that if the priest interfered in public to have the children withdrawn, he might bring down upon himself or the people the enmity of such individuals, and therefore, as it was somewhat of an odious duty, odious in its discharge, I preferred taking it upon myself, and therefore it was I who generally at the visitation of the parishes, directed the people to withdraw the children or desired the priest would see it done in the course of a short time afterwards. There have been some few instances where I have been consulted by the priest, and not being able to go within a short time to that parish, I have desired him to see that the children were withdrawn, and I have been informed that he had done so, and that my wishes were fulfilled.

Has any instance occurred within your knowledge, of the priest having made use of his spiritual authority to compel the parent of any child to withdraw it, if he appeared unwilling to do so?—I have no recollection of any instance of the kind in my diocese, except one which perhaps might be included in the question which has been asked. There was a school under the protection of Lady Aylmer, in the county of Kildare; this school was frequented by some Catholics, and I was informed by the parish priest, that there was no Catholic teacher in it, and that the persons employed used many exertions to disturb the faith of the children. I desired him therefore to advise the parents to withdraw their children; he told me afterwards that they all did so, except the gate keeper of this lady, who apprehending that he would lose his situation, and undergo a persecution (which frequently follows, at least in some parts of Ireland, from the children being withdrawn from such schools), he suffered one or more of his little children to continue to attend it; and I think the priest told me that in consequence of the gatekeeper doing so, he refused to administer the sacraments to him, and I believe to his wife; that is the only instance of the kind which has come to my knowledge as I now recollect.

Do you not conceive that if the parent of a child, having been cautioned against sending his child to a particular school, inasmuch as in that school the religion of the child was likely likely to be tampered with or endangered, still continued to send his child, he would be guilty of a sinful error?—Yes.

 and

Would it not be the duty of his confessor on his stating the fact to him, to require either that he should abandon that error, or if he refused to do so, to refuse him absolution?—Yes, that would be the duty of the confessor.

No person can be admitted to the sacraments while in the practice of sin; he must repent of sin, and resolve not to persevere in it before he can receive a sacrament?—That is the case, with the exception of the sacrament of matrimony, which being a civil contract as well as a religious rite; we sometimes solemnize it where we are not certain that the party is not in a state of sin.

The sacrament of penance?—That cannot be administered but on repentance.

Do you conceive that a priest of the Roman Catholic church would be justified, not only in refusing the rites of the church on the grounds stated, but in imprecating curses on the heads of the parents of children who should persist in sending their children to schools disapproved of by him?—The priest who would imprecate curses on any one for any crime whatever of his own authority, would act extremely wrong; and if by curses is meant excommunication, he has no right to excommunicate any person; for the right to inflict that censure is reserved to the bishop or the person deputed by him.

Would a priest be justified in praying or expressing a wish that any temporal evil, sickness or disease, might visit any person who sent a child to a school disapproved of by him?—He would not; and if I found any priest under my direction had done so, I should reprimand him in the most severe terms for abusing his office; for our duty is to bless and not to curse.

If it should be found that a priest had so done, he would incur your censure?—I should reprimand him most seriously.

Did you ever hear the expression in common parlance of the "Priest's Curse"?—I may have heard the expression used, but I do not recollect it.

(To Doctor Murray.)—Is the phrase of the priest's curse familiar to you?—It is not.

Did you ever hear it used by any peasant, "the Priest's curse be upon you"?—No, never in my life.

As an imprecation from one peasant to another; as a malediction?—I never heard that expression from one peasant to another.—(Doctor Kelly.) Nor have I.—(Doctor Doyle.) For the ease of my conscience, I would mention with regard to my last answer but one, that there was a parish priest in my diocese, some time ago, in whose parish a very great scandal and abuse existed; he wrote to me, that finding all his exertions to put down this abuse had been ineffectual, he at length prohibited it under the pain of the curse of God, or some expression of that sort; he wrote this to me when he had acted thus, lest it should come to my knowledge in some other shape; and assigning his reasons in order to escape my censure, which he apprehended would otherwise fall upon him. Now I recollect that I did not reprehend that priest; for he appeared to be conscious of having acted with a degree of impropriety, and I thought the feeling existing in his mind, was a sufficient security against his doing so again. I mention this because I stated before, that if a priest had done so, I would reprimand him; that was a case in which I omitted doing so; but the omission was the result of his writing to me, and assigning a plausible reason, so that I had thereby an assurance that he would not do so again.

The letter conveyed to you the notion and impression that the priest was himself sensible he had erred in what he had done?—He was under the impression that I might learn it; and that on hearing it, I would reprimand him, probably with severity, and he wished to put me in possession of the full merits of the case, and hoped thereby that I would not censure him for it; as to whether he thought he was doing wrong I cannot say.

As far as his flock is concerned they are still in ignorance, whether it was with your approbation?—My flock know me too well to suppose I would approve of it.

They do not know of the letter he has written to you, shewing his feeling on the subject?—They are in ignorance of that, I suppose; but if such a proceeding were to be repeated, they know that they should meet with redress, on making application to me.

How can they know that?—Because they know in many instances that where they had any reasonable complaint of the conduct of a clergyman, on representing it to me, I have always interfered.

But this having occurred and no complaint having been made by the parishioners to you, how are they aware that you would interfere?—I think the thing is so wrong in its nature, that it must strike almost any Christian, that I disapprove of a priest appointed to minister between the people and God, converting his ministry into a curse.

Do you not believe it is common in many parts of Ireland, that that does take place from the altar on the part of the priest as applied to the people?—I should fear too often; but as to what may happen in other parts of Ireland as to the conduct of priests in their chapels, I should feel delicacy in expressing an opinion.

Have you not heard that it was common?—I have not heard that it was common; but I do not think it impossible there may be cases in which it occurred.

Is the case you have referred to a singular case in your own diocese?—Yes; it is the only one which has come to my knowledge.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that the Roman Catholic priests do not feel that the power of excommunication is vested in the Roman Catholic church?—It certainly is; but the authority of the Catholic church is not vested in a single priest.

In whom is the authority vested?—In the bishop; and no priest can inflict excommunication, unless deputed to do so by the bishop.

Is

Examination of
Dr. Murray,
Dr. Kelly,
and
Dr. Doyle,
14 April 1825.

Is there a distinction between excommunication and the sort of curse referred to in a previous question?—Yes, there is a distinction; the one is a mere imprecation, such as an idle person in the street might express against the other.

The question meant to ask, whether, according to the discipline and doctrines of the Roman Catholic church, there is, in any portion of it, a distinct authority to pronounce an authoritative curse, as contradistinguished from excommunication on any individual?—No, I know no such thing.

Do you happen to recollect the last words of the Council of Trent?—I cannot speak to them.

Are they these; that the cardinal, who closed the council, pronounced a curse on all heretics, which was, according to the authority referred to, perhaps erroneously, said to have been repeated by all the ecclesiastics in these words, “a curse upon them, a curse upon them?”—That, of which mention has been made, is more properly called anathema.

Have the goodness to define the word anathema, according to the sense of the Roman Catholic church?—The word anathema, is understood by the Roman Catholic church with Saint Paul, as a separation, or removal from something; he wishes to be anathema from Christ for his brethren; that is, he wished to be separated from Christ for a time, for the good of the church.

The anathema of the Roman Catholic church means only, that they are to be separated from the church?—Yes, in the same sense as is spoken of by the apostle.

Is anathema analogous to excommunication?—In substance it is the same; the one is the prayer, and the other the judicial act, by which the separation is made.

Does that separation imply the utter destruction of the thing separated?—The utter destruction, certainly not; but the separation of the thing.

In the service of the Established church for Ash Wednesday, there is a service called the Commination; do Roman Catholics, when they pronounce persons accursed, do it in any other sense than that in which the Established church appear to do it in that Commination?—I conceive the Established church uses the expressions, or curses, precisely in the same sense as we do; namely, that used by the apostle.

Would a Roman Catholic clergyman be justified in refusing to baptize a child, whose parents send their other children to schools disapproved by the Roman Catholic priests?—If the refusal were persevered in, that would be a kind of impiety. There is nothing in the conduct of any person living that would justify a priest in refusing, and continuing to refuse, to baptize a child.

How long might he refuse to baptize, before it became impious?—So long as he might not apprehend that there would be the slightest danger of the child dying without baptism.

Do you think it would be permissible to the priest to threaten the parents with that?—I think it would be highly improper; but where there are so many persons engaged in the ministry, many of them young, and many with warm feelings, some of them may resort to acts which are not proper. I would highly disapprove of it.—(Doctor Murray.) That is my feeling decidedly.—(Doctor Kelly.) I never knew an instance of a clergyman refusing to baptize a child in consequence of the parents sending their other children to a school not approved of by the priest.

Is not the case, in which the priests do refuse to baptize a child, the instance of a child whose parents are not known at the time?—(Doctor Doyle.) The only case in which the priests within my diocese, I believe, or any one of them, would hesitate at all about baptizing a child, is when illegitimate children, or children whose parents are unknown, are brought to them; then they direct the person bringing it to take it to the parish where it was born; but where the parents are known, it is always baptized. It is necessary to know the parents, in order to the registry of the baptism.

You have been already asked, whether it would be the duty of a Roman Catholic clergyman to refuse the rites of the church to a person who persevered in sending his children to a school where he thought the religion of his children would be endangered?—Yes.

Do you mean, that the clergyman would be warranted in refusing to hear the confession of the person; or that he would be warranted, hearing his confession, to refuse him absolution?—If Judas were living, and were to come to confession, he should be heard; but due absolution can be given only when the priest finds the man upright before God, and his heart penitent for having done wrong. He could not therefore absolve him, if he left his child in the proximate occasion of losing his faith.

When a person is able to make a confession, he can only have extreme unction consequent on absolution?—Just so.

Can any person be received as a participator in the communion, in the church of Rome, without an absolution immediately preceding it?—There are hundreds, and I may say thousands, who go to communion in our church, and who do not receive absolution immediately previous to their going. They may have received it a week before.

Would a Roman Catholic clergyman be commendable, or otherwise, who had refused to admit a parent to communion, supposing him to have a child in a school disapproved of by the priest, and refusing to withdraw him from that school at the desire of the priest?—We do not suffer any person to approach the holy communion without having gone to confession; but many persons go to confession, and the priest does not find it necessary to absolve them; therefore, many persons go to the holy communion without having received absolution. But with respect to every one of those going there, after having been at confession, without having had absolution, it is with the special leave of the priest.

Describe the consequence, on confession, in which the Roman Catholic church holds that absolution absolution is not necessary?—It is not necessary where the penitent is found not to have been guilty of any mortal sin from the time he has been at communion before.

Absolution is not necessary for venial sins, as contradistinguished from mortal sins?—That is the truth, as taught by the Council of Trent, and received by us.

Have you heard of any cases of extreme unction having been withheld from any persons, in consequence of their children being at those schools?—Never.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Has your experience been the same?—I have never heard of any man or woman having been denied the sacrament of extreme unction on that account.

Would you disapprove of that in the case of a London Hibernian school for instance?—(Dr. Doyle.) If the father refused to withdraw it from that place.—(Dr. Kelly.) I have said I have not known of any person being refused extreme unction in consequence of his sending his children to a London Hibernian school, but I think there might be a case where they would be refused it.—(Dr. Doyle.) If I found that the London Hibernian school was one where the rules were strictly adhered to, and that the Catholics were desired not to suffer their children to frequent it, and yet did so, being apprized of their danger, I should think it proper to withhold the sacrament from them when dying.—(Dr. Murray.) Except on repentance.—(Dr. Doyle.) Certainly.

The sacrament of extreme unction is administered after absolution is given consequent on confession, where the party is able to confess; if the party, in making that confession, though he be in the extremities of death, acknowledges that he has children at a school, in which school the religion of these children appears to the confessor to be in danger, and declares no intention of withdrawing the children from the school, but determines to persevere in sending them there at the hazard of their religion, in that case would it be the duty of the clergyman to refuse to administer extreme unction to him?—It would be the duty of the clergyman to refuse to administer extreme unction to him.

If the person stated that he had had children at such a school, that he was sorry for having so done, and that he would not continue to have them there, would the priest in that case refuse him absolution or extreme unction?—No; he would not refuse him absolution or extreme unction.

Then the absolution or extreme unction is refused in consequence of the person appearing to be persevering in the error?—Precisely so.

Is it a venial or a mortal sin in a Catholic parent to send his child to a school to which the only objection is that the Douay version of the Bible is read without note or comment?—If that be the only objection, I do not consider it a mortal sin; to define what is a mortal sin is sometimes very difficult, because it is not the mere reading of a Testament that I consider an evil, but it is when that reading is attended with a danger of the subversion of the faith, or when it can be understood as implying a conformity to another religion; so that to take the naked fact, unattended with circumstances, I should hesitate long before I pronounced it a sin.

Would you consider it a mortal sin in a parent so to educate his child as that the religion of that child must be brought into danger?—In that case I would, unquestionably.

And therefore, if a school be established which the priest is conscientiously convinced is calculated to endanger the religion of Roman Catholic children, if the priest warns the parents of the children of such danger, and the parents notwithstanding persevere in sending the children there, would the parents in that case be guilty of mortal sin?—Certainly, if the priest were a prudent proper man.

Who is to judge of that?—I think the bishop is the person to judge of it, who in case of doubt takes to his advice the most learned and prudent of his clergy.

In the mean time the priest has refused the offices?—That is not often the case; I should think the priest will not act in matters of that moment without consulting others.

In cases where the priest is called to administer absolution, he must necessarily exercise some discretion?—He must.

He is for that purpose the judge?—Yes; in ordinary cases he is competent to decide.

Therefore the priest, in exercising a judgment on the conduct of a parent who sends his children to a school of this nature, is exercising a discretion in the same way as he might on any other conduct of the supposed penitent?—Yes; I think so.

Is it a venial or a mortal sin in an adult peasant to persevere in reading the New Testament in the authorized version of the church of England, after his priest has forbidden it?—I will repeat a sentence from St. Augustine, and it will show what my mind is regarding mortal and venial sin; I should feel great delicacy in fixing the amount of guilt which constitutes the one or the other; St. Augustine says, Quæ sunt levia vel quæ gravia peccata non humano sed divino pensanda sunt iudicio; quis enim crederet, "qui dixerit fratri suo fatue! reus erit gehennæ nisi ipsa veritas dixisset." Now, that maxim I adopt fully; it is then extremely difficult to determine when the quantity of guilt amounts to that which we consider a mortal sin; a perfect knowledge of the act to be done, and a wilful adoption of it, and that this be substantially contrary to the command of God, and that the matter of it is one of considerable amount; all this is required, in order that the sin be mortal; where there is question of faith, the matter is of great moment; nothing can be greater; but one man may read a Protestant version of the Scriptures without any danger whatever; another man might read it with more danger, and another with still more danger; I could not therefore determine as to the abstract point, whether a mortal sin would be committed by reading any book; I should, before I judged, be informed as to the dispositions of the man's mind; I read the authorised version of the sacred Scriptures as freely as that approved of by my own church; I do not conceive that by that I violate any law whatever; another man might do the same, and yet he might be a person to whom such reading might be extremely dangerous, for he might not bring to that book the dispositions he ought to have; it is out of my power then to determine the quantity of guilt which an individual in the abstract might incur by reading or not reading a certain book.

Would you allow any of the peasantry of Ireland, who might persevere in reading the Scriptures in the authorized version, after having been prohibited by your clergy to be received to the sacrament?—No; certainly I would not.

You would consider them as in effect being guilty of a contemptuous disobedience to your church?—Certainly.

Need there be, in the schools alluded to, any other stumbling block than the Scriptures being read and got by heart?—There need not.

It is enough if the Bible is read there without note or comment?—Yes, that is quite sufficient in order to make such schools obnoxious to us.

Do you consider that the Hibernian Society, or any other society established in Ireland at present, aims at making proselytes?—I am perfectly convinced that they do; the Kildare-street Society is the one about whose principles or dispositions I for some time entertained doubts, but doubts which have been since removed.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Is it your experience, or have you heard in such manner as to believe that there have been any particular acts of destruction of the Testament in the authorized version in the west of Ireland, either executed or enjoined by the Roman Catholic clergy?—The directions given by the Roman Catholic clergy in the archdiocese of Tuam are, that if the versions of the Scriptures are not approved of by the Catholic church, the faithful are to refuse to take them; but if they should be induced to take them, they are to give them up into the hands of the clergyman who preserves them; but I have not known of any instance of a clergyman destroying by fire, or otherwise, any of those Testaments.

Have you ever heard of sixty, or any other number of Testaments, having been thrown into the river at Ballinasloe?—I never heard of it.

If you heard that stated to have been done by a Roman Catholic clergyman, would you disbelieve it?—I do not know the clergyman at Ballinasloe.

Should you disapprove of the act?—I should recommend to the clergyman at Ballinasloe to take the book and to preserve it.

Should you think such an act deserving of censure?—I think it an improper act to destroy such a book.

(To Dr. Doyle).—What is your opinion upon that point?—I think the same; I think it improper to treat the word of God in that kind of way; if a single individual, through error or mistake did such a thing, I might overlook it, but I should think it very wrong.

Should you think it improper for such an individual to bury it?—I should be highly amused with such a proceeding.

Would you think him highly deserving of approbation?—I do not know but I would; it might shew a disposition which I would prize highly, though I do not think the act a very laudable one; but attending to the disposition more than to the act itself, I would reward the man.

You would consider it in the man a proof of orthodoxy?—Yes; a proof that he was filled with right faith, only pushed to an extreme; but in an enlightened person I should think such a proceeding extremely wrong.

(To Dr. Kelly) —Are you acquainted with the county of Mayo?—I am.

Can any considerable number of Roman Catholics have been withdrawn from the communion of the Catholic church without your knowing it?—No, not any considerable number.

Have you heard of any number being so withdrawn?—I have heard of one man in Westport, who withdrew from the communion of the Roman Catholic church in consequence of the clergyman having reprimanded him for his immoralities; he had given great scandal in the parish by his immoral conduct, and the clergyman had reproached him publicly, and in consequence of his public reproach the man got so offended that he embraced the established religion, and continues to go to church; with that exception I do not know of any other persons in the county of Mayo.

Do you think there could have been any considerable number without your hearing of it?—Not any considerable number, certainly.

Do you think there could have been any considerable number withdrawn from attending the sacraments without your knowing it?—I think not; for on my visitations I make particular inquiry of the clergymen respecting their parishioners, and I inquire whether they have been punctual in attending the sacraments, and the Roman Catholic clergymen inform me where there is a falling off, and where there is a punctual attendance; and I am gratified in saying, I never knew a more punctual attendance at the sacraments, throughout the diocese of Tuam, than in the last twelve months.

Can you form any opinion as to what is the case in the neighbouring diocese of Elphin, embracing the county of Sligo?—I have had conversations with the bishop of Killala on this subject; I have had conversations with the Bishop of Achonry; I have had conversations with the Bishop of Elphin; and I have heard them all say, that instead of a decrease, their flocks are rather increasing.

The coadjutor Bishop of Elphin resides at Sligo?—Yes.

Is a considerable portion of Sligo within his jurisdiction?—I believe not the entire of it.

903
Examination of
Dr. Murray,
Dr. Kelly,
and
Dr. Doyle,
14 April 1825.

Is part of the county of Sligo under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Killala?—Yes; and part under the jurisdiction of the Bishop of Achonry.

Do you think the county upon the whole is within the jurisdiction of the three prelates?—I am sure the greater part is.

Does it not follow from what has been already stated by all the bishops now present, that if in point of fact, during the last three months, there were a great number of Roman Catholic children in the Hibernian and other scriptural schools within the district to which your last answer had reference, there must be a corresponding number of their parents, either openly or tacitly abstaining from the communion of your church?—I do not conceive, that within the last twelve months to which I have made allusion, the Roman Catholic clergy of those districts have been so very exact in compelling the parents to withdraw their children from schools as they had been; I have recommended to the clergy of the arch-diocese of Tuam to forbear for the present moment in consequence of this commission being sitting, as I impressed upon their minds that I had the strongest hopes, that before a year was about, this commission would make such a report to the government as would provide means for Catholic education, and that for a year much evil could not result from forbearance.

The question had more immediate reference to the transactions of the last three months?—I have urged the same, since the time I had the honour of meeting Mr. Grant and Mr. Blake in Westport.

Is it your impression, that within the last three months, there has been a greater relaxation of effort to withdraw the children, than within the corresponding three months of the last year?—I know there has; I have recommended it, and I know my recommendation has been attended to.

Is it your impression, that there is not at this moment a considerable extent of refusal of the rites of the church through the counties of Sligo, Leitrim and Mayo, in consequence of Roman Catholic parents persevering in keeping their children at those schools?—I cannot speak to Leitrim; with respect to the part of Mayo in the arch-diocese of Tuam, which is under my care, I have already stated what is the practice, and I have recommended Dr. Burke of Sligo, and Dr. M'Nicholas of Achonry, whom I met on the 13th March in Galway, to pursue the same course; and I have every reason to think, and in fact I have a kind of assurance from them, that they will pursue the same course that I have myself pursued.

It is your impression, that in the respective dioceses at present, there is no material withholding the rites of the church on the ground stated?—I am sure there is a relaxation.

Is there any conflict on the principle of the priests withholding the rites of the church from the Roman Catholic parents, in consequence of their sending their children to those schools?—There is in my opinion a temporary relaxation of the severity.

Have you any means of knowing or forming a belief, whether there is a withholding of the rites of the church in reference to such a cause?—I am not aware that there is a withholding of the rites of the church to any very considerable extent; it is for that reason I say, there is a relaxation of the severity.

Is it your belief that the parents of the children acquiesce willingly in the withdrawal of their children from the schools; do they receive the advice with gratitude, or consider it a great hardship?—They receive it with gratitude, and they are convinced it is for their souls sake, that the priests exercise this zeal.

And they withdraw their children without reluctance?—They withdraw their children without reluctance, unless where they are under the power of landlords, who inflict temporal injury upon them.

Is it your belief that the landlords inflict that persecution to which you have referred?—I have heard that in the county of Sligo, great severity has been exercised, and I know in the county of Galway also great severity has been exercised.

Do you think much anxiety is caused in Ireland, by the inducements held out to the children to attend the schools on the one hand, and by the prohibition on the part of the Roman Catholic priests on the other?—I know that that creates great heart burnings on the part of the people.

Do you think that tends to foment and encourage the religious differences unfortunately prevalent in Ireland?—Very much.

Is it your opinion, that dissatisfaction on account of religious opinions has increased materially in Ireland in consequence; and that in point of fact, those differences are more keenly felt at this moment than they were before these societies had such an active operation?—(Dr. Doyle.) I think those religious differences have grown regularly with the propagation of the system of scriptural education, and that they have received an additional increase from the late public meetings in Ireland, held for the purpose of diffusing religious knowledge and scriptural education among the poor.

Do you think they tend to make the people of different religious persuasions dislike one another, because they are not agreed on religious subjects?—I think that effect has been produced; it is very clear, when I go into a parish to visit the clergy and people, and when, instead of employing myself in giving instructions on the duties of their several states of life, and explaining to them the morality of the gospel, I am obliged to explain to them the difference of the several religions, and the danger to which they may expose their children by sending them to those schools, that their mind and attention are drawn to the difference of religion, and to those dangers, and their feelings consequently excited. This necessity on my part arises out of the disputes on religion, and the efforts of those to whom I refer.

Examination of
Dr. Murray,
Dr. Kelly,
 and
Dr. Doyle,
 14 April 1825.

Is there a prevailing opinion amongst the Roman Catholic body in Ireland, that certain societies, excluding the Kildare-street Society, have resolved or made an attempt to convert the Roman Catholic body from the faith which they now hold to some other?—That impression appears to be not only general, but universal amongst the Catholics, and very few of them disassociate the Kildare-street Society from the others.

You yourself see that there is a difference, both in the principle of the Kildare-street Society, and its operations?—There is some difference; it is going on perhaps more covertly, but I am persuaded the object of most of the persons engaged in it, as well as the agents of it, are the same as those of the other societies.

Are you acquainted with the reports of the London Hibernian Society?—Yes, I have seen some of them.

Do you know whether they confine their objects merely to the education of children in schools?—That is the immediate object of this Society, but they have besides that object another, which is to loose the children as it were from the faith of their fathers, and thereby uncatholicize the growing generation; that is the ulterior object—the immediate one is the education of the children. Their principles are in our opinion, subversive of the Catholic faith. They seek first to disturb the consciences of the little ones, and they hope that when these little ones grow up to manhood, they may be loosed from the Roman Catholic church, the Society being quite indifferent what denomination of Christians they may join themselves to, provided they be not Catholics.

Are you acquainted with the practice of the London Hibernian Society, of employing itinerant Scripture readers?—I believe it is mentioned in the abstracts of their reports, or the sheets in which their rules are laid down, but I have not known it practically.—(Dr. Kelly.) They have been sending what they call Scripture readers into the villages, for the purpose of reading religious tracts, which I understand are principally composed of invectives against the Catholic religion.

Have you seen or known any of the Scripture readers belonging to the Hibernian Society?—I have never met any of them, but I have heard the clergymen in the country say, that readers are going about to the villages, and endeavouring to get the people to assemble round them, for the purpose of reading a chapter in the Scriptures, and of reading other religious tracts, and I am told books, that are principally directed against the Roman Catholic clergymen.

Is it your impression, that there are many or few of those persons now itinerating about the province of Connaught?—I do not believe they are numerous.

Have you heard that their efforts had had any effect in shaking the faith of the adult population?—I have not heard of any instance.

Do you believe that it is likely, that they could by such practices, subtract any material number, or any number at all, of the adult population of Connaught?—I think those who expose themselves to danger are liable to fall, and if the practice became very prevalent, and the faithful were not warned of the danger to which they expose themselves by associating with such persons, I fear that in some instances they would succeed in withdrawing some of the Roman Catholics from the faith.

Do you think it is the disposition of the peasantry in general to receive them willingly, or with indignation, or with what other feeling?—They receive them with disgust and displeasure.

Then they drive them away; they do not admit them into their houses?—No, they do not receive them, generally speaking.

They do not admit them?—No.

Of course they do not listen to them?—There may be some who will receive them, but not to any extent.

Have you had any serious apprehension on your mind as to the effect of such practices?—(Dr. Doyle.) The only apprehension I should have if they came into my neighbourhood would be, that the peasantry might stone them.

Do you think there are any in your diocese subject to such danger?—I have never heard of any of those individuals being in the diocese of Kildare or Leighlin.

Have you heard of any of them in the neighbourhood of Kilkenny?—Not any.

Have you heard much of those people, so as to think that they make much impression, one way or another?—(Dr. Kelly.) I know they have made no impression; I have heard that they have gone about, but have not been attended to.

Have they attracted much attention?—Not much attention.

Have you heard, whether they are in the habit of preaching as well as reading?—I have not heard of their preaching.

Do they read to the persons assembled in crowds out of doors, or are their proceedings principally confined to houses?—To houses.

They are intimately connected, in notion at least, with the Hibernian Society schools?—Certainly.

(To Dr. Murray.)—Do you know any thing of a society, called the Society for promoting the Principles of the Reformation in Ireland?—I know such a society has been established in Dublin; I do not know any thing of its progress; I have not taken any notice of it.

Do you know whether it attracted any attention?—I do not know that it engaged any attention in the diocese where I live; I got the prospectus a long time ago, and I noticed it sufficiently to keep it by me, and a short time before I came over I received the first number of its publication, containing what they consider the practice of the Roman Catholic clergy.

Is that Society in any way connected with any of the Education Societies?—No further than that some of the members belonging to this society are also members of some of the other societies, particularly the Bible Society. I found the names of the Rev. Mr. Mathias, the Rev. Mr. Singer, and the Rev. Mr. Guinness, who are engaged in both those societies; there are fifteen of them altogether, with one or two secretaries.

They are connected, not with the London Hibernian Society, but the Hibernian Bible Society?—The Hibernian Bible Society.

Does it connect itself in any way with the London Hibernian School Society?—Not to my knowledge; it may.—(Dr. Doyle.) I think Mr. Gordon is one of the secretaries, but I am not quite certain.

Do you conceive any degree of irritation was excited in the south of Ireland, by the meetings held there in the course of last year, for the purpose of establishing schools in connection with the Hibernian Society?—Yes; I think it is quite plain from the discussions which took place at such meetings, that they did excite an extraordinary degree of attention of the public, and that the results of them were calculated to widen still more the existing differences upon religion.

Do you think they were at all calculated to produce a more inflamed opposition to schools in connection with that Society?—Yes, I know they were, because the people considered Mr. Gordon and others as agents of a society which professed to educate the poor of Ireland, and finding them not only employed in promoting schools for children, but also engaged chiefly in promoting scriptural knowledge as they deemed it, therefore I think the opposition to the society was increased in proportion to the exertions of these men.

That they were considered as acting in a spirit of hostility to the Roman Catholic church?—Yes; and in perfect conformity to the spirit of the London Hibernian Society. In very large meetings of Roman Catholics, in Cork and Waterford, resolutions were adopted declaratory of their opinion of those men, and of the societies from which they proceeded, and of their own determinations to educate the Roman Catholic poor on principles compatible with the doctrine and discipline of their own church, and totally unconnected with those societies.

Do you think if this commission had not issued, there would have been a more general and determined opposition to the schools founded and instituted by the Hibernian Society, and the Kildare-street Society, during the last year, than there has been?—We would have followed up, of course, the line of conduct we were pursuing previous to the appointment of the commission, by again petitioning Parliament; if our petitions had been disregarded, and the commission had not been appointed, we would have considered that the government was tacitly sanctioning those societies which we think act on a proselyting principle; therefore we would have set our faces against them, and probably broken up all connection with them which now exists.

The Roman Catholic prelates and clergy of Ireland, object to the Testament being used as a school book, or being read by children?—We do.

Do you object to the Testament being read by persons of mature years, and of education?—No, of course not.

Do you rather recommend than forbid it?—I do not know whether there may have met the eye of the Commissioners a publication signed by all the bishops of Ireland, printed by Mr. Coyne; in this, all the bishops recommend to the faithful to read the Scriptures, but to read them in those dispositions of prayer and of obedience to the authority of the church, which we think necessary that they may be read with profit.

The objection to the reading the Scriptures, where it is made, applies to the person who reads and to the manner of reading it, rather than to the act of reading it by a person of competent knowledge and who reads it with a proper disposition?—Certainly it is.

It is considered that persons of the age which children are when attending schools, are not competent to come to a right knowledge of its meaning?—Our principles are the same as those of St. Paul; we wish to give to children milk and not strong meat; we give them, therefore, in the form of catechism, the first principles of the religion of Christ, and as they grow up in faith we give them the strong meat of the Gospel to digest.

Can you give an idea of the proportion of the peasantry in your diocese, who have attained that strength?—I cannot classify them; but every man whose morality is sound and whose faith is what it ought to be, I should wish to read the Gospels; and as to the Epistles and the Apocalypse, I should think it would be better that the generality of the people engaged in other pursuits during the day should abstain from them, because the morality that would be useful to them is mixed up with other matters of great depth and difficulty, and they would not profit so much by the reading of them as of the other parts, nay, it might be even dangerous to them. I recollect an instance to have occurred to myself: there was a daughter of a farming man, in the diocese of Leighlin, who read or heard read, "whosoever loves father or mother more than me is not worthy of me," or some such passage, and she actually left her father's home, and went about the country for several days, to fulfil, as she supposed, the will of God; at length she came to me to get advice, and told me this; when, after setting her mind right upon the matter, and composing it, I sent her home to her parents: it is just so with the generality of the peasantry; if they read the more difficult parts of Scripture they are very liable to understand them in a wrong way, and not having time, or the capability of comparing them with other passages, they may take deep root in their minds and do them an injury, so that the gross ignorant country people are, in my mind, much better instructed in the morality of the Gospel, by means of religious books, which convey it to them in a style and method adapted to their own ideas and situation of life, than by giving them the Scriptures generally to peruse; but as the Gospels are, for the much greater part, very simple and plain, shewing the Redeemer holding forth his morality in a divine light, those might be read with great profit and safety.

You would allow a majority of the peasantry in your diocese to read the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles?—I cannot say the majority of them, because in our peasantry the majority are destitute even of that degree of improvement which I would wish to find in one to whose hands I would wish to commit the Scriptures; there are a very great number whom I would be satisfied, and even glad to find occupied every day in reading portions of the Scriptures.

But you would not approve of those portions for the majority?—I cannot say that I would for the majority; I would prefer having for them books of morality, in which they would have explained and inculcated the plain rules of life, and those doctrines necessary to direct them in their own state, and to impress their duties upon them according to their own ideas; and such are the books with which I have endeavoured to supply them throughout my diocese.

Supposing the case of twenty or thirty peasants in your diocese, who could at this moment read, would you disapprove of a peasant, who could read, reading to them the four Gospels, or any portion of them?—A peasant, if he confined himself to reading to them what is mentioned, I should have no objection to that; but I would like the bishop or some clergyman to select the man to so read. It is a mode of instruction which I follow myself, and prescribe for the clergy; each Sunday in the mass they read the Gospel of the day or the Epistle, and then make a few moral reflections on them to render them the more useful.

What is the rule and principle of the Roman Catholic church, as to the translation of the Scriptures into vulgar tongues?—The rule, if I may call it a rule, for I cannot say there is a rule, properly speaking, upon that subject, because from the early times of the church there have been translations of the Scriptures, or of portions of the Scripture, made by private individuals into the vulgar tongue; such translations were made very early in England and very early in France. I cannot say then that there is a rule, as any man who pleases may take up the Scripture and translate it into the vulgar tongue, but the bishops of the province will not give their sanction to a version which they have not revised and found to agree, not only substantially but literally, with the vulgate version which has been declared by the Council of Trent to be authentic.

Does the Council of Trent mean to say that any other Latin or Greek translations of the Scriptures are not authentic?—While it approves of that it does not condemn others, but it approved of that, as being correct in the opinion of those well versed in the Scriptures.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that in most of the Roman Catholic countries of Europe there are, at this moment, translations of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongues of those nations which have received the sanction of the Roman Catholic church?—The sanction of the Roman Catholic church; I might say that the Douay version has received the sanction of the Roman Catholic church in this country, whereas it is current here with the knowledge and approbation of every bishop in Ireland; so in France, where I believe a good many versions are current throughout the kingdom; and I dare say the same is the case in other countries.

You were educated in Portugal?—Yes.

Is there any version in the vulgar tongue which has received the sanction of the bishops of that country?—Where I studied, the only one we used was the vulgate, and not having been conversant with the peasantry I do not know what was used among them, nor have I seen in Portugal any version into the vulgar tongue at all.

Did you ever see in Portugal any translation into the vulgar tongue, whether allowed or not?—No, I did not.

What should you say with respect to Spain?—I cannot speak to that.

(To Dr. Murray).—You were educated at Salamanca?—I was.

Can you give any information as to any authenticated version of the Scriptures into the Spanish language?—I did hear that there was a Spanish version of the Holy Scriptures, but I do not happen to know the fact, as I lived in the Irish college, where we used the Latin vulgate and the English versions.

Have the Scriptures any practical circulation in the vulgar tongue in Spain?—They had not then.

Have the people seen the Scriptures in a language they could understand?—I believe they were not generally read by the people.

Do you imagine that any material portion of the population have ever so much as seen the Scriptures in a language they could understand?—I do not know that they have.

Have you any means of knowing whether the Inquisition would have permitted it?—I suppose that the Inquisition would not have permitted a general circulation; there might have been particular permission from the authorities of the church.

Is it within your knowledge, that that permission would have been in practice obtained except in very rare instances?—I dare say it would not have been generally obtained; I have seen an Italian version which was approved of by the Pope, the version of Martini, Archbishop of Florence, to whom the Pope wrote a letter of thanks for his translation.

Is it your impression, that that version is pretty generally in the hands of such portions of the population of Italy as can read?—Of all those who wish to purchase it, I never heard any difficulty about it.

Have

Have you been in Italy?—I have.

Is it within your knowledge, that such portion of the peasantry in the Italian states who can read it, are in possession of the Scripture in the Italian tongue?—I really do not know; but I think there would be no difficulty in allowing any Italian to read it; it is a translation with a comment.

The Commissioners observe, in a document styled The Encyclical Letter of the Pope, given at Rome, at St. Mary Majoris, the 3d day of May 1824, the following paragraph, addressed to the Irish bishops, “ You are aware, venerable brethren, that a certain society, commonly called the Bible Society, strolls with effrontery throughout the world, which society contemning the traditions of the holy fathers, and contrary to the well known decree of the Council of Trent, labours with all its might, and by every means to translate or rather to pervert the Holy Bible into the vulgar languages of every nation, from which proceeding, it is greatly to be feared, that what is ascertained to have happened as to some passages, may also occur with regard to others; to wit, that by a perverse interpretation, the Gospel of Christ be turned into a human gospel, or what is still worse, into the gospel of the devil.” Do you subscribe to the expression of that sentiment?—I approve of such a sentiment which goes to condemn the permission to any unauthorized persons to translate the Scriptures, and to hand that about as the word of God.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Do you subscribe to that sentiment?—Certainly.—(Dr. Doyle.) And I, undoubtedly.

Do you conceive the authorized version of the church of England to rank under the description that is there given of the gospel of the devil?—(Dr. Murray.) The letter only says, that it may become so by perverted interpretations, many of which have appeared in the church; it may thus be made the instrument of diffusing error, and become the work of the devil. It is a quotation from Saint Hierome that is given there.—(Dr. Doyle.) Not only that, but our own might, by misinterpretation, become a gospel of the devil, to use the strong language of Saint Hierome.

When you state that that occurs in a phrase employed in that letter; do you understand the phrase as meaning, that the translation of the established church is the gospel of the devil, or that the gospel being misinterpreted, being wrested by man to his own destruction, thereby becomes in effect, as it were, the gospel of the devil?—Yes; God forbid that I should consider the authorized version of the Scriptures as the gospel of the devil; but I concur in the sentiment inasmuch as it says, the translations into the vulgar tongues may, by a perverse interpretation of them, become to the persons so perverting their sense in the language of Saint Jerome, quoted by the pope, the gospel of the devil.

Might not the same effect result from a false interpretation of the vulgate?—Certainly; the translations made from the vulgate, by the authorities in the church of Rome, we know are correct; but every individual undertaking to make a translation, one into the Romaick and another into the Syriac, and so on, might give what translation they please.

Then it applies to the translation?—(Dr. Murray.) We should take as strong an objection to a wrong interpretation as to a wrong translation.

Have the goodness to refer to the original letter, and state, whether it does not refer to the text, and not to the interpretation?—(Dr. Doyle.) The adjective “ perverse” is added to the word “ interpretation,” which settles the matter.

Then you consider the word as applied to notes on the vulgar tongue, and not to the translation of the text?—Certainly; to wrong notes or interpretation; but the translation itself may be made so loosely, or so maliciously, that it may become, not the gospel of God, but the gospel of man; and again, if that translation so perverted, or even the text of the vulgate itself, were by human perversion explained or understood in a wrong sense, in that case, both the translation and the interpretation of it would be perverse and bad.

Do you consider the authorized translation of the church of England as of a sufficiently perverse quality to merit the description there given of it?—As I said before, God forbid I should so consider it, for though it has many errors, I consider it one of the noblest works; one of the ablest translations that ever has been produced; this I say, whilst I look upon it as abounding with inaccuracies, and having in it many errors.

Would not this passage, if considered as referring to mere translations of the Testament, apply as completely to the translation of the vulgate as a translation of the established church, for the words are, “ Ex quo valde pertimescendum est, ne sicut in aliquibus jam notis ita et in cæteris interpretatione perversa de evangelio Christi hominis fiat evangelium, aut quod pejus est; diaboli”?—I have seen a translation of the Testament made by some Socinians; in this there were many whole passages omitted altogether, and those passages of course of the most vital importance, inasmuch as they went to demonstrate the divinity of the Son of God, and his consubstantiality with the Father; such a translation as this might well be stiled “ The Gospel of the Devil,” as the very text of the Scripture went to overturn the very foundation of our faith.

The Commissioners collect from you, that where any portion of the peasantry of the country are very well and properly qualified to understand the Scriptures, you allow of their being furnished with a proper translation in the vulgar tongue?—I should like, if they were qualified properly, that in every family in the kingdom there was a Bible, and I should be very glad that the New Testament, or the Gospels and the Acts particularly, were in their hands.

Do you conceive that any individual is qualified to judge for himself with respect to his capacity of reading the Scriptures, or those parts of the Scriptures which he may safely read; or must he in all cases be authorized by his spiritual pastor?—He must not, beause all our people are at liberty to go and purchase Bibles and Testaments, and keep them at their houses and read them; and for doing so they require no special permission, which shews that the individual himself can judge as to whether he ought to have the Bible or the Testament in his family or not; if he were to consult me, and say do I act well or ill by reading the Scriptures, I would consider the kind of man he was, and advise him either to read the entire or only such parts of the Bible as I might deem best suited to him, and as I should find him, in my opinion, likely to profit by.

Taking them as a general class, the description of persons enabled to purchase the Scriptures, are able to read them with safety?—Indeed I think so.

(To Dr. Murray.)—What is the practice generally prevalent in Ireland with respect to the Sunday school instruction in the Roman Catholic chapels in Ireland?—The practice differs according to the different parishes.

To what extent does it prevail?—There is generally a moral school in the chapels either before mass or after mass, where a number of pious people, men and women teach, the men take charge of the boys, and the women of the girls, and teach them the catechism; sometimes they read for them a moral book, according to the zeal of the pastor, and there are some instances where other instructions in reading and arithmetic are also given.

Is it your impression that there are few or many Roman Catholic chapels in Ireland, where that course is not pursued?—I cannot say of Ireland generally; but it is recommended by, I believe, all the bishops, and I believe it is a good deal attended to.

Is it pretty general in Dublin?—Yes, in all the chapels in Dublin; all the parish chapels; the catechism is taught after mass every Sunday.

Is the attendance of children on such occasions very numerous?—In general very numerous.

Amounting to thousands?—I suppose there are a thousand, or considerably more than that number.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—What has been your experience, in the province of Connaught, upon this subject?—The system of having catechism taught in the parochial chapels, is prevalent throughout every part of Connaught that I am acquainted with.

Is it the usage, that the children, pretty generally of all the day-schools in the parish, should attend at the Sunday school at the chapel on Sunday?—It is a rule, recommended and enforced, as far as is compatible with circumstances. At Westport chapel, on each Sunday, there are 800 children instructed for at least an hour or an hour and a half. They are divided into different classes; those who cannot read are instructed apart by themselves; those who can read, have certain lessons in the catechism marked out to them, which they are to learn in the course of the week; and on Sunday they are examined in their respective classes, in the parts of the catechism that are marked out for them.

Are there a great number of teachers upon such occasions?—Between male and female teachers, there are forty in Westport; and in Castlebar the same proportion. In the country parishes the teachers do not exceed two or three, in some instances.

Is it not, in the country parishes, the practice to call on the Roman Catholic schoolmasters in the parish, to lend their aid to the Sunday school?—It is.

(To Dr. Doyle.)—What is your experience of the Sunday schools in your diocese?—I am sure there is no part of Ireland in which Sunday schools are more diligently attended to than in my diocese. After mass, the children all attend catechism; and before mass, there are books of religious instruction read for all the adults.

(To Dr. Murray.)—Have you ever heard of a society, called The Sodality of Christian Doctrine?—Yes; it is a society very much encouraged.

Have the goodness to explain the origin of that society?—It is a society which has existed for several years; the object of it is to communicate religious instruction to children.

It is approved of by all the Roman Catholic bishops?—Yes, it is. In the diocese of Dublin, as long as I have been in the ministry, it has been very much recommended.

The particular societies connected with that society are called Confraternities, are they not?—Sometimes they are called Confraternities.

Are there many confraternities connected with that society, in the diocese of Dublin?—They are in general separate societies in each parish where they can be established. The bishop recommends that the people form themselves into societies of this kind for the communication of religious instruction.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—Is your experience the same with respect to those confraternities in Connaught?—Yes; they are male and female. They are called, and go by the name of "Sodality;" they engage to give moral and religious instruction to the people, and they generally make it a rule to approach sacraments once in the month; they give instruction before and after mass in the chapels, as far as it is in their power, and they conclude the instruction of the day by getting the children to kneel down, and by prayer.

Are the Commissioners to understand, that wherever such a confraternity exists, the Sunday school is pretty generally in their hands?—Yes.

(To Dr. Doyle.)—Is that the course taken with regard to your part of Ireland; are there such confraternities engaged in the Sunday school system?—The confraternities in my diocese are universally those conducting the Sunday schools.

They are distinguished by that designation?—Yes.

Can you state whether there was any bull of the Pope, or rescript, sanctioning the principles of that society, in or about the year 1800?—I cannot state the date, but I know that this this society was formed first at Rome, and to the members of it certain indulgences were granted by the Pope on condition of their instructing the children, and those same indulgences are extended to the confraternity wherever it exists.

By what name or form of instrument were those indulgences granted to that society?—By a regular bull, which is much the same in its form as a proclamation here of the king in council.

That bull communicated to the different bishops in the church of Ireland?—It is received by them, and adopted, and thereby it is in force.

By a printed book, entitled, The Rules of the Christian Doctrine Society, which was given to one of the Commissioners in St. Mary's chapel, in Limerick, by a Roman Catholic clergyman there, that bull is professed to be set forth, in which they observe this passage: "An indulgence of 300 days is given, for ever, to all those who, with a devout and contrite heart, repeat the three following verses or ejaculatory prayers: 'Jesus, Mary and Joseph, I offer you my heart and soul. Jesus, Mary and Joseph, assist me in my last agony. Jesus, Mary and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul to you in peace.' An indulgence of 100 days is granted for devoutly and contritely repeating any of these ejaculations applicable in both cases to the souls in purgatory. Pius VII. 28th April 1807. N.B. This indulgence is gained as often in the day as the devotion is performed." Have the goodness to explain the nature of the privileges which are obtained by a member of the confraternity, in reference to the paragraph just read?—The privileges, as there stated, are an indulgence of 300 days, which I consider ought to be understood in this way, that when canons of penitentiary discipline were enforced formerly, the church often required, before sinners would be forgiven, that they should perform a course of penance, to last a certain number of days or years. Now, by the obtaining of this indulgence, the penitent is entitled to a remission of the penance, which, had he lived in the time when those canons were enforced, he would have been obliged to perform, unless it were remitted to him by the bishop.

In your evidence before the Lords committee, you have distinctly stated that no prayer is ever offered up to the Blessed Virgin, except in her quality of intercessor?—Certainly.

Does it appear to you that she is distinguished by that quality in the manner she is here addressed?—Not in the form of the words, but in the mind of the Christian; he knows he addresses the Saviour as his God, and the Blessed Virgin or Saint Joseph as an intercessor. The prayer is the act of the mind; and when the person makes this distinction, as he always does in his mind, the form of the words he uses is to be understood conformably to the sense in which he uses them. There are none of our people, however poor or ignorant, who do not know that our Saviour alone is to be worshipped as God, and that the Blessed Virgin and Saint Joseph can do no more than apply to him for us.

The Commissioners are aware that that is the interpretation put upon it by the Roman Catholic church, but do you believe that the poor peasant takes that distinction?—I believe he would, because every one who learns the catechism of our church is aware that God alone is entitled to supreme worship, and that the saints are only intercessors.

Does this sentence, "Jesus, Mary and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul to you in peace," call upon the Virgin Mary as an intercessor?—I do not know that it calls upon her for any distinct act of intercession, but it implies God grant me admittance into the society of the saints.

Again, "Jesus, Mary and Joseph, I offer you my heart and soul;" will you explain what practical intercession she is called to perform there?—It is not so much an act of intercession which she is prayed there to exercise, as an act of devotion which is offered to her, and such as may properly be offered to a saint entitled to respect from her high place in heaven.

Then in that last-mentioned prayer she is not applied to as an intercessor?—I cannot say that she is; but the prayer is rather an act of praise offered on account of her exalted rank in heaven.

Is it not an act of worship as far as the Saviour is concerned: "Jesus, Mary and Joseph, may I breathe forth my soul to you in peace"?—Yes; I think with regard to him, it implies a total resignation of the heart into his hands, as the supreme arbiter of our future destiny. As far as they (the saints) are concerned, it is an offering of devotion to them, and an implied prayer to them, as well as an act of affection, that they would assist us in our approaching to God.

Then that sentence is, in fact, when properly understood, an act of adoration so far as our Saviour is concerned, but not so far as the Virgin Mary or Joseph is concerned?—Certainly not to the extent, or at all as the Saviour is adored, but we respect them as saints, and reverence them with affection and devotion.

Do not you think that there is danger of an illiterate peasant falling into a mistake?—It is not likely he would be mistaken. It is language I would not myself write for his use, though it is the conviction of my mind, that they, the peasantry, are so well instructed by the catechism, that they would not be liable to fall into an error as to the invocation of saints.

There may be great mistakes in the minds of Protestants, in reference to the degree of respect paid to the Host when carried from the chapel in a box through the street; will you have the goodness to explain the nature of the respect which the peasantry pay to it?—The respect which they pay to it is the supreme adoration which they would pay to God in heaven, or to our Redeemer, if he were in his proper person on the earth; because our belief is, that our Saviour is really and substantially, though in a supernatural manner, present in the sacrament so carried.

Then it is true and very adoration?—It is true and very adoration.

That is of course in the ceremonial of the mass; but the question applies to the carrying away that not used in that ceremony?—The adoration is precisely the same until the species of the bread or wine is corrupted or are corrupted, and then the divine presence we believe ceases. According to the Lutheran doctrine, the real presence is confined to the act of use; according to us, it being once real, it does not cease to be so until the species are wasted or consumed.

The Commissioners observe there is an abridgement of the Christian Doctrine published by the Right Reverend Dr. Plunket; is that approved of in Ireland?—(Dr. Murray.) In his diocese it is; out of his diocese I believe it is very little known.

In that the doctrine of invocation is explained, in these questions and answers, “Are we forbidden to honour the Saints? No—Why are not we forbidden to honour the Saints? Because we do not give them the supreme honour which only belongs to God.—How are Catholics taught to distinguish between the honour they give to God, and the honour they give to the Saints, since they pray both to God and the Saints? Of God alone they ask for mercy, of the Saints they only ask their prayers.”—Is the doctrine of the Roman Catholic church, with respect to the distinction between prayers offered to the Almighty and to the Saints, accurately stated there?—(Dr. Doyle.)—It is.

Do you think that doctrine is properly understood by the peasants in Ireland?—It is.

What is the relative authority ascribed by the Roman Catholic church to the Scriptures, and to the decrees of general councils?—They are of a different order or nature altogether; the Scriptures we receive as the word of God inspired immediately by him, and in the transmission of which to us the holy writers have been the mere scribes of the Lord. The decrees of general councils received by the universal church, we conceive to be certain and true, and that they were adopted or framed by the church guided thereto by the Holy Ghost.

Is there not a distinction to be taken between articles of faith and matters of discipline propounded in the general councils?—There is; and the observation I have just made with regard to the decrees of general councils, is to be understood of those relating to faith or morals, but not as regarding discipline, unless such discipline be essentially connected with faith.

But in matters essentially connected with faith, is it the belief of the Roman Catholic church, that the decrees of councils are by the dictation of the Holy Ghost?—For instance, suppose there were a decree of council with regard to the mode of administering baptism, or with regard to the baptism of infants, not yet possessing the use of reason, here the discipline would be the giving of baptism to infants, and the doctrine would be the baptising the human being; here then the discipline and the doctrine are so essentially connected, that the church could not err in deciding that the baptism of infants was valid and good.

The question is, whether in a matter of pure faith, unmixed with any portion or matter of discipline, the decision of the general council is received by the Roman Catholic church, as having proceeded from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit?—We receive it as a decision of a council, the council being directed and governed in making it by the Holy Ghost.

Do you conceive they can have erred in coming to that decision, or coming to that decree?—I am convinced they cannot.

If any council had ever, as some Protestants erroneously suppose they have, enjoined the not keeping faith with heretics, would it be a matter of faith or a matter of discipline?—It would not be a matter of faith, or a matter of discipline, it would be a gross violation of right and justice and of the law of nature, which no council could enjoin; because it would be overturning the very law of God, which is anterior to all councils.

It would have overturned the law of God; it would have been a matter of faith and not of discipline; supposing for instance, such a principle to have been laid down?—It would have been unjust in any case, in the sense in which it is generally understood; namely, that faith between man and man is not to be observed, because they are of different religions, as much as if they were of the same religion.

Have you read the decrees of councils?—I have read many of them.

Is it your belief that many things are not contained in them, which would give reason to a fair and candid Protestant to believe that that doctrine had been propounded?—I think a fair and candid Protestant not much versed in the proceedings of councils, might have been led without much fault on his part to that conclusion.

Do you conceive there are some passages in the decrees of councils which do admit of such application, as might admit of that?—I have never read any decree of the kind, which has been referred to, which would lead, if rightly understood, to that conclusion.

Is the third Lateran council supposed to be one of the general councils of the Roman Catholic church?—Yes.

Are the Commissioners mis-informed, or in error, in supposing that in the 27th chapter of that council, there is the following passage; “That all those who are any way bound to heretics, should consider themselves absolved from all fidelity and obedience due to them, so long as they persist in their iniquity?”—Taken in that isolated shape, I believe it might be found in the decrees of the council to which reference has been made, but it should be understood with reference to the general context, and the history of the council itself should also be read in order to understand that passage rightly; at that period, and at some periods antecedent and subsequent to it, there were heresies broached in different parts of Europe, and councils were held for the purpose of suppressing them; those councils or several of them, were held not for the sole purpose of suppressing the heresy, but also for the purpose of of enacting laws for the temporal and spiritual concerns of those kingdoms, who sent there their bishops, and their ambassadors or orators, so that those councils and that one of Lateran by name, might be styled a sort of congress of the European powers, as well as a council of bishops; it was agreed by the potentates forming that council, that certain petty princes who maintained or supported heresies or heretics within their petty state should be put as it were under the ban of the empire, as having forfeited their right to their fiefs, so that opinion, or vote, or decree, might be understood as relating to the subjects of those petty princes, who by countenancing a practice contrary to the laws of the church and the state, should on that account lose their fiefs, and that their subjects should no longer pay them obedience, but pay it to the lord paramount, or if they had no lord paramount, pay it to the emperor; thus, when a decree says, that fidelity is not to be paid or kept towards the persons of heretics, it is to be understood in this way, namely, that those persons by the general consent of the potentates, that is, the temporal and ecclesiastical powers, and by the laws of the empire, had forfeited their rights to their principalities or possessions; such were the institutions of these times.

Does it not appear to you, that the words, that "all those who are any way bound to heretics," are rather of a more comprehensive signification than confined to emperors or fiefs?—I believe the words quoted are to be understood of leagues or treaties, or things of that kind, entered into between each other by the little states who revolted against the larger, or against the church, and in such cases we ought never to forget that the laws of the church were at the same time laws of the state, and that those persons who, previous to the holding of that council, had broached the heresy, had thereby also violated the law of the land; in England the Gospel is part of the law of the land, and the man who abuses it is liable to be prosecuted at our tribunals; so in Spain, which received the discipline of the Council of Trent, a man who violated it might be punished by the lay tribunals.

Do not you think that a Protestant might be excused for a misunderstanding of this passage?—I think if he was unacquainted with the history of those times, and read that single isolated passage, he could hardly come to a right conclusion.

Do you recollect the date of the Lateran Council?—I think it was in the time of Alexander the Third.—(Doctor Murray.) About 1179, in the feudal times.

In the fourth Lateran council, and the third canon, there is this passage; "That the Roman Catholics who, under the banner of the cross, shall set about the extermination of heretics, shall enjoy a full remission of their sins as much as those who go to the Holy Land;" will you have the goodness to offer any observations that may occur to you respecting that passage?—As well as I recollect, the Albigenses are alluded to in that council; they were people who revived the horrible crimes of the Manicheans, and indulged in gross vices against nature; the powers of Europe assembled in order to suppress this nuisance, and they enacted, conjointly with the church, the most severe laws to be enforced against them; the Pope grants in addition what we call a plenary indulgence, to persons who would engage in this war against the Albigenses, and the remission of their sins in the same manner as the people going to the Crusade could obtain it, and which is to be understood thus; "the remission of the temporal punishment due to the sins they might have committed, in as ample a manner as the church can grant it;" for though the church in its bulls uses the phrase, remission of sin, it is like the invocation we were just speaking of, and is to be understood in the manner the language of that time was understood, and conformably to similar modes of language used in the sacred Scriptures. When I was asked, for instance, before the Commons, something about the phrase in the Bull of Indiction of the Jubilee, in which there is an expression like to that now mentioned, I answered what I will beg to repeat now, "that in the Scriptures, the name of sin is often given to that which is not sin, but which is an offering for sin, or in some way connected with it;" so it is said by Saint Paul, "that he who had no sin was made sin for us;" and again, it is said in one of the books of the Old Testament, "they shall eat, (speaking of the priests) the sins of my people;" this phraseology then, is taken from the Scriptures and brought into the bulls which have been issued, and is to be understood in a sense analagous to that in which it is used in the Scriptures; and that this is the right interpretation of it, is deduced from this, that in all our catechisms which explain the principles of our faith throughout the universal church, and in all our prayer books, whenever there is mention of an indulgence of any kind, in any shape whatever, it is stated to be a remission of the temporal punishment due to sin, and not of the sin itself, and that one of the conditions, and a necessary one for gaining any indulgence whatever is, that the person be contrite for any offence he may have committed against God, and if possible approach to the sacrament of penance.

You consider the word heretic in the passage just read to you, as exclusively confined to the Albigenses?—I believe it referred to the Albigenses.

You conceive the council had no reference to future times?—Certainly it is an universal rule with the church, that it never speculates; it always treats of the matter before it, and never goes beyond it; that mode of proceeding is singularly exemplified in the Council of Nice, the Council of Constantinople, the Council of Ephesus, and the Council of Chalcedon, each of which confined itself to a decision upon the simple point of faith which was brought under its consideration at the time.

Is the passage first read to you from the first Lateran council, a matter of faith or a matter of discipline?—I can scarcely call it one or the other; it appears to be a matter of policy mixed with faith; I do not know what the heresies were, or what the nature of the decree or vote was, to which allusion is made.

You understand the council as defining an article of faith, and therefore as a council of faith faith when it propounds an article of faith to the church at large?—Yes; and that in that it is infallible, and in that only.

The Commissioners observe in the fourth Lateran Council, canon the third, the following passage, and which they are informed is repeated by the Council of Constance; “if any temporal or other prince being required and admonished, shall have neglected to clear his country from heretical pollution, he shall be excommunicated by the metropolitan and provincial bishops, and if he shall have refused to make satisfaction within a year, his conduct shall be signified to the Roman Pontiff; that his vassals should be absolved from all obedience to him, his lands should be seized by the Catholics, who after exterminating the heretics shall possess it without any dispute;” does that appear to you to recognize the power of a transfer of property in consequence of contumacy, and also the sanction of the extermination of heretics?—(Doctor Murray.) That is to be explained exactly in the same way as Doctor Doyle has already mentioned; that was a decree of what may be called an assembly of the States General of Christendom, held at Lateran, to consider the means of saving various estates from the effects of that dreadful moral contagion which was spreading in the twelfth century, when heresies were broached which taught marriage to be a crime, and other doctrines were advanced which were calculated to upturn the very foundations of society itself; the different powers of Europe there assembled together with the church, agreed as to the necessity of using strong measures to put a stop to this evil, and ordained that any person who would not obey this decree of the assembled powers, should be considered as a criminal, and be subject to the punishment that was there assigned for his crime, by this general depositary of, as well the civil as the ecclesiastical authority of christendom.*

Does not that passage go further than pronouncing the punishment of heretics; does it not suppose the case of a prince, guilty merely of the crime of abstaining from clearing his country from heretical pollution?—From his not uniting with the other powers to protect his country from the contagion which was spreading, they considered him of course as an enemy, as from those states in which the contagion was allowed to remain, it would spread to the rest.

Is it to be understood that that particular decision of the council flowed from the inspiration of the Holy Spirit or not?—That is not one of the cases in which we say the council is infallible; it is only infallible where it propounds to the church a matter of faith, but in such a matter as that it is as liable to err as any other society, and even in any reasoning on which its decisions are founded it may go astray, it is merely where it proposes to the church an article of faith that we conceive a council cannot teach an error.

Do you conceive any one of the three decrees or canons of councils referred to, as having any binding nature or effect at present?—Not the least; they applied to particular cases which have passed away, and they have not the least validity at present.

Have they ever been repealed, rescinded, denied, or in any manner condemned?—They were repealed by the fact, that they are no longer in existence: they regarded a particular case, and passed away when that case ceased.

Are the Commissioners to understand that those once pronounced, have been renounced, or only in abeyance, in consequence of no opportunity calling for their exercise?—The principles they were supposed to imply not being entertained, the imputation of them has of course been renounced.—(Dr Doyle.) They could not be in abeyance, whereas they emanated from a congress of European powers, which consisted of the emperors and feudal lords. The whole feudal system has passed away as well as the Albigenses, and hence their laws cannot be in abeyance. When the end of a law ceases, it is moreover a universal maxim among jurists, that the law itself ceases; as to these laws, therefore, being in abeyance, that cannot be. They are not the laws of the church of which there is a question, but the laws of the universal states of Europe, as well as of the pope and bishops with them which should also be recollected.

You conceive those are in no case to be taken as the rules of the church at present?—Certainly no more than the Pandects of Justinian; they never were at all the laws of the church as a distinct body at any period.

You do not consider those canons as canons of general faith and general principles, for the guidance and observance of the church, but as rules established by particular assemblies for particular purposes?—Precisely so.

Those assemblies representing temporal as well as spiritual authorities?—Just so.

Is it your opinion that those decrees historically speaking, were never considered as laws in the church subsequent to the particular occasion of the Albigenses to which they alluded?—I consider them no more than precedents which might be followed if governments existed such as then did, and circumstances arose precisely similar to those which occasioned their enactment.

You are deliberately of opinion that no such general principles have existence in the Roman Catholic church?—I consider them principles that existed in the Roman Catholic church,

or

* This decree is considered spurious by the Protestant ecclesiastical historian Collier and others; if genuine, we must remember that it does not regard mere speculative opinions, but practices of a nature so horrid that Society it was thought should, for its own preservation, endeavour to put them down. Finally it is a decree, of which, even if genuine, every Catholic is quite at liberty to disapprove, whereas it is not a definition of the church, proposing to the faithful a doctrine to be by them acknowledged and believed as an article of faith.

We find it recorded in the continuation of Fleury's Ecclesiastical History, (l. 77 & 49) that there were present at the Fourth General Council of Lateran, either in person or by their ambassadors, the two emperors of the East and of the West, the kings of England, France, Hungary, Arragon, Sicily, Jerusalem, Cyprus, with a great number of inferior potentates.

or rather in the states professing the Roman Catholic religion; but the spirit of them has died away with the state of society which gave rise to them.

Do you conceive it ever was the principle of the Roman Catholic church that faith might be broken with heretics, because they were heretics?—Certainly not.

Do you conceive it was ever the principle of the Roman Catholic church, that the Pope might jure divino, absolve subjects from their allegiance?—Certainly not.

Do you not conceive that those principles, the deposing power, breach of faith with heretics, and the doctrine that it is right to injure men, because they differ from you in religion, are principles now universally condemned by the Roman Catholic church?—Universally condemned by the Roman Catholic church, and we feel humiliated when they are imputed to us by any one; for no person of knowledge could impute them to us.

Should not you consider that a man acted sinfully who broke his faith with a Protestant?—Just as much as if he broke it with myself.

Should you not conceive it to be his duty to resist any potentate who came to invade his country, though he came with a bull of the Pope, assigning the kingdom to that potentate?—I should feel myself equally obliged to oppose the person bringing a bull as if he came without it, and I should feel bound to oppose him with all my might.

Do you conceive the person not doing so would be doing wrong?—Unquestionably; that he would be guilty of a great violation of his duty to the state.

Is the oath of allegiance now taken by the Roman Catholics, as applicable to those doctrines (that is, in rejection of them), a faithful declaration of the opinions and feelings and tenets of the Roman Catholic church upon these subjects?—It is.

(To Dr. Kelly.)—The Commissioners have understood it is the custom of the Roman Catholic prelates to disapprove of pilgrimages to holy wells and such other places; is that your feeling?—It is.

In point of fact, is it the very general habit of the peasantry in your part of Ireland to resort to a place called Saint Patrick's Purgatory, in the county of Donegal?—Some individuals, I understand, go there; but it is not a general practice.

Have you ever had any communication with the bishop who has had that part of Ireland in his charge, which would enable you to give any information upon the subject?—I cannot particularly describe what passes there.

Have you ever had any communication with any of the pilgrims on their return?—Yes, I have seen them on their return. I am informed that they enter into a kind of retreat for three or four days in the island; they live during that time most abstemiously, I believe on bread and water; during that time they frequent the sacraments. There is a clergyman there who gives prayers, and they go to confession, and receive the sacrament, and spend those days whilst they are in this retreat in prayer and fasting.

The scene is a small island in a romantic lake?—Yes.

Have you understood whether there are any particular penances or infliction of pain super-added to fasting and prayer?—The superadded infliction of pain is, I believe, voluntary.

Do they suffer pain as well as hunger and the duty of prayer?—I believe they remain on their knees a good while, which inflicts bodily pain.

Have you any means of forming an opinion, whether the number which actually resort in the summer to Saint Patrick's Purgatory, exceeds or falls short of a hundred thousand?—I should not conceive it approached to that number, but I am not acquainted with the place.

You say they are received by a priest; is it your impression that they are received by several priests, who attend for the purpose of receiving the pilgrims?—Yes, there are many; I do not know the number.

Do you conceive the priests persevere in doing that, contrary to the sentiment of Roman Catholic prelates?—I am not aware that the Roman Catholic prelate of that district has issued any prohibition.

The Commissioners understand from you, it is a practice you do not approve of?—I do not approve of the pilgrimages which have been performed in my part of the country, for I have witnessed abuses of them; what passes in other parts of the country I do not know. If people retire to an island to praise God, to adore and serve him, and to enter into a spiritual retreat, and that their going there and returning home be not attended with any abuse or impropriety of conduct, I think it is a very laudable praiseworthy thing; but I have been informed, that on their way to the pilgrimages, and on their return home, great abuses have been committed; and it is on that account I have discountenanced pilgrimages at wells.

Do you not think it probable, that if abuses have existed in regard to those pilgrimages, equal abuses have existed in others?—I cannot say.

Have they been altogether discontinued in your diocese?—No. I beg leave to make an observation with respect to the councils; when we say that a general council is infallible, it is when it propounds an article of faith to the universal church for its acceptance and its adoption. The passages which have been cited from the Councils of Lateran have not been addressed to the universal church as articles of faith; these councils did not require the universal church to accept of those doctrines as articles of faith; others did not enjoin them; it was a mere matter of regulation, and neither addressed to the universal church, nor was the doctrine contained in these passages ever accepted by the universal church; therefore I do not consider the matter referred to as the decision of a general council.

Is there, in your opinion, nothing which, coupled with the commentary of history, might alarm a fair and candid Protestant?—I think a Protestant not understanding it in the sense I have stated might be alarmed; there are many things that pass in general councils by which we are not bound ; in order to ascertain whether it is in the province of the council or not, it must be propounded to the universal church for its acceptance, and not merely a matter of private regulation.

The Rev.

DO you think that the children acquire much taste for study ?—I do think they do.

Do you think, if they were to read the Scriptures without receiving the comment and explanations upon it that you are in the habit of providing for them on Sundays, it would make much impression upon their minds ?—I should think it would produce a good deal, but very far short of what it does in the other way. I know Roman Catholics who attend my school, and who are not subjected to any oral instruction upon it, generally are far inferior in their acquaintance with it to the Protestants who prepare it with the view of being examined by me.

Is any thing but the catechism taught on the Saturday, during the hours when the school is devoted exclusively to the use of the Protestants ?—No ; except that some of them prove parts of the church service from the Scriptures, and sometimes we keep some of the children a little longer to read the church service, intending that they should join in the responses in the church, which they have not been in the habit of doing.

Is it from the catechetical instructions they receive on that day they derive their understanding of the Scriptures ?—No, it is out of school, when all the Protestants attend me ; I have about 140 Protestants that I hear myself every week ; I have divided them into three classes, according as is convenient to them from local situation ; I go to a farmer's house on Friday evening and Saturday evening, and to the church on Sunday morning ; and the children of all the different schools, according as it is convenient to them, meet me at one or other of those three places, and there I hear them, and explain the Scriptures ; and their anxiety is to be prepared so as to answer to me ; the different schools being all joined, some children coming from one and some from another, it excites a sort of desire in each school that the children shall answer well, and I think that is a sort of thing that gives them a stimulus.

Does your curate render you particular assistance on those occasions ?—He always takes the lower class ; viz. those who are not in the Scriptures.

Do they read the portions of the Scriptures that you explain to them on the Sunday ?—On Sunday evening, in the church, I explain a chapter, and that chapter is read and got by heart by all the children in the different schools, and I examine them in three distinct sets upon Friday evening, Saturday evening, and Sunday morning before church ; if it is a long chapter, I divide it into two, but generally I give them a chapter every week.

Do you think that that is a sufficient quantity for them to study in one week ?—I think, for children who have many of them a great deal to do, it is, perhaps, as great a quantity as they are able to learn well ; whereas other children, who have no other employment, might certainly learn more ; but I find that with many of them it is enough.

Do they read daily the same chapter ?—They divide the chapter into suppose six portions in the school, and they read a portion of it, and learn it by heart every day ; and then they repeat it all the last day, so as to be prepared for me.

Does their study of the New Testament in the course of the week not extend beyond the single chapter, which I understand you to say they learn ?—That is the portion of it which they particularly attend to ; they may in the different schools read more, perhaps read a chapter in the Old Testament, or part of the Scriptures they had read before, to keep up their acquaintance with it ; but that is all the advance ground, if I may so say, in the week.

Do you prefer the course of making them perfectly acquainted with the New Testament, chapter by chapter, as it occurs, to reading more rapidly and a little less attentively a large portion ?—Indeed I do, because some of the children without that would not know any thing ; if you made them run over a large quantity, they would not know any thing when they came to the end of it ; and therefore, from some experience, the conclusion I have come to is, that it is better to secure a small portion well acquired, than to have a few get more advantages, and the majority of them not know any thing ; I may be mistaken.

If on the Saturday a certain chapter was to be the subject of comment, and they were to read the Testament either every day in the week, or three days in the week, should you prefer their reading repeatedly the same chapter, in order to enable them to come with their minds prepared to instruction and examination on Saturday ; should you prefer their reading successively the other chapters, taking care that the chapter to be commented on should be one of those they had read in the week ?—I should prefer it being one, because they would not be able to carry off more.

Do the children read through the four Gospels successively ?—No ; they have not in the school read all the four Gospels ; they have read Matthew, Luke and John ; I do not think they ever read Mark in the school.

Will you explain the reason of the omission of St. Mark ?—It is because it is so like the others, and we are still anxious to go on.

Is the scriptural instruction of the children confined to the Gospels, or does it include the Acts

915
Examination of

Acts and the Epistles?—Since I have begun the present system, we have not come to the Epistles; and I do not know when I end this year what I shall put them to. If I put them into the Epistles, then I should fear I was putting the smaller children to what they could not comprehend, and if I do not put them to it, I should feel I was keeping the larger children from what they ought to be made acquainted with, so that I shall be under the necessity of altering my plan again. I have put them through Genesis, Exodus and most part of the five books of Moses; through Matthew, Luke and John, and the Acts. I have put them through those books upon that system; all reading the same portion, and they are now asking me what they shall read next year; and I am obliged to say, I do not know yet.

Do you not think that even the younger children would be able to comprehend the Epistles of Saint John and Saint James, with the same degree of assistance you have given them?—Indeed I should think they would.

And also many passages of the Epistles of St. Paul?—Yes, many passages; but those who have been engaged in teaching children, know it is very remarkable how much worse a child will answer the spiritual part of the Scriptures than the historical part of it; what the children are just finishing with me, is Saint John's Gospel; and some children certainly will not answer so well a spiritual chapter of Saint John, as they will the parables, or the historical part of Saint Luke; you find that their mind does not draw it in as well.

And such spiritual passages also impose more labour on the teacher?—Yes, no doubt; and perhaps do more good to those who are able to comprehend them.

Do you think it probable, under any circumstances, it will be your proceeding to put the children indiscriminately through the Epistles?—No; not put the children indiscriminately through the whole of the Epistles; but indiscriminately may apply either to the children or the Scriptures; I would not put the children indiscriminately, because you might as well be giving them something to read in a foreign language.

Do you conceive, under any circumstances, you would be able to put any of the children through the whole of the Epistles?—Certainly, some of them.

We will suppose, then, the case of the children having the advantage only of what may be expected as an average degree of care and explanation upon the part of the teacher; and seeing that it is extremely important that they should be made acquainted with parts of the Epistles, and scarcely possible that they should be made familiar with the whole of them; could you suggest to us any principle of discrimination as to which parts you would recommend to a teacher so circumstanced, to bring before the attention of the children in preference to others, it being understood, that the question does not contemplate the printing any thing separately, or in the form of selections out of the New Testament?—I think it would be very easy for a teacher to select out of the whole of the Epistles, portions that would be highly edifying to them and equally intelligible with the other parts of Scripture to the grown up children; my difficulty has been, that I have been in the habit of making all the children read the same, and there is the difficulty that lies with me; I want not to have two classes in the Scriptures, but one; and I have put the children through that which I suppose to be common ground to the grown up children and the younger ones; and now I must either keep the grown ones from reading what they ought to read, or I must divide my Scripture class into two; and then I cannot hear them all myself, which I wish to do.

If no opportunity of explanation to the children was given, would you think it desirable to put all the Testament readers through all the Epistles indiscriminately?—I should rather put them through them all indiscriminately, than put them through none indiscriminately if the choice was put to me, whether will you give it to them all indiscriminately, or whether you will say they shall none of them have them, I would say, let them all have them all.

In the catechetical instruction you give to the children, do you confine it to the church catechism?—Yes.

Have you had opportunities of becoming acquainted with the other catechisms in use in the schools in Ireland, called Crossman's, Stopford's and Mann's?—Yes.

Do you think it is desirable to teach them to the children successively?—As far as my own limited observation goes, it is time thrown away upon the children; they learn them by rote, and do not know the meaning of them.

Does your observation apply to all catechisms?—To those that are learnt off by heart, I think the church catechism, if you do not only take it as a ground work for instruction, does not convey any idea to the children; I ask them to prove the several parts of it out of the Scriptures—if I was to give an example, I should say, "you are to renounce the devil and all his works." I ask the children to give me texts of Scripture to prove that position, and so lead them on in that way.

In what manner do they find those texts?—The way I began with them was this; I gave them an answer in the catechism that they were to prove. I told them the chapters in the Testament in which they were to find the texts, and they looked them over, and their judgment was exercised, by selecting them, and then by degrees I found they did not want that help of marking the chapter, and it is wonderful the number of texts which they will find; they made by chance a very great improvement upon my original system. I intended they should have sat down in the school and found the texts out there; they mistook me, and thought they were to do it at home, so that they have the whole family looking out for the texts, which I find is a wonderful improvement upon the system.

Do you find that they take great pleasure in it?—Yes, they do; they will first begin with mere verbal agreements—any text that has the same word in it, but they soon shew they are led by the sense.

In the explanations you give to the children of the chapter in the Scripture that they have read, do you think it necessary, in reference to the circumstances in this country, in which they are placed, amongst persons of different religions, to enter fully into the explanation of controversial matters?—No; I have almost entirely abstained from it.

On what principle?—I was afraid the minds of the children would rather be turned to it as a matter of controversy than a matter of personal feeling; and I knew I could easily excite a controversial feeling amongst them; but I was not so anxious to do that, as to excite a really pious personal feeling, and I have most cautiously, in every instance, abstained from it.

If you come to a text that is given differently in the two versions, or to a text that is differently interpreted by the two churches, do you pass it unnoticed?—Where I explain, I have stated they are my own flock; and I state to them what I conceive to be the truth simply, but without a view to the opposite opinions held; that has been my general habit.

You teach affirmatively, not comparatively?—Yes, generally; there may be exceptions; things may come across one's mind at the time; but it has been my principle to abstain, to keep the people from controversy as far as I could.

About what length of time does it occupy you to give the explanations you are in the habit of giving on the Sunday?—To the class that assemble in the church, about an hour or an hour and a quarter before service, and perhaps on the week evenings, when we are not stinted in time, about an hour and a half.

Are the catechetical examinations that are promoted by the Association for discountenancing Vice, established in your parish?—Yes; I am to have on Friday and Saturday an annual examination of the children of my parish.

Does the religious instruction the children obtain at the school you have been describing, enable them to obtain premiums under these examinations?—Yes.

Do you think that the catechism and a chapter in the week is sufficient for that purpose?—Yes; they keep up the ground they have gone over, so that when they come to be examined a second year, they have made themselves acquainted with large portions, so that they are able to answer according to the plan adopted in former years, but they cannot answer every year according to the present plan.

Do you require of the children to take their Testaments home with them?—I do not require them to do so at the day school.

It would be permitted if they liked it?—Yes, certainly; all are provided with them.

Does each Testament belong to a particular person, or are they school books?—They have them in all shapes in the Sunday school; they take them home, and for the every day school, they are in the school; they have them both ways.

Are the Testaments of both the authorized version and the Douay version used in the school?—No; we have always offered it, but finding there was the same objection to one and the other, it would have been rather inconvenient in the school, and therefore we have not used the Douay version, but always offered it, either at the Sunday school or the day school; any Roman Catholic child that had their own version, might use it, but they said they would as soon have the one as the other.

Is the difference between the two versions such as to make it impossible for the children to read them in alternate verses in class?—They might do it, but the teacher must have his eye upon both books.

Are any of the schools you are in the habit of inspecting or paying attention to taught by Roman Catholic masters?—There is one taught by a Roman Catholic woman, that is principally supported by me; I pay her so much a year; it is up in the wildest part of the mountains, about five miles from my house; that is the only one under Protestant care that is taught by a Roman Catholic.

Does that vary much in its character from those taught by a Protestant master and mistress?—She is not qualified so well; she is one I found there; she is a well-conducted decent woman.

Are there many schools in the parish that are exclusively Roman Catholic, to which Protestants are not admitted?—No; they would take Protestants; but there are hedge schools where they teach the Roman Catholic catechism, but they are very bad schools indeed.

Is the master of those schools entirely supported by the pay of the scholars?—Yes; or supported by the people; they sometimes get their diet from house to house.

In the school connected with the Association which you have described, do any of the children pay, or are all of them taught gratis?—Most of them pay.

Are the parents of the children who pay in a rank of life considerably above those who receive gratuitous instruction?—No; the way I do with them is this; if they will send two children to the school, I pay for one; with some of them, if they send three, I pay for one, so as to try to lighten the payment a little upon them; and some of them, who are very poor, send them quite free, and some of them would not accept of it.

Do you think that they object to accepting gratuitous instruction?—A certain class of the people do object to it, and that class of the people that are in as great want of good instruction as any other, and I could give you an illustration of this, drawn from my experience in my own neighbourhood; when I went there, all the ladies and gentlemen that were disposed to promote education, thought the way was to have free schools; they had small free schools, and clothed the children; had their masters or mistresses, and school houses, and every thing of that kind, at a great expense, and only a few children; I suggested, when I went there, that the same house, and the same master and schoolmistress could do a great deal more good if they had not free schools, and if they would allow the decent sort of farmers to send their children, and pay so much a quarter for them. Lady Rathdown had a school of 20, and upon my suggestion she altered the plan of it, and she has now from 70 to 80, and all the respectable farmers have had their children educated at her school; they would really have had no means of instruction for their children unless that plan had been acted upon; and at Colonel Howard's, the late Mrs. Howard set up a free school, where there are now 20 scholars, and while Lady Rathdowne has a school of 90, with a mistress, not so good, and the children not so well taught, in Colonel Howard's, it is often hard to keep the number full; those who are of a certain class, who are unable to procure education for their children by getting a master, yet will not send to a charity school; they will send where there are children, if they pay themselves; and therefore, as far as my experience goes, I think the system of free schools is a bad system, because it leaves out a certain class whose pride, and if I may ever use the expression, whose right pride will hinder them from taking gratuitous instruction, and are not able to procure good instruction for their children.

Does not the free school system necessarily lead to this anomaly, that the lowest class in society may eventually become better educated than the class next immediately above them?—Yes, it would; I have known, in some parts of Ireland, where free schools in that way literally did harm; they broke up more respectable schools—schools where the children were taught by better educated masters, and where the most respectable class of the people sent their children, and who were just as completely in want of education as the poorest.

In any general system of schools, which should you think the best rule; that the general principle should be free admission, but with the exception, that those might pay who pleased; or that the general rule should be, that payment should be the principle, but with a sound and proper discretion, vested in particular persons, to make exceptions, and admit those free who could not pay?—I would, undoubtedly, prefer, that the general principle of the school should be pay, and that the not paying should be the exception; if that principle was properly acted upon, I am satisfied it would answer among the poor farmers, where the education of their children is as great a desideratum as amongst the poorest people, and if you do not meet their prejudices, they will not send their children; there is no school where the children are better taught than in the one put down in the return at Colonel Howard's; the respectable people send their children to inferior schools, not so convenient to them, because it is a charity school, and if that same woman had a school that could hold 50 children instead of 20, and that they were allowed to pay a reasonable price for it, she would have her school full in a week.

Why does not Colonel Howard change his system?—I do not know that it was ever suggested to him; it was a system that Mrs. Howard liked.

Are the children who pay and those who are taught free, treated exactly alike in the school?—Yes; in the schools I have any thing to say to, exactly the same; I might state a circumstance to shew what a small thing will make a difference; I found, some time ago, in my school, that the master used to make the free children stay and sweep the school-room; they were some of them the children of the same families, those children who were not asked to do it, and I found it was a great offence to the parents that it marked them in the school, and I immediately ordered that the master should keep a person to do it; that it was his business to sweep the school, and I would not allow the children to do it; some children would not do it, and I said none should do it.

If a portion of the children pay for the instruction they receive, do you think it desirable that the payment should be received entirely by the master, even although he should receive a salary?—I think it is always good to make him feel an interest in the attendance of the school, and the prosperity of the school.

Is that object promoted by giving him the payments of the children?—Yes; he is anxious for every child that goes.

Have you ever known the practice of distributing the money received from the children in clothes and rewards?—Yes, I have; but we do not do it.

Do the children pay quarterly or weekly?—Quarterly, in a country place; it never answers for them to pay weekly, and I will tell you one very great advantage of weekly payments, where they are not able to pay regularly; they take their child away for a week, and the irregularity that comes from that does more harm than can be conceived.

Will you state what are the rates of payment which, upon the whole, you would recommend to be established?—That must depend entirely upon the country; our's is a very dear country; from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 3d. a quarter is the common rate that is paid, but in remote countries that would be too high.

For 3s. 3d. per quarter are we to understand, that not only reading but writing and arithmetic is taught?—Yes; for that they teach them reading and writing, and I believe they teach higher when they pay higher.

Is arithmetic taught in the school connected with the Association?—Yes; and it should be taught in every school, in my humble judgment; if you wish to do good to the middling orders, you must attract them by what they value; they think a fine arithmetic book, written out, is a sure test of a good school, and if a master is not able to put the children through Voster or Joyce, he is considered an ignoramus; they will not come to a mere Scripture school, and you must, in order to gratify the children's parents, teach them profit and loss, and tare and tret, which will never do them any good whatever.

Are the objections which are made by Roman Catholic priests, to the attendance of the children in the schools in which the Scriptures are read, more strongly pressed now than at former times?—Yes; there has been increasing hostility for some years; when I first went to the parish of Powerscourt, there was no objection made; the children went, and some of the priests did not say any thing.

Can you call to mind when the objections first commenced?—I think it is about five or six years ago; we had a priest not very clerical in his character, and he did not trouble himself about our schools, and then we got a more strict priest, and since he came he has made more objections.

Do you think the objections are owing chiefly to the change of the individual, or has there an increased jealousy arisen upon scriptural education?—I think an increased jealousy has arisen, and that the individual has been more influenced by the change of times than the change of times has been made by him.

How do you account for the change that has taken place in the degree of resistance that is offered to the scriptural education of the Roman Catholics?—I should think there has been more attention generally to the subject, both amongst Protestants and Roman Catholics, within these last five or six years, than there was before; Protestants have been more active in teaching and instructing the people around them, and Roman Catholics have been more excited to consider their own particular views; I think the general increase of interest upon the subject of religion has been the great cause of it.

Do you think the fears that the Roman Catholics entertain of the interference of the Protestants in the religious creed of their people, is far greater now than it was at the period you first came to reside at Powerscourt?—Yes, I think it is greatly increased; there is more jealousy upon the subject.

Is there greater resistance to the principle of scriptural education this year than there was last year?—I believe there is not more in principle; but there has been more active exertion this year than there ever was before.

Do you attribute that to any particular cause?—The priests seem to be more active generally; my own opinion is, that they see something going on amongst their people more than we see; I think they see something of improvement, and an illumination of their minds, that they are jealous of. I do believe that they have found more freedom of thought amongst their people than they did in former years.

Do you attribute that freedom of thought to any particular cause?—I should think to the increase of education and the spread of the Scriptures.

Do you mean freedom of thought particularly upon religious subjects?—Yes, I believe so.

Do you think that tends in any degree to what is generally understood by the term free-thinking?—No, I do not mean that; but I think it is opposed to that blind following of their instructors that they were in the habit of shewing.

Will you state your experience as to the success of the exertions of the Roman Catholic clergy in your own district in times past, in withdrawing the children from the schools?—When I first set up this school that I speak of, there was no school in that part of the country; it is about two miles and a half from my house, up towards the mountains. The majority of the children were Roman Catholics, and by degrees, that majority has been turned into a minority; and I now think out of 114 children upon the roll last month, there were but 26 Roman Catholics.

Is it your opinion then that the success of the Roman Catholic clergy in opposing that particular system of instruction has been proportionate to their exertions?—No; in some places they have succeeded, in others they have not; immediately about my residence almost all the Roman Catholics send their children in spite of the priests; and in the neighbourhood of my school, about two miles and a half from my house, they are more out of the reach of the Protestants.

Have you observed an alteration of success and failure attend the exertions of the Roman Catholic clergy?—No; when they first began, they began quietly; they used to take the children to attend their stations, and then they quietly removed them without any noise; they succeeded more in that way than when they began to speak out plainly against the Scripture education; then the people began to rebel, and said they would send their children; their quiet exertions for two or three years has done more than their open opposition.

Do you mean that the avowal of the principle of excluding the children from scriptural education has had the effect of exciting disapprobation?—Yes, particularly where they have not provided other schools; in my parish where they have prohibited them from going to our schools, they have provided no others; I have gone into many houses, and seen seven or eight children training up in total ignorance; and the people said it was the priest who forbade them to send them to school. I have asked them, are they to be doomed to total ignorance; they said they did not know; but lately they are building a school near the chapel in my parish; but till now, all their efforts to keep the children from our schools, were unaccompanied with providing any other schools for them; there are only 150 children going to the schools out of 2,400 Roman Catholics, while there are 197 going out of 800 Protestants.

Do you find that the excitation and jealousy amongst the middle and lower ranks of Roman Catholics, that unhappily prevail at the present moment, is attended with any increased estrangement of manner towards you, in the daily intercourse you necessarily have with them?—No; I have found them as civil and kind to me as they ever were, particularly about my residence; perhaps not so much so in the more remote parts, where I have not so much intercourse with them.

Do you believe that the circumstance of there being no Roman Catholic schools, arose from the want of means on the part of the clergy?—I suppose the means not being easily had, might be an obstacle; but I confess my feeling is, that they had not any desire for the education of the people.

When that school is erected, do you think their efforts to clear your school will be effectual?—Yes, I suppose they will for a while; but I find that the people generally think they are not so well taught in their schools as in ours.

Do you think that the Roman Catholic priests in your parish have the power to prevent the the greater part of their flock from attending the schools at present established?—They have the power of preventing the greater part of their flock; but as I told Mr. Doyle the other day, in a conversation I had with him, that he had not the power of taking them all away; that there were many of them that would sooner give the priests up than give up the schools.

From what you have been able to observe of the conduct and opinions of the Roman Catholic clergy upon this point, have you any reason to believe that their exertions to prevent the attendance of the children in these schools will only be temporary?—I should certainly think, in a great many instances, it will only be temporary; but still if they are decidedly hostile to it they must have a great power over the mass of their ignorant people in keeping them away.

Do you not think over a large part of Ireland their influence will be more successfully exerted than in your parish?—Yes, much more; and yet in parts of my parish, remote from respectable inhabitants, their influence is extremely great indeed; but in the more civilized parts of it (for we have a great variety in my neighbourhood), they have not the power of taking them away; the people know the value of instruction, and having no other means of receiving it, they will not be deprived of it.

Have you known of any instances in which landlords have exerted any authority or influence they might have to prevail on their tenantry to send their children to the schools, notwithstanding the objection of the priests?—None at all in my parish; there has been no influence of a landlord used in the parish of Powerscourt, as far as I am acquainted with it; so far from it, that I remember once speaking to Lord Powerscourt, and saying, that it was a singular thing that not one Roman Catholic child that lived in his demense attended Sunday-schools; and I asked him if he would not speak to them, he said, “no, I will not;” “because if they refuse to send their children when I bid them, I should feel myself called on to turn them away. I would not keep any one that refused it if I bade them, and I would not even ask them.” I merely wished him to speak to them, to tell them they ought to send their children for instruction.

Do you think that much ill effect results from the state of struggle and contest in which the people are involved with their priesthood, by their desire to obtain instruction?—I think there is sometimes unpleasant feeling resulting from it; but I may say, that the general feeling of the persons I have spoken to, or that have spoken to me (for there are others that would not speak to me), has been rather that of sorrow that they were hindered from the means of instruction.

Do you think that the habit of deceiving the priests, to whom they ought to look with reverence and attachment, has a hurtful effect upon the minds of the people?—I certainly think it has, and so much so, that I have sometimes myself thought, with regard to individuals whom I knew had not acted fairly, whether it was a right thing in me to allow them to partake of that which they would not partake of openly and honestly.

Do you think if any system could be devised which could provide for the religious instruction of the Protestants and the Roman Catholics, and which could be acceptable to both classes, and that the children of both could be, to a very great extent, educated together, that the result would be to produce more harmony and concord between them than at present exists?—Yes, most certainly; I think the educating the Roman Catholics and Protestants together is a very important thing to do; with regard to exciting a kindly feeling in the country, it would be most desirable I conceive to hit upon any system that would be acceptable to both, and it is upon that ground I have made the compromise in my parish, and have given up the privilege of explaining the Scriptures to the Protestants in the school, for the sake of having a system that would be acceptable to the Roman Catholics also.

If the school you have described now to be building by the Roman Catholics in your parish succeeds, and if a number of Roman Catholics are withdrawn from your school, and yours should in consequence become almost exclusively a Protestant school, would not the effect of the separate education after a time tend very much to widen the breach that already exists between the two classes?—I certainly think so; and as far as my little experience goes, it would be a hurtful thing to have exclusive Protestant and exclusive Roman Catholic education.

Do you consider that the experiment you have entered into has been a successful experiment?—It has not at present, but there has not been time enough yet to prove it; the winter time is a bad time to judge of the filling of a school, we cannot judge until spring comes, until the weather improves, whether it will have the effect of increasing the quantity of education in the neighbourhood.

So that hitherto you cannot draw any certain conclusion in your own mind?—No; I think in Lady Rathdowne's day school there were 73 children; it is three weeks since the compromise was made, and there have been but three children sent back to the school in consequence of it; and I should state, that Lady Rathdowne told Mr. Doyle, before me, “If I do not find that the Roman Catholic children are sent to the school in consequence of the compromise, I will break it off, and go on upon the old system,” and then Mr. Doyle said, “If I recommend people to send their children to the school, you cannot consider me answerable for their minding it.” “No, but,” said she, “if I make a sacrifice in the school, with regard to explaining the Scriptures, it is for the more general use of the Catholics in the neighbourhood; and if that does not take place, I shall revert to the old system.”

You have said that the Roman Catholic priests were not anxious for education?—I meant, that I conceive the Roman Catholic priesthood know that intellectual education is not necessary to make the people good Roman Catholics, whose merit consists in submitting to authority;

Examination of
The Rev.

we think education is necessary to make the people good Protestants—I conceive that they do not feel that desire for education amongst their people; because intellectual apprehension of the subject is not as necessary to Roman Catholics as we consider it to be to us; that the essence of the one is to submit to authority, whereas it is the character of the other not to believe every spirit, but “to try the spirits, whether they be of God;” therefore the Protestant system looks more for education than the Roman Catholic does.

Then it is a conclusion drawn from your understanding of the Roman Catholic religion, rather than the practice of the Roman Catholic clergy?—It is drawn from my views of the Roman Catholic religion; and I conceive I am borne out also by my experience of the practice of the Roman Catholic clergy around me.

Do you know whether the Roman Catholic clergy in any manner discouraged the attendance of Roman Catholic children at schools where the Testament was not read, and where it was not insisted upon?—I am not acquainted with such schools; but I am acquainted with their withdrawing the children from schools in which the Testament was read, and not providing any other schools for them to go to, leaving them as they are in my neighbourhood, the great majority of them, in a totally uneducated state.

Will you have the goodness to state whether in your neighbourhood there are many Roman Catholics of opulence?—Not generally speaking.

Are you aware that the Roman Catholic clergy of Dublin, without any aid from the state, have established a variety of seminaries for the education of the lower orders?—Yes, I am fully aware of that.

Are you aware that in towns where there are opulent Roman Catholics the clergy have exerted themselves to establish schools?—Indeed, I believe they have; I conceive that is where the population themselves would cry out for education, and therefore of course they must have it in some shape, but where the people can be kept in ignorance, the priests are in too many instances not anxious to introduce education.

Has there lately been a school established at Enniskerry for the education of infants?—Yes.

Will you be so good as to describe the nature of that establishment?—I think there are forty-four or forty-six children at the school at Enniskerry; Enniskerry itself has not a sufficient number of small children to justify an infant school, so that there is a caravan that goes up into the mountains, and brings down twenty or thirty and carries them back again; there is a young woman who was trained under a Mr. Wilderskin, in England, who has the care of them, she seems to have a very tender feeling for the children, they are very much pleased with the process they go through, and their learning; it is a very pretty sight to see them; Lady Powerscourt gives them one meal in the middle of the day, on account of their having to come so far, and they seem as happy as they can be.

At what age are they received?—From two years old to six; they are superannuated at six.

In what is it possible to instruct them?—They learn their alphabet, and they learn to obey, and they sing a hymn, it is wonderful how well they sing; in short, they are trained to obedience until they are six years old, and then they are drafted into the other schools.

Are the parents fond of sending them there?—Yes, they are; but the Roman Catholics will not send them—the priest has objected to the infant school most strongly; I do not believe there is one Roman Catholic child in it.

Does he object to it more strongly than the other school?—Yes; I think there was more said against it.

Do you know on what ground it is objected to?—I can only speak from hearsay; that the Reverend Mr. Daly said, it was the greatest attempt that was ever made to make heretics of them from their very youth; but I know the people say that they are not allowed to send them; they would be very glad to send them if they were; the consequence is, that I do not believe there is a single Roman Catholic child in the school.

What hours do they attend?—From nine to three.

Does the caravan take them home again?—Yes; it brings them down and takes them up again, it goes about two miles up the mountains; I met it the other day, with twenty-two infants in it, and they seemed quite happy.

Have you formed any opinion of the comparative effects of education in charity schools in which the children are boarded, and necessarily separated from their parents, with that which is given to children in public schools which they attend daily from their homes?—I have for many years considered that the system of charity boarding schools was extremely erroneous, and that there was a great deal of evil connected with it; in the first place, there is a much greater expenditure of money—the sum that one of these small boarding schools costs, would give all the means of education to the whole neighbourhood around. My own opinion is, that though the heads of the children there educated are better stored with learning, that there is not that good effect produced upon those children as where you train them up in the scene in which they are afterwards to live; if you can excite any good habits in their houses, it is something accomplished; but you are never sure of any good effect produced by the instruction upon the child trained in a boarding school, and then thrown open to the wide world afterwards. I have generally found them turn out ill, and my own opinion is, that the system of education must be one that will carry it on in their own houses, connected with their families, and with the scenes they are afterwards to be conversant with in the world; I have been asked frequently to preach charity sermons for parochial schools here, as St. George's and St. Mary's, and different schools, but

I have declined it, from conviction that it was a bad principle. I have said, "You must excuse me."

Have you observed that any of those schools are so much better regulated than others, that you would consider them exceptions?—Yes; some of them are better, but I am sure the principle is a bad one; great care may sometimes overcome the bad tendency of the principle, but I feel assured that the principle is bad.

Have you had any opportunity of observing the effect of the Charter school education?—I have not had the same opportunity that I have had with the Foundling Hospital children. Among the Charter school children, they have friends to go to; but it is a dreadful state of absolute destitution that belongs to the Foundling Hospital children—it is that that makes them so much to be pitied; I have known some of the Charter school children got in for three, four or five years, by their parents, and then they were taken out, and there were their friends to receive them.

Have you known any instances of persons who have got their children into the Charter schools who would have been able to educate them if they had exerted themselves?—Yes; I have known a great many servants, and people of that kind, who have got their children into the Charter schools.

Appendix, N° 259.

Examination of the Rev. Benjamin William Mathias, on Oath;
Tuesday, 30th November 1824.

DO you know what catechism the children in the Bethesda school are taught?—The church catechism only, and the explanation of it, that was written by the late assistant chaplain, Mr. Murray.

Do you approve of Mr. Murray's explanation?—Yes, I do; I think it is calculated to extend their information.

Is it a controversial catechism?—I do not see it in a controversial point of view.

Are you well acquainted with the catechisms that go by the names of Stopford's and Mann's catechism, or Crossman's catechism?—I do not know Crossman's; I have been acquainted with Mann's, but there has been none used in the school but the church catechism and the explanation of it.

Do you think it forms a desirable part of the education of girls, that they should be taught a great number of different catechisms?—No, I do not think it is; personally, I should far rather make them conversant with the Scriptures.

Do you think that the religious instruction the children derive from learning numerous catechisms, is likely to make much impression upon their minds?—A good deal will depend upon the manner in which they are taught; if they are merely taught to exercise the memory, it can do them very little good; the multiplication of catechisms would only tend to perplex.

Is it found in practice, that learning no other catechism than the church catechism, and Mr. Murray's Explanation, they are able to distinguish themselves at the catechetical examinations of the Association?—There is only a small number sent in; not more than four; and they generally carry away one or two premiums.

Do they not feel at that examination the want of instruction in a greater variety of catechisms?—No; I think the examination runs very much upon the Scriptures, otherwise they certainly would not be able to compete with those who are acquainted with several catechisms.

Do you happen to know how often the children read the Scriptures in their school hours?—Very frequently, I believe.

As much as every day?—It is a book that they read in every day; that is, those that can read.

Do they read the Old Testament and the New?—I never knew of any limitation in that respect.

* * * * *

We should be glad to know the result of your experience, as to the susceptibility of religious impressions upon the minds of children of the age you have been speaking of?—I have known many instances of children, at a very early period, manifesting impressions favourable to religion; and I rather think it is because those impressions were not made on them at a very early period, or attempted to be made, that it does not appear.

Of the 34 children actually in the school, what proportion of them should you say have received any serious impressions?—I cannot speak of the children at present in the school; their education has not devolved upon me so immediately, but I know several; we had several children attending our sacrament very seriously; not at present, because they are very young, but I have known many of them go into life with very serious impressions, and out of that number you would have six or seven very serious attendants upon the sacrament.

While they continue in the school?—Yes.

At what age do they leave the school?—Sometimes 14; sometimes later.

What are the earliest ages you admit them to the communion?—Not earlier than 12 or 13; we would admit them at any time, when we were satisfied they had a rational and proper feeling of the institution; there is instability about children you cannot act on.

Examination of
The Rev.
B. W. Mathias,
30 Nov. 1824.

Have you any means of knowing whether the children paid any considerable attention to the sermon?—I have known instances of their paying wonderful attention to it.

Do you believe, generally speaking, that the children sitting there are listening to the sermon?—Some of the little things you may see are not, but there is a great decorum about them; they are very near us, and we see them; several of them have been able to say a good deal of the sermons after they have heard them.

* * * * *

Have you much experience in the schools which are established throughout Ireland for the admission of day scholars, the system varying in many of them, according to the disposition of their respective governors, as to the course in which the Scriptures shall be taught, and the mode of education therein pursued?—I have very little personal knowledge of them at all, my habits have not been that way. My system of education would perhaps be considered rather latitudinarian; I would decidedly prefer, that the education should be scriptural, what I mean by scriptural is this; I would have the New Testament particularly read in the school, and I would have the children made conversant with it decidedly, and likewise the Old Testament, in reference to and in illustration of it. I would make them acquainted with the book of Psalms, which I conceive most admirable and calculated to excite a spirit of piety; the Scripture history, and the Scripture prophecy, with a view of illustrating the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ in those particular points of view; but if the children attending the school were of other denominations, I would keep to the broad grand leading features. I would not have it a controversial school, but I would be anxious to have the Scriptures introduced into it; but if the introduction of the Scriptures into the school, would go the length that the children would remain uneducated, I would rather have them taught to read in any way, than not have them taught to read at all; and I will be honest in telling you why, because I would have an opportunity of getting that book of instruction into their hands if they could read, which I could not do otherwise; my principle is, that education, without religious instruction, wants its basis and its stability. I would have no polemical school, I would make them acquainted with the life and parables of our Lord, the cautions and encouragements of Scripture, and every thing according to the most liberal view I could take of Christianity. I would make them have a reverence for God, a confidence in the Saviour, and a desire to live practically as Christians altogether, that is the object I would aim at; I would put the Scriptures into their hands, believing them, under the blessing of God, most calculated to accomplish that; but if the putting the Scriptures into their hands would prevent their being taught to read, I would far rather they should learn to read than not at all. I have known various instances of schools conducted upon that principle, where a great number of children of various denominations have attended and derived benefit.

Have you at all thought of the probable effect of the system pursued in the schools established by the Society for the Education of the Poor, and in the London Hibernian Society, in both of which there is a rule that the Scriptures shall be read, but that they shall not be commented upon, nor shall any explanation of any sort or kind be given of them, do you think it possible for the children to acquire nearly as much benefit from the Scriptures studied under such circumstances, as they would if there was an opportunity of commenting upon them?—Perhaps I am not correct in my view of what is meant by comment; if it merely refers to controversy, building up a child in one communion in opposition to another; I think it is, what in the present state of the country, should be avoided.

Without reference to controversy, do you not think the children require to have the full meaning and purport of the passages of Scripture explained to them, do you think they are fully competent to collect it for themselves?—Often times by putting the same things in other words, you will make them understand it where the particular mode of wording they do not understand.

Do you think that the head class of an ordinary school, supposing them to be able to read with sufficient ease and fluency, derive much practical advantage from reading the New Testament, without any sort of explanation being afforded?—I think they might derive a great deal of advantage, but not so much as if the subject was more dwelt upon. I know one advantage they have derived, that they have got an acquaintance with things in the word of God, pointing out right and wrong; having repeated and committed them to their memory, that if they had not read it, they would have known nothing of.

Do you not think the previous habit they might so acquire of reading the New Testament, might have the effect of inducing them afterwards to revert to it, when they would not otherwise?—I do believe it.

Do you not think there is a very large proportion of the population of this country who would not, in after life, even know the appearance of the Scriptures, so as to recognize the New Testament if it was lying open before them, or be able to distinguish it from any other religious book, unless they had afforded to them a previous opportunity of becoming acquainted with it in the school?—I fully believe that.

It has been the practice in some of the schools to have extracts and abridgements of the Scriptures, do you feel a strong objection to the Scriptures being put into the hands of children in that form?—I cannot say I admire the practice of extracting altogether, but at the same time, I think a teacher will, of course, select where there are children under his education, those passages of the New Testament or the Old, that would be most obvious or familiar, and so far there will be selection in the teacher.

Which do you think most desirable, that the selection should be left to the judgment in each particular case of the particular teacher, or that a general selection should be made by persons possessing that degree of wisdom and experience, that would best qualify them for

923
Examination of
The Rev.
B. W. Mathias,
30 Nov. 1824.

for the purpose?—The latter thing appears to me a very great difficulty, and in the state of this country, to do any thing of that kind effectually, you must get the clergymen of the different denominations combined in the selection; I rather think that would be very difficult, and if you have any selection at all, it must be a selection upon the judgment of the teacher.

Do you not conceive that a meeting of persons, perhaps of different opinions, may produce a degree of harmony in general, which each person acting separately upon his own separate opinion would never produce?—I think that oftentimes depends upon circumstances; I certainly think you may frequently get a collection of people for a particular object, that bring their prejudices ten-fold stronger with them, and will be found to yield with greater difficulty; and in the particular state of excitement at present that is more likely.

Is not it more likely to prevail where a person is left to act upon his own opinion unchecked, unenlightened and uncontrolled by the expression of the opinions of others, than it would be where he was controlled by the expression of the opinions of others?—I cannot answer what the eventual result would be, there would be a greater diversity.

You do not think it would lead to a degree of compromise?—I am not sure; if we suppose that it is the selection of the Scriptures we are speaking of; if we suppose compromise to refer to tenets and doctrines, I question, in the present state of things in this country, if it would lead to that compromise that would bring about such a selection that all persons would acquiesce in.

Supposing the selection is left to each particular master, then, though in some cases the discretion left to the master may be the means of removing objections, may it not, and is it not likely in other cases rather to fortify objections to reading the Scriptures when considered in this view, that if the master be a Roman Catholic, acting under the directions of a Roman Catholic priest, he may select parts of the Scriptures that will favour his peculiar doctrines without any peculiar explanation of them, and thus exclude Protestants from the school, and vice versa, that a Protestant anxious to maintain particular principles, may select those passages of the Scriptures, not separating the passages from the book, but pointing them out as the passages to be read, as would favour his particular notions; and whether in this view the discretion of the Roman Catholic master will not lead to the exclusion of Protestants, and the discretion left to the Protestant master, go to the exclusion of Roman Catholics from the school?—I cannot say precisely; that would depend upon this circumstance, if the Roman Catholic was particularly tenacious of his principles he would do it, and if the Protestant was particularly tenacious of his principles, he would no doubt be inclined to do it too; but as both of them have a similar object of giving a sort of outline of the Christian truth to their people, I think they would not select passages to build up either the one or the other; but advance the general principles of the religion of Jesus Christ.

Assuming that to be the governing feeling, would it not be as likely to tell through a meeting of those persons as upon them acting separately?—I have my fears upon the subject.

Have you ever known of any attempt as yet made to produce an agreement between the clergy of the opposite communions on the principle of selection?—No, I have not; in individual parishes, perhaps, the Roman Catholic and Protestant clergymen may have had an understanding among themselves, but nothing of a public nature.

Understanding that the Roman Catholic clergy will have an objection to the use of the Scriptures generally in the schools, what plan would you expect to be able to devise for uniting the children of both persuasions in the same mode of instruction?—I think, at least according to my present views, that you might select certain books of the New Testament, and some books of the Old Testament, that perhaps might be agreed to by both parties, understanding still that that plan was not to exclude all the Scriptures; but that he will select books of the Sacred Scriptures that were chosen out for that purpose. I do not like the idea of selecting only one or two or three verses or things of that kind. I have reason to know from a source I can very fully give credit to, that there is one Roman Catholic clergyman, and there may be many more, that would not object to the reading of the four Gospels and the Acts, though that gentleman had very seriously opposed the business of reading the Scriptures.

Are we to understand that you propose that a book of that description, comprising only the four Gospels and the Acts, should be admitted into schools in which the Scriptures in all other forms should be excluded?—I should not like it: but if you wish the young people to read a portion of the Scriptures, I should think that portion would be less objected to than the epistolary part.

Do you conceive that in a case where, from the number of the scholars, two masters were required, or a master and a teacher, and in which there was a Protestant and Roman Catholic master, that the Scriptures might be read, the Protestant version by the Protestant, and the Roman Catholic version by the Roman Catholic master, leaving to each not to cut out but to point out what parts might be read?—It is a plan that might be resorted to, to meet existing circumstances in the country. The difference as to the two versions, though in two or three points I think weighty, in general is very far from being a matter of any importance.

Do you conceive an arrangement of that nature would answer the object of those who wished the children should receive full and perfect scriptural instruction through the means of reading the Scriptures themselves, rather than any part of the Scriptures separated from the rest?—There are some parts of the country where all the children would be of one denomination. I am strongly inclined to think that a little more time would mellow down the feelings in the country a good deal, with respect to the business of the Scriptures; but I must confess I find it very difficult to find a substitute for the sacred Scriptures.

Would the plan suggested meet your views?—I would not object to that arrangement, because I am confident a person becoming acquainted with the Douay version, may derive a saving knowledge from it. A man reading that version may obtain a full knowledge of the Gospel.

If by some means the jealousy that prevails among Roman Catholics as to the Scriptures being put into their hands by Protestants should subside, do you not think that would be a desirable system to establish?—I certainly would not object to it decidedly. I would far rather see the Roman Catholics should be conversant with their own version of the Scriptures than unacquainted with them.

Extract from the Examination of the Reverend Henry Murray, Chaplain to the Foundling Hospital, on Oath; Monday, 22d November 1824.

Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Murray,
22 Nov. 1824.

WHAT books are the children taught in the school?—They are taught the Bible, such as can read it, and the Testament, and they are taught Mrs. Trimmer's Abridgement of the Old Testament, and those books that are made use of in the central schools, and Osterwald's Abridgement of the Bible.

What catechisms are they taught?—They first read the common catechism, then the catechism broken into short questions.

By whom was that catechism written?—By the late Primate Newcome.

Is Stopford's catechism used?—Yes, occasionally; the catechisms used are the common church catechism, the catechism broken into short questions, and Crossman's catechism; the object of that is to explain the words found in the Prayer-book; the next catechism is Mann's and Lewis's, but what I lay the greatest stress on is, I examine all the grown up boys three times a week in the Bible, and connect it with the catechism of the church of England, the Litany, and the Liturgy of the church of England, and I find that the most effectual of all modes. Getting catechisms by heart, is of very little use; I am the catechist of the Charter school, at Kevin-street, and I think you would there see a specimen of the kind of education that would tell in this country.

You have enumerated a series of catechisms, are we to understand that the same child goes through each of them successively?—A child that was to stay four years, would go through all those catechisms; but as they remain a short time in the house, if we teach them the common catechism that is all we can do.

Suppose the case of a child who goes regularly through that series of catechisms you have described, will you mention the order?—First the common catechism, the same catechism broken into short questions, Crossman's catechism, the next would be Mann's catechism, Stopford's and Lewis's.

There are six catechisms in succession?—Yes, there are; there is another catechism which is sometimes used at present, the Bishop of Down's catechism; I have it for such children as go to the Association's examination; but I found teaching the Bible, and connecting it with the Liturgy of the church of England, more efficacious than all the catechisms of Europe; but at the same time I by no means neglect the catechisms.

Re so good as to state which of those catechisms you conceive the best for the instruction of children?—I think Lewis's is an excellent catechism; every church has a catechism of its own, and if you take the text detached from its context, you may prove every thing; but I think Lewis's gives the text fairer than any other I know.

Do you think Stopford's the second best?—I do; I think Mann's the worst.

What do you think of Thistlewaite's catechism?—A very good one.

Are you aware that Lewis's catechism has been rejected by the Association for discountenancing Vice, as an improper book to be circulated?—No, I do not; though I have been a member of it from the beginning; there is one question in Lewis's that looks a little Calvinistic, I do not know whether that was the ground; it was one that I would not have put in if I had had the looking over it.

There is nothing Calvinistic in Mann's catechism?—No, certainly not; but in Mann's the answers are too long.

When the children are examined for catechetical premiums, under the direction of the Association for the suppression of Vice, are they examined in the several catechisms you have mentioned?—It is left discretionary with the examiner; but I observe that in general the examiner confines himself to the Bible at the examination; Secker's Lectures on the Church catechism, which is one of the best books possible that our boys read; it is plain, and contains a great deal more information than books that have harder words in them.

Have you "Porteus's Confutation of the Errors of Popery," bound up with it?—That is the edition we have; it has the six sermons against Popery.

Do you not think that Stopford's catechism enters a little more into the controversy between the Protestants and Roman Catholics than would be considered desirable?—There are two editions of the catechism, we use the one that retains that part; but I am not for temporizing at all, I should speak out.

Does Thistlewaite's catechism enter into that controversy at all?—No, not at all; it is rather 925

Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Murray,

rather adapted for the meridian of England, and that is not calculated for this country; any man that knows this country would make an important distinction between the two.

Did you ever see a book called the Leed's catechism?—No.

Or the Bristol catechism?—No, I never heard of them.

Did you ever see Archbishop Usher's catechism?—No.

Did you ever hear of it?—No.

What do you mean by a Scripture catechism?—A catechism that would be called a catechism upon the gospel of St. Matthew for an instance, would be one that would relate to all the particular parts of St. Matthew. I have several catechisms that have been written by myself, for the use of the children at the Foundling hospital, and several copies have been taken by different masters and ushers of the different schools and societies; I dare say, forty copies have been taken of them at different times; my Testament is interleaved, and I put down from time to time, any thing that occurs to me. I have made several scriptural catechisms, one on St. Matthew, another on the Acts, and another on St. John, but they are very much torn by lending them to different people; I do not want them now, from long experience; it is the result of twenty-three years experience. I was catechist for a great while to the school at Baggot-street, and I was transferred from that to Kevin-street; I am sorry I cannot give up more time to it; I am there once a week, and sometimes oftener.

Does your own manuscript catechism go much into the questions in controversy between the churches of England and Rome?—Yes, whenever it occurs; I do not go out of my way to it; when a text occurs in the New Testament, I shew the children that the explanation put upon it by the Roman Catholics is not the true one.

Does your catechism attribute idolatry to the church of Rome?—No; I do not say that any where expressly. As the result of my opinions upon this subject, I would state that at Kevin-street, last Saturday, I was examining the children in St. John, and I shewed them, from the circumstance of the woman of Samaria, how we should deal with those who differed from us; that with regard to their errors, when an opportunity occurs, you ought to endeavour to show them they are wrong; but you ought to treat their persons at the same time with kindness, as our Lord did when he told the woman of Samaria, her religion was nonsense; if Jesus has left us an example that we should follow, why not follow him in that respect.

Appendix, N° 261.

Examination of the Rev. Henry Cooke, on Oath; Wednesday, 5th January 1825.

YOU are moderator of the synod of Ulster?—I am.

Is it an annual office you hold?—Yes, and never held but once for life, according to our custom.

Have you any acquaintance officially with the education of the children of the Presbyterians in Ulster?—I cannot say directly official, but I have a tolerably general knowledge of the system and state of education in the Presbyterian body.

But not from your situation of moderator of the synod?—No; I have, however, from other sources information in some degree official. The general synod of Ulster is divided into 14 Presbyteries. A Presbytery consists of the ministers of a convenient district, with a ruling elder from each congregation, statedly assembling four times a year, and occasionally much oftener. According to our discipline, one part of the duty of each Presbytery is to hold a visitation of all the churches under their care, and among other things, to enquire into the number and state of daily and Sunday schools. To this part of their duty some presbyteries are very attentive. The other source of information, is to be found in our practice of visiting all our people from house to house, examining the children and others. At other times we assemble the people by townlands, and examine both young and old. From one or other of these sources, every Presbyterian minister must derive a very accurate knowledge of the state of education among his people.

Is every minister also a member of the Presbytery?—Yes, they are all equal in their rank.

Is it a necessary part of the duty of each minister in that situation, to visit all the families in the congregation?—Yes, which is not necessarily parochial.

If not parochial, how are the limits defined?—In no way but by the persons wherever situated, who pay their contributions to the minister.

Does every family in the congregation contribute to the support of the minister?—In some cases all or nearly all the members pay; in other cases, perhaps not half.

How is that arranged?—The manner in which they obtain support for the minister, is by letting the pews in the meeting-house, and every individual who has a pew, or part of a pew, pays so much for it, according to an established rent; if there be any number of people in the congregations who have no pews, they generally pay nothing; this, however, does not prevent the minister from visiting and performing for them all the other ministerial duties. I was once a minister of a parish, where only, I think, about 200 families paid me, and about 300 families, for whom I performed all the ministerial duties, paid me nothing.* I know many of our congregations in similar circumstances.

Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 January 1825.

Were you educated in Ireland?—My early education was in Ireland, my college course principally in Scotland. I was one year in Dublin.

As a boy did you receive your education in Ireland?—Yes, altogether; I went to Scotland at 14, and was there 4 sessions of college. I afterwards went back and was there another session.

In Scotland were you in the University?—Yes, for five years.

Had you acquired any classical learning before you went there?—Yes, and I studied classics during three years in Scotland also. According to our law, we must attend classics one year in the university or college, and if you fee certain classes in the universities of Scotland once, you have not to do so again, but may attend them twice or oftener. The Greek I attended one session according to our law; I attended again on the Latin just as I found it convenient, in all three years in classics. It may not be out of the way to mention, that before we can enter the university, we must have read a certain course, and have been examined by the Presbytery before we are permitted to enter the university with a view of becoming a minister, viz. Sallust, Cicero de Officiis, Virgil, Horace, Greek Testament, Homer's Iliad, and Xenophon's Cyropædia.

What schools had you been at in Ireland, where you had acquired any classical knowledge?—It would be impossible to give a name to them, except by the townlands where they were kept. I learnt classics in Ireland with three individuals; the first was a Roman Catholic young priest, the second a Presbyterian probationer, the third had been educated for a Roman Catholic priest, but chose to marry a wife and become a schoolmaster.

Were the schools in which you were educated in your boyhood in Ireland, numerous?—Yes, a very considerable number, I have endeavoured sometimes to recollect them all; there are two I cannot distinctly recollect—I am conscious that two masters existed, but I cannot recollect their names, all the others I distinctly remember.

From what number in the whole do you conceive you had received instruction?—At least six, I distinctly recollect six; I can make myself certain by going back to the first and proceeding from one to another. Three of them were classical teachers.

In what counties were the schools?—In the county of Derry.

Were you not at school any where but in Derry?—Not in any other county.

Is Derry the county with which you are now best acquainted?—No, with the counties of Antrim and Down.

Are you still well acquainted with Derry?—Yes, having lived in it constantly till 14, and during the vacation of college in the summer, when the Scotch universities are not attended. I was in the county of Derry till 19, and living in a part of Antrim adjoining it till I was 23, and I have been in the county generally twice or three times a year since.

Is the state of education essentially different now in those counties from what it was when you were at school?—Not essentially different through the whole counties; it is locally different in consequence of a variety of improving circumstances. I shall instance it in Derry, where certain of the companies in London having taken their estates into their own management, have improved the state of education; I know they have as to school-houses, and I believe as to the masters; I recollect coming through Derry about two years ago; I observed the improvement of the school-houses, and called at one in the neighbourhood of which I knew, in order that I might speak to the master and enquire into the state of the school. I found him much more intelligent than I had been accustomed to expect in such persons, and I have good reason to believe that there are several of a similar description. I allude particularly to the Drapers Company, and schools in the neighbourhood of Moneymore. I believe some of the other companies are also patronizing education.—(Note B.)

What observations have you made as to the appearance of the children in the schools; is it much improved?—Yes, very considerably; indeed, if the children were not better in their dress than formerly, still the general appearance of the school would be better. Children used to sit all round the walls as they could; now they have got comfortable benches and desks, and even if deficiencies in dress did exist, they would not be so apparent. Undoubtedly the appearance both of children and houses is much improved.

Does it appear to you that the children in those schools are better taught than in those you were formerly acquainted with?—Yes.

And that the schoolmasters are of a superior class?—Yes, the one I conversed with in the neighbourhood of Moneymore, appeared much more intelligent than any English schoolmaster I had met before in schools of that description.

Is the general character and class improved?—I cannot say generally; locally it is.

Do you entertain any doubt that the extension throughout the country of better schools, will necessarily and rapidly produce an improvement in the schoolmasters?—I have no kind of doubt of it. I conceive, however, it will chiefly depend upon the increase of the salary that would induce well qualified persons to undertake the office.

When you first remember, were the difficulties which arose from teaching persons of different religious persuasions much felt?—During my education at school and college, I never heard of them.

Were children of all religious persuasions educated promiscuously in the schools?—Yes, and so far as I recollect my own observations at the time, or those of others, I never heard the least objection, or any idea of impropriety in it, or evil that might arise from it.

Did the children receive religious instruction in the school, according to the doctrine of their respective churches?—To a certain extent, so far as this, that sometimes the masters caused the Scriptures to be committed to memory, especially the poetical parts, as turned into

927
 Examination of
 The Rev.

into metre in our psalm books, and invariably the catechisms of the churches to which the children belonged, were taught in all the English schools where I was educated.

Who taught the catechism?—The schoolmaster.

Did he make any scruple in teaching the catechism of a church of which he was not a member?—None at all; three catechisms were taught in the same school; I recollect in two schools distinctly the church catechism being taught; the master of one school was a Roman Catholic; of the other a Presbyterian; I recollect it distinctly, from this circumstance, that there were few of the establishment in the neighbourhood; the Protestants were mostly Presbyterians; the church catechism was to me, therefore, the more remarkable; in the schools the greater number were either Roman Catholics or Presbyterians; the catechism used by the Presbyterians was called the Westminster Assembly's shorter catechism; the Roman Catholic catechism was called the Christian Doctrine; the number of children belonging to the establishment were comparatively few, but I distinctly recollect, when any of them attended the school, their catechism was taught; so was that of the Roman Catholics; and so sure am I of the fact, that I committed and still recollect a portion of both; I committed them to memory when sitting beside the children, or hearing them their lessons, to prepare them for the master.

Did that various knowledge of the catechisms confound your religious belief?—I donot think it did, in any degree.

Has there not arisen of late years, in the county of Derry, a great jealousy on the part of the Roman Catholics, on account of the religious instruction given in the schools?—I could scarcely speak of the county of Derry with so much accuracy upon that point as others, but so far as I know, till very lately, none has arisen in the county of Derry.

Has it arisen in the counties of Antrim and Down?—Comparatively little in Down; there were some instances of it two years ago; there was some noise about Sunday schools, and a few children left school, but they generally all returned in a short time; of some schools I had a distinct knowledge.

Of Sunday schools?—Yes; it is of them alone I speak; I never heard of any objection to daily schools, although the Scriptures were read in them.

Be so good as to describe what occurred in the Sunday schools?—I think it was about two years ago, there was some general letter published, relating to either Bible societies or Sunday schools; I cannot decidedly say which it was; a letter published by authority from Rome; and in consequence of that, there was, for perhaps a few weeks, from some Sunday schools I know of, a secession of some of the Roman Catholic children; but immediately after the noise had subsided, they returned, and I heard of no objections afterwards; with the sole exception of one Sunday school in my neighbourhood, where the master informed me some had left it.

What is the system of instruction pursued in those schools, and to what do you attribute the jealousy excited?—To the publication of this letter; I cannot say whether it related to the Bible Society; I think it did; I think there was in the letter something about the Bible Society having translated the Bible into the English or other tongues; I am certain it was a letter in which that was mentioned.

Did the system of religious instruction pursued in the Sunday schools, go to bring them within the general subject alluded to in this letter?—I conceive not; the children were not obliged to bring any books but such as pleased themselves only, least objections should be made; catechisms of all kinds were refused; the junior children used the first and second books published by the Kildare-place Society, and the more advanced scholars read the Scriptures, and perhaps committed some portion of them to memory every week; however, I am so far certain of there being no jealousy upon that point, I recollect, on one occasion, giving premiums, and some of the Roman Catholics took a part of them, for repeating our Saviour's Sermon upon the Mount, and shewing an accurate knowledge of the precepts delivered in that sermon.

Have you ever known a child of Roman Catholic parents, educated in that religion, become converted merely by the instruction in the Scriptures he received in the schools you are acquainted with?—I never knew an instance of it.

Have you observed it has had a tendency to unsettle them in their faith, or produce a kind of resistance to the Roman Catholic priests?—No; never any thing of the kind.

Have you ever observed it has indisposed them to attend mass in after-life?—No; I never perceived any consequence of that kind.

On the other hand, have you observed it has produced a beneficial effect upon their character?—Yes; I have seen instances in which it has so done; I will mention one instance; the Presbyterians in the north are generally speaking excessively puritanical in their observance of the Sunday; the Roman Catholics not so; when I was a boy I dare not go bird's nesting, or after any other boyish amusement, on a Sunday, or I should received a severe chastisement; I have been surprised at seeing the Roman Catholic children amuse themselves on Sunday, as in bird's nesting, bathing or fishing; but if the schoolmaster heard of their having been so employed on Sunday, he would have given them a lecture upon the propriety of behaving themselves, and remembering the Sabbath-day, and I have known it produce a beneficial effect upon their conduct in after-life. I have seen the most beneficial effects from common school fellowship between Roman Catholics and Protestants.

Do you entertain any doubt of its being extremely desirable to educate the children of different religious persuasions in schools in which they should be taught in common, and that it would tend to widen the separation that exists in this country if they were educated in separate schools, or classed according to their religion?—I think it would do a great deal of

The Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 January 1825.

evil to educate them separately; education is common and neutral ground, and there they may and should meet to rub away prejudices and asperities.

Do you think children should receive a religious education as well as education in matters of mere general instruction?—My own opinion, as to the religious education of children, I look upon in two ways; first, what they receive from their parents or schoolmasters; and secondly, what they may receive, or should, from their clergyman; all I conceive that the schoolmaster should do, is to teach them to read, &c. and amongst their other studies they ought to read and perhaps commit and repeat the Scriptures at school, because they contain the will of God, to which children should early attend, and he ought to teach them their catechism, as brief outlines of Scripture, as viewed by their respective churches, because there are many parents too busy or too indolent to do it; if the children do not learn, either by committing the Scriptures or catechism, it is almost impossible for the clergy to teach them afterwards; but I conceive it nearly a matter of indifference whether they commit the Scriptures or the catechism; I would as soon engage to convey religious instruction to a person who had committed the Scriptures largely as the catechism; my idea is, the master should go no further than to hear them read the Scriptures, and respect them, and hear them their catechism, and then the business of the clergy should distinctly commence. My own practice is this; the parish I have divided into seven districts; I catechise, once a month, all the young people in the parish who have never been at the communion, and whom I can induce to attend; I allow one week, and a day in the month, for doing this part of my duty; I begin on Monday, at the most distant part, and on Saturday, which is one of the most busy days to an extempore preacher; I catechise the children in my own neighbourhood, but I could find no place so convenient as the school houses; I therefore took the school houses, not going till after school hours; as soon as I go to the school, or perhaps sooner, the school is dismissed, and every child that does not belong to me goes away, and generally the schoolmaster staying with me; I begin, and catechise the school, and other children of the neighbourhood who attend; I ask them first their catechism, according to their capacity, and then endeavour to get a verbal explanation of the phrases from the young, and the doctrines from the adults; I prescribe them at one examination a certain portion of Scriptures, to be attentively read for the next visit, and then examine them upon it, according to their respective capacities; one of their exercises is committing the psalms and hymns, and I take up not more than two hours of any one day, perhaps only an hour and an half, or even less, asking each child only a few questions, and endeavouring to keep up a constant inspection upon the children and their parents, instead of long tedious examination, seldom repeated.

Is one week in the course of the month sufficient for that purpose?—Yes, amply sufficient; and did the discipline of the school permit, one day in the month would nearly suffice. My great object is not to examine any child too long at once, for fear of affrighting it; but making it as brief a matter as possible, and substituting a kind of clerical police instead of a long examination at distant intervals.

Are the children whom you so examine, first instructed through the catechism?—Yes; they read the catechism sometimes with the master, but only after school hours.

And are examined in it by the master?—Yes; he hears them, but he does nothing else. I endeavour to get them to understand the meaning of the words and doctrines, he teaches them the mere letter; I conceive it my business to lead them to the meaning. Our primary catechism has a good many very difficult words in it, perhaps too much so for children; a minister must make some exertion before the children understand it; but with proper diligence on the part of ministers, I consider it one of the best abridgements of religious knowledge.

Do you consider the schoolmaster a sort of coadjutor in the instruction the children receive?—Not more than an automaton in doing the work; I conceive he has nothing to do with any thing but the letter, but I conceive it is almost absolutely necessary that a schoolmaster should do so, for a good number of parents would be so inattentive, it would not be done; in all cases when I have found such parents, I could do little either with them or their children.—(Note C.)

Is the presbyterian catechism, in point of fact, ever taught by the Roman Catholic schoolmasters in that automaton manner?—Yes, it is.

Do you disapprove of it?—No; there is but one Roman Catholic schoolmaster in my parish, he teaches it once a week, he told me so, and I believe him; I was myself taught the catechism by a Roman Catholic.

Do the schoolmasters of the established church teach the Presbyterian catechism in the way described?—A considerable number of them do; and when any of them do not, it is not on account of any objection, it is mere negligence. I know that some of the Presbyterian schoolmasters do not teach it, they are too lazy or too careless to do it, and I have heard the parents often complain. I complain of both.

Would you consider it a sufficient preparation for the instruction the children receive from you, if they should get parts of the Testament by heart?—Yes; I should be quite satisfied with committing the Scriptures, but I should consider the giving up of the catechism a sacrifice; but I would willingly make it, if it contributed to the general cause of school education; it would only give me a little more difficulty at first. I would find it very difficult to give a person of moderate capacity any consecutive view of religion, for want of having an outline in the memory, such as the catechism gives; but I would consider it with a person of tolerable intellect sufficient. In some instances, I have had hearers who had particular objections to some parts of our catechism, and I have examined their children on the Scriptures, and I have always taught them without a catechism the same doctrines I taught to others who had committed a catechism.

You

929
Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 January 1825.

You would be quite satisfied with a system of instruction in which the children were made to repeat to the master (whether he were a Roman Catholic or Protestant), their catechism, and to get parts of the Scriptures by heart, as preparatory for you?—Yes; or I would resign the catechism at school, and trust to my influence with the parents at home, provided such a sacrifice were desirable for promoting a common education for all classes.

Is any part of the Regium Donum applied to the schools?—No part of it.

Nor any allowance from the government for the purpose of the schools?—No; there is not any given into our hands.

The Presbyterian clergy are divided into classes for the purpose of receiving the Regium Donum?—They are divided into three classes.

Are those classes regulated by the government, or by the Presbyterian church?—By the government they were regulated, and are not changed. When the allowance to a congregation is once settled, it is not afterwards changed.

What is the rule that governs in the sum to be received by the several classes?—It was originally settled by government upon the principle of the number of hearers in each congregation; and the amount of payment they made to the minister—in proportion as he had a large number of hearers, it was supposed he had the more duty to do, and he was accordingly rated higher. In the large parishes they had the largest sums; where the highest rate of stipend was paid, it was supposed the rate of living would be highest, and this brought parishes in considerable towns generally under the first class of bounty.

What are the classes?—The first class have 100*l.* a year, the second 75*l.* and the third 50*l.*; they are nearly equal in numbers; originally they were equal; congregations have since increased, and as the new erections have generally been small congregations, the government have from time to time given such additions as have made the lower class more numerous than the others.

You mean to say, there are about the same number receiving 100*l.* 75*l.* and 50*l.*?—Yes, nearly.

Which does the greater part of the income of the Presbyterian clergy result from, the Regium Donum, or other sources?—The Regium Donum; when I speak of that, I speak of the higher class of bounty. I will give what I conceive to be the general average of the payments. In the lower class the people pay from 50*l.* to 60*l.* a year (a very few pay something less), that of course will leave the minister about 100*l.* or 110*l.* a year. In the second class they generally pay about the same, 50*l.* or 60*l.*; and in the third class, there is very little difference in the payment made by the people, except in cases of a few congregations in the larger towns, and a few in the richer parts of the country. I know two congregations in the first class, that only pay their minister 50*l.* a year; the minister then has 100*l.* from government, and only 50*l.* from the people. I know of one or two in the first class that pay 80*l.* a year; and there is one that pays 100*l.* In some of the town parishes they pay from 150*l.* to 200*l.* a year, the rest, in the highest class, pay on an average about 60*l.* a year.

On the whole we are to collect, that in the highest class, with the exception of a few of the larger towns, the total amount of income of the Presbyterian clergymen, is from 150*l.* to 180*l.* a year?—Yes; in Derry and Coleraine, Dublin, Armagh and Newry, I should think they receive about 150*l.* from the people. In Belfast, 200*l.* from the old congregations; the rest all stand, I believe, as I have stated, that is, paying 50*l.* to 60*l.* a year.

The arrangement of the government, as I understand you, while it produces an approach to equality in point of receipt from the congregations, must produce considerable inequality in point of contribution, from the individuals composing them?—Yes; beyond all question, the people in small congregations pay more, individually, than the people of large congregations, with the exception of the few large parishes to which I have alluded.

Does the money paid by each congregation arise from the value of the pews, or is it all paid by any form of rate?—It arises by regular rent upon the pews; the pews are regularly rented, at different prices, according to their local situation in the house.

Who fixes the price?—The committee, who are managers of the affairs of the house, with of course a final appeal to the people; and in a new congregation it is sometimes a matter of difficulty to arrange it. In the older congregations it is a settled custom, and an attempt to raise it would be a dangerous experiment.

How do you make the appeal to the people?—By taking their aggregate opinion; and in cases of difficulty, calling in the aid of influential ministers.

Does government interfere in any way in the appointment of the clergy?—No, by no means; they require certain matters after we are ordained, but they never in the least interfere with the appointment.

What is done in the way of communication with the government, in order to entitle the clergyman to receive the Regium Donum?—Government requires no communication till he is ordained; he then goes before two magistrates of the county and takes the oath of allegiance, and the magistrates subscribe a declaration to this effect; he then sends to the moderator and clerk of the synod, a form of a memorial to be transmitted to the Lord Lieutenant; they add to the memorial their certificate of the ordination, and it is then transmitted to Dublin, to one of the secretaries, and afterwards a warrant is issued from the Lord Lieutenant to the agent to pay the amount.

Am I to understand by "Ordination" appointment to a particular congregation, or being called to a particular congregation?—The Presbyterian doctrine is, that every minister is a Bishop. Presbyter and Bishop they view as convertible terms in the New Testament; they consider every minister the highest officer in the church, being a presbyter, because of his character, and being a bishop on account of his care over the church. Ordination is carried on in the following manner: the previous circumstances are these;—the congregation apply to the presbytery for a person to come upon what is called trials; he is heard, there is then appointed a minister to take the determination of the people; the poll of the people is carried on by the registry of the seat holders of the house, and if two thirds of the congregation are in favour of having the candidate placed amongst them, they then send forward what is termed a call for him to consider, and in the mean time, if he be a young man, he is put by the presbytery on a course of second trials; he goes through other examinations perhaps, and preaches a certain set of sermons before them; if the presbytery approve, they send a minister to the congregation, at least ten days before the time appointed for the ordination, with what we call the edict of the presbytery, to give notice to the people to have all accounts settled, and that if any member of the congregation have any objection to the life or doctrines of the intended minister, he is to give notice of it; they then appoint ministers to do certain duties, some to explain the nature of the ordination, and others to give the charge to the minister and people; when the day of ordination comes, there is a sermon preached; the ordination is explained, and the candidate kneeling, the act of ordination consists in the presbytery laying their hands upon him and praying; and it is after this he sends forward the memorial I have mentioned to the moderator, who certifies it to the secretary at Dublin, and then the bounty is paid. It is not our practice to ordain any man ad ministerium vagum.

Then the clergyman who applies for the Regium Donum upon being ordained, applies for it as being ordained and appointed to a particular congregation?—In no other way than that; he must state he has been ordained at a certain time; the moderator certifies this fact, and the certificate of having taken the oath of allegiance is appended.

Have you not new congregations established, from time to time?—Yes, some few.

In what way are the ministers of them brought within the sphere of the Regium Donum?—When any number of people think they require a minister, they apply to the presbytery, who send a committee of ministers to inquire and ascertain the facts; if they think there is no necessity for it, if they are near enough to a place of worship, such as can hold them, they will not grant it; if they find the houses are too distant, or that there is not a sufficient house to contain the people after one year, they will erect them into a congregation; but not before the presbytery has been convinced of its necessity will they permit the people to begin to build the house. When a minister is ordained in a new congregation, there is a regular application to the Lord Lieutenant, stating that there is a new congregation at a distance from any place of worship, and a number of people attending, paying a certain stipend, and praying it may be recommended in the estimates to Parliament for a portion of the Regium Donum. In the south of Ireland, and in the west, the same rules are gone through exactly, stating the number of Presbyterian families (as a number of Scotch people, settlers from Ulster, and descendants of the old Presbyterians, are scattered through the south), and making a regular application by memorial to the Lord Lieutenant.

Upon the occasion of such applications as you have last described, have you experienced any difficulty on the part of the Government in including such congregations?—I could not say difficulty; we have experienced considerable slowness; we have had one grant in the south, in the town of Carlow, and one or two in the north; but we have a number of congregations in the south, some in the west, and others in the north, where we have had no grant—there is a great deal of slowness—whether they will be recommended, I do not know.

The amount of these grants is governed by the same principles that govern the others?—Yes; there has been but one grant in the south, that was placed in the second class, and all the grants in the north latterly, have been, so far as I know, in the third class.

That being the proper class according to the original regulations?—I cannot say that; one of them would have been in the second class, according to the original rule. I should state in explanation, that I believe in the original arrangement, when it was settled between the government and some of the influential members of our body, there should be a certain sum of money granted, and so many congregations in one class, and so many in the others; there were some that very nearly became equal, and as it was necessary to put them into one class or the other, there was an influence exerted by some of the ministers in favour of themselves or their friends, which put some lower that should have been higher, and vice versa.

Has that been put right?—No; there has been no change.

Could you procure a list of all the Presbyterian congregations in Ireland that have not obtained the Regium Donum?—Very easily.

Specifying in which of the instances applications have been made to government, and the dates of their applications?—Yes.

Could you obtain it for all the respective synods, as well as the synod of Ulster?—Yes; very easily.—(The witness was directed to furnish such information to the Commissioners.)—There are only two bodies of Presbyterians in Ireland receiving aid from government that have had any increase of congregations; the synod of Munster has been decreasing from either 45 or 49 to its present number, I think eight or nine.

To what do you attribute that remarkable decline in the synod of Munster?—Partly to the extension of the elective franchise; at one time, when only Protestants had the elective franchise, I think it probable a number of settlements were formed for the purposes of election, and ministers appointed for them. I also attribute it in part to this; that originally a great number of Protestant families in the south of Ireland were Presbyterians or Independents, pendents, and afterwards became attached to the church. Some of the congregations were family chaplaincies, attended by some of the tenantry, for instance the family of Dormer, at Tipperary; when the families left this country and went to reside in England, or came into the established church (and in most cases they did join the church), then the congregation died away; but I must chiefly attribute the decline, with the sole exception of a few such instances as I have given, to the growth of Arianism and Socinianism in that synod, and the unacceptableness of those doctrines to the people; and I ground my opinion upon this, that where we have attempted upon other principles to establish congregations, we have revived them.

Do you attribute the decline of the Presbyterian congregations in Munster to the circumstance of their not having the Regium Donum, in the instances referred to in the preceding question?—No, certainly not; but that suggests another cause of explanation as to the decline. The original grant of the Regium Donum, was a certain sum of money to a certain number of ministers, in trust for the rest, and these trustees, in council with their respective synods, had in their hands the applotment and distribution of the royal bounty. In our synod, before the late arrangement was made by government, the Regium Donum, in consequence of the increase of congregations, came so low as 16*l*. When a new congregation was added to the synod, the allowance to its minister had to be taken out of the general sum, and the ministers had less in that year than the preceding; the same would have been the case in Munster, had congregations increased, but I have heard it said, I do not know how good the authority may be, that some of the ministers there had no great objection to the old congregations dying away, that they might have an increase of annuity, by dividing the lapsed bounty among themselves.

At what period was the Regium Donum put upon its present footing?—In 1803; but it had been under discussion some time. I was then too young to know much about it.

Through what channel is the Regium Donum now paid?—Through an agent appointed by the government, but belonging to our body; Mr. Hay, of Londonderry.

Is there any discretion in the distribution of it?—No.

The government are merely certified of the character of the person through his ordination, and taking the oath of allegiance?—Yes.

Do you consider the Presbyterian body upon the increase or decrease in Ireland?—Under certain local circumstances there has been a decrease; upon the whole, I know there is a very considerable increase.

Do you think it is increasing in a greater or less ratio than the population in the districts where they are?—I know it is not, owing to the uninterrupted stream of emigration.

Do you conceive the emigrants are principally Presbyterians?—Almost altogether in the north; in my neighbourhood, I may say altogether.

To what circumstance do you attribute that?—In a certain degree, to a more general wish for personal independence than is found in some other classes; in the cases of many of the young members of a family, they find themselves pinched upon a narrow farm, and they will rather emigrate than divide it down. I also attribute it to their greater advancement in education. They read more than some other classes, and by books favourable to emigration, they are induced to go to America.

Do you not think the members of the Established church are as much disposed to emigration?—Yes; but in the Protestant portions of the country, I am best acquainted with, the members of the Established church are very few, and therefore I cannot compare them so easily as the two larger bodies, Roman Catholics and Presbyterians.

Could you form any idea of the amount of the Presbyterian body in Ireland?—No, not without a tedious calculation, and more documents than I am at present possessed of. (See note D.)

Will you be so good as to mention the counties and principal seats of the Presbyterian population in Ireland?—Down, Antrim, Derry, Tyrone, Armagh, Monaghan and Donegal. We have a number of congregations also in Cavan.

It is ascertained that the population of the county of Down is 325,410 persons, have you sufficient local knowledge of the county of Down to be able to form any general opinion, in your own mind, as to the relative proportion of the Protestant and Roman Catholic population in that county?—There is just one portion of the county of Down with which I have comparatively little acquaintance; that is the district bordering upon the mountains of Mourne; on one side I have been down as far as Rostrevor, and on the other side as far as Bryansford.

Is not all that district comparatively a much less populous district than the other part of the county?—Yes, it is in a great degree a mountainous district. There is one department of it I believe tolerably populous along the shore, from Newcastle to Kilcoel; the other parts are, I believe, very wild and uninhabited.

With the exception of that district, can you form any general opinion of the relative population of the Protestants and Roman Catholics in the county of Down?—Except a mere gross guess would be considered sufficient, I could not, without entering into a calculation of where the Presbyterian and the people of the Established church were situated; but if I would form an opinion at once, without saying I attach much consequence to the estimate so made, I should think the population would be as about seven Protestants to two Roman Catholics. There is the one district I do not pretend to have the least knowledge of, except that we have one congregation in it, in which I never was, it lying very far off me; and that there is a very small congregation of Independents, of which I know nothing; but the general principle I go upon in the calculation is this; I compare the parish of Killyleagh with others; I know there are some districts in the county of Down, where there are more Presbyterians and Protestants of the church than in Killyleagh parish. I know there are some few spots, such as about Ballynahinch, and parts of Lecale and Ards, where there are more Roman Catholics in proportion than in Killyleagh; but taking them altogether, they might come very near the average of Killyleagh, which is about the proportion I have mentioned—seven to two.

What should you suppose was the proportion in the county of Antrim?—In one parish, of which I was minister, there was no Roman Catholic, except perhaps one or two that paid church cess, the people were almost exclusively Presbyterian; there were only three families belonging to the Established church.

Are you able to form the same sort of general opinion you have already expressed, as to the county of Down, upon the county of Antrim?—No, I could not; and the reason is this, that there are certain portions of that county that are almost exclusively Roman Catholic; and others almost exclusively Protestant.

Which portions of it are almost exclusively Roman Catholic?—One part I know of, Lord O'Neil's property, called Feevagh, and some neighbouring districts in the barony of Toome.

Are the districts considerable in the county of Antrim, in proportion to its entire extent, that are exclusively Roman Catholic?—No, I think not; there is the district of Feevagh, and the district of Newton Glens or Cushendall; I consider that those are nearly Roman Catholic; one I am certain is, and so I believe is the other.

Is it your impression, generally speaking, that the proportion of the population that is Protestant, is greater or less in the county of Antrim, than it is in the county of Down?—I think the Protestant population of Down is greater in the country; in Antrim it is greater in the towns.

You consider Down, on the whole, to be a more Protestant county than Antrim?—Yes, but very little; I should imagine the difference very trifling.

What is your impression with respect to the relative proportions in the county of Londonderry?—I consider there are more Roman Catholics there; the proportion is greater than in either Antrim or Down.

Should you suppose the Roman Catholics as numerous as the Protestants in Londonderry?—No, I think not.

What do you conceive are the relative proportions of the two classes in the county of Armagh?—I know comparatively little of Armagh; I cannot form a general estimate.

Can you form any estimate of Tyrone?—No, I could not.

Could you as to Monaghan?—No, I could not; I could form a gross guess of Tyrone and Armagh rather than the other.

Could you of Donegal?—I know Donegal considerably, but not sufficiently to form an estimate of it.

What is your opinion of Donegal?—That there are more Roman Catholics than Protestants; very considerably more.

Is it your impression, that the number of Protestants is greater or less than the Roman Catholics in the county of Armagh?—I am inclined to think the number of Protestants is greater in Armagh.

What is your general impression as to Tyrone; which do you consider the most numerous?—I think the Protestants are most numerous in Tyrone; but as to Armagh and Tyrone, I give a very general and vague opinion. I am inclined to believe in both of them the Protestants are most numerous.

What is your impression as to the county of Monaghan?—Of that county I know less than even of the others, and cannot so well form any opinion; but I have an impression that the Roman Catholics may be equal to the Protestants there, or rather more numerous.

Have you any knowledge of the county of Cavan?—Comparatively little.

Which do you then, on the whole, consider are the more numerous, the Protestants or Roman Catholics, in the whole province of Ulster?—I conceive the Protestants more numerous by far.

Have you any impression as to the relative proportions of the Presbyterians and members of the Established church in Ulster?—It would be a very vague guess; it would arise merely from considering of the attendance that I have seen at church, and as a Presbyterian minister at the meeting-houses; I could only form a guess upon those two grounds.

Which do you conceive the more numerous, the Presbyterians or the members of the Established church, in the entire province of Ulster?—The members of the Presbyterian church I consider far more numerous.

Is there not at least one class of the Presbyterian members in Ireland who do not receive any portion of the Regium Donum?—There are two classes; one class are commonly called Mountain-men by the common people. They give themselves the name of the Reformed Presbytery; they are the descendants of the Ancient Covenanters. By persons acquainted with church history they are sometimes called Covenanters, and sometimes Cameronians; they retain the sentiments peculiar to people of that class. As to political opinion, they do not go so far as to say, that the house of Stuart are the proper persons to reign; at one time they did go to that extent; but they entertain an opinion that the present government is what they are pleased to term in church phraseology Erastian; and that the established church of Scotland, and the established church of England and Ireland come under that denomination; and they receive no bounty or allowance from government.

How came they not to be included; do you mean they do not choose to accept it?—They would not take it I believe.

933
Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 Jan. 1825.

In fact they do not seek it?—No, they do not; on their own principles they could not take it. Perhaps if the government chose to give them money without condition, as you might give money going along the street, they might take it; they take the solemn league and covenant, and consider it binding on all estates of these kingdoms.

What do you conceive may be the number of covenanters in Ireland?—I think not more than a thousand families throughout Ireland. I may form an erroneous opinion; but I think there are not more than a thousand families.*

Is there not another class of Presbyterian ministers who are not included in the Regium Donum?—Yes, there are a few; but they only form two or three congregations, that have arisen from peculiar circumstances. There is a Mr. Bryce who has two or three ministers connected with him; he quarrelled with his brethren for receiving the bounty conditionally—he would receive it, if it were given unconditionally; but he holds, that the giving bounty in classification implies Erastianism, as it is called; allowing the state to interfere with the church; and he and a few others connected with him, do not receive any bounty; there is another class, but I believe there are only one or two congregations, connected with some Scottish Presbytery, who do not receive any bounty.

Be so good as to describe the body known by the name of “Seceders,” in Ireland?—They are a body that arose in Scotland; I cannot exactly recollect the date; they arose owing to a sermon preached by one of the Erskines (either Ralph or Ebenezer Erskine), before one of the synods, against patronage. The synod took this amiss and censured him; and a number of his brethren sustained him and stood by him. He with others protested and appealed to the general assembly, but was censured and suspended by them. Being finally summoned before them to answer for his contumacy, he and a number of other ministers in Scotland, united against the principle of patronage, and constituted themselves into a Presbytery, and appeared at the bar of the general assembly of the church of Scotland, and declined any further connection with it, until the church of Scotland should think fit to reform themselves from patronage. (The Crown and a number of persons of Scotland having the power of presenting to churches); from these Erskines originated the seceders in Scotland; a Mr. King, who lived in Dromara, in the county of Down, invited some of those seceders over to preach in Ireland; they came over as a kind of missionaries, and preached in Ireland, and then settled congregations in different parts of the kingdom.

How many congregations are in communion with the seceders?—I could not well form an estimate; I think them about half as numerous as the general synod of Ulster.

Are they all included in the Regium Donum?—Yes, except those lately erected; there is one congregation in Belfast, and there may be a few others not included in it, but expecting arrangements may be made with government for including them.

In what manner is the expense defrayed of building the meeting-houses and keeping them in repair?—In the first place, by the voluntary contributions of the people; and if they happen to have liberal minded landlords, by getting such assistance as they may be disposed to give. The great number of landlords in the north, belong to the established church; they, however, generally contribute to the meeting-houses, and there is a third mode which is absolute begging through the towns. I suppose there are half a dozen of our ministers at this moment begging through the towns, among people of all persuasions.

Do you mean in the town where the chapel is to be erected?—No; I assisted the Presbyterian minister of Mullingar, in the town of Belfast; a number of others went with him, and raised fifty or sixty pounds. I and another minister raised 50*l.* in Belfast, for a meeting-house in Carlow.

What do you conceive to be the general cost of building meeting-houses?—I am sorry to say, that they are in general in a very bad state, owing in some cases to the poverty of the people, in others to their contentment with bad houses, or the worst of patronage from resident landlords; but where there have been good houses built either by the subscriptions of the people themselves, or assisted by the liberality of their landlords, I can give some correct estimates; I know one house built for 1,500*l.* which we consider a very good house; I know another built for 2,200*l.* which we consider the best country house in Ireland; I know another very excellent one built for 800*l.* and smaller ones for proportionately smaller sums. By the good houses I mentioned, I mean good for our people; they are plain but substantial.

What should you estimate is the average expense upon the whole, of constructing a meeting-house?—For what we would call a good house about 1,000*l.* but of these I should call good houses, I must say there were very few.

Do you conceive yourself enabled to speak generally as to what are the sentiments of the Presbyterian population with respect to the different societies that have undertaken to assist the education of the lower classes in Ireland?—I think I have a general knowledge of the matter.

What do you conceive are their feelings with respect to the Society for promoting the education of the Poor of Ireland, commonly called the Kildare-place Society?—That they feel a lively interest in all its operations; that they feel exceedingly grateful both to the members of the Society for their attention to their applications, and to government for granting them aid; and I think that the people are every day seeing the beneficial effect of their labours.

You are aware of the fundamental rules of that Society?—I am.

Are

* The witness desires to add—“I have since ascertained, from good authority, that there are about two thousand families.”

Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,
5 Jan. 1825.

Are they considered objectionable by any members of the Presbyterian community?—No, not at all; the principal thing I know of is, that in the school hours, the catechisms are excluded, and the reading of the Bible insisted upon; and that amounts to the whole of their principle, I believe.

Does the circumstance of excluding the catechism in school hours, not excite any feelings of dislike or opposition on the part of the Presbyterians?—Not the least; they consider it as a concession to the general purposes of education; and while I know they generally wish for it to be taught either out of school hours or by parents at home, I know they do not object to the rule of the Kildare-place Society; they consider it a fair thing to make any reasonable concession on their part to advance the general interest of the whole community.

In the parts of Ireland you are more immediately acquainted with, have you observed of late any increased opposition on the part of the Roman Catholics to the principles of that Society?—I have more heard of it than observed it; in my own neighbourhood, I have understood latterly, there has been in various places a great deal of opposition.

Have you witnessed any particular instances of it?—I cannot say I have witnessed any such.

Are we to understand that the Roman Catholic clergy in your neighbourhood, have not in point fact exerted themselves against the schools in connection with that Society during the present summer?—I have not heard much upon the subject; this I have heard, I was told through a gentleman of high respectability in our neighbourhood, that he conceived latterly there was an increased attendance of Roman Catholics at the school; he has a school I believe under the Kildare-place Society, in his own demesne, and I have understood, through him, that the Roman Catholic bishop or vicar, or some other having influence among them, had intimated to the clergy and people, that he was convinced there was no proselytism in the schools, and therefore for them freely to send their children; and if he should discover at any future time there was any proselytism, he then would think it time enough to interfere; and I understood from the said gentleman, there has been an increase in the attendance of the Roman Catholic children. I have known of no instance of objection, except one, where I was informed some Roman Catholic children left a Sunday school.

Are there many Sunday schools in your part of Ireland?—A great number.

About how many do you know in any one parish?—We have six in my own parish.

Do you know of any where there are more?—Not any, but in other parishes there may be more. If I took in every Sunday school where some children belonging to myself were, I could add to the number of schools considerably, but I confine myself to the parish in which my meeting house is situated.

Speaking at present, of all that portion of the country immediately within the sphere of your own observation, but not confining it strictly to any one parish, can you inform us whether the Roman Catholic children generally attend those Sunday schools?—I believe they do in as large a proportion as they attend the daily schools.

Have you known of any instances of Roman Catholic children changing their religion, and becoming Protestants, in consequence of attending those Sunday schools?—No; I know of two Roman Catholic Sunday schools that are exclusively so; there is one in the neighbourhood of my own parish, which is held in the mass-house; and there is another in the town of Belfast, and that is exclusively Roman Catholic, and held in the chapel also; but I have never known an instance of a Roman Catholic child becoming a Protestant from having attended a Protestant Sunday school.

Are the feelings of the Roman Catholic parents friendly to their attendance in the schools, speaking generally, as far as you have had an opportunity of observing?—Yes; I never heard of objections on the part of parents, nor have I heard much of the clergy interfering, except in the case of the two schools I have mentioned; in other places I am acquainted with, I believe the feelings of parents are friendly to the schools.

Do you conceive, that the children who attend those Sunday schools in general, attend day schools also?—A great number of them do, but there are some that do not; I have attended at Sunday schools when I have examined them, and made the inquiry whether there were any who attended no other school, and at every Sunday school I found one or two that were never at any other.

Do you conceive that there is any considerable proportion of Protestant children attending Sunday schools who do not attend day schools?—I think there are, particularly young servants, who are not attending any others; I always make it a point in families where I find young servants, to speak to them upon that subject.

What do you conceive to be the impression of the Presbyterian population, with respect to the schools belonging to the Association for discountenancing Vice, speaking generally, not confining your observations to any one or two particular instances?—I think they would be as favourable to them as others, if there were no one thing done exclusively: and where any objection has arisen, it has been from some exclusive act.

What do you mean by the word “exclusive”?—I mean in raising a house, and giving it into the hands solely of the bishop and rector, or curate, and putting the schoolmaster, and the management of the school and books, entirely in his hands; I have known some evils arising out of this.

Does it appear to you unreasonable, that a school that is professedly to be a parochial school, and connected with the minister of the established church, should be dealt with in the manner described?—I conceive where people have subscribed to build a school-house, or where public money has been given, the school-house and its patronage ought to be public, and that any exclusive patronage would have the tendency to create a jealousy between the Presbyterian and the Established church that should not exist.

or

Do you think there are any feelings of alarm on the part of the Presbyterians, lest the religious faith of their children should be interfered with in those schools?—I have known some complaints, but not general.

What kind of complaints do you refer to?—I have known complaints of premiums being given to Presbyterians in preference to others, in order to make them attend those schools, or schools so managed, to get them to learn the church catechism, but the complaints are not at all general.

Do you conceive any objection would be entertained by the Presbyterian parents, to their children learning that catechism?—I think there would, if the children were required to learn it as a condition of attendance.

Are you acquainted with many schools connected with the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Not many, of which I can speak particularly.

About how many?—Not more than two or three; the Kildare-place Society is the one I know most about.

Are you acquainted with many of the London Hibernian schools?—No, comparatively none, except those in the south.

Are we to understand, there are few in your vicinity in the county of Down?—I believe there is one in the district of Mourne that I do not know much of, but with that exception, I do not think there is any other in the whole county.

Can you inform us what are the feelings of the people in your vicinity, with respect to the principle of education being gratuitous or given for payment?—I think they are altogether unfavourable to gratuitous education.

Can you state on what principle, and what their feeling is with respect to it?—I think one feeling is, that it would, in a certain degree, degrade them, that they would consider themselves lowered in society by it; I think another feeling is, that they very often think those schools are not so well managed, that there is not the same interest taken by the master in the school, when he is paid independently of the scholars, as when his payment depends upon the information communicated.

Is there not a considerable proportion of scholars that would be unable to pay?—I think a very small proportion that could pay nothing; there is, however, a very large portion that could not pay any thing high; I have known instances of schoolmasters getting fifteen pence a quarter, and being satisfied with it.

Do you think, if there were good schools established in your neighbourhood, of which the general principle was payment, and a master well qualified, and the education good, do you conceive, that those children being admitted to gratuitous education, when properly recommended, as an exception to the general rule of payment, would tend to repel those inclined to pay?—I think it would, and I could give instances to that effect; and so convinced have I and others in my neighbourhood been of the injurious tendency of an openly gratuitous education, that we have been forced upon the following expedient in order to obviate the difficulty. There is a committee of management; I am not one of the committee, but being the minister of the greater number of the people, I take some charge in it; the school we limit to a certain number of scholars and a certain rate of payment, and if the number attending does not come up to our maximum, the committee hold the privilege of recommending gratuitously a certain number to make it up; the children go to school without any body knowing whether they go free or otherwise, and there is no objection to that being done.

The question is rather, whether, if the individuals sent for gratuitous instruction were known, and the others, being a considerable majority, were to pay reasonable rates, do you conceive that a school so conducted would be objected to?—No, I do not think it would so much as a school where the general principle was gratuitous education.

You would recommend, that payment should be the general principle, and gratuitous admission the exception?—A great deal, I conceive, would depend upon the mode in which gratuitous children were introduced; if it were publicly known that any one was a poor child, it would stand as a barrier at the door to prevent a good many children from coming; the gratuitous education ought, I conceive, to be in the hands of the most efficient persons in the parish to appoint children in a way not much talked of.

Do you conceive, if there was a regulation that some certain limited number should be appointed by the ministers of different religions, either separately or on consultation with each other, it would be considered as any objection to the attendance on the school by the more wealthy?—No, not at all.

Even in cases where the number of gratuitous children exceeded the pay scholars?—I should feel some doubt upon that; there is one point, however, in cheapening education to all classes, which might be effected, and is effected in a great measure by the Kildare-place Society, I mean the cheapening of books. This principle might be extended without danger of offence.

Has it occurred to you to examine the books published by the Kildare-place Society?—I believe I have examined them all, or forty out of fifty.

Do you approve of those publications?—The general idea I have formed of them is highly in their favour—I do not recollect any exception.

Do you conceive them well calculated to supplant the use of the bad books that were used to be found in schools?—Yes, admirably.

Referring to your experience, when a boy in the schools you have attended, will you mention mention the general description of books at that time current in the schools?—I could mention the names of a great number we used; Manson's Primer and Spelling Book were the first, with Fenning's Universal Spelling Book.

The question is, rather as to reading books to be found in the schools, whether for amusement or study?—The reading books in the schools were exceedingly promiscuous, with the sole exception of the Scriptures, there was no classification in the school, except reading the Scriptures and spelling; they were necessarily in classes; the other books were exceedingly promiscuous, and in general very bad.

By whom were those books supplied?—Brought by individuals.

Where did they usually buy them?—From hawkers passing through the country generally, or from grocers that lived in the villages.

Enumerate the reading books that you can recollect, that were in use in the schools?—I recollect one book being common in the schools, called the Lilliputian Magazine; another, the Youth's Instructor, those were good books; then, as to the other books, to say they were in general use might be incorrect, because in one school you would find one class of books, and in another, a different one; I could enumerate many of the books that were used where I was at school.

Enumerate any of the books of the description you have mentioned, that you recollect yourself?—I recollect reading a book, called the Seven Champions of Christendom and Destruction of Troy; I recollect reading Hero and Leander, Gesta Romanorum, and Seven Wise Masters; I recollect having read the Chinese Tales; I recollect having read the romance called Parismos and Parismenos, and Don Belianis of Greece; another extravagant tale I recollect having read, the History of a Captain Freney, a robber; I perfectly and distinctly recollect that.

Did you ever read Ovid's Art of Love?—No.

Aristotle's Masterpiece?—No, I never knew it read in schools; I have seen it among the people; I saw many copies of it sent out from Belfast, a few years ago.

Valentine and Orson?—Yes; and I recollect reading the Irish Rogues and Rapparees, and a book, called the History of Redmond O'Handlon.

Was not he a notorious highwayman and a murderer?—Yes, both Freney and he.

What is the latest period at which you have known those books to have existed in the country schools in your vicinity?—I recollect the general class of books through the schools being nearly what I have stated, until within a very few years. I do not recollect any considerable change from such books as I have enumerated, till within these few years.

To what circumstance do you attribute the change to which you have referred?—There is an opinion I think it necessary to mention previously to coming to this point; I am inclined to believe, that previous to the year 1798, injurious impressions were made in the north of Ireland by the partizans of a society in Paris, of certain French philosophers, who had got the schools of France into their hands, and who had generally monopolized the management of the masters and the books, and who, I understand, upon pretty good authority, expended 200,000 l. a year upon that object (this is mentioned by Dr. Simpson, in his Plea for Religion, derived from some French documents); I think from the friends and admirers of that society, or men holding similar principles, there was a considerable impulse given to the public mind of the North of Ireland. I know perfectly well that the works of Tom Paine and such writers were extensively put into the hands of the people: Paine's Rights of Man, a political work, and Age of Reason, a deistical one, were industriously circulated; I know it was very common to drop them on the road, and leave them at the door of the poor man, or push them under the door. I know also, there was an impression went forth upon the people, that the catechisms were bad books for schools; that the Bible also was an improper school book, and that rhetorical collections were fitter books for schools; and I believe from many schools the Bibles and catechisms were about that time and some time succeeding, very nearly banished. The Bible and catechism were supplanted by rhetorical collections of a very good description in the better schools, and in the common schools through the country by the books I have now described. I am also inclined to believe, that not a few of the schoolmasters were men of bad principles, who preferred any book to the Bible.

Did you ever know Paine's Age of Reason, or Paine's Rights of Man in the schools?—Not in the schools, I can state; but I can state on my own general knowledge, that the Bibles and catechisms in some places are now only in the act of returning, and that in some places there is difficulty in getting them restored. The objections, however, to the Bible, as a school book, are rapidly disappearing.

Do you not think there is something in the very circumstance of the anxiety now shewn to proscribe the use of the Scriptures in the schools, that produces a counter acting exertion favourable to their introduction?—I must say, where we had completely succeeded in re-establishing the Bible as a book read in the schools, it would not have been easy to give any additional impulse; I cannot say there was any increase, because there was not room for it; and the improvement in books latterly, I cannot in my mind trace further back than the publications of the Kildare-place Society. In some of the better schools they previously had several collections, and a book, called the Monitor; that I consider a beneficial book; but in country schools few of these had made their appearance.

Do you conceive the Kildare-place publications are in the course of taking possession of the schools generally in your part of Ireland?—I think they are; they will soon have exclusive possession of the country schools.

Do you conceive that books of a better description are in the way of being sold through the the means of hawkers?—Yes, they are; I recollect hearing from old people, that in their early days, the catechism and the Bible were the usual school books; these were supplanted by the principles and books I have mentioned; the change for the better in modern times I am inclined to attribute to the experience the people have had of the evil of the principles attempted to be imposed upon them, and to which they had listened with too much credulity; I am also inclined in part, to attribute the improvement to the interest which many good people of the higher orders have taken in the education of the lower; and above all, under Providence, to the labours of individuals and societies, who have put good and cheap books of an improved character into general circulation.

Is it your opinion that the principle of inspection is a valuable one for keeping schools in good order?—I think in order to make an efficient system of education, it is absolutely necessary at present.

Have you ever had occasion to meet with any of the inspectors in the service of the Kildare-place Society?—I know two of them; Mr. Fitzgerald is the name of one, and Mr. Daly of the other.

Have you formed any opinion as to whether it is likely that the appointment of such officers is attended with good effects in the country, speaking from your own observation?—Yes, attended with most beneficial effects, in three ways; first, it is attended with most beneficial effects upon the masters; secondly, upon the scholars; and thirdly, upon the people themselves. It gives them a confidence about the schools; and I must say, it is attended with a similar effect upon the clergy. We are convinced ourselves we ought to have been doing the work that is now doing by the public; upon my own mind it has had the most powerful effect, and I have begun the system of half-yearly examination of the schools of the parish.

Do you not think that the employment of men of rank in society is likely to have the effect of directing the attention of the middle and upper ranks in society to the well ordering of schools?—Yes, it has upon the clergy and gentry; and I might rank along with the clergy and gentry, persons approaching to them in rank, who ought to take, from their station or connection, some control over the schools; I mean the most respectable farmers.

It will not have the effect of superseding local inspection and making them, the clergy, gentry and others, inattentive?—No, I think quite the reverse; I give the instance of myself.

We should be glad to know your opinion as to the Lancasterian plan of education, and the use of monitors, as contradistinguished from the exertions of the masters, applied to each individual pupil?—I have examined some Lancasterian schools; I mean I have been present and looking at them; I think that in large towns, such as Belfast, where there is one which I have examined, and it is an excellent one, it appeared to answer the purpose very well; the parents were generally poor working people, and paid no attention to the education of their children, and partly to keep them out of mischief, and to give them a little education, they send them there; and I have observed them in the country; the people look at them there with great prejudice; they think they are useless; they think that the master must teach the children himself, and that his inspecting the monitors is not teaching the children; and the prejudice is so strong as almost to render them inefficient.

How far do you live from the charter school at Strangford?—By water, not more than three miles, or four; by land ten miles.

Have you ever had any opportunity of forming a judgment as to the plan of education in that particular school?—I have not.

Are you acquainted with the system pursued generally in charter schools?—Very little.

Have you any well grounded opinion?—I have no opinion upon the subject.

Will you be so good as to explain to us wherein the difference of faith or opinions consists among those who are vulgarly denominated the new and old light, as applicable to the Presbyterian body?—In one word in the north of Ireland, the old light signifies, in its strictest as well as most common acceptation, Calvinism. It is also occasionally employed to signify Arminianism; and also that intermedium between the two, which Richard Baxter taught; it is employed to signify all those, but most generally Calvinism. New light, in the North of Ireland, exclusively signified Arianism, or a verging to Socinianism. We have not many Socinians. There may be some, not more than one, among the ministers of whom I am certain; there may be another whom I suspect; but among the people there are a few. The term New Light is applied to them all.

Do you conceive that Arminianism and Calvinism are easily reconcileable with each other?—I think, taking it in the sense in which it was taught by the Remonstrants in Holland, they are not at all reconcileable; but as it was taught by Wesley, they seem to meet so closely, that it is not easy to distinguish them. I mean, that a man who would write or preach the doctrines called Arminianism, has necessarily to concede all the essential points of Calvinism. (See note E.)

Are we to distinctly understand, that in speaking of the Presbyterian church, the word New Light is understood to imply Arianism, leaning at least to Socinian opinions?—In its most extensive sense, it signifies distinctly not only Arianism, but Arianism verging towards Socinianism, or positive Socinianism. Some few Calvinists apply it to Arminianism; but this is uncommon.

Do you think there is Arianism in any of the ministers officiating in the Presbyterian congregations in Ireland?—Yes, I am certain there is, so far as one can be certain.

Is it avowed by those ministers, or denied by them?—I do not know that it is avowed by

Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,

more than two or three; the others are all anxious to deny it, or say nothing upon the subject. I am here speaking of the North; in the South it is distinctly avowed by the synod of Munster.

In what way have they avowed it?—One way is, by preaching. I know the distinguishing doctrines of it have been preached, and others by tacit consent; it is known by considering the doctrines they do not preach. I believe it would not be easy to find any other way of ascertaining the fact.

In the synod of Ulster, do you conceive there are any ministers belonging to it who hold the Arian doctrines?—I do think there are.

What is the total number of ministers belonging to the synod of Ulster?—I think, taking in ministers and assistants, it would be about 200.

Of that number of 200, what portion should you suppose hold the Arian doctrines?—I have not been able to estimate 40, about 35. I think that was the most, upon a special personal examination of the list of the synod; and very few of those would be willing to acknowledge it. It is known by defect rather than declaration.

What number of ministers belong to the presbytery of Antrim?—I believe eight congregations, and ten ministers; one has no congregation.

Are they understood to hold the Arian doctrine?—I think there is one of them of whom I would question very much whether he does hold it or not; I should suspect he was more of an Arminian; but he does not, so far as I know, preach the doctrine that would shew he was not an Arian.

As to the others?—One of the principal persons has published, they were all Arians; but the rest affirm he had no authority for saying so. I consider them all Arians, except perhaps the one mentioned.

How many ministers belong to the synod of Munster?—I believe eight congregations and eleven ministers, of whom two lately died.

How many of those hold the Arian or Socinian doctrines?—There was only one out of the number that did not hold Arian doctrines; and some of them I believe held the Socinian doctrines.

What number of ministers belong to those you name Seceders?—I think about 100, or a few more.

Do any of those hold the Arian doctrines?—I conceive not one.

Do any of the covenanters?—Not one.

Was there not some rule of discipline until lately, which had the practical effect of excluding the Arian ministers from their functions in the synod of Ulster; something in the nature of a test or subscription of articles, or confession of faith?—I think about a hundred years ago, or near it, the presbytery of Antrim were separated from the general synod of Ulster, on account of the Arian doctrines. They were, I believe, expelled from the body chiefly, or altogether, on that account. I believe the ostensible reason used by the members of the presbytery of Antrim was a refusal to subscribe any human test or doctrine; and the law of the synod, before and after that period, certainly stood in words, and should in practice—that no one should be licensed to preach, or ordained, except he subscribed the Westminster confession of faith—with this sole exception; there was an Act passed by the synod, called the Pacific Act, to relieve persons from mere expressions, not relieving them from the doctrines. If any minister objected to the expression in the confession, he had a right to put it into his own words; but at the same time not to deny the doctrines contained in it; and it was even so particular, that he would not be permitted to put it in scripture language, because there might be a doubt thrown over the meaning he attached to it. With that exception, the law was that before any one received licence or ordination, he must sign the Westminster Confession of Faith. The principal reason for the Pacific Act was this; there is one chapter in the Westminster Confession of Faith that goes to define the power of the civil magistrate; and it declares that the civil magistrate has power to call synods, or such other religious assemblies, and to see that nothing be enacted therein contrary to the Scriptures. This produced a good deal of debate; for whilst none would have denied the right of the civil magistrate to convene a religious meeting, many scrupled at the latter part of the article, which seemed to give the magistrate a right to enter upon the interpretation of the Scriptures; it was upon this subject that explanation was frequently required. Ecclesiastical writers on the subject explained the law thus:—The magistrate has power "circa sacra sed non in sacris." Difficulties on this subject created the necessity of the Pacific Act I have mentioned: there might be also other expressions, to which the same latitude might be extended, the minister putting it in his own language, but not impugning the doctrines. Such was the law of the synod in words; and at the time the presbytery of Antrim was separated from it, it was very exactly the practice. I can only give a conjectural reason for the change; but I think, in all probability, it arose from certain writings being circulated among the ministers, and also from an Arian professor having crept into the University of Glasgow. This was a professor Simpson, who was ejected by the general assembly of the church of Scotland, for teaching, that the doctrine of the divinity of our Saviour was to be understood, as far as I can recollect his expression, cum grano salis. I cannot trace the origin of those opinions in the synod further than I state.

In point of fact, would the condition of the subscription to the confession of Westminster, have the effect of excluding Arians altogether from the ministry?—Yes, it must.

No person could subscribe that confession, and be an Arian?—No, he could not; it is impossible he could be any thing but a Calvinist. It is, beyond all question, the most strict of all confessions that have been written.

Are

Are the seceding ministers of Ireland bound to subscribe to it?—I apprehend all of them.

Did you subscribe to it?—I did.

And yet we must collect from your former evidence, that all the ministers of the synod of Ulster do not subscribe to it?—At the time some of those opinions were introduced, which I have referred to, a laxity of discipline was introduced as to enforcing subscription, some presbyteries laying it aside, others eluding it by equivocal phraseology; the consequence was, that the greater number of presbyteries dropped it altogether; but at the same time some of the presbyteries, that have given up the subscription, are the most decided in favour of the doctrine of the Westminster Confession. So that you are not to infer, from a presbytery having given up the subscription, that therefore they give up the doctrine. But the presbyteries that have properly retained subscription are most decidedly Calvinistic.

Would such presbyteries, as you have described, be averse to adopting the rule again of making the subscription to the confession a condition upon undertaking the ministry?—(See Note F.)—There might be some objection, because they go upon this principle, that it is much better to examine the young men upon the Scriptures than require their subscription to any human formulary, because you might get a hypocrite to sign it.

At the same time one does not see how that reason would apply to the excluding the subscription to the confession of faith, because it might be still open to examine them upon the doctrines, and the supposed hypocrite might be detected?—I hold the opinion implied in the question, but I think that amongst our clergy, who go by the general denomination of the Old Lights, there are some holding Arminianism, but the point in the confession upon the subject of predestination is so strict, it is impossible to entertain any doubt; the consequence has been, that those members holding Calvinistic doctrines, and others holding Arminian doctrines, or doctrines akin to them, have made a kind of compromise with one another, and the Calvinists have not enforced subscription for the purpose of not excluding those who hold the doctrines of Arminianism; I mean, by that, Arminianism, as modified by Wesley and others, and which I myself consider as conceding the doctrines of Calvinism.

In what manner did the synod of Munster get rid of the subscription to the Westminster Confession of Faith?—I am almost certain they never had it, because the synod of Munster generally acted as a number of independent churches, having no common bond of union.

At what period was the synod of Munster formed?—Many of them were chaplains of families in the time of Cromwell, and were Independents.

Do you mean they were of that sect known by the name of Independents?—Yes; several of them appear to have been Independents; some were settled as ministers of Protestant colonies; some were the ministers of French refugees, and seem to have had little connection more than what arose from the management of the government.

Of course, you have read the thirty-nine articles of the church of England?—I have.

Are there any of those articles you would not feel at liberty to subscribe?—The articles permitting the church to ordain rites and ceremonies, I could not subscribe, except explained in a very particular manner; if it signified to ordain or enforce any ceremony not contained in the word of God, I could not subscribe it.

Could you subscribe to all the doctrinal articles?—Yes, I could.

Do you conceive, that all the ministers you have described as seceders, could with equal facility subscribe to all the doctrinal articles of the church of England?—Yes, no doubt; we hold the articles of the church of England to be Calvinistic, and in that we agree with one portion of the church, and disagree with another; those articles that refer to the doctrines of the gospel we should have no objection to in the world.

Do you conceive, that the number of Arians among the Presbyterians in Ireland has been increasing of late years?—I think it is very much on the decrease.

At what period do you suppose it was the greatest?—I think it was greatest perhaps about an hundred years ago; at the time the presbytery of Antrim was separated from the Synod of Ulster, I think then it made very considerable progress under the patronage of high names, as Abernethy, the author of a very excellent work upon the Attributes, who gave it a very great deal of eclat. I think it afterwards declined for a time, but I think there was subsequently a revival; forty or fifty years ago it might be at its height, and remained stationary for a time, or was even upon the increase, but latterly it has decidedly declined, and I will give you a striking example of it: I was ordained in 1808, I believe I succeeded an Arian; another friend was ordained in 1808, and he succeeded an Arian, or one very near to it; another friend succeeded in like manner a very decided Arian, and another friend another Arian, until in one whole district, which was twenty years ago entirely Arian, I do not know of one single minister you could suspect of Arianism, except one.

Can you state, how the congregations, your own and that of your friends, were affected by the change?—The people were delighted by it; they considered themselves suffering very much, certainly, under the ministry of the Arians.

You think the congregations generally, as contradistinguished from their ministers, are indisposed to Arianism?—Yes, the great body of the people most distinctly are opposed to Arianism; but if the people of rank in a congregation be Arians, as sometimes happens, they may bring in a minister of Arian principles by their influence; for, although the people have equal votes, we allow a proportion of representation and influence to property in the house. Originally also, there was a certain representative power allowed to quality and rank of the person, that could only be an estimated thing that would go by the opinion of the ministers and elders; but now, without allowing rank or quality to enter into the estimate, the richer part of a congregation have a great facility in keeping out any minister, or bringing in one of their own choice.

Is there any precise rule?—Two-thirds of both men and money are necessary to get a minister in, and one-third would keep him out.

Can you assign any reason why persons of the rich and upper and better class are more disposed toward Arianism than others?—I could not give a decided reason; but I think one reason has always been, that the ministers called the Old Lights, were always most disposed for enforcing strict church discipline. They all kept up a discipline, in modern times considered ridiculous, punishing members for delinquency, and unfortunately the rich classes of people were not fond of it. I think the Old Lights also preached the highest, and therefore to some, the least acceptable standard of morality.

Can you discover, in the modes of education that have been pursued by the Presbyterian clergy of Ireland, any predisposing cause that would account for certain leading characters among them declining to Arian principles?—Not more than the influence of the presbyteries. A young man when he commences as a student, comes under the care of the presbytery, the necessity of writing essays and preaching sermons before them, brings him constantly in communication with them, and if they are Arian, it is likely he may imbibe some of their notions.—(See Note G.)—I will venture to assign as another reason, the protégés of government have generally been Arians.

Has there been any cause of the kind existing in the Scotch universities?—Latterly there has not been any thing very distinct, except that some of the Scotch professors have been, at least I may say, suspected of Socinianism, or very liberal opinions, as they are pleased to call them, and that might have predisposed some. It is a notorious fact, that some of the professors of Edinburgh and Glasgow have been suspected.

Do you apply that to the professors of theology?—I do not apply it to them; and yet, although I studied under two professors in Scotland, there was a great deficiency in their system of education in theology; it was a great deal too general. I never heard any doctrines brought forward, although I believe the persons themselves hold those doctrines that might have been brought forward with advantage to orthodoxy. This glaring deficiency in the education of Irish students of theology, arose in a great degree from the length of the Scotch professor's course, and the shortness of the Irish student's curriculum of theological education. It was a great evil.

To what circumstance do you attribute the recent decrease of Arianism among the Presbyterian clergy?—To greater exertion and decidedness on the part of the ministers holding orthodox doctrines, and to the Bible and missionary societies, which have altogether got into the hands of the orthodox or old light ministers; in consequence of that, they have been brought into public notice, which they were not before; their principles have been known, and have been stated at public meetings; a number of very influential orthodox ministers have arisen, that have boldly asserted their sentiments, and taken away the cause of objection that formerly existed against orthodox ministers, and the stigma affixed to them of vulgarity, which may have been in a great degree the case; this point is well illustrated in a very excellent essay of Mr. Foster, upon the reason why evangelical preaching has been less exceptionable to the upper classes; latterly, a number of ministers better educated and better calculated for preaching to the higher ranks, have taken off the stigma that before existed upon those doctrines, and exhibited them in a more attractive form and more prominent point of view, but the great cause has been the advancement of the Bible as a more prominent object of religion, and attention to the Bible and missionary societies, which have brought the orthodox minister into more notice, and given them more decision and more influence.—(See Note H.)

Have you observed less disposition on the part of the Arian ministers to refer to the Scriptures as the standard of truth, than amongst those whom you describe as orthodox?—No, I do not think I have observed less disposition; but there is less inducement. I conceive that the sermons of the Arians contain none almost of the peculiar doctrines of the Gospel; there would be no reference to either the person or almost to the works of the Saviour; their discussions consist more of essays on ethics. There would therefore be less inducement for reference to the Scriptures as they would have less to prove of what is peculiar to the Scriptures. The others treat frequently upon the peculiar Scripture doctrines of the Gospel, and therefore have more reference to scriptural authority.

Do the observations made as to the decrease of Arianism apply to Ireland generally, or to the province of Ulster?—I conceive it is general; I cannot call it a decrease in the South; I can only say there is a visible increase of other doctrines. We have established churches in different places; we have it in our power in almost any of the principal towns of the South to establish others. The Arians have either not the inclination or the power, I cannot decidedly say which; but I am inclined to think they would not have the power.

Note (A.)

The persons in Presbyterian congregations who do not contribute to the minister, are in some cases the poorer class, but not invariably so. The poor are generally as forward to pay according to their means, as the rich. The principal cause of the great surplus of people who do not pay, is to be traced to the increase of population, and the consequent inadequacy of the present houses to accommodate the people. To show that it is not the poor who are unprovided, I shall just mention that I have attached to my congregation three persons whose joint income is at least equal to twelve hundred a year, and yet they have have no pews (for they cannot get them), nor do they contribute any thing to me; and I conceive I do all ministerial duties for about 200 families who have no pews and pay no contribution. This overflow of population, compared with our means of religious accommodation, has always been to me matter of deep regret. It has forced me upon an increase of ministerial duties, far above the powers of my constitution. In summer I examine at 11 A.M. on each Lord's day, preach at 12, and lecture again at 2 P.M. Again at 5 or 6 P.M. I preach in the outskirts of the parish, and am fairly compelled to officiate in the open air. But if I did not thus multiply the services, there are hundreds who, for want of pews, would not hear a sermon in a year, nor attend any public worship. In winter, I examine at 11 A.M. each Lord's day, preach at 12, and again by candlelight at 6 P.M. This evening service I consider as one for the poor, giving up my own pew, and requiring all the people to do the same, that all who come may freely be accommodated. The attendance is large and regular. I have latterly attempted to raise a subscription to enlarge and improve the meeting-house; and though I am aware of liberal assistance from the landlords, I have found it very hard or impossible to get the body of the people to move in the business.

I know one congregation where the minister told me he does duties for 500 to 700 families, who pay him nothing. This is a subject of deep interest to every Christian.

I have repeatedly offered 10*l.* a year out of my own scanty income, if the people would raise fifty more, in order to pay an assistant, offering to engage to diminish in no item my own routine of duties. I could not succeed in the attempt.

Note (B.)

In the county of Antrim, the improvement in school-houses of late years, is very remarkable. There are two very capacious houses, principally for the education of the poor in Belfast; one at Whitehouse, one on the foundation of Erasmus Smith, near Templepatrick; others connected, I believe, with some of the education societies at Carnmoney. A similar state of improvement is visible in other parts of the country. In Down, there is a remarkable improvement through the whole country. In going along the public roads, new and improved school-houses meet the eye in every quarter, and so far as my knowledge extends, the state of education is keeping pace with the improvement of the houses.

Note (C.)

Since my return from being examined by the Commissioners of Education, I am more confirmed in my opinion of the importance of the catechism to a school. The week after my return from Dublin was my examination week in the parish. In one quarter, I found the attendance and answering of the children very superior to the others. The cause was the schoolmaster, who being more serious than any of the others, and in some degree a protégé of my own, had paid more attention to the children learning the catechism than the other masters. I should still, however, be willing to surrender the catechism in school, provided the sacrifice were of any public service to education.

I have discovered an error of 50 families in one congregation, which are to be deducted in the addition.

I consider the preceding calculation as below the real amount.

Note (E.)

After advancing this opinion, I must beg both the pardon and patience of the Commissioners who questioned me, while I explain the grounds of my statement.

I admit, that when Calvinism and Arminianism are defined in distinct propositions, and when the partizans of each assume a controversial attitude, there is an utter incompatibility between their views of doctrine.

When I say that Arminianism (as taught by Wesley, &c.) concedes all the essential points of Calvinism, my authority is this;—there is a note in Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, edited by Mr. Simeon of Cambridge, which gives an account of the following concessions by Wesley.—1. The heart of man is naturally so depraved by sin, that it never would, if left to itself, think of turning to God. 2d. The grace of God, by the holy Spirit, is anterior to our turning to God. 3d. This grace is absolutely necessary through the continuance of the Christian life, and if withdrawn, the sinner would return to iniquity.

Now, when these points are conceded, it does appear to me that Calvinism necessarily follows. I reason thus:—1. Here is a sinner, who would never turn to God of his own will. 2d. The grace of God is anterior to his conversion. 3d. The intention of God to grant the grace, must then have also been anterior. 4th. If anterior by a moment, it must have been eternally anterior; to deny this, implies that God thought, on the day of a sinner's conversion, what he did not think the day before. In a perfect being, new thoughts would imply accession of knowledge, and render him imperfect.

The doctrine of prayer also taught by Arminians, concedes Calvinism;—I pray God to give, to do. I either mean he will give and do, or I mean a mere compliment without truth. If I mean, that I expect him to give or do, I admit he must intend to give and do. He must intend, before he gives or does; if he intend a moment before, and there must be intention or there cannot be giving or doing, then in a perfect being, the intention must have been eternal, and Calvinism is conceded. The answer, attempted by shewing this, would make God the author of sin, and appears to me to be both bad theology, and worse philosophy. It goes upon ignorance, or rejection of the great Newtonian principles of analysis; and substitutes reasoning by synthesis. It begins at God, and comes down to the sinner, and makes God's intentions and the sinner's doings a unity; whereas it should begin at the sinner, and try to analyse events up to God; and not form a unity of God's intentions and the sinner's actions, until it had proved they were capable of being united, by having separated them first, and thereby demonstrated their previous connection.

Now this analysis the Arminian never can effect. 1. We have first a sinner in action. 2. We have then a sinner's intention to act sinfully; this is the second step of the analysis. 3. We may find a tempter, and that tempter may be a bad companion, or the father of all evil; but follow the analysis as we will, we will never discover God to be, if I may use the expression, a component part of the aggregate of a sinner's thoughts and works and ruin. Thus in the only true mode of philosophising, we are not entitled to pronounce upon the aggregate, until we have analysed the parts, and proved, first, their separate and then their united existence. But in this mode, God can never be proved the author of sin.

When, therefore, I say, that Calvinism and Arminianism are compatible, I only mean, that modern Arminians grant so much that Calvinism is deducible from the concession.

Note (F.)

The subject of subscription, and of separation from the Arians, has often formed matter of deep consideration to many members of the synod of Ulster. I confess I am favourable to both. I feel myself a member of a church openly tolerating what I consider erroneous doctrines. But alas! where should I retire into greater purity. That church is free from the stain!

I have therefore, with others, laboured to reform rather than abandon a church I acknowledge in some degree corrupt. We have not been without some success; we have seen, as I have stated above, most extensive revolutions for the better. Had we been separate from the Arians, their congregations would have been filled on the demise of ministers with Arian successors. Our remaining in union has enabled us, in many cases, to fill the churches of deceased Arians with orthodox preachers.

Notwithstanding all this, the anxious wish of many is for a separation; and the great practical barrier in the way is, how to reconcile the Calvinists and Arminians. The Arminians are the smaller number. Some ministers have talked of modifying the Westminster Confession on the article of predestination; others of substituting a subscription to the distinguishing doctrines of the "Trinity," the "Atonement," &c. &c. Others have talked talked of a prospective union with the Seceders. It wants but a beginning to effect a division on some of the foregoing principles. I think the orthodox members of the synod might all agree to resume subscription to the Westminster Confession, under the operation of the "Pacific Act." I have described, I believe the Arminians amongst us to go further in conceding the essentials of Calvinism, than even what I have mentioned in Note (E.)

Note (G.)

As one cause of the modern progress of the Arian principles, I cannot omit mentioning the models of sermons, brought into fashion by Dr. Hugh Blair of Edinburgh, and others. These miserable dilutions of the doctrines of the Gospel; these ethical niceties of the school of Chesterfield, formed the polished model of genteel composition; and Pope's "Soft Dean," who "never mentioned hell to ears polite," was abundantly outdone by a minister in the north of Ireland, who, determined to be honest and yet polite, actually spelled the word h-e-l-l, without pronouncing it.

I must add, in explanation of what I say of the Arians being the protégés of government, that I can instance it in Dr. Campbell of Armagh and Clonmel; in Abernethy, a favourite of Chesterfield, and the late Dr. Black, perhaps the most influential member that ever appeared in the general synod; and it is well known he was the intimate friend, and in matters relating to the synod, the adviser of the late Marquis of Londonderry.

Note (H.)

A disposition to trace causes and effects is often a bewildering propensity, and may lead us to draw upon fancy, where facts are not easily found. Hoping, however, that I am not led beyond what I have felt and observed, I am strongly inclined to attribute a large portion of the advancement of orthodoxy, and the decline of Arianism in the Presbyterian church, to a visible and increasing improvement in the established clergy. I am aware I am writing to members of the church, and that to speak of improvement, may imply an ungracious retrospective censure; but I feel that I write to a board who wish for truth and facts. I may be in error, but I do believe I am stating the fact, when I say, that the established clergy some time ago did not do as much for religion as they now do. I speak of those of the North, with whom I have been acquainted. Now, latterly, I think I have witnessed a great change for the better; their name, their learning, their influence, have, in many cases, been thrown into the scale of orthodoxy, as well in the Presbyterian as in the Established church; and from this co-operating power a great revolution of sentiment seems to me to have arisen in the Presbyterian body. I could adduce facts to prove my opinion, if necessary.

I submit the foregoing notes, as explanations and additions to my evidence, before the Commissioners of Education Inquiry.

Appendix, N° 262.

Further Examination of the Rev. Henry Cooke, Thursday 6th January 1825.

HAVE you observed whether the school-houses which have been erected, partly from the funds of individuals, and partly by contribution from the public funds, have always remained for the use of the public as schools?—Not always; I have heard of some instances to the contrary, and at least I know one, a very glaring one.

Have the goodness to state what you know upon the subject?—I know one instance within fifteen miles of my own neighbourhood, where there was a meeting first held in the church, when the parish, so far as I recollect, subscribed by way of assessment upon themselves, a certain sum of money, for building a school-house; on that point, viz. of assessment I am not so certain; but at a public meeting of the parish in vestry, there was, I understand from good authority, a general committee appointed to manage the school, and certain subscriptions entered into, whether parochial or individual I cannot decidedly tell. Land was granted for the school-house, and the school built partly by the subscriptions of individuals and partly from assistance.—I cannot say from which of the societies; but I believe the Kildare-place Society; the sum given, I understand, was 80*l.*; three individuals or four in number, after some little time, either before or as soon as it was filled with a schoolmaster, entered into an agreement, as I was told by the late Presbyterian minister, that there should be half-a-guinea or thereabouts, a quarter, paid by the children going there, which was a bar to any children but their own. The rector of the parish, a very benevolent man, the Presbyterian ministers and some others, I believe the Marquis of Downshire for one, embarked in the matter; there were certain resolutions entered into, where those persons were present; it was publicly stated in the newspapers, that those persons had made attempts to appropriate the school and the opposition of the parish to such appropriation, and that they (the parish) had succeeded in preventing it; but the others had the lease, and continue, I believe, to keep the house attended only by the children of three or four rich families.

Name the place?—Dromara.

Have you known any instances in which a building, built in part from public funds, for the purpose of a school-house, has been applied entirely to private purposes, and the teaching teaching discontinued?—I have not known any instance in which there was payment from the public funds where that was done; but I have where school-houses were built by private funds. I have known of several; in one case I was a sufferer myself, where my father subscribed to build a school-house, which was soon afterwards put to a private purpose; in the times to which I allude, there was, I believe, no public fund for the purpose of building school-houses; but I know two or three instances of the description I have mentioned.

Do you not think where public funds or subscriptions are raised for building school-houses, some security should be taken that they should continue to be applied in all cases to the purposes for which they were destined?—Absolutely necessary; I have known education suffer very much from the loss of school-houses in the way I have mentioned.

Do you not think in all cases where school-houses are provided by public money or subscription, that it would be desirable there should be some authority in the country to secure that the objects of the subscribers and contributors should be complied with, and effective education given in each of the schools, by a distinct superintendence provided?—I think it highly necessary.

If one decided rule were followed with regard to the instruction to be given in those schools, provided that rule were a good one, would it not prevent a great deal of jealousy and suspicion, and quarrelling that now goes on upon the subject of instruction in those schools?—I think it would; but I am here speaking of places of which I have comparatively little knowledge. In my own neighbourhood we have little or no jealousy.

Are you not aware of some parts of Ireland where it exists?—Yes, I have heard of it in the south and in some places in the north.

Are you acquainted with many schools established under the Association for discountenancing Vice?—Not many.

Are they conducted in such a way as to answer the purpose of giving general instruction to the country, or do you think they are chiefly adapted to the instruction of children in the established church?—Yes; I conceive if their principles are strictly acted upon, that their purpose is not so much for general education as for children of the establishment.

What have you observed as to the management of those schools?—As to the management, not having seen many of them, I cannot speak particularly, but rather with regard to the operation of the principle upon the people's minds, and the production of jealousy. I could give two instances in my own neighbourhood: there is one school in the parish of Killinehy, for which the people subscribed; they are comparatively a rich farming district and pretty liberal. It was built by the aid of the Association for discountenancing Vice; when the lease of the house was to be made out, it was given, I think, to the bishop and rector, and perhaps the curate, I am not sure whether any other; it came down from some solicitor in Dublin, giving them an entire power over the appointment of the schoolmaster, and the books to be used in the school; the people were very considerably offended at this. I should mention they are entirely a Presbyterian parish; within the bounds of the parish there is, I believe, scarcely a single member of the established church but the rector and his family; the people took immediate fire at the conditions of the lease, and the consequence was that those who had not paid their subscription, refused to pay any. A school much required and that promised to be extensively useful, runs the risk of being rendered useless; the house is built and ready for the schoolmaster, but I believe scholars would scarcely be found to attend.

At whose expense was it built?—The subscription of the rector, who gave the ground, and partly at the expense of the people, who also subscribed; he wishes to put it under the Association and make it a parish school. The parish and he are also unfortunately engaged in a dispute about tithes, and that may give an additional tone to the feeling; but independent of this circumstance, I think the form of the lease would have been deeply injurious.

Has any other instance come to your knowledge?—Yes; in the neighbourhood of Saintfield, in a district where it was exceedingly wanted (I know of no district in the north where a school is more wanted); and the determination of the vicar, who is yet an excellent man, to have it in the manner I have described, has, I understand, hindered the school-house from going on.

Is that also chiefly a Presbyterian district?—Yes, chiefly; there are some Roman Catholics.

Are there any diocesan schools established in the counties you are acquainted with?—There is one in Downpatrick which I know. I have heard of others,—I know nothing of their management, but I am aware of their existence; I am bound to say that the establishment of the new schools has, among many of the Presbyterian ministers and people, excited a good deal of jealousy. The jealousy arises upon this account, that we shall have to pay for the building of the school-houses, and have no power over the schools. Protestants of the county of Antrim and the county of Down, are generally Presbyterians. The tax for building the new diocesan school in the county of Antrim is, I believe, 6,000*l.*; the tax upon the county of Down for the repairs of Downpatrick school, was 2,000*l.* and in those places we feel a good deal of jealousy.

Is the money levied?—In Antrim partly it is, and in Down, I believe altogether. I am not positive as to the sum in Down, but I am every thing but absolutely certain it is 6,000*l.* in Antrim.

Is there any point that occurs to you upon the general subject of education in Ireland, which you did not state yesterday, in the course of your examination?—Yes; there is one point I should wish to explain, as my evidence would tend to injure the Scotch professors of Theology; I mentioned, that although I studied two years under one professor, and one under

945
Examination of
The Rev.
Henry Cooke,

under another, I never heard any doctrinal points stated; it is absolutely necessary, for doing justice to those persons, to whom I owe very much indeed, that I should explain. The explanation is this; before the late addition to our means of support, by the liberality of the government, the income of the Presbyterian ministers was very limited; our ministers had only 16*l.* a year from government, and their stipend was not larger than I have stated. In some of the congregations the liberality of the landlord allowed them to live by having farms at a cheap rate. In consequence of a number of rich families leaving the Presbyterian body,* (Note A.) to whom they almost all at an early period belonged, and joining the established church, the greater part of these farms were lost by the congregations, the landlords feeling no interest in them; and in some cases the old ministers appropriated the farms to themselves, of course succeeding ministers were deprived of a principal means of their support, and a great many of our clergy were comparatively very poor; under circumstances of this kind you cannot suppose our education would be very extensive. I believe, that previous to 1803, it generally consisted of a few sessions at philosophy and languages, and that only a part of the Irish students ever attended theology at the university, but depended altogether on their reading while under the care of their presbyteries. After 1803, the curriculum of study for our students was extended to three years in languages and philosophy, and one year's study in theology. On the other hand, the time of education required for a Scotch minister is eight years; he has four years in languages and philosophy, and at least four, and in many cases six years, in theology. If he be in any degree irregular in attendance, he must be six years; the consequence of this system was, that the Scotch education in theology, extending through four years, and sometimes six, our ministers, who only attended one year on theology, would generally hear not a single doctrine of the Gospel discussed in the lectures. A system extending through six years, was necessarily very voluminous; the entire discussions of a year, were often confined to one or two points, being the very outworks of religion. Our ministers attending but one session, must of course have received a very imperfect view of theology; I give myself as an instance; I never heard any lectures on doctrinal theology. About 1804 or 1805, we had extended our system of education, and required two years attendance on theology; this law was soon repealed, and we again returned to an attendance of one session. From this statement, it will be evident that where the range of the professor's lectures extended through four, five, or six years, we got but one year of that range; consequently few of our students ever heard a single word of the doctrines of the Gospel explained; all the time they had for attending to that subject, was the year and a half that they are under the presbytery, in going through a certain course of sermonizing. When I observed, that from the Scotch professors I had heard nothing of the doctrines of the Gospel, it might be drawn from my evidence that they gave nothing of them; this apparent neglect is accounted for in the way I mention.—(Note B.)

Do you bear in recollection for what period of time the tithes were in possession of the Presbyterian church in Ireland?—They were generally in their possession from their first coming in until the usurpation of Cromwell. They appear to have held the church livings wherever they had congregations; the fact with regard to some parishes, is on record; for example, Bangor, Ballywalter, Hollywood, Ballycarry or Broadisland, and various other parishes in Derry, and I believe Donegal.—(Note C.)

How did they get into the hands of the Presbyterian clergy?—From the time that they came into the country, in the reign of James the First of England; perhaps it may be necessary to explain how the matter seems to have been effected. We have an example in the year 1630, the year in which Livingston was settled in Killinshy;—it was required that he should meet the bishop, and receive induction from him; they were, as Hudibras terms them, of "the true Presbyterian stubborn crew," and would not submit to this; but Bishop Knox of Raphoe, joined with them in the character of a presbyter, and the Presbyterians acknowledged him in that character. The bishop was pleased to strike out every portion of the ordination service to which he did not agree, and Livingston mentions, when he was to receive induction from the bishop, he told him he might strike out such parts of the ordination service as he did not agree in; he found that he had no need to strike out any thing, for it had gone through the hands of others, who had already struck out every point to which he could object. The bishops appear to have certified their ordination in some form or other, and both Knox of Raphoe, and Ecclen of Down, joined with the presbytery in the Presbyterian mode of ordination, and the government recognized the bishops in their official capacity, and the presbytery recognized the bishops as assisting presbyters in the act of ordination.

Where do you find this?—In the works of Livingston and Kirkpatrick.

Could it now be shown over what portion of Ireland the tithes were possessed by the Presbyterian clergy?—I question if it could be shewn of them all; it is only incidentally mentioned in the works I have named.

Are there any parochial records which could shew it?—I know only one instance where I think it is mentioned, that is an old parish book, at Dundonald, near Belfast; but as it is long since I saw the book, I am not certain of the point.

Have you any reason to believe that over a considerable part of the province of Ulster the tithes were possessed by the Presbyterian clergy?—I am not certain of any part but Down, Antrim and part of Donegal.

Are you aware whether Lord Strafford had any share in depriving the Presbyterian clergy,

* See notes at the end of this examination.

Examination of clergy of their tithes?—Yes; they were sadly persecuted by him; some of them deprived and permitted to preach again, then again deposed, and hunted through the parishes, or forced to fly the kingdom. In the life of Livingston several of these points are recorded.

Did he take any tithes from them?—Yes, it was at his instance that the bishops deposed them.

Had they lost the tithes through the agency of Lord Strafford, before the usurpation of Cromwell, or was it Cromwell who deprived them?—They were generally restored during the time of Lord Strafford, but when, by the influence of Laud, the formulary of the church of Ireland was changed, many of them were again deposed. The formulary in the time of Archbishop Usher, agreed upon in 1615, admits the ordination by prebysters; and uniformity between the churches of England and Ireland, did not exist until 1634, when the Thirty-nine Articles of the church of England became for the first time the creed of the church of Ireland.

Do you conceive that Archbishop Usher was friendly to that mode of proceeding?—Particularly so.

Have you had occasion to see Archbishop Usher's catechism?—I have seen it; I have no distinct recollection of it on my mind.

What do you know of the time and manner in which the Presbyterians were deprived of their tithes?—I believe many of them were in possession of their tithes till the usurpation of Cromwell;—(See Note D.) the Presbyterian ministers, we are happy to say, continued to pray for the king, in the presence of the troops of Cromwell, and unawed by the threats by Colonel Venables, and several of them were taken up, and put in durance in the keep of Carrick castle, and others in Belfast, for praying for the restoration of the king; at that time they were deprived, and never received any recompence; the only recompence they afterwards received, was in the form which I have mentioned, although I believe in the latter part of the usurpation there was an allowance made even by Cromwell. I have no distinct recollection of it as a fact, but I am pretty certain of it. In the time of Charles II, in 1672, 600*l.* were annually granted; this sum was withdrawn in about 10 years. In 1690, 1,200*l.* were granted annually. In the time of Queen Anne, there was a similar allowance made, but subject to the pleasure of the Lord Lieutenant. From some of them it would appear to have been withdrawn, as during the ministry of Lord Bolingbroke, &c. under the influence, as I have heard, of Dean Swift, some of their meeting houses were nailed up, and permission to preach refused them.

Previous to the year 1803, was there any permanent assistance given by the government, or any public fund, for the maintenance of the Presbyterian clergy?—Yes.

What did it amount to?—Sixteen pounds a piece.

What did it arise from?—From a certain sum voted by government, and given to a certain number of ministers, who, with the council of the synod, divided it among the other ministers, according to their congregations.

Was it an annual grant from government?—Yes, it was.

Note (A.)

It is a well-known fact, that a large portion of the most important families in the north, were originally Presbyterians; and some of them continued so till very lately. Among these may be enumerated Lord Chichester, the lord deputy, who was a disciple of Cartwright the polemic, Lord Cloneboy, Lord Montgomery, head of the Mount Alexander family, Lord Templetown, of Castle Upton, down to the last generation; the Londonderry family to a similar period; the family of Blackwood of Ballyleedy, ancestors to the present Lord Dufferin, &c. &c. &c.

Note (B.)

There is an expression I recollect in the former part of my evidence, which requires to be explained. When asked, "If I considered the improvement in school-houses and schoolmasters general?" I answered, it did not appear to me so much general as local, or something to that effect. Now it occurs to me, that in the confusion, perhaps inseparable from an examination, I took the word general in the sense of universal.

The opinion I have formed, and the meaning I intended to convey, was, that the improvement was general as to the counties, but local as to the parishes. A fine parish school looks well to the traveller; but many other school-houses are required to improve the general education of the parishes. I did also mean to convey, that some parts of the counties were better than others, but what I have now stated was my principal intention. The same explanation applies to schoolmasters. They are as generally improved as the school-houses. But still one good schoolmaster to a large parish, leaves, in many places, a number of other schools in the same parish but badly provided.

Houses for Schoolmasters.

To make schoolmasters permanent, and to encourage them to acquire character, I believe a residence attached to each school would be found a great inducement. A schoolmaster who is forced to wander among his scholars from day to day for food and a bed, is in great danger of being educated into a vagabond. I would beg to suggest this matter to the Commissioners.

Note (C.)

Note (C.)

Evidence of the tithes of their respective parishes having been in possession of the Presbyterian ministers of Ulster.

1611.—This appears to be the earliest authentic date of a Presbyterian minister being settled in Ireland. Brice was his name: Ballycarry, or Broad Island, in county Antrim, his parish. He was deposed by the Bishop of Down and Connor for nonconformity, 1635. At the same time were deposed four others, among whom was Hamilton, nephew to Lord Cloneboy. Lord Cloneboy was son to a Presbyterian minister. 1622.—Blair was presented to the parish of Bangor by Lord Cloneboy; being a zealous Presbyterian, the difficulty was how to get him legally ordained, so that he might have the tithes. Bishop Ecclin agreed that Cunningham of Hollywood and others, should concur with him. They should acknowledge the bishop in the character of a presbyter; and as such he joined with them in the act of ordination in the church of Bangor. Blair was permitted by the bishop to strike out of the office of ordination any objectionable parts.

All who were ordained in Ireland of the Presbyterian persuasion, from 1622 till 1642, were ordained in the same manner. "All of them enjoyed the tithes, though they remained 'Presbyterians still.' There was both a civil and ecclesiastical comprehension, for they met and consulted with the bishop on the interests of religion; and some of them were members of the convocation in 1634.—Kirkpatrick's Presbyterian Loyalty, part 1, page 163. A controversial work, I believe, never contradicted. Edit. 1713. Kirkpatrick subjoins his authorities.

1630.—Livingston was ordained after a similar manner by the Bishop of Raphoe, Knox.

Note (D.)

When Henry Cromwell charged the Presbyterian ministers with ingratitude, because in the latter period of the usurpation some of them had 100 l. per annum, "they looked not upon the salary as any obligation, for the usurpers had taken the tithes from them."—Kirkpatrick, part 2, page 301.

"When Jeremy Taylor, a man every way illustrious, became Bishop of Down and Connor, he was met by a body of clergy strongly attached to the principles of a different ecclesiastical polity, inimical to the episcopal authority, and resolutely bent upon resisting the exercise of it in his person. During the two years that intervened before the Act of Uniformity, the great majority of the clergy had yielded."—Bishop Mant's Charge, 1824. He refers to the life of Taylor, by Heber, p. c. IV.

Hence it is evident, the body of the clergy in the united dioceses of Down and Connor were Presbyterians in 1660. For if I recollect rightly, the Act of Uniformity was enforced in 1662.

In 1662, there were sixty-four Presbyterian ministers in Ulster; of these, it would appear, from Woodrow, Appendix 5, that only four conformed. The rest were ejected from their churches.

The use which the present Presbyterian ministers of the synod of Ulster would make of this historical record is, not to advance any obsolete claim to the tithes; but to show that their Regium Donum is not, as it has been misrepresented, a bribe, but merely a compensation. How far, as a body, they have deserved it, it becomes not one of their members to say. I shall only beg leave to say, that if ever they did deserve it, they probably have at present as fair a claim as ever they could formerly produce.

I shall only add one other rather curious point. We have on record two letters, one from Lord Inchiquin, another from the Lord of Airds, in the reign of King William, expressing their opinion and hope, that the Presbyterian church should be established in the north of Ireland, and some other parts of the kingdom.

At present we do enjoy many of the essentials and advantages, without the inconveniences of an establishment. If we have small incomes, we are free from trouble in their collection; and would His Majesty's government only revise the invidious system of classification and put it on an improved system, and extend to us some legal power to tax ourselves for the amendment or rebuilding of our wretched meeting houses, the Presbyterian church of Ulster could have nothing further to beg, and would feel a lasting gratitude to their rulers and benefactors.

Examination of the Reverend James Carlile, on Oath; Thursday, 25th November 1824.

ARE you one of the ministers of the Scots church in Dublin?—I am.

How long have you resided in Dublin?—I came to Dublin first in the year 1812; I was not ordained till May 1813; that is rather more than eleven years.

Are you a native of Scotland?—Yes, I am.

Were you educated in Scotland?—I was.

Have you had occasion to pay much attention to any schools connected with your church, in which the children are lodged, boarded and clothed?—Yes; when I came to this country, I found the school, consisting of twenty boys and ten girls, that were of that description, boarded, lodged, clothed and apprenticed to trades; but the difficulty of procuring such apprenticeships for girls, laid the governors under the necessity of apprenticing them as servants.

servants. I attended the school for sometime every day, and afterwards twice a week, chiefly for the religious instruction of the children.

Was the school supported by subscriptions?—The sole support of it is a charity sermon, preached once a year, on the first Sunday in March.

About what might have been the expense per head for each child per annum?—The first sermon I preached in St. Mary's Abbey; there was 460*l.* collected; we had then thirty children; but that has, like almost every other annual collection for similar purposes in Dublin, gradually sunk down.

How long was the school established before you arrived in Dublin?—It was established as a day school, and the children received clothing, nearly a hundred years ago. It continued in that way for a very considerable time, till about 1780 the governors commenced taking in boarders; and in 1792 it was regularly organized for boarders.

Is it in existence still?—It is; but there are not so many boarders in it.

Was the expenditure of the money, and the management of the school, under the inspection of a committee?—Yes, the ministers and elders of the Scots church.

Did that committee regularly attend to the affairs of the school?—To the selection of the children and expenditure of the money; but not personally to the education of the children, that being entrusted to teachers.

Were the master and mistress persons qualified for their situation?—Yes; the mistress who was there when I came to the church, we detected in improper conduct, and she was very soon afterwards dismissed; and one of the difficulties in conducting the schools is the obtaining proper persons as teachers; we found her pawning the clothes, and training up the children to a system of chicanery and lies; since that time we have had very good mistresses: the master has been always the same, and he is a very respectable man.

In what way are the admissions of children to the school regulated?—There is notice given from the pulpit on the Sabbath before the admissions are to take place, of so many vacancies, stating male and female, directing that candidates should be presented, with proper certificates, stating the circumstances of the children. The whole of the candidates are examined, with the persons that bring them, and their certificates; and if any doubt arise, the election may be postponed, till some of the gentlemen examine into the truth of the statements; and those that are admitted are the most necessitous. In cases of equal distress, we give the preference to those belonging to our own congregation; but we receive applications in behalf of any children. We make no exception to Protestants of any denomination; but latterly it has been found useless to admit Roman Catholics; it only seemed to set people a plotting to get them out, for they have almost immediately been withdrawn or have eloped. The governors have, therefore, come to a sort of agreement (I do not know that it is stated on the books) not to admit Roman Catholic children to the boarding school.

What is the age of admission?—Nine years, to the boarding school.

What number of years do they continue there?—That suggests another of the difficulties in conducting these schools; we engage to the public to keep them till we can apprentice them; and we find it exceedingly difficult to get them apprenticed, particularly the boys, as we wish to get them apprenticed to trades. We do not send them out to farmers or as servants. Supposing that question might be put to me, I examined the books, and found the 23 children at present in the school have been, upon an average, in the school four years and one month; there have been four children, six years and nine months in the school; six children, on the average, five years and seven months; seven children, three years and six months; three children, two years and eight months; and three children, nine months.

Is there any fee given with the children when they are bound out apprentices?—There is no fee given; and that is perhaps one of the reasons of the difficulty of apprenticing them; but we might find equal difficulties on the other side, because institutions, which do give fees with apprentices, have them applied for by improper persons, to get the fee, and the child is afterwards ill treated. The governors, partly because the charity could ill afford it, and partly from fear of applications of that kind, have not given apprentice fees.

Do you make it a rule to bind the children out to Protestant masters only?—Yes.

What examination is made into the circumstances of the persons applying?—They are required to be recommended by some person known to us, with the circumstances of the case distinctly stated; and if there is any doubt, one or two of the elders are deputed to make inquiry. But by questioning the child or the parent, we can usually get at the truth of the case, together with the certificates that we require to be sent along with them by some respectable person.

What degree of proficiency do the children attain during their stay in the school on the subject of education?—They make very good proficiency upon the ordinary subjects of education; the boys reading, writing and accounts, and scriptural education. I now attend the boys usually once a week, for religious instruction, and their proficiency in a knowledge of the Scriptures is very fair. The girls are attended by ladies connected with the school; I do not attend them; they are taught besides reading, writing and accounts, sewing and knitting; they also do all the household work of the school.

Are the children that are admitted into the school orphans frequently?—They are usually orphans, but not always so.

How many of them have parents living?—A considerable number have one parent living; I do not know that there are any that have both.

You would say they are always persons in distress?—Yes, surely.

Did I understand you to say there was a day school in connection with this establishment?—

ment?—Yes; children are admitted for mere education, with the same master and mistress.

Are they taught together with the boarders?—Yes, they are.

Is there much apparent difference in the character of the children boarded within the walls of the school, and those admitted to the day schools?—In regard to their proficiency, the boarders get on much better; the others are extremely irregular in their attendance, but as to their character when they go out, we have no opportunity of ascertaining; as to the day scholars, it has been instituted but lately.

Has the boarding school answered the expectations of the persons who established it?—It is difficult to answer that; certainly it has not answered my expectations, and there are others of the gentlemen in the session quite of the same opinion.

In what way has it not answered your expectations?—The children, in general, have not turned out so well as one should have expected in theory, by removing from intercourse with the world, and educating them exclusively in the school; it has not manifested itself so effective a system as we were led to suppose it would have done; a very large proportion have been withdrawn by their parents, or ran away from the school, and a considerable number of those apprenticed have run away from their masters.

Is it found, that by removing the children from their parents and friends, and putting them under the care of masters and mistresses, they are in point of fact removed from temptation?—I do not conceive they are, by any means; but very frequently brought into it.

In what way, when they are confined within the walls of the school-house, can they be led to wrong?—There are children brought in from all states of society, who have been accustomed to witness scenes of vice. In the best conducted boarding schools vice will insinuate itself, and it is not likely that it can be excluded from a common charity school.

Do you think that vice is introduced into the schools generally by children that have previously been accustomed to vice?—It is difficult to answer that; because we know little of the character of the children before we receive them.

Do you think that a vicious child coming into a school of this description is more likely to affect the other children, than such a child introduced into a day school from which the children return home daily to their parents?—Children in a boarding school must be treated as members of the same family; they must sleep together, and have their meals together, and be all on the same footing; the master cannot tell the children not to associate with any particular child; whereas if a child at a day school takes up with a bad companion, the parent, who is on the alert to detect such an evil, as soon as he discovers it can put his child on his guard against it.

Do you think the parents are more likely to discover the bad effects produced upon the mind of the child, than the master?—Yes; because the parent is more in the child's confidence than the master or mistress ever is; and besides, the parent has usually fewer children to watch over, and is more interested in their welfare. A great deal of mischief is excluded from the master's eye; children at school have tricks of their own that they never discover to their teachers, although they may tell them at home, and thus furnish the parent with an opportunity of warning them; or they may tell them to brothers or sisters, or even servants or neighbours, and then they may come to the ears of the parent; but the master or mistress always finds it difficult to get at the truth, a habit of dissimulation gets into the schools, and which indeed the masters and mistresses are perpetually complaining of.

Do you mean there is a greater habit of falsehood and dissimulation in a boarding school ceteris paribus, than in a day school?—I should think there is a much greater tendency to tell falsehoods to the master and mistress than to the parent; that the parent is much more likely to get at the truth than the master or mistress.

Children then, you think, cannot be under that constant careful superintendence in boarding schools where there are only the eyes of the master and mistress upon them occasionally, that they are when they return home?—Certainly not.

Do you then conceive that the parents would be more likely to prevent or to correct bad habits than the master or mistress?—I do not think there could be one single moment's doubt, when the question is between a respectable parent and a master; the only doubt would be when the children are not of respectable parents. In such cases it may be supposed that a decent master will do more to train up children to decency than a profligate parent; yet this is balanced by several considerations, such as the danger of improper masters, and the difficulty of detecting them; the danger of children of profligate parents corrupting the children of decent parents, among whom they may be introduced. A few instances of the children of a decent parent introduced among vicious children, and placed under the care of a worthless master or mistress, is sufficient to counterbalance all the good that any school is likely to do to the children of profligate parents; besides, it often happens that a parent, although profligate himself, is at pains to preserve his children from his own vices, and such parents frequently succeed in rearing to ideas and habits of decency; the conductors of such schools have always to choose between evils, namely, either to select only the children of creditable parents, and then to remove such children from their relations, and place them under the exclusive care of a kind teacher, or to select only the children of profligate parents, and thus hold out a premium to vice, or to mix reputable with disreputable children, and thus to run the hazard of rendering the vices of the bad common to all.

Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,
25 Nov. 1824.

Do you think that those sympathies which it is desirable with a view to the happiness of society to encourage, prevail as much in the minds of children who are excluded from the society of their parents and friends, as those that are not?—I conceive not by any means.

Do you conceive that the effect of separating children from their families and connections and shutting them up in boarding schools has the effect of quenching those kind feelings in their hearts which would otherwise exist there?—Unquestionably to a great extent; the children who are educated, at least for a considerable time, at boarding schools, and who see little or nothing of the anxieties and labours of parents for their maintenance and their moral tuition, cannot feel the same interest in their parents as those who have witnessed all their solicitude; and I believe that in point of fact it will found that children who are reared in boarding schools, are very seldom disposed to do much for their parents, or near relations, in distress; from what I have seen of the dispositions and habits of children who have left our school, I conceive that they were much more likely to prove burdensome to their parents or relations, than to assist them.

Do you think four or five years passed in a boarding school of the description spoken of, have a tendency to qualify or disqualify the children for their future prospects in life?—I think they get habits of idleness which they seldom conquer—they have nothing to do but to be taught to read and write, and such other matters as may be done about the school; they have not those habits of industry that are likely to fit them for life.

Do you conceive the condition of the children in such a school is one of greater or less hardship than it would be in a parents house?—I think it is to the children of the school, one of more tedium and less interest, but not so much hard work.

Is it a state of less exertion?—Yes, if the people are in any degree industrious.

Do you conceive it desirable, that children from their early youth should be inured to those exertions that have been referred to?—I think it is highly important that they should, but not over-worked; there is also a distinction to be made respecting the nature of the exertion in these schools; it is usually of a totally different kind from what they would find in their parent's house; they would there be employed in any sort of drudgery, bringing in coals and cleaning out the dirtiest places about the house; and in schools they are rather employed in a genteel sort of occupation, such as learning lessons, writing, &c.; the consequence is, that when they go out into the world, they are usually disgusted with common drudgery.

Do you think it would be possible for a master or mistress, without the imputation of cruelty, to call upon children to perform those menial services which you describe as incidental to their parent's house?—I think in this country, it would be considered as a stigma upon the school if the children were employed to the same extent in such services; it is otherwise in the poor houses in Scotland; there they might be employed in any occupation, but here charity children are trained up differently. I wish, however, not to be understood as saying that the girls of our school are not employed in the common household work; we have no servants in the school.

Can you state whether the feelings of the children in the school of St. Mary's Abbey, are generally those of shame or pride, in consequence of their education in the school?—After they have been for some time in the school, the prospects of their future life get much higher than they were when they entered the school. We had a child the other day, whose mother when she was brought into the school I visited; I found her a widow woman who had five or six children, in a room full of filth and the most offensive smells; the child has been in the school some years, and there was an application from a very decent man, a shoemaker, to train her to binding ladies boots and shoes, which he represented to be a good trade, and by which I found a woman could earn a good livelihood; but the child was greatly shocked and chagrined at the idea of such an apprenticeship, although at the time she came into the school she would have been delighted to have been taken into any kitchen, or received by such a person to assist in the common work of his family for her food. And such instances are perpetually occurring.

Do you think those projects of ambition salutary, and as being likely to lead to greater exertion or to lead to disappointment?—They make them dissatisfied with their apprenticeships, and they form one great cause that induces them to leave their apprenticeships.

Are the children ashamed of having been educated at a charity school after they leave it?—I think there is the strongest tendency to be ashamed of it. They seldom return to the congregation in which they were exhibited as charity children; the disposition to get rid of that, is one of the effects of their being ambitious.

Have they any feeling of attachment to the institution where they received their education, or the persons from whom they received it?—In a comparatively small number of instances; the only instances in which I have observed that, with any degree of decision, has been where besides the master or mistress some persons in respectable circumstances may have voluntarily and spontaneously taken the charge of the school, and in those cases there is frequently gratitude manifested, but seldom to the teachers; and still less frequently to the governors or congregation that supported them.

Do you think in after life, it is a circumstance they consider an opprobrium, to have been educated in the school at Mary's Abbey?—In some few cases we have found them disposed to recognize us again, but from the way they talk of it, they shew they consider it an effort; they say, "we are not at all ashamed of it," from which we infer that there is a temptation to be ashamed, and accordingly the greater part of them never do look near us; some of them have turned away from me, and would not recognize me in the street, though they knew me well.

 Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,

Has it occurred that you have met a child whom you knew, but who pretended not to know you?—Uniformly they do that, if they have eloped from the school, or from their apprenticeships; but if they have conducted themselves well, they are more ready to make up to me; but I may mistake the motive; sometimes, they might think it impertinent to accost me in the street; there are a few of the children that do return to us, and seem disposed to continue their connection with the congregation, but of all that have been educated in the school we have only one communicant in the Scottish church, and who has thereby attached himself to the Scotch church as a member of it.

To what number of children do you refer in making these observations?—To the whole of the children who have passed out of it during the last thirteen years.

What may be about the number to which your observation applies?—I see from a memorandum in my hand, that up to August 1822, there were 57 children who had left the school, and although there have been a number from Presbyterian families, we have only that one communicant.

Do you know whether any of the others now belong to the church of England?—There are some few who attend us, but have never come forward to join us at the communion; of the others, there are some few that being in their apprenticeships go with their masters or mistresses to the established church, or some other Protestant congregation.

Have you the means of knowing what has become of those that do not attend either the Presbyterian church, or the church of England?—Any of them that belonged to the Roman Catholics before they came to us, have returned to the church of Rome; I do not recollect a single instance to the contrary, and not a few I fear attend no place of worship regularly.

Have you found that the minds of the children have been much impressed by the scriptural instruction they have received?—They very readily receive scriptural instruction so as to be ready to give accurate answers, nothing is more easy than to excite a little competition between them, and you may make them answer admirably, but in very few cases have I seen it have any influence upon their hearts, so as to take it home as a practical matter to themselves, though I have endeavoured to impress upon their minds that religion is a personal and practical thing; I have frequently rivetted their attention to such subjects, but when you come to the point of practical effect upon them, I have observed such effect in but a very few instances.

If the children were not removed from their parents, but continued still in the ordinary habits and circumstances of life, do you think they would see that religion was more closely connected with themselves, than they do being confined within the walls of a school?—I think the experience of Sunday and day schools is to that effect—they would then have the parents sanction for what was taught them at the school, even if the father was not a religious man, he would perhaps give his sanction to the instruction which they received in the school, and if he was a religious man it would have ten thousand times more effect than any thing that could be said to them at the school; the approbation of it at home would add prodigiously to the effect of any instruction given in the school.

Have many instances occurred to your knowledge in which from peculiar circumstances you have been able to make impression upon the minds of the children?—There have been very few instances—some have seemed to be seriously affected, but a very small proportion; there were two that died, and another or two at the utmost that seemed to be under serious impressions. With respect to the superior efficacy of instruction given while the children are staying with their parents, I would make this observation;—there is one particular vice of females, that of lewdness, which is a subject we can scarcely touch upon—the consequence is, that the child goes out into the world totally unprepared to guard against that temptation; the mistress may, but very few mistresses, I apprehend, do touch upon it, and if they did, it would have comparatively little effect, whereas a child living with its parents and probably hearing reference to a woman that has lost her character and witnessing the horror with which another speaks of that vice, is more impressed with the danger of it, and made better to understand the effect that such a fall would have upon her future life, than she would be by any thing that could be said in the school; and I believe it will be found, that that description of vice carries off a very large proportion of the girls that go out of these schools; they are not warned against it; it is a matter upon which the clergyman can say little or nothing, as its coming from him might do more harm than good, the mother and father could say with effect what nobody else could say, and I have reason to believe, it would be found on inquiry that what I have stated respecting the after lives of girls reared in charity schools, is the fact.

Have any facts come to your knowledge that have led you to the opinion you entertain upon this subject?—There are none I could give in evidence, as I received them only at second hand; I have reason to fear some of our own girls have gone upon the streets, and I have strong reason to entertain the same fears with regard to the children of many of the female charity boarding schools in Dublin. It has been stated to me by persons who had abundant opportunity of knowing the facts, that a very large proportion of the female patients in the Penitentiaries and Lock Hospitals of Dublin, consist of young women who had been inmates of charity boarding schools.

Would you except from that observation the parochial female schools of Dublin?—Not if they are boarding schools.

Does there exist out of doors a prejudice against the children educated in these schools?—Among the lower class of people there does; I think, in the upper class of people there is no such prejudice, on the contrary, that they would prefer them if they found them generally to turn out well; in this however they are frequently disappointed, so that few are disposed to receive them ; they find it difficult to make the other servants agree with them ; they are placed in a sort of dilemma with regard to them ; if they keep the charity child excluded from the other servants, it excites envy and ill will, and the child is often rendered proud and unmanageable ; or if it is permitted to associate with the servants, it very frequently will be corrupted.

Are they rendered worse than the other servants, or do they only fall to the level of the general class of servants?—If pains are taken to separate them from the other servants, then servants are afraid of their telling tales, and they either annoy them or endeavour to corrupt them, and thus to get them to side with them ; and charity children lying under a kind of reproach among servants, if once they are corrupted, they sometimes are led further into vice than other children would be, for the purpose as it were of redeeming their character in the kitchen, just as a young person who has made a serious profession of religion, but who has afterwards fallen into bad company, will often go farther in profanity and vice, than the others ; as if it were purposely to convince them, that although he once seemed to be religious, he is now as bad as themselves, and may safely be received into their fraternity.

Are they more liable to be corrupted?—I think so decidedly.

Are they more inclined to be corrupted?—That I think is implied in the former answer.

Do you consider that the name of a charity child, is often applied as a stigma?—Yes, the name they often give them is, “ Parish brat.”

Is it an object with the children to relieve themselves from this stigma when they go into service, and what steps have they recourse to in order to attain that object?—That depends partly upon the temper of the child ; some children may have determination and steadiness enough to brave it out, but there are others that sink under it and yield to any suggestion the servants may make, and may become the agents in stealing, or in any other vice that may be going on in the kitchen, or they conceal what is going forward, or they sometimes run away.

You have said that the servants consider that they are likely to be tell tales?—Yes, I think that is a very common impression.

Do you think that the servants consider them likely to become tell tales because they think them likely to act upon a principle of fidelity to their master or mistress?—If they be kept separate from them, and elevated above them, they think they are brought in for the purpose of watching over them, and making the master and mistress acquainted with what is going on, and probably it is more on that account than any other that the impression exists.

Do the children in these charity boarding schools appear in general cheerful or otherwise?—That will depend partly upon the nature of the discipline that is observed.

In general what has struck you ; do they appear to have as good spirits as children mixed with their own families?—It is difficult to answer that, it depends upon the measure of liberty they have.

Can you speak as to your own school?—I should say they have not the same spirits and cheerfulness that children at home with their parents have.

You have said fifty-seven children have passed through the school?—Yes, up to August 1822, and a few more since that time.

Can you state exactly what has become of those children, dividing them into classes most convenient for the purposes of statement?—Not precisely—I can give a sketch of them ; of those 57, up to 1822, there were apprenticed or provided for by the governors 32 ; eloped from the schools 18 ; 4 were withdrawn by their relations ; and there have died in the schools 3 ; making a total of 57.

In the first place what became of the 18 that eloped, so far as you can state?—I can state but with regard to a very few of them ; we have reason to believe some proportion of them were removed in consequence of being Roman Catholics, and by the influence of the Roman Catholics ; I traced some of them to Roman Catholic institutions.

What is your impression as to what became of the remainder?—My impression is, that they have not turned out well—some went back to their relations and their relations were exceedingly anxious to bring them back to the school, sometimes they have not been admitted, at other times they have, if they have not staid away any length of time.

Are you aware of any of them being lost in consequence of their elopement?—I am not aware of any of them being starved to death, but I know that some of them sunk into great wretchedness, and some of them became extremely worthless in their character.

Do you think that elopement was generally equivalent to a return to their relations?—I think in almost all cases the relations were the first that they went to, but when the children elope, we consider it an expression of an intention to break up all connection with us, and we look no further after them.

Speaking of the 32 that were apprenticed, have you any means of knowing how many eloped from their masters?—There were sixteen of them eloped from their apprenticeships.

Do you know what became of them upon their elopement?—Some of them got other apprenticeships, and one solitary individual of those who eloped and got another apprenticeship, his mother being a member of the congregation, does attend the congregation ; we found in some instances that the reason of their eloping from their apprenticeships was, that the parents were not satisfied with the apprenticeships and seemed to have encouraged the child to elope, and got them other situations ; the inference which I drew from that was, that they were not proper objects for the charity school, at least during a considerable part of the time that they were in it, because if the parents were not satisfied with the places we had provided provided for them, and could provide them with better, they might have done so without permitting us to be at the expense of their maintenance, probably for years together, unnecessarily.

Were they, generally speaking, apprenticed to respectable trades?—The boys have all been apprenticed to trades.

Of the sixteen who continued in their apprenticeships, what account can you give?—Four had completed their apprenticeships in August 1822, and there were 12 then in them.

Can you say of those, speaking generally, they are doing well?—A very considerable proportion of those who have persevered in their apprenticeships are doing well, and the masters and mistresses are satisfied with them—in one or two instances the accounts were quite gratifying.

Can you state about what sum was expended upon those children during the nine years?—The only means I have of stating that is, that taking the amount of the charity sermons and the number of children in the school, and taking the average of each child, I should think there must have been upon an average something like 400*l.* spent yearly upon the children, and the average number of children in the school is not above 27 or 28, in consequence of the vacancies not being filled up immediately when they occur; we begin with 30 and fill up the vacancies from time to time.

Dividing your total expenditure by the number of your children, what do you conceive to be the annual expenditure for each child per annum?—I could not state it at less than 14*l.* a year.

Do you conceive you have taken as much pains as are applied in any other charity boarding school, to impress these children with the importance of a knowledge of religion?—I am persuaded as much pains as are taken upon the average, I will not say more so; for instance, there is Swift's Alley Female School, that has been regularly attended by a number of ladies for many years, and till lately we have not had so active a superintendence in our female school; in the boys school there has not been any other attention to the religious instruction of the children than that which the master and one of the ministers have paid to it.

Do you conceive upon the whole as much pains have been taken with the religious instruction of the children in St. Mary's Abbey, as in other charity boarding schools in the city of Dublin?—I do conceive so.

Have you felt it particularly your duty to attend to them in that respect?—Yes, I have.

In how many instances have you had reason to be satisfied with the result of your care?—In point of knowledge, the progress of the children has been satisfactory in many instances, but in practical religion in very few.

Can you state how many out of fifty-seven?—It is difficult to judge of the heart; there may be more seriousness in a child than you are led to imagine; I should not think out of the 57, so long as they remained in the school, there were more than four or five of them that were seriously impressed, and even of some of them I had some doubt.

Is the relief afforded by these schools well adapted to the wants and distresses of the poor?—Viewing it as a matter for relieving the poor, I conceive it quite an absurd system; it does nothing comparatively to relieve the poor, in proportion to the money expended; from the experience I have had, if I had the power of arranging the system of the schools, I should endeavour to make it the first point to divide the education from the relief of the poor; for when you endeavour to effect them together, it creates confusion, and it is impossible to accomplish both objects with any degree of propriety in the same institution.

Would the same sum that is now applied to the maintenance of one of these children in the school, if distributed in a different manner, produce greater relief and more beneficial effects upon the children of the poor?—Decidedly so; I consider that in any family if the same sum now expended upon the education and maintenance of one child, was expended upon the whole family, it would be much more judicious for the relief and instruction of the family; suppose a family of four or five children—according to the present system, you pick one out of the rest, and educate that one in a style much superior to the rest; whereas you might for the same sum educate the whole, and leave something for the support of the family, they would be kept together, and they would all be educated, and in all respects the 13*l.* or 14*l.* a year would be incomparably better distributed among them.

Do you entertain any doubt, if the money was applied to the establishment of a well regulated day school, and the same portion of money was applied towards clothing and relieving the present necessities of the child, that more beneficial effects would be produced than spending a large sum upon a particular individual?—Certainly; if you take 400*l.* a-year, you might have for one of those hundreds an extremely respectable schoolmaster, capable of teaching 50 or 60 children; you might pay the rent of the school-house, and have 200*l.* a-year to distribute among the parents of the children; and I apprehend there is no comparison between the good that might be done in that way, and giving relief in the way in which it is now done.

Would that mode of assisting the poor in the provision for their children have a tendency to lead to improvidence on their part?—Viewing it as a general matter for the poor, I do not mean to say that I would encourage such a system; I would merely say, that as the money is expended at present, it has very bad effects in inducing the parents to give up their children; and it does not produce the same quantum of relief that it would if differently administered. But in any case there might be danger in distributing a large fund among the poor; and I do not wish to be understood as offering any opinion upon that subject.

You think more benefit would be conferred upon society in general, if the sum that is expended

Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,

expended in the boarding, lodging and clothing of a child, were given to the parents, and the child merely provided with education?—I do not wish to commit myself as to the general benefit to society, but that the child would be likely to become a better member of society, and that more effective relief would be given to the family I have no doubt.

Are you aware that a system has been lately adopted in the Foundling Hospital, of removing the children from the nurses in the country at the age of six or seven years, and placing three or four in the custody of a sort of dry nurse, a Protestant in the country, whose duty it is to provide for the diet and clothing of the children, and also to see that they attend a well regulated day school, for which she is held responsible; is it your impression that the situation of a child so circumstanced is more likely to produce a useful member of society, than if that child was taken at once into the Foundling Hospital?—With regard to Foundling children, they ought to be separated from society at large; there is this specific difference between them and other children, that they have no relations; they have nobody in whom they are naturally led to place confidence. But I am quite persuaded of this, that to take a child out of the circle where its confidence and affections are, and place it any where else the child must be injured by it.

Do you not conceive that a child of such tender years would very soon come to place its confidence in that artificial parent as strongly as its own?—That depends upon the person the child is with. I have no doubt, if the substituted parents treat the child as their child, that the child will soon learn to treat them as parents; but if they treat the child as a step-child, and make a difference between that and the children of their own family, it will not look on such persons with the affection and confidence of a child towards his natural parents.

Are you aware, that it is found by experience, that the nurses treat the Foundling children with a degree of affection that could not be anticipated?—I have heard so.

That they often forego the reward that is incident to returning the child rather than part with it?—I have heard that, but I sometimes suspect that in those cases we hear all the good, but a very small part of the bad.

Have you not also understood, that when the children elope from the Foundling Hospital, it is to return to that nurse?—The child has no where else to go; it is upon the wide world; and I can scarcely pretend to give an opinion upon it.

Are we to understand that you are not without a latent suspicion in your mind, that the attachment said to subsist between the nurses and children, is less than is supposed?—The affection in many individual cases I have no doubt is as great as has been represented; but that it does not form so large a proportion of the total number of cases as is sometimes represented I strongly suspect. Such instances are usually spoken of as remarkable; and when we consider the many thousands that are out, it has always appeared to me that it might not be a general characteristic of the nurses. This, however, is a subject in which I have no personal experience.

Assuming then the probability of a moderate degree of neglect and inattention on the part of the nurse, is it your own impression upon the whole, that a given number of children, suppose 700, distributed under the care of two or three hundred Protestant nurses, are more likely to become efficient members of society, than if they were drafted into the Foundling Hospital, in which there are usually twelve hundred children?—I should think much more likely to become useful members of society, by being connected with a family where they form domestic affections.

It being also understood that the governors of the Foundling Hospital are in very particular correspondence with the clergymen of the parishes in which such children are situated, and who undertake to exercise over their education peculiar superintendence?—I should think the children were much more favourably circumstanced for turning out good members of society by being in those families, than by being in the hospital.

Have you had opportunities of observing the system of parochial instruction adopted in Scotland?—Yes, frequently.

Has it ever occurred to you to consider, whether under any modifications, it could be adopted for the peasantry of Ireland?—I should conceive so, without much difficulty.

Will you state the general principles of that parochial instruction in Scotland?—The distinguishing principles of it seem to me to be the providing education for society generally; not for the poor exclusively, but for the inhabitants of Scotland generally: of course all pauperism is excluded. At the same time it is so constructed, as to put a good substantial education within the reach of the whole community.

How are the schoolmasters provided under the Scotch system?—In the country they have, from the land proprietor, a house and school room, and a small bit of ground gratuitously.

What extent of ground?—About as much as will feed a cow, a cow's grass it is called; and in addition to that, sometimes a small salary.

What are the usual rates of teaching?—That also varies in some respects; but from 3s. 6d. a quarter to 2s. 6d. I believe it is somewhat higher now than when I resided in Scotland.

Have the children any particular facilities afforded them for extending their education beyond merely reading writing and accounts?—In the country parishes the schoolmasters are usually able to teach Latin at extra hours, and for an extra fee, but still a moderate fee; some of them teach Greek, and some of them mathematics; but in the towns the facilities are much greater.

Describe the nature of the facilities in towns?—Usually in towns there is a teacher for each

953-

James Carlile,

each of the different branches; there is a teacher for reading, another for writing and accounts, a third for Latin.

Do they all teach in the same schools?—Not usually; but in different schools.

Do the children transfer themselves from one school to another in the course of the day?—In the part of the country I come from, when they go to the reading school, they go to no other for the first two or three years; the boys then are taken from the reading school, and they are put to a writing master to be taught writing, accounts, book-keeping, &c. to another to learn Latin. And they do transfer themselves in the course of the day to these different schools. In the same way the girls, after leaving the reading school are placed in schools where they learn to sew, and in others where they learn to write, or sometimes a master is introduced to teach them to write at the same school.

Speaking generally of the schoolmasters who instruct the rural population of Scotland, and for the present omitting any particular mention of the large towns, what do you conceive to be the average annual income of a schoolmaster?—It would be very difficult to give an answer to that, because it depends partly upon the number of scholars.

The question seeks to know in point of fact what usually a person of that rank of life is able to obtain for himself by the application of his time?—I should think it might be stated, including all emoluments, at something like from 70*l.* to 100*l.* annually.

You are aware there is a salary provided to a certain amount, the maximum and minimum of which is fixed by statute?—Yes; I have alluded to that; that may amount to fifteen or twenty pounds a year, but including other emoluments from the scholars, I should think it might be stated at not far from the sum which I have mentioned.

What opportunities have those schoolmasters had for their own education?—It varies very much; some have been regularly educated for schoolmasters, others have been educated for the church, and have failed in obtaining situations in the church.

By whom are those schoolmasters appointed?—By the Kirk session; they are under the superintendence of the presbytery or session.

Is there one in each parish in Scotland?—The law is so, and I believe there is; I know of no exception in the country parishes.

Can you state generally whether the parishes in Scotland are more or less large than in Ireland?—There are a thousand parishes in Scotland, and if you divide that by the population you can get the average.

What is your opinion as to the distance these schools are from one another in the low lands and cultivated country?—I should suppose five or six miles sometimes; sometimes two or three miles, according to circumstances.

Are there ushers generally in those schools?—If the school is large there may be; but none are provided.

Are there male and female schools?—The boys and girls attend together in the same schools.

Do they mix together in the same classes?—Yes.

Do you not think it would be better if means could be found to separate them?—I have never observed any inconvenience from it in the younger children; they are separated when the girls begin to learn to sew.

Is it found there are many rival schools to those parochial schools established merely for the instruction of the rural population?—I was going to observe, that the instruction of the people does not altogether depend upon the parish schools; but they fix a minimum for a good education; there are other teachers, who undertake the business of tuition for their own emolument, but those persons must either teach cheaper or better than at the parochial schools; when a district is large, by being placed in a more convenient situation they may get more scholars; but if any man open a school in the neighbourhood of a parochial school, he must either teach at a lower rate, or he must shew advantages either in education, the selection of his scholars, or some other point, to induce the better sort of people to send their children to his school.

Do you not think the parochial schools give a tone to the education given in Scotland?—There is no doubt of it; the respectability of the master, and the respectability of the place, and the education, in short, in all respects it fixes a minimum at which respectable education may be obtained, and therefore it forces every one that professes to give education to equal the parish schools.

Ceteris paribus, do you conceive the preference of the people generally is towards the parochial school or the rival school?—I think generally it is towards the parochial school. In some respects it has the same aspect to the people as the established church and a dissenting meeting house; it has nothing of pauperism in it; it is (viewing the matter generally), regarded as the more respectable system of education, although there are private schools that stand higher than many of the parochial schools. If children to any considerable extent are sent to another school, it is from some fault in the master, but usually the parochial school is the most respectable day school in the parish.

Are there any children admitted to gratuitous instruction in the schools you have described?—There is no such thing I believe in the country schools; in the towns there are poor houses which have schools attached to them for the children that are inmates, and some few charity schools where instruction is given gratuitously.

Is it your opinion that in consequence of there being no gratuitous instruction in the country, any considerable number of children are without the means of education?—But a very small proportion; I have heard it stated in a whole parish as an astonishing thing that there were two or three grown up people who had lived all their lives in the parish without being able to read; and I believe some of those cases, if not immediately the children of Irish parents, were descendants of them.

What are the regulations as to the religious education adopted in the parochial schools?—Nothing further than the reading of the Scriptures, and getting off the catechism.

What is the catechism?—The Assembly's catechism or the catechism prescribed by the church of Scotland; it is what is called the shorter catechism.

How often is it taught to the children?—After they have been taught to read a little, they are usually made to get it by heart; perhaps one or two questions of it are learnt daily, till they get the whole of it.

Are the Scriptures explained to the children, as well as read by them?—I believe there is no rule in regard to that; I believe they are not explained to them.

Can you describe to what extent the Scriptures are read, how often, and in what quantities?—There is usually one class reading the New Testament, and another the Old; the books read are, after the alphabet, a spelling book; the next is the New Testament; after that, the Bible, and sometimes to that is added some collection of miscellaneous reading.

Do you conceive that the Scriptures are read more or less every day, in every Scottish parochial school?—Yes, every day.

There are miscellaneous reading books in addition to the Scriptural instruction?—I believe that is not uniform in the town schools; there are always miscellaneous books, but I believe in the country schools the Bible class is the highest class.

Can you state in what manner books are supplied to the parochial schools?—The children purchase them.

Has every child its Testament?—Yes, the master gives notice they must provide themselves with Testaments, which is done by the parent.

Can you say in what manner the children of the Irish, who have of late years become domiciled in Scotland in very considerable numbers are taught—do they frequent the parochial school?—I believe not to any great extent; there have been, by means of Sunday schools and day schools of a lower description, and evening and morning schools, where they sometimes are required to pay and sometimes not, many educated; but there is not a large portion attending the parish schools.

Do you conceive it is the necessary expense attendant upon the parochial system of education that deters the children of the Irish population from attending them, or from objections of another nature?—I think one reason is, that there is employment for children in Scotland, and the parents send them out as soon as they are capable of doing any thing to earn money, though they might send them to school if they had not that occupation; yet in consequence of being able to employ them, they are suffered to grow up without education.

Do you think an objection to the religious instruction that you say is incident to the Scottish parochial schools, operates to deter them from sending their children to them?—Yes it may, to some extent, but there is not so much opposition to the reading the Scriptures in Scotland as in Ireland; in Glasgow and other places the priests do not so much object to it; in Glasgow and Paisley, and in other schools established for the education of the Irish poor at a cheaper rate, the Scriptures are read; there is a very strong declaration of that kind published by Mr. Scott ten years ago, that has since been repeated, and I know it to be the fact, from being personally acquainted with members of committees of their schools.

Are you aware there are schools of considerable extent established in Glasgow, exclusively for the instruction of the Roman Catholics?—They are put in their way, they are opened at a lower rate, they are made welcome to them, and the Roman Catholic clergyman is one of the committee, but I do not believe that any others are excluded.

You have spoken of Sunday schools as existing in Scotland, to what extent are they established?—They exist to a very considerable extent in Scotland, but not for teaching to read; they are almost exclusively for religious education; there has been a difference of opinion in regard to the propriety of teaching children to read in Sunday schools. In some towns those schools in which the reading was taught, has been opposed from the fear of interfering with the ordinary business of tuition, lest the people, from a desire of saving money, would send their children to those schools, and would be satisfied with having them taught on the Sabbath day.

We are to understand, that generally speaking, instruction in religion alone is imparted in the Sunday schools?—Yes, usually so.

Who are the teachers in the Sunday schools in Scotland?—They are people of a different description; some of them are in the working classes of life, but men of good information.

Are they both men and women?—Unless female teachers have been introduced lately, I do not remember any females being employed in public schools; but I know that there are private classes taught by ladies in their own homes.

Are there girls in the Sunday schools as well as boys?—Yes, there are schools of different descriptions, some are for grown up young women, and others for grown up young men, but according to the system of Scotland, the children are not separated by sexes.

What may be about the number of children in a Sunday school in Scotland?—Perhaps from 50 to 100; I cannot answer this question with any degree of precision.

About how many teachers may instruct that number?—That I can hardly say; the system of Sunday schools was introduced by merely one teacher or two teachers, who asked questions of different individuals, without going over the whole of them every evening; it was rather a supplement to learning the Scriptures; there was no teaching to read, and therefore

957
 Examination of
 The Rev.

therefore there was not the same necessity for dividing the school into classes under different teachers.

Have you any guess how many Sunday schools there may be in Scotland?—No, I have not.

Do they exist in a majority of the parishes?—I should suppose not, but in all the large towns they do.

Are they usually held in the meeting-houses, or school-houses?—Usually in school-houses, sometimes in the parochial school-house, and sometimes the private school-house.

Have they, generally speaking, received the sanction of the Scotch clergy?—There is a difference of opinion and of practice on this subject. There was a very considerable jealousy upon the first introduction of them, and in the minds of some, there was even an attempt to put them down by force; two Sabbath school teachers were arrested, I think, in Aberdeen, and put in prison, and a gentleman who had been chief magistrate of Paisley, repeatedly was summoned as a vagrant teacher.

Did that feeling at all originate in the jealousy of the clergy, from their supposing that the religious instruction of the people was interfered with by lay teachers?—I believe it did.

Are there many instances in which the clergy co-operate in the Sunday school instruction with the lay teachers?—I do not know that they attend the Sabbath schools, but they attend the committee meetings and acquiesce in them, and take a part in the arrangements, but usually they do not attend for teaching.

Do they exercise any sanction or approbation over the persons who are desirous of becoming lay teachers in the Sunday schools?—Not further than as members of the committee, or patrons of them, where their opinion would be attended to respecting any person they might object to.

Does it frequently occur, in point of fact, that objectionable people do propose themselves?—I have never heard of distinct instances of improper people; there may be some not so judicious in their instruction as others, but I have never heard of any inconvenience arising from it to any extent.

Do they examine into the proficiency of the children in the Assembly's Catechism?—I do not know that there is any particular rule as to that; some of them do, I know.

Do they in the Sunday schools explain the Scriptures?—Yes.

Can you say what part of the Scriptures usually form the subject of examination?—No, they would feel themselves at liberty to go to any part of the Bible; the Scotch system of preaching and teaching is more extended over the whole Bible than in the other two parts of the United Kingdom; they do not confine themselves to the peculiar doctrines called the doctrines of the gospel, they go over the whole Scripture, and I fancy the same system is followed in the Sabbath schools; a Scotch auditory would be interested in a sermon illustrative of Scripture, that would be accounted wearisome here.

Be so good as to enumerate the different religious sects that prevail to any extent in Scotland?—After the establishment, there is the secession from the establishment, which is an extremely large and respectable body; they separated from the establishment about the question of patronage; they afterwards divided between themselves respecting the lawfulness of taking the oath required of burghesses for the freedom of towns or cities, and they continue separate under the name of "Burghers" and "Antiburghers," from the side they take upon that question; they have, however, within the last two years coalesced, and now are known by the general name of Seceders.

Do the Seceders differ from the established church of Scotland in doctrine?—No, not in the least, it was merely respecting the question of patronage, nor was there any dispute upon patronage on the footing in which they conceived it to have been originally established, namely, the people had a veto upon the presentation, but in Principal Robertson's time, the law of patronage was made absolute; presbyteries were directed by the general assembly to ordain presentees, whether the people consented to it or not.

Are we to understand, that the Seceders all agree in the Assembly's Catechism?—Yes.

And in the confession of faith of the church of Scotland?—They do; I believe there is a part of the Burghers, as they were called at that time, that introduced some small variations; some few words of difference into the article of the confession of faith, as to the power of civil magistrates in religious matters. Besides this body, there are some Independents of the same connection with the Independents in England.

What number do you conceive the Independents may amount to in Scotland?—A very small proportion indeed; they have never succeeded to any extent.

Do the Independents differ in doctrine from the established church?—These Independents do not, but the original Independents of Scotland were Sandemonians. There is a remnant of the old Presbyterian church, as it was established previous to the time of Charles the Second. I do not know what they called themselves; I believe it is the reformed church; they did not differ as to doctrines, but there was a time when the leading and religious people in Scotland considered themselves bound, as the Israelites did formerly, to come under a solemn engagement and covenant for the support of religion, and in which their kings and princes were induced to take a part; Charles the Second did take a part in it, and no other king has done it since, and I believe they do not, or at least did not recognize the present family upon the throne in consequence of their not having taken the covenant, but they are comparatively a small body.

Are there not Episcopalians also?—Yes, there is a body considerable in point of wealth and rank, though small in number; generally speaking, the nobility of Scotland,

Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,

and the more wealthy landed proprietors have joined the Episcopalians from various causes.

Can you form any opinion of their number?—No, I cannot; they are most numerous in a part of the country I am little acquainted with; there are several very respectable congregations in Edinburgh; they exist more numerous in the north than in the south. There were, till of late years, two classes of Episcopalians; one class connected with the old Episcopalian church of Scotland, and there were Episcopalians connected with the English church; when the late Cardinal Stuart died, there was then a union between them and the present Episcopalians, and they are now under the superintendence of Scotch bishops, with the exception of one or two congregations who have not placed themselves under their jurisdiction.

The old Episcopalians of Scotland were called Non-jurors, were they not?—Part of them were; whether all of them were, I do not know.

Do not the members of the episcopal church of Scotland attend, when occasion offers, the service of the established church of Scotland?—I fancy not very generally; the feelings and practices of different individuals will naturally vary in this respect.

Are there many individuals in the Scotch church who communicate in the sacrament with them?—I should think very few indeed.

Are there many individuals who attend the one service as often as the other?—I think few or none.

Do the Episcopalians differ in point of doctrine as contradistinguished from discipline, from the members of the established church in Scotland?—In point of the articles, the Episcopalians adopt, I believe, the articles of the church of England, and the church of Scotland those of that church, but in regard to their own practical teaching and doctrine, there is a difference from the doctrine of the church of Scotland; till within these very late years, I never heard of any episcopal minister that was considered what is technically called an Evangelical minister or Calvinist; there are one or two now that have that character by common report, but there were none till within these few years.

Do you conceive persons of that description to approach nearer to the established church of Scotland?—Yes, to the standard of the church of Scotland, because we have the same distinction there that you have here between evangelical ministers and others of a different description, but I feel myself on tender ground, speaking of a church I do not belong to.

Is it generally understood that the established church of Scotland dissents from any one, and which of the 39 articles of the church of England?—No, I do not know that it has any reference to the articles of the church of England; they have their own articles, they were formed without any relation to the church of England.

Is it your own impression, that a perfectly orthodox divine of the church of Scotland, would dissent from any one of the 39 articles of the church of England, if he was to consider the matter deliberately in a doctrinal point of view?—I apprehend not.

Are there any members of the Baptist persuasion in Scotland?—There are very few; there are two descriptions of them; there are the Sandemonian Baptists, and those connected with the Baptists in England. There is also a very respectable body whom I intended to mention in speaking of the Presbyterian bodies, but was drawn away from them by the questions put to me. They are called usually the Relief. Their doctrine is precisely the same with the church of Scotland; they did not wish to dissent from the church of Scotland, but merely to have the choice of their own minister; they built places of worship, and applied to be recognized by the church of Scotland, but were refused as not coming under their arrangement—the consequence was, that they became dissenters, and have formed a tolerably large synod.

Do the Wesleyan Methodists prevail to any extent?—Not to a great extent; they have congregations in most of the large towns, but are not much scattered over the face of the country.

Are there many of the Society of Friends?—Very few indeed.

Do you not consider the members of the established church of Scotland, the Seceders, the Relief, the Independents, and the Baptists as Calvinists?—There is, I believe, no considerable religious body in Scotland, with the exception of the Methodists, that in any official document publicly professes any thing but Calvinism; perhaps some might except, also, the Episcopalian, but that depends on the sense ascribed to the articles of the church of England.

Does any branch of the Presbyterian church in Ireland profess Arianism?—The presbytery of Antrim, separated upon the point of signing the confession of faith. The Munster Synod do not sign the confession of faith; I believe their objection to it was the Calvinistic doctrines of it.

Is it understood they objected to sign the confession of faith, because they hold the Arian doctrine?—Their objection, I understand to arise from their holding either Arian or Arminian doctrine, or both; Arians, I believe, are always Arminians, although Arminians are not always Arians, and the confession of faith is opposed both to Arminianism and Arianism, but many arguments against requiring the signature of the confession of faith have been brought forward entirely independent of doctrine.

With respect to the synod of Ulster, are we to understand that you consider them to be Calvinistic, and also junctarian?—For a long period, their public official profession was precisely the same with that of the church of Scotland. The first variation from that profession was, that some of the presbyteries did not insist on candidates for the ministry signing

959
Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,

signing the confession of faith, while the profession of the synod remained the same, and its laws respecting signature unrescinded; in these cases, I believe, no other profession of doctrine was substituted. For the purpose of remedying this defect, and producing some uniformity of practice, a new system has recently been adopted, namely, that presbyteries are required either to insist on the signature of the confession of faith, or in the event of the candidate declining to sign it, they are to require of him an explicit statement of his reasons, particularly of those points in which his views do not coincide with the confession of faith. If the presbytery be not satisfied with his views, they may of course refuse to license him.

Are we to understand that a Presbyterian clergyman can belong to the synod of Ulster, and exercise his ministry under it without he signs the confession of faith?—In some of the presbyteries it has not been required for many years; individual presbyteries have taken it upon themselves to dispense with that, and the synod did not or could not enforce it.

Do you conceive that those individual presbyteries hold more or less the Arian opinion?—It is generally understood that they do, or at least did, when the signing of the confession of faith was first dispensed with.

Have you as a minister of the Scottish church in Ireland, any official connection with the Presbyterian church of Ireland?—Yes, I am a member of the synod of Ulster.

Has it occurred to you to consider whether the Scottish system of parochial instruction could be made applicable to Ireland under any modifications?—I think so.

In what manner would you propose to make the experiment?—The first thing is to select or to take measures for finding committees, that will take the place of the Scotch presbyteries, to take the superintendence of the school and the master, so as to insure the respectability of the master and his qualifications—in Ireland perhaps it might be made general.

How do you mean made general in Ireland, do you mean in every parish?—Supposing the government were disposed to encourage it, the government would hold out certain encouragements to any respectable committee that would incur a certain expense, and take the superintendence of the school upon such and such a footing; to have a master to teach so and so, and teach for so and so; that the government would do something towards the expense of the school, providing the school, or any other part; and in that case, the members of different churches, or the leading people in different dissenting congregations, perhaps the corporations of some towns, as it is in Scotland, might form the committees; any respectable body of men that would undertake the school and give it their patronage, and select the master, and let the government stipulate for the instruction, the rate of instruction, and bear some part of the expense.

Is it your idea that each of those committees should contain in them a part of the different sects that are in Ireland?—I think it would be well for the government not to interfere in that, but to let them select themselves.

Who is to select the committees?—If the government hold out an inducement and require the committee to be at part of the expense and leave it to them to select themselves, the first thing would be to establish a school upon the terms that the government proposed, and the government by being at some part of the expense would have a veto upon the master, and the dictation as to the books to be read in the school.

Do you not think it would necessarily result from that, that you would have one committee of Roman Catholics; another of Protestants; and another of Presbyterians, to establish three different schools?—Yes, in some cases it would; in others not.

Do you think they would probably unite in forming a school, in any instance except where such necessity as you last adverted to should be found to exist?—It would depend upon what books were introduced into the school; if the Scriptures were insisted upon being introduced, probably many Roman Catholics would not unite; if that was dispensed with and allowed only where the committee agreed upon it, they would.

Are you well acquainted with the system pursued by the Kildare-place Society?—I am acquainted with the outline of it.

In what respect does the school you speak of, differ from theirs?—It should be of a more respectable character, and not for paupers; it should be in a respectable place and should have a schoolmaster that would be able to expend something like from eighty to one hundred pounds a year from the emoluments of the school, or some salary that should be given to him, and that it should not be a penny a week, but two or three shillings a quarter, paid in advance; and that it should be a system of education that would open a higher source of education, if they chose to go to the expense; that parents should not be required to give their children a higher education, but that they should have the power of making them acquainted with Latin or Greek, or mathematics; I conceive one of the great stimulants to education in Scotland is, that a man if he does not send his child to reading, it is not merely that, but he excludes him from all his prospects; on the contrary, if he teaches him to read, it opens to him a prospect that he does not know where it will end; he may educate his child for the church, or if he destine him for a trade, he may make him acquainted with scientific principles; if, for example, he be a gardener, he may give him sufficient Latin to enable him to comprehend the science of botany; the consequence is, that there is scarcely a day labourer in Scotland that does not look to something more than common labour for his child.

Are you aware there are schools in Kerry in which Latin and Greek are taught, and that to a considerable extent, at 2s. a quarter?—Yes, but then they are not taught respectably; if the school was respectable, and a respectable master; a master who could dress something like a clergyman, who should have the superintending of the children and not at a much higher rate, he would induce people in much better circumstances to attend that school, and persons in lower circumstances would be induced to clothe themselves more decently, so as to be admitted into such a school, and that would tend to raise the tone and feeling of the country.

Examination of
The Rev.
James Carlile,

Would you make any provision for the admission of any children gratuitously?—Not at all; it should be separated from every thing like pauperism; the system of the Kildare-place Society is for paupers, but you want something here that is adapted to the population and not to paupers; for that purpose it should aim at the education of children raised somewhat above the rank of paupers, and give them education at a moderate but on independent, and respectable principles; that would introduce the poorer classes into them; there are a considerable portion of the middle classes here.

Suppose you get into the country where there is no middle class?—Even in the country there are many whom it would be extremely desirable to treat on a different footing from paupers; I do not know of any town so small but where there is a considerable proportion of such persons.

What is your practice in the schools under your own superintendence as to the Scriptures?—The Scriptures are taught in the schools.

Do you explain the Scriptures to them?—Yes, to the boarders, but not to the day scholars; I fix the day I go, and I announce to the day scholars that they may remain or not as they choose.

Do you conceive that the reading of the Scriptures is advantageous where it is not connected with instruction upon the passages read?—I have never seen any inconvenience arise from it in the schools, and where the people are disposed to receive it I should think it advantageous, I merely recommended the dispensing with them here because they cannot be insisted on without impeding the system; I think it is useful when adopted voluntarily but not otherwise; it appears to me as there is nothing imperative upon the government to take an active part in regard to religion, they are not bound to go further upon that point than they can do with manifest utility.

The question was as to the practical result of reading the Scriptures without catechetical instruction, whether you conceive the children understand what they are about?—They unquestionably imbibe a knowledge of a great part of the facts of Scripture—there are of course a multitude of things they do not understand, but it is impossible to conceive that a child reading the book of Genesis, or the Gospels, should not carry away the narrative.

What course do you consider the best, reading it without instruction or explanation, or combined with it?—It depends upon the arrangements made for that instruction; in cases where you can provide persons you can trust, no doubt good will result from oral explanation; I should more doubt of a good result from it than I should from preaching the Gospel, but were you to leave it to the discretion of the schoolmasters generally it would be dangerous.

As to catechisms?—It might be better to say nothing of catechisms, or to exclude them; I do not think the catechism is a thing that produces much effect upon children; they very seldom understand it, except by instruction they may receive at home.

Do you lecture the children upon what they read?—I ask them questions as they occur to me; I have several exercises with them; one of them is to examine them upon the sermons that are preached; another on the Holy Scriptures, and so forth.

Have you many Roman Catholics attending the day schools?—There are some.

Do you find that they are opposed by the priests?—I do not know as to individual children at present, but they are very frequently withdrawn, and sent back again after being withdrawn; we can see there is a struggle going forward, between some influence used with them and the desire of the parents to avail themselves of the school.

Is the reading the Scriptures a sine qua non as to the Roman Catholics as well as Protestants?—In the day school we make no distinction as to reading the Scriptures.

Must they read the Scriptures in the day school or not?—Yes, they must in both schools.

Must they read in the authorized version?—Yes, although some of the children have brought the Douay version, and there was no objection made to it.

HAVE you paid much attention to the system of education pursued in schools, in which the children are boarded as well as educated, and in which they are necessarily separated from their parents and friends?—I have long had my mind turned towards it; and though I cannot say I have much experience upon the subject, yet the strong impression upon my mind has for a long time been, that there was something exceedingly futile in the expectation of good from boarding schools, where the children are received early and shut out from all intercourse with society, and then, just at the most dangerous age, cast upon the ocean of life without any friend and without any experience of life, and shipwreck, I conceive, must too often follow; it is a wonder it is ever avoided. It strikes me, that a child educated in a cabin really enters life, as far as circumstances are concerned, with more advantages than a child educated in a boarding school, and circumstances will operate more or less with respect to common life.

Do

Examination of
J. D. La Touche,

14 Dec. 1824.

Do you apply that to the case of children who have not parents, or children in general?—I would apply it to children in general; I think the case in Ireland really is, except in cases of large towns (which is indeed an unnatural state of society), and where children are thrown upon the world without a person belonging to them, that the children are generally provided for by some of their near relatives. I have seen children brought up by poor families, who had no connection with them whatever, except that they had been left to nurse with them, and the parents had gone off and the child was never deserted. I remember a very remarkable instance that was told to me of Dr. Everard, the late Roman Catholic Archbishop of Cashel, as having occurred to him: he was riding, and in the course of his ride he called at a poor woman's house in some part of the county of Tipperary; he found she had a large family; he began talking with her, and he asked her, as the children ran by his knees, "how old is that little thing and that;" at last he said, "my good woman, you must have had twins very often, you have duplicates of every age." "Oh," she said, "Sir, six of them are my own and six God sent me." "How do you mean?" "Oh," she said, "a poor beggar woman came across the mountains, and she got a fever and she died, and she left her six children with me." There was that woman with her large family, she contrived to support them; I do consider that, generally speaking, the relatives will support the children that lose their parents, for surely it stands to reason it must be so, for the provisions for orphan children in Ireland are not commensurate with the numbers whose parents die, and yet they do not perish I believe.

Have you reason to believe that many children are abandoned to perish?—There was an instance that occurred in my own knowledge, of a poor child whose parents were alive; she was found in a state of great destitution in my own neighbourhood, she had been under peculiarly unfortunate circumstances; she was a child about seven or eight years old; her father was alive and had married a woman not her mother; she had been an illegitimate child of his before, and the neighbours felt she had no claim on them; she had her own father, and his wife did not feel much liking for her, and she was deserted; she was supported by a gentleman's family in the neighbourhood.

The number of children admitted into the Foundling Hospital has within a very short space of time been diminished from 2,000 to 500 per annum, have any facts come to your knowledge, that lead you to believe that the sudden closing of the doors of that hospital has produced either infanticide or the abandonment to destruction of any children?—I have had no instance come before me that would lead me to say that any thing more than inconvenience has resulted from it, that is, that different classes in the neighbourhood have been obliged to support a child that has been found destitute.

Have any instances of the kind come to your knowledge?—There was an instance of a foundling that occurred last year in the parish I belong to; I do not know for what reason it was not admitted into the Foundling Hospital, there were different stories about it, but she is living in right good health; there was a poor woman took her, and she has continued to support her literally without any payment. I do not approve of boarding schools; at the same time really it is a hard thing to know what to do in the state of society that exists in Ireland at present, where there is no legal provision for the poor, nor do I desire there ever should be where there is such an immense mass of poverty; it really sometimes does occur, when every thing about one is imperfect, whether the adoption of a perfect system will work well. I do not think there is an animal on the face of the earth that excites more my commiseration than one of those children going out to any place; I think a gentleman's house the last place I would wish to see them in.

Why do you think they are particularly ill calculated to be servants in gentlemen's houses?—I think gentlemen's servants are very bad company for them, and I think gentlemen and ladies are very bad masters and mistresses for them; they come out of those schools overgrown children with many of the pettish tempers and manners of children; therefore, supposing they get a stubborn fit, you have one of those children quartered upon you for two or three years—what are you to do with them, you cannot give them a beating, every feeling of your mind will revolt against that; you do not like to get one of your servants to beat them, that is very unpleasant too; what can you do? you cannot get rid of them. At the same time, I have known of young persons educated in charter schools and the orphan house that have been completely blessings to the families which received them, they have been the most excellent that could be conceived, but at the same time that is only what we see continually, that Divine Providence counteracts the evils of human systems.

Are the cases of failures more frequent than those of success?—I have not experience enough to answer that. I have heard it said by those who have been chaplains to penitentiaries, that it is a very hard thing to do good to people that are locked up, who are excluded from all intercourse with the world; I think there is a reason for it that satisfies my own mind, that the temptations that occur tend to the formation of principle, although they also frequently tend to the destruction of it; the person gradually becomes accustomed to wield the instruction that he requires, and when they are locked up it sinks merely as a kind of science into their mind, and is not an operative principle; at the same time I would state, that I believe that the generality of persons that have been dismissed from the penitentiaries have turned out well, to which, however, we may suppose their experience of the miseries of vice much contributes.

Do you think, from the observations you have been able to make upon the subject, that the character of the children from those schools is decidedly different from those of the children who are educated in cabins and cottages, and day schools?—I am inclined to think it is; they are overgrown children and totally unacquainted with the world, and totally unfit to deal with others; that is the impression on my own mind; I would not speak as having very large experience upon the subject, but as rather expressing an opinion grounded on my own reasoning and the opinions of others. I never had any in my own family.

Examination of Paulus Æmilius Singer, Esquire, on Oath; Monday, 29th November 1824.

Examination of
P. Æ. Singer.
Esq.
29 Nov. 1824.

HAVE you been called to the Irish bar?—Yes.

Are you a governor of the Lock Hospital?—I am one of the governors of the Lock Hospital.

Is that a hospital for the reception of patients labouring under the venereal disease?—Yes; and entirely confined to females.

Have you also any superintendence of any penitentiaries, supported by private funds, for the reception of females?—Yes; the Dublin Female Penitentiary.

What class of women are received in that?—Prostitutes only. It is a refuge for them, when they are anxious to leave a life of vice, and to return to the paths of virtue.

What number of patients will the Lock Hospital hold?—One hundred and fifty is the standard number.

Is it generally full?—Always; it is very rarely it is not entirely full; and upon the days of admission, which are Tuesdays and Fridays, there are frequently from twenty to thirty more than can be received. They are examined by the surgeon, and the most pressing cases are taken in.

In your superintendence of those establishments, have you had any opportunity of forming an opinion as the effects of the different descriptions of education of females which are pursued in this country upon the character and conduct of the women?—In those various institutions we have had many, very many instances indeed, of characters coming forward, that have been educated in various institutions in and about Dublin,—from the Foundling Hospital, and the various parochial charities; but the numbers contrasted with the great aggregate of the individuals passing through, do not admit of comparison; but this I will say, without hesitation, that with regard to moral feelings, we have not discovered those from the schools to be possessed of one particle more than those who had never been in them.

Do the girls appear to have lost the effect of the religious instruction they have received in those schools?—Entirely; I never saw a trace of it in any of them.

Had you ever occasion to perceive that they kept their Bibles and religious books, and that they referred to them in the times of their disease and distress?—Not a single instance of it, to my knowledge; but on the contrary, the impression on my mind, from the best recollection I can form is, that they seemed generally to be of a more vicious character than the others; for if there is a moral barrier presented to them at all, when a female breaks through it, she becomes more desperate than others, who not having had that barrier to break through, had not any feeling of that kind.

Of the women now in the house, what number have been educated at different schools in which they have been separated from their parents?—There are eight at present in the Lock Hospital out of 150.

Does it appear at what schools they were educated?—Yes, there are six of them from the Foundling Hospital, and I understand one from a Roman Catholic establishment on George's Hill, and one from the Arklow charter school. In our Penitentiary on the Circular Road, from April 1813, to November 1824, the number received into the house was 284, of whom 38 have passed through different charity boarding schools; of those that have passed through the Penitentiary, some have gone from the house whom we knew had been in schools, but were not able to ascertain the exact school they came from; but the 38 are persons from many schools in Dublin and its vicinity.

Can you state what number of patients pass through the Lock Hospital in the course of a year?—From the 4th of March 1820, to the 4th of March 1821, 593; for the same period to 1822, 813; to 1823, 775; to 1824, 673; and from March 1824 to the 27th of November, 619.

Would the records of the hospital enable you to state what number of those had been educated in charity boarding schools?—No, it would not; an inquiry of this kind forms no part of the business of the hospital; it is a mere matter of curiosity.

You have stated that there are 8 out of 150, now in the Lock Hospital who have received their education in charity boarding schools?—Yes.

Is it your impression, that there is the same proportion in the total number that pass through it in the course of each year?—As a matter of opinion, I should say yes.

Was your attention early drawn to the circumstance of those better educated girls coming frequently into the hospital?—From the very moment I saw the persons that came forward my attention was called to it, to endeavour to ascertain the cause why persons who had got this education should turn out so badly afterwards.

Have you been able, in your own mind, to account at all for the fact you have stated, of so many of those girls falling into vicious habits?—I will state what my opinion is; it appears to me, from the best view I can take of the subject, that the reason why girls educated educated in these schools fall into vicious habits afterwards, arises from this circumstance; that they are removed, in the first place, from their natural protectors, whoever they may be, whether parents or other relations. They are taken into the school, and placed among strangers; the consequence of which is, that the natural feeling or tie that first bound them is broken, and they are educated in a way superior to what that particular class of individuals ought to be educated in, being nursed, if I may use the phrase, in a sort of delicacy, which when they are put out from the schools, either as apprentices or as servants, they do not meet with, and having no prior parental or relative tie to bind them, while the persons that put them out are naturally more attentive to the school than to those that have gone from it. It is natural to foresee, that without any protecting friend, such as a parent or relative, to watch over them, and unfitted for the situations they go to from the education received, they become the victims of the first temptation that falls in their way. Separation from friends seems to be a fundamental error in parochial education, together with the particular system generally pursued in such boarding schools.

Have you been able to observe what effect is produced upon the characters of the women by the system of instruction pursued in day schools, which does not produce the necessity of separating the children from their parents; have you been able to observe whether the number of persons who pass through those institutions, that have not been in the boarding school, are wholly uneducated; or whether any of them have received the education alluded to?—With respect to day education, it prevails very generally at present; and I have no hesitation whatever in giving my personal opinion, that those educated in the day schools are by far the better educated class; and that their moral principles and conduct through life are infinitely better than those who have passed through boarding schools. There is a school very near where I reside, superintended by young persons, and the conduct of the individual is superior to any thing I have ever been able to trace from those who have been educated in the boarding schools.

Does it appear that a large proportion of the women that fall under your notice in those institutions have been entirely uneducated?—A great proportion of them; by far the greater proportion. With respect to the Penitentiary, I can speak more distinctly; the greater part of them are forced to commence with their letters to teach them to read. It is the first thing done with them on entering the house.

Of those who have been instructed, and know how to read and write, do you think as great a number come from the boarding schools as from the day schools?—I am not aware that from my own knowledge I can fix my eye upon any individuals from the day schools, so that I am not able to draw a comparison; for those I have mentioned here are from the boarding schools. I am not aware of any that have been educated in the day schools; there may be some.

Would you conceive that all the others, except those eight, had been without education?—No; but I understood the question applied to the public system of charitable education; there are a vast number of minor schools throughout the country, where the lower orders get a certain degree of education, and those who have been taught to read have acquired it through the medium of some school, but I could never trace it back to any particular charitable establishment, either a boarding or day school.

You have mentioned that 284 persons have passed through the Penitentiary in a given time, and that 38 of those have been educated in charity boarding schools, what is your present impression as to the proportion of the remaining 250 who have been educated at all, and those who have been totally uneducated?—By far the greater proportion were totally uneducated.

Would you say three-fourths or four-fifths of the balance were uneducated?—I should say four-fifths of the 250 were uneducated.

Are we to collect that it is your opinion, that of the 284 in question, 38 were certainly educated in charity boarding schools, and that about 200 were not educated at all, and that 50, the residue, were educated in day schools?—The fifty who received education certainly must have received it in day schools, but not in charity day schools; I should suppose in those small schools, where they perhaps pay a penny a week, or bring some article in payment.

From what class of schools had the greater number of the 38 in the Penitentiary come?—I think, certainly, from the Foundling Hospital, but there is not so great a proportion from the Foundling Hospital in the Penitentiary as appears upon the eight of the Lock Hospital, for of the number from the Penitentiary that have been in schools, several of them we have not been able to ascertain what schools they were in, not being at present in the institution; they stated, upon admission, that they had been in schools, but the majority were certainly of the Foundling Hospital, and I think the reason is obvious why it should be the case, if the system I was given to understand was that which prevailed, but in this I am informed a change has lately taken place; the fact was this—the demand upon the hospital was extremely great, and the extent of the establishment in Dublin not at all commensurate to the demand upon it; they were therefore under the necessity of having a vast proportion of the children nursed out of the house, and I understand that the children were allowed to remain with the nurses till they arrived at a tolerably old age; a girl passed before me, some short time ago, that told me she was near 10 before she was brought in from nurse; when they are brought in from nurse, they are sent, as soon as possible, out as apprentices; having been with their nurses for such a length of time, not doing any thing, but acquiring habits of idleness, upon coming to apprenticeships in town, many of them have left their places, and returned back to their nurses, who not receiving further payment for their support, would not of course receive them, and several of the individuals told me that they had no remedy but to come to Dublin, and try what they could earn upon the streets.

Does it appear that the Foundling Hospital girls have taken to a life of prostitution at a very early age?—I have got the age of those now in the house; one is of the age of 17; another 16; another 19; one of 22; another 24; and one 25; but it is very probable that those of an advanced age have been through the Lock Hospital three or four times; it is very likely they have been six or seven years in a life of prostitution.

Speaking upon general recollection of the 38 who passed through the Penitentiary, that appeared to have been educated in charity schools, what is your opinion of the age at which they become addicted to vicious pursuits?—All young; we have had an instance in the Penitentiary so young as 13; that was a solitary instance.

Mention the next to that?—The average age was from 15 to 16; there are at present in the Penitentiary five who have been educated in different charity boarding schools, and I should apprehend that 16 or 17 is the outside age of either of those five.

From the numbers that are received in the Penitentiary, is there any reason to conclude that those girls are more desirous again of getting into any establishment of that kind, and taking to a line that may relieve them from the abandoned course they have taken to?—The impression upon my mind is the reverse; and that it is not the fact that they are more anxious to get in than others; they are generally led to the institution, or sent by some individual who knew them in the school where they were educated; and in many instances they give way rather to the suggestion of going into it, on the solicitation of their friends, than an inclination of their own; those who turn out best are those who come to the institution unsolicited, and manifest a personal disinclination to vice, and desire to leave a course of prostitution.

Have you known any instances of girls who have had the option given them of entering into the Penitentiary after they had passed through the Lock Hospital, and refused it?—Many of them.

Do they openly avow they would rather continue in a course of prostitution?—Yes, many.

Have you known that to be the case with many of the girls educated in the schools referred to?—I cannot say that.

In the admissions of patients, have you any reference to the character of the individual, or do you merely consider the state of the disease?—The disease is the only thing; and the worst cases are generally taken in.

Have you had any opportunity of forming an opinion of the effect of the charity boarding school education upon boys?—No, I have not; our chief attention has been turned towards females; boys are so much more easily provided for, they do not come under our observation like the girls.

Is there any connection between the Lock Hospital and the Penitentiary of which you have been speaking?—There is no existing connection between the two; the only thing is, that if there happens to be a vacancy in the Penitentiary, and there is a suitable character in the Lock Hospital, she will most likely be admitted into it.

The Lock Hospital is supported wholly upon public funds?—Yes.

The Penitentiary upon private funds?—Yes, wholly.

We have collected from you, that of 150 cases at present in the Lock Hospital, there were eight individuals who had passed through charity boarding schools, that would be in the proportion of 53 in each thousand that pass through charity boarding schools; in your opinion, would that be an exaggerated calculation?—I do not think it would.

Have you any reason to suppose that the actual proportion upon each thousand that passes through the Lock Hospital is less than what that calculation would point out?—No; I think the number in the house is the mean number.

We observe, upon the other hand, that of 284 who have passed through the Penitentiary in a given time, there have been no fewer than 38 cases of individuals who have been educated in charity boarding schools, which would give a proportion of about 133 in a thousand instead of 53 in a thousand; can you assign any reason why there is a greater proportion of individuals who are inmates of the Penitentiary and who have passed through charity boarding schools than in the Lock Hospital?—I think in the Lock Hospital, the individuals only go there under the pressure of disease, and in the other, the fact of their having led a life of prostitution induces those who are their friends to get a refuge for them; in the one case it is because there is a sort of external pressure upon them, in the other it is from their friends wishing them to go there; this appears to me to create the difference.

Can you assign any satisfactory reason, why amongst a given number of applications for admission into the Penitentiary, there should be a greater proportion of them educated in charity boarding schools than among the applications for admission into the Lock Hospital?—Merely the reason I have assigned: that in the Lock Hospital females only go to be cured of a disease, in the other case the individuals are known to a variety of characters, and seeing they have gone astray, they are anxious to lead them out of that course of life, and for that purpose endeavour to get them into the Penitentiary. If they were left to their own feelings we should not have so many applications; there is hardly a day of admissions when ladies do not attend with some unfortunate female, and use all their exertions to get them in; in the one case the individuals are frequently solicited, in the other they merely apply at the hospital under the pressure of disease.

From what you have said we have collected that the amount of moral and religious reformation reformation effected in the Lock Hospital is very trifling indeed, are you more successful in the Penitentiary?—With respect to the Lock Hospital, any thing in the way of moral reformation could only arise from the discipline hitherto acted upon; there is a person now (under the deed of settlement of Mrs. Balfour), the Reverend Mr. Fawcett, who is a general chaplain to many of the hospitals, he visits the Lock Hospital, among others, to speak to and instruct the patients.

At what time did that appointment by Mrs. Balfour take place?—Within a very few months.

Antecedent to that was there any chaplain?—Before the governors came in there was a chaplain, but the governors found the inefficacy of giving instruction in the way the thing was going on, and they recommended the government of the country to put him on a reduced allowance, as a pension, and to leave the duty to be done by the parochial clergy.

Did you find the parochial clergy attend to those duties?—Yes; whenever sent for.

Not at other times?—No; for except what may be called clinical instruction, no other could be given; it is an unpleasant disease, and as to congregating them for instruction, it was out of the question.

Is the Rev. Mr. Fawcett to perform any other duties than those performed by the parochial clergy?—He has full liberty from the governors to go into the wards and instruct the women, if they are inclined.

In point of fact, during the time that has elapsed since his appointment, has he performed more active duties than the parochial clergy?—Yes, unquestionably; he visits it occasionally during the week, and the others only come when sent for.

How many are in the Penitentiary at present?—I think, forty-two.

About what proportion of them should you conceive have sought it out, without being brought there by the intreaties or remonstrances, or compulsion of their friends?—I cannot answer that from memory.

Is it your impression that a half, or a third or a fourth?—I should think two-thirds are voluntary.

About what proportion should you conceive are in the progress of decided moral and religious reformation?—I conceive of the forty-two, and deducting from them the number that have been admitted within the last three or four months, but which I do not exactly recollect, I should suppose thirty, or more than thirty, of the number now in the house are in a state of amelioration, and some of them of the most satisfactory character.

Are there any cases at present in the Penitentiary of such decided repentance that leads you to suppose upon their returning to the world they will lead a virtuous and moral life?—I do not doubt it.

About how many persons do you entertain sanguine hopes of?—I should suppose there are ten or twelve of that number at least.

What is the average period of residence in the Penitentiary?—In that institution they do not confine the time.

Where is the Penitentiary?—On the circular road, north; it is at the upper end of Eccles-street.

Is the Penitentiary managed by a committee, or how else?—By a committee of ladies.

How many ladies?—Twenty-one is the number of the committee, as it ought to be; but it has never been full.

From what classes of society do the subscriptions principally proceed from which it is maintained?—From different classes; but chiefly from the middle ranks of society.

Have you a charity sermon?—Yes, annually.

What may be the average expense of the institution annually?—I cannot state that from memory.

Is it your impression that children educated in any particular class of boarding schools are upon the whole more vicious than those that come from others; the question has reference to your own particular experience, both in the Penitentiary and in the Lock Hospital?—No, I cannot say they have; I may consider them pretty much of the same description of character, as far as I can form a judgment.

What do you usually find the first sentiments of a young woman upon being admitted into the Penitentiary, is it that of disgust at the restraint necessarily incident to the institution, or joy at finding a refuge from the misery in which she has been involved?—Both of those features occasionally exhibit themselves in different individuals; some of them appeared to have been much rejoiced, as if they had got into a new life; and others have been disgusted at the restraint and labour they are forced to undergo, for at the Penitentiary they are made as far as possible to earn their own subsistence.

Have there been many instances of young persons immediately after their admission insisting upon going out again into the world?—Several.

In such case do you permit them?—Every effort is made use of by the committee and matron to prevent their doing so.

Is there any personal restraint?—None whatever; on their perseverance they are allowed to go, previous information being given to those individuals who may have recommended them, and (if such has been the case), they can be found.

Is it any person's office to lecture those young persons in religious matters?—Yes; the chaplain, the Reverend Charles Brough.

Can you say whether in general upon their first admission they seem to be callous?—Yes, very generally; it seems to be quite a new thing, they are quite indifferent at first.

Examination of
P. Æ. Singer,
Esq.
29 Nov. 1824.

Should you say, in the majority of instances, they appear in a little time to be susceptible of religious impressions?—I apprehend it is the case; in a short time they generally appear to become susceptible of those impressions.

Are there any instances in your recollection of young women who have persevered in continuing in the institution, but have not shewn themselves susceptible of religious impressions?—Yes, certainly there are cases of that kind; at this moment there is a young woman in the house who remained for several years cold and insensible to every thing that could be brought before her, and if I was to give an opinion upon her state now, I would say she is a very highly instructed female; upon every point of importance, instead of being looked upon with suspicion, she is a person of the greatest confidence in the house; the committee do not limit the time for remaining in the house.

Are there many instances in your experience of individuals who have passed through the Penitentiary, who have been placed creditably in the world, and are now behaving as they ought?—Yes, very many; there are several filling ostensible situations; there is one individual who is known to come from the house, who is the superintendent of the entire of the establishment of one of the highest characters in the land, and such is the approbation of the individual with whom she lives, that he never writes of the institution but in the highest terms.

When was the institution opened?—In April 1813.

Is the chaplain a clergyman of the established church?—Yes, and the formulary of the chapel is that of the established church.

What is the rule as to the admissions of persons?—There is no exception made to any individual on the account of religion; but they are distinctly informed on coming into the institution, that it is a Protestant establishment, and if they do not wish to conform to the rules of the institution they must not come into the house.

Do you find that many Roman Catholics, after such information, do enter it?—Many do.

Do you conceive they become Protestants finally?—I would not undertake to say that, but while in the institution they must conform to the worship of the place.

Do you apprehend, upon leaving the house, they return to the communion of the church of Rome?—I believe some do not, but I cannot speak with certainty as to all, not having an opportunity of following them in after life, some having gone to England, and others to Gibraltar; but so far as we have known we do not think they have.

Are there not asylums of a similar nature professedly Roman Catholic?—Two or three.

Are we to collect, that no Roman Catholic is admitted, without distinct information that she must conform to the Protestant mode of worship?—Certainly; and any person coming to the institution that professes a different formulary from the established church gets similar information—they must attend in the chapel; there is no distinction made but with respect to the process pursued in the house, the very moment the door is closed upon them, the term Protestant or Roman Catholic ceases altogether; such a word is never used in the house.

There is no peculiarity of religious instruction addressed to the Roman Catholics for the purpose of converting them, that is not administered to the others?—None; the word is not permitted to be used in the institution, and if the parties endeavour to begin a discussion they are stopped; Christianity is the principle, without any distinction of sect.

How long has Mr. Brough been the chaplain of the institution?—From the 1st of March last, the chapel was opened on the 28th of March, and he was chaplain from the 1st of the month; prior to him, the first chaplain was the Reverend Thomas Burgh, who is now dean of Cloyne; and upon his giving it up, the Reverend Mr. Bushe, rector of St. George's parish, was the chaplain.

Before the chapel was built, how was the service performed?—There was no service performed in the institution, but the persons who undertook the duties came to the institution and lectured the inmates on the Sundays; of the ladies who composed the committee several came on the week days and read to them, and it is a part of the matron's duty to attend to their instruction; the sacrament was administered to the sick in the house, and the chaplain attended for that purpose, but the regular formularies were reserved for the opening of the chapel.

Is your chapel attended by a congregation distinct from the penitents?—It is.

What may be the ordinary amount of persons attending worship in the chapel, not including the penitents?—I could not form an idea; it varies according to the state of the weather; I should suppose I have seen in that chapel from six to seven hundred people, but that has been upon a particular day, either the opening day, or some particular day.

What is the salary paid to the chaplain?—At present 100*l.* a year chargeable upon the funds of the institution, and another 100*l.* a year from the chapel collections, provided they produce as much, after paying the officers out of it; there is a clerk and sexton, and the balance goes to the chaplain; if it exceeds 100*l.* the remainder goes to the credit of the funds of the Penitentiary.

Are you acquainted with any particularly well regulated day schools in Dublin?—No, with the exception of the one in Dispensary-lane; it is intended, I believe, to have general day schools throughout the metropolis; the rector and his curates are endeavouring to raise money for building one in the parish of St. George, and I shall rejoice, as a matter of personal feeling, if the parochial day schools generally, should supersede the parish boarding schools entirely.

Is it your impression, that the parochial clergy of Dublin are beginning to be of opinion, that the day schools will be more efficacious in diffusing moral and religious instruction than boarding

967
Examination of

boarding schools?—I cannot say; I am not aware of their feeling, but I believe the archbishop has recommended them.

Are we to understand, that the establishment of day schools is meant to be concurrent with boarding schools, or rather to take their place?—That I cannot say; in St. George's parish, when the intention was to form a union, many of the committee were very hostile to the measure, and it was forced to be abandoned.

On what principle do you conceive that hostility proceeded?—I can only conceive it was the predilection of the ladies to the school; it gave them occupation, and they liked it.

Are you acquainted with the state of the parochial school of St. George's parish?—I am.

Is it not understood to be one of the best regulated in Dublin?—Yes, I think it is.

In the hands of peculiarly attentive persons?—Yes.

How many children are there in that boarding school?—I do not recollect the number exactly; it is capable of containing 24.

Boys or girls?—Girls, all.

What may be the annual expense of that boarding school?—Rather more, I believe, than 300*l.* a year; I am not accurate.

From what sources do its funds proceed?—Annual subscriptions, and an annual charity sermon, together with a modicum of work by the children.

Has it ever occurred to you to take into consideration what number of children might be well instructed in daily schools for the same amount?—I am quite satisfied a thousand children could receive education in day-schools for the same sum of money.

Do you consider the instruction that might be dispensed under proper regulations in well regulated day-schools, is more or less likely to lead to subsequent good conduct, than the education administered under all the circumstances you have described in a boarding-school?—Certainly, I have not a doubt of it, and that the day education will have not merely an influence upon the children but those connected with them; the education the children get in a boarding school is confined to the children alone, and has no moral effect upon the family; when children are sent to day-schools, there is attention paid to their cleanliness, and the children will bring home an influence upon the domestic arrangements that cannot but be ultimately serviceable; the lessons they are forced to get at home, will to a certain degree have that effect, and the books they bring home will have a similar result; it will also bring the teacher in contact with the family; if, for example, a child comes to school, and swears an oath, it is very likely he has heard his father swear it before he came to the school; the very fact, therefore, of an individual going to point out the error to the parent, "and saying, do not swear before your child," must produce good; I am quite satisfied, that general day-school education is one of the great means that will be productive of the greatest moral results to the country.

Has it ever occurred to you to consider the relative advantages of the nature you have last alluded to, between daily education administered on the ordinary days in the week, and that which is dispensed in Sunday schools?—Not exactly; I think Sunday school education is one of the approved modes of education.

Does not it possess the advantage, in a peculiar degree, of bringing the middle and lower classes of society into contact together?—No doubt; because the greater part of Sunday school teachers are gratuitous, and that brings them in contact with the poor and their families.

Have you considered the relative advantages or disadvantages of gratuitous and pay education in day-schools?—My own impression is, that pay education, let it be ever so small, is by far the most advantageous, because education may be considered as a commodity; in this case it is like every other thing which is purchased by an individual, it acquires a value, but in the other case it does not to the same extent. I had an opportunity of witnessing this in Fermoy, where the late John Anderson established a school, which was most extensively attended, at a very moderate rate of payment; and those children who could not pay for it, their parents would not in general allow them to go, from a principle of pride, but when the thing could be effected for them, were very glad to go; I consider education is a kind of commodity, that a man who gets it for nothing sets little value upon it; but if he gives but a trifle for it, he will esteem it.

Appendix, N° 266.

Examination of Francis William Greene, Esquire, on Oath;
Tuesday, 7th December 1824.

DO you reside in the county of Wicklow?—I do.

Have you paid considerable attention to the society for education in that county?—Yes; I am secretary for the upper half barony of Talbertstown, and previous to the establishment of that society, for some years, I had been attentive to the subject of education.

How long is it since that society existed?—Since 1818.

Were its operations confined to the county of Wicklow?—Entirely.

Is it supported entirely by voluntary contributions?—At first Mr. Parnell got grants from Parliament for two years, which were discontinued afterwards.

Do you recollect the amount of subscriptions in the last year?—I do not.

Was the sum of money you stated to be granted on its first institution, a part of the Lord Lieutenant's fund?—Yes; but it was before the Commissioners were appointed in Dublin.

What class of schools are supported by the society?—I cannot say that any school is supported by the society; its object was to have prepared and supplied books, that both Protestants and Roman Catholics agreed to.

Describe the objects of the society?—I conceive the objects to be to obtain information to assist schools as far as possible, without interfering with their internal arrangements, and in particular to prepare religious books that could be read by the children of both persuasions without objection, and to get schools established where they are wanted.

What class of schools was it an object to assist?—Every class of inferior schools.

Do you consider the schools under the management of the Kildare-place Society or the Association for discountenancing Vice as coming within the objects of the society?—The society prepared those books, and every school that applied for them got them without any distinction.

Were the schools that applied principally schools kept by private individuals, or were they schools supported by private subscriptions, or schools maintained partly by public funds?—I think the greatest assistance was granted to what are called hedge schools, as we supplied them with slates, desks and forms, as well as books; some of the schools belonging to those societies did apply for aid, and got it.

In what manner did it proceed in providing books for the schools you have described?—We purchased some from the Kildare-place Association at reduced prices, and printed others, which we intended still to have enlarged on if the funds had continued. We printed two spelling-books, an abridgment of Thomas A'Kempis; and we had in preparation Bishop Tomline's Summary of the History of the Jews, and an abridgment of the New Testament, which Mr. Doyle undertook to prepare.

Was the abridgment of the New Testament you had in preparation ever published?—No.

What prevented it?—It was approved of by Mr. Daly and Mr. Bayley, two Protestant clergymen, as far as Mr. Doyle had gone; but it was never laid before the society completely finished. However there were sums appropriated for printing it and Tomline's Jewish History, which was laid before the committee for the purpose of revision according to the rule, to leave out any thing objectionable to either party in what was published by the society.

Have you discontinued the preparations for publishing those extracts from the Testament?—No; there was 100*l.* appropriated for it, and 50*l.* for Bishop Tomline's work, which have not been otherwise applied.

Are you still forwarding those objects?—There has been an opposition given, that I fear may be fatal to the publication of it.

Which has the opposition been given to?—To Mr. Doyle's book.

How has that opposition arisen?—By some of the gentlemen preferring Mrs. Trimmer's lessons to the book that Mr. Doyle had in preparation, and there is a fact with respect to Mrs. Trimmer's lessons, that probably has been stated to the Commissioners, that came to my knowledge in that society also; it is a curious fact: Mr. Parnell submitted Mrs. Trimmer's lessons to Dr. Troy, and he appointed Mr. Doyle, then of Castle M'Adam, now of Bray, to revise them; Mr. Doyle did revise them, and by some accident they were not printed conformably to his corrections.

Is it not now known that the Roman Catholic clergy object to the latter work, called Mrs. Trimmer's lessons?—So far from objecting to it they have allowed it to be used in the schools about me, and introduced it into their own.

Does no objection exist to the use of that work in the county of Wicklow?—There has been none in my neighbourhood; they read it as well as the Douay version in the Roman Catholic schools there; the arrangements are under the Kildare-place Society.

Has any effort been made to remove the children from the schools in the county of Wicklow?—Not from my school nor in my immediate neighbourhood; I pursued a plan in my school different from that of the Kildare-place Society; I appropriated five days in the week to general instruction, reading Mrs. Trimmer's lessons and whatever was not objected to by the Roman Catholics; the sixth day, Saturday, I appropriated to particular religious instruction, the Protestants all attending on Saturday morning; at first I permitted my gardener, who was a Roman Catholic, to instruct the Roman Catholic children on Saturdays, in the afternoon, but since that, they attend their chapels for instruction on Saturdays.

What is done at the chapel is left entirely to the Roman Catholics?—Yes; but they have schools at the chapels, for which they have constantly solicited our inspection.

Have you ever inspected them?—Frequently.

In what are they instructed?—In reading, writing and arithmetic, and also in female works; there are female schools as well as male.

What instruction do the Roman Catholic children who attend their schools receive on Saturday?—I do not know.

Have you been invited to attend the instruction of the boys on that day?—Not particularly on that day; the invitation was general, but I never went on Saturday, being otherwise employed.

Where do the Roman Catholic boys go on Saturday?—To their chapels; the schools are kept in the chapels on the other five days of the week also.

Do all the boys who attend the chapel schools read in the Testament?—Yes, the higher classes.

969
Examination of
F. W. Greene,
Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

How many times in the week?—They have always read when I went there; I do not know how often they read.

Is there any rule with regard to the boys who attend the chapel schools?—I do not know that there is, except that they conform to the Kildare-place rules—they are under that Society.

In what way do the Protestant children pass Saturday in your own school?—They attend before ten o'clock, and for three or four hours receive catechetical and scriptural instruction, and many who have left school take advantage of the opportunity.

By whom is the instruction given?—By my son, who is the curate of the parish, and the other branches of my family, and by the schoolmaster.

Do the children learn the catechism on that day, or repeat it that day, having learnt it on some other occasion?—They learn it in school on that day, and also at home; they have tasks set them which they prepare for that day, and once a year they are examined under the regulations of the Association for discountenancing Vice.

Will you describe the mode in which the particular instruction is given on that day?—The Association have allotted certain portions of Scripture for their examination, according to the classes they are in, and the children are prepared in these so as to undergo examination according to the rules of the Association.

On that day do they read any portion of the Scriptures?—Yes.

Is the portion of the Scriptures they read the subject of comment by a clergyman of the church of England?—Certainly.

Do the Scriptures which they have read previously in the week become the subject of comment upon that day?—Yes.

As well as that which they read on the day of scriptural instruction itself?—Yes; they are examined in the knowledge of both.

Is your school attended by Roman Catholics and Protestants?—Yes, for five days in each week.

In what proportions?—Our returns are made up from July to July, and in the last year there were 172 that attended the school; they were nearly half and half, viz. 82 Protestants and 90 Roman Catholics.

Does your school derive aid from any society?—From Erasmus Smith's fund.

From Erasmus Smith's fund only?—That is all; I have given two acres of land to the schoolmaster rent free.

Is the Testament read on the days of general instruction, in any other form than Mrs. Trimmer's Lessons, in that school?—Not for the five days, except the extracts usual in spelling books, &c.

Do all the children old and young, being Protestants, attend the Scriptural instruction on Saturday?—Yes, and several who do not attend the daily school, or who have left it.

In what way are the younger children employed on that day?—In learning their catechism from the schoolmaster; as soon as they have the catechism off by heart, they are transferred to higher classes.

In those higher classes do they read the Old Testament, or the New Testament?—They read those portions of both assigned by the association for the class they are in.

You no doubt consider your school to be in connection with that association?—No, certainly not.

Any further than they look for the catechetical premiums?—No, the parish school of Donoughmore is in connection with the association.

Does the head class only read in the Testament on Saturdays?—There are either four or five classes read the Old and New Testaments on Saturdays.

Into how many classes is the school divided?—Five or six; all the small children who have not got the catechism off are with the schoolmaster; I think there are five classes besides.

When you speak of the classes into which the Protestant children are divided on Saturday, what reference have they to the classes in which the same children stand on other days, are they the same?—No, not all the same.

For what purpose are the children classed on Saturday?—According as they are capable of being examined in the different classes proposed by the association; the association have laid out certain portions of the Scriptures to be read by the different classes; they are classed according to their capability as coming under one or other of these.

How many hours do they continue in school on Saturday?—The head class more than three hours, the other classes from two to three hours after they commence with their respective teachers, and they are generally more than an hour preparing in the school before they begin.

Are the classes examined upon the portion of Scriptures that each has read separately?—Yes.

To whom do they read the portion of Scriptures severally allotted to them on Saturday?—To the different branches of my family; the schoolmaster when they have the catechism off hands them over; they rise in regular succession, the ladies take them after the schoolmaster; then I have the second class, and my son the highest; and every year they are changed in conformity with the rules of the association according to their proficiency.

Can you speak comparatively, so as to be able to say whether you think the children according to this mode of instruction, reading a portion of the Scriptures only on Saturday, under circumstances when it is possible to explain and to comment upon it, derive more knowledge of the spirit and meaning of the Scriptures, than the children taught according to the methods of the Kildare-place Society, in which a portion of the Scriptures is read day by day without any explanation whatever?—My impression is that they derive more improvement from the former mode.

Examination of

Esq.
7 Dec. 1824.

Have the goodness to explain why?—Nothing interferes with the teachers paying that attention and giving any explanation that is necessary, and they (the children) are thereby better prepared for further instruction the day after (Sunday), besides greater emulation is excited by the classification for the association premiums, and seeing grown up persons attending; I have no doubt that the progress of our children is in that respect superior to any I know in the neighbourhood.

Are these schools managed in conformity to the rules of the Kildare-place Society, in your neighbourhood?—Oh yes, several.

Do many Protestant children attend at the chapel schools which are in connection with the Kildare-place Society?—I never heard of more than five.

Are the schools in the Roman Catholic chapels fully attended?—Yes, there is a great attendance.

What number appears upon the reports to be in attendance?—It appears from the report that there is more than one in seven of the population in a state of instruction in the daily schools; in the two chapel schools there were this year four hundred and seventy-two children.

Is each chapel in a populous neighbourhood?—Yes, but not in a town.

To what do you attribute the full attendance at those schools?—To the desire of education which was greatly excited by the general circulation of bank notes; all the farmers became anxious to have their children taught as soon as the bank notes became the general circulating medium of the country, and these schools are well conducted and on the improved system.

Would your school contain more scholars?—I have within the last year enlarged it considerably,—it would contain more scholars now, but it was so crowded I was obliged to enlarge it; I got 100*l.* from Major Woodward towards doing so.

Do you believe that the schools at the Roman Catholic chapels are preferred by Roman Catholics to your's?—No, Roman Catholic children go from my neighbourhood to the chapel schools.

Do they go a greater distance to the chapel schools than to your's?—I cannot say they do.

Are there many Roman Catholic children that might attend your school that do not?—Except from want of clothing or some other thing of that kind, I do not know that there are.

You have stated the school is not opposed by the Roman Catholic priests; do you think the attendance is encouraged by the Roman Catholic priests?—I believe it was encouraged by them.

Is it so now?—I have no reason to know of any alteration—there has been no opposition.

Does any inconvenience arise from the division of the Protestants and Roman Catholics on Saturdays?—I have known of none; on the contrary the Roman Catholic clergymen approved of it, and observed that it would give an opportunity to grown up persons to receive religious instruction who might be ashamed to stand before a large congregation to be examined on Sundays.

Is the school supported by the Association for discountenancing Vice in your neighbourhood well attended?—It is.

About what proportion of Roman Catholics attend?—About one in three.

Are the Scriptures read in it daily?—Yes, and the priest said he had no objection to the Gospels and Acts being read.

Did he say so to you?—No, to the schoolmaster.

EXAMINATIONS taken by William Grant and Anthony Richard Blake, Esquires, at Edgeworth's Town, September 2d, 1824.

Mr. Daniel Graham, sworn and examined.

Examination of
Mr.
Daniel Graham,
2 Sept. 1824.

I HAVE been master of this school seven years; I am a Roman Catholic; the school is composed of Roman Catholics and Protestants.

There is religious instruction afforded to the Roman Catholics, by monitors appointed for that purpose, with the approbation of the Roman Catholic priest, who frequently visits the school, both when religious instruction is given and at other times if he pleases. There is also religious instruction afforded to the Protestant children, by monitors appointed by the approbation of Mr. Edgeworth and the Protestant minister.

I do not interfere in any way with the religious instruction of the Protestants, nor does any other Roman Catholic, to the best of my judgment and belief; such interference would be quite contrary to the rules of the school.

The course of the religious instruction afforded to the Roman Catholic children, is appointed by the Roman Catholic clergyman. I see it always given. It consists of catechizing the children, and in the reading of religious books approved by the Roman Catholic bishop, and in this case, sent by his lordship for the school's use.

The instruction is afforded always on Saturday, from three to four o'clock, and sometimes on other days. The Roman Catholics are instructed separately in one room, and the Protestants in another.

There is also a small class of Presbyterians, who are taught by one of themselves in their own system of instruction.

The Protestant clergyman occasionally visits the school, as well as the Roman Catholic, at the times of giving religious instruction, and at other times when he pleases.

There has been no interference with religious opinions on either side, or with respect to instruction afforded, or any books of a religious tendency put into the hands of either by the other; not even the Testament has been put into the hands of the Catholics by Protestants, or by the latter into the hands of the former.

The greatest harmony prevails; we never hear the word Catholic or Protestant used on either side.

Mr. Christopher Cudmore, sworn and examined.

I am B. A. of Trinity College, Dublin, and a Protestant; I am classical master to the school. I came in January 1823.

I have heard the statement made by Mr. Graham, and agree with him. I attend to the instruction of the Protestant children.

Both classes are further instructed in religion every Sunday at the chapel, by the Roman Catholic priest, and at the church by the Protestant minister. The latter also are instructed on that day in the school room, by Mr. Edgeworth.

The books used by the Protestants consist chiefly of the New Testament, the church catechism, and Ostervald. The books used by the Roman Catholics have been before alluded to; all these books are kept locked up in a cupboard, and only taken out at the times when religious instruction is afforded. The keys are kept by the monitors, and the books are returned to the cupboard when the lesson ceases.

Mr. John Goldsmith Gambell, sworn and examined.

I am a Roman Catholic; I am general superintendent of the school under Mr. Edgeworth. I agree with the statements made by Mr. Graham and Mr. Cudmore; and there is nothing that I wish to add.

Mr. Edgeworth insists upon all the boys attending some place of religious worship, and a return is made every Sunday evening from church and chapel.

They all assemble in the school after prayers, and inquiry is made into their behaviour at their respective places of worship.

There is no Presbyterian minister or congregation nearer than two or three miles.

Memorandum.—The Right Rev. Dr. M'Gouran, Roman Catholic bishop of the diocese of Ardagh, and the Rev. James Donoghue, were present at the time of taking the above examination in the school-house, and agreed to all the above statement.

The Protestant clergyman, Mr. Keating, was prevented by illness from attending.

EXAMINATION of Scholars resolved upon.

James Kenzie.

James Kenzie sworn:—Declares on a Saturday, about nine months ago, the master returned from town after the boys had dined, the bell had rung for work, the master inspected the webs in the workshop, where there is a task book; witness was weaving at the time, performed a quarter of a yard of weaving less on that day than usual, in consequence of sore eyes, occasioned by a kick witness got from a horse some years ago; master called witness off the loom to beat him; witness declared he was unable to do more, master wanted to beat him with a birch rod, but witness refused to take down his breeches; master called Beazely, Read and Hines, who were working in the shop, to tie him with loom cords; they did so; there is a stay between the loom and fire-place, over which they were putting the cords to raise witness off his feet, but the stay gave way and fell, not being very tight; at this time witness had on his breeches, master sent him up to the loft, after leathering him about the shop, on the face, &c. wherever he could hit him, with a birch rod; master sent Beazely and Hines after witness to the loft, who took off his breeches; master also followed him with the rod; Beazely and Hines tied witness's hands before him, by desire of the master, and were about tying him up to the rafter of the house, but for the shortness of the cord; they then let the cord drop, and witness loosed his hands; master got hold of witness by the neck with his two hands, and kept knocking his head against a bench for about twenty times; witness ran down towards the warping loft, master followed him, overtook him, and knocked witness down, by tripping him and striking him on the breast; witness got up, and ran down to the weaving shop, and got under James Lee's loom; master ordered Beazely and Hines to drag witness out; master pushed a bench against witness, and prevented him from going out of the door, and beat him with a rod across the face, which blackened his face, and caused his ears to swell; when master was choking witness on the loft against the bench, witness's eyes were bursting out of his head, and the blood ran down his cheeks from his eyes; after being dragged out from under James Lee's loom, Beazely and Thomas Hines, and the master, tied witness up to Michael Heraghty's loom, with his back against it; Read did not assist in tying witness, but did in taking from the loom; at this time witness's trowsers were off; master stood before witness and struck him with his fists on the jaws, he also cut him across the thighs with the birch rod; and the master ordered him to be untied, which was done by Beazely.

(By the Committee.)—Did any thing occur while Beazely was loosing your hands, or afterwards?—No.

Did you refuse to take down your trowsers, when required by the master?—I did.

Was you put upon a man or boy's back?—No, I was not; the master wished to put me on a man's back.

Was you tied up more than once?—I was tied up in the loft; my hands were then tied; I was tied up to the loom, and also to the stay.

Can you give any reason why your front was turned out, and not your back?—I cannot.

Did you work on Monday?—I did.

Did you do as much on Monday as on Saturday?—I did.

Did you find any difficulty in working on Monday?—I was not able to work as well, but I was afraid of another beating. I worked one yard and three quarters.

Had you ever received from Mr. Hines the same severity of punishment before?—Never.

Did you make any particular resistance, or were you saucy or impudent to Mr. Hines, upon Saturday?—I said nothing to him but that I was unable to work; but I would not take off my trowsers.

Had you ever been before whipped, and your trowsers taken down?—Often.

Why did you refuse to take down your trowsers?—I told him I was not able to work.

Did you make any complaint to the committee or visitors after this beating?—I did not; I don't believe there was a board since, but that Mr. Gillmore and the catechist, and Mr. Hume, and Mr. Black, and Doctor Johnson were at the school, and I did not tell any of them, because I was afraid of being beat after they left this.

Continuation of
Appendix N° 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

Was you ever present when the committee asked the boys if they had any cause of complaint, and promised that their names should be concealed from Mr. Hines, and that their complaints would be redressed; and this at a time when the master and usher had been directed to withdraw from the presence of the boys?—I do recollect, at the time Mr. William Lee the inspector was here, that the master and usher were sent away, and the boys were asked if they had any cause of complaint.

Do you recollect the same to have occurred at any other time?—No; except on the night the Commissioners were here.

Do you recollect Mr. Gillmore asking you similar questions?—I do not; but he might have done so.

Do you recollect Rev. Mr. Stokes sending the master and usher and family out of the school-room, and asking the boys if they had any causes of complaint?—I do; it was when the boys complained of Mr. Shiels, the usher.

What gentlemen accompanied Mr. Stokes?—When the complaint was made by Costelloe to Mr. Stokes, there was none of the committee with him; but Mr. Stokes brought Mr. Gillmore, and Mr. Hume, and the catechist, to inquire into the complaints.

Do you recollect Mr. Stokes ordering the door to be shut?—I do.

Do you recollect Mr. Stokes doing so more than upon that occasion?—I do not.

Do you recollect Dr. and Mrs Thackeray, calling upon the boys in a similar manner?—I do.

Do you recollect any complaint being made on that occasion?—I do; a complaint was made against the master and usher; the complaint was, the boys did not get their play hours.

Was there any other complaint preferred?—I think there was about diet; Mr. Thackeray having read something about diet out of a book.

Have you any recollection of any complaint being made then, or at any other period, of Mr. Hines, having exercised undue severity towards the boys?—No, I do not mind that any boy made any complaint, except to Mr. Thackeray; I mind Mr. Hines treating other boys cruelly, but I do not mind their having made any complaint.

Do you recollect any boy having been treated as cruelly as yourself?—Never, except the kitchen boy; I have seen Mr. Hines putting him, clothes and all, into a water-stand, and as he came out, flogging him with a double-thonged whip, until he could hardly stand, because he sometimes used not to have the porringers and spoons ready for the boys breakfast.

Have not a number of boys been brought from other schools to this lately?—Yes.

Have you not heard that these boys, in their former schools, have not been employed at work as the boys of this school are?—I have heard them say so, and that they were very sorry for having been drafted here.

Have the boys, to your knowledge, formed any combination against the master?—Indeed they have not; I will tell the truth.

Have the stories told by the boys of other schools, of their having been permitted to play, when they must work here, caused any dissatisfaction amongst the boys of this school?—I think they don't look pleased at it.

Have the boys written any letter to the Commissioners since they left Sligo; or have any of the boys a book to write down complaints against the master?—They have not written any letter since to the Commissioners; but I heard the Commissioners direct Maurice Beahen to write to the committee of 15 in Dublin to get out of the school, but Beahen said he would not be allowed to write, and he has not done so. There was a book to write down complaints, but I know nothing of it.

Was that book kept by one of the new boys?—No, it was kept by Thomas Ludden.

Are the elder weaving boys dissatisfied at being kept in school so long, and do they complain of being put as apprentices to weavers, they knowing their trades already, and are they anxious to get out at once, expecting to receive the fees usually paid with them?—Beahen and Daniel Kenzie are anxious to get out, and to get the fee money for themselves.

After having been beat by Mr. Hines on the Saturday in question, did you make any complaint, or shew yourself to Mr. Bell, the surgeon of the institution?—I did not, but Mr. Hines brought me to Dr. Bell about three months since, to ask him if the disease of my eyes would prevent me from working on a loom, and Mr. Bell said it would not.

Do you recollect Mr. Bell, or any person for him, attending to inspect the state of health of the boys?—I recollect Dr. Murray attending the school.

How long after you was beat did you see Mr. Bell or Dr. Murray visiting the school?—I did not see them for three months after, but I cannot recollect the time.

Did any person ask you what was the matter with you, after the severe beating you got?—No person asked me but the boys about the house; the catechist did not come the next Sunday.

James Kenzie.

John Read.

John Read, sworn:—Is superintending the working of the flyshuttle, and instructing the boys; knows James Kenzie; recollects about four months ago, the master found Kenzie falling backabout half a yard in his work as a weaver; he asked the reason; can't say what answer Kenzie gave. Master then struck at Kenzie with his hand as he was sitting on the loom; can't say whether with his opened hand or clinched fist, but hit him, can't say where; he then desired him to come off the loom to be horsed, and he was put upon a boy's back; but after receiving a few stripes, his breeches being then down, the boy was obliged to let him down; he was then put upon Thomas Hine's back, he got a few stripes there, but was obliged obliged to be let down again; his hands were then tied together before him, and the cord was brought over the stay of a loom which gave way, he was then ordered up to the loft, and Thomas Hines with him; does not know what happened there, but heard a moan; the boy very shortly after came down, his breeches then altogether off; he went behind a bench, which the master closed upon him, and prevented him getting off; the boy then got under James Lee's loom, and witness and Beazely and Hines were called to tie him; when witness came forward, Beazely had him out, and as witness went forward, the boy held up his two hands to him, and said here Mr. Read, I won't resist against you; the boys arms were then tied and drawn behind his back, and he was brought forward to the loom, and another loom-cord was joined to the tying, and brought over the cap of the loom and secured there; the master then stood on the right hand side of the boy, and beat him with a birch-rod from the instep to the knees; can't say whether he went higher than the knees; the boy then stooped forward, and said, oh! sir, I'm off; that was before he was untied; the master replied, and said, oh! you'r very bad, and struck him with his hand about the head; but what part of the head does not know; he was then untied; saw the boy on Monday, his face appeared black or blue about the eyes or nose.

What is Kenzie's character as to his diligence and attention in his work?—He is very negligent.

Is he respectful to his master, or is he sulky?—While the master is present he appears obedient enough; but in his absence he is sulky and disobedient, and heedless with regard to advice given to him.

Do you consider him a good or bad boy?—I do consider him a bad boy indeed.

If the blood was streaming down Kenzie's face from his eyes, could it have escaped your observation?—I did not see any blood, seeing the master so much raised, I did not like to make any remarks.

When the boy held out his two hands to you, and you stood in front of him, could there have been blood streaming from his eyes without your observing it?—I cannot say; I did not see it, I was so confused.

Were the boy's feet tied together?—I did not see them tied.

Have you heard any complaints by the boys for being obliged to work?—Never did, except hearing them say, that there were other schools where they were not obliged to work.

Why did you take the trouble of advising the boys, in pointing out to them the advantages of their situation, compared with that of other boys in the country, as you have declared you have done?—Because the boys were complaining of being confined, and that they were kept too long in the school, without being bound.

Has there been any quarrel or disagreement between you and Mr. Hines?—I will tell you all the difference I ever had with him; first, one day he came in, and I had measured part of the webs, and there were two or three of the boys whose webs were short, about an inch or an inch and half; I told Mr. Beazely of it, if he chose to enter it in the task book, that he might cut them short or not, as he pleased; when the master found the task to be done, he ordered the webs to be taken off the beams, and on measuring them, he found them short, and witness was ordered to make up his accounts, which he did not mind, as he knew Mr. Hines to be hasty. There was another instance, when he did not answer Mr. Hines, and he was again ordered to make up his accounts.

Is Mr. Hines generally severe in inflicting punishments?—In my opinion he is.

Did Kenzie deserve punishment on that day?—He did; but I think not so severe.

Would he have got such severe punishment had he not kicked and opposed Mr. Hines?—I cannot answer; I never knew him to strike a boy without a cause; I consider the master catching hold of the boys by the throat as severe and objectionable; but I never knew a boy unable to attend his work or meals, by any beating received from Mr. Hines.

Did you see Kenzie work on Monday?—I did, but he complained that his back was stripped against the bench in the loft.

Have you ever known Kenzie tell a lie?—I have frequently; but never knew him do any harm by it.

John Read.

Investigation continued, 20th September 1824.

Lieut.-Col. Dodgin, C. B. Rev. Messrs. Stokes, Yeates and Elliott; Gowan Gillmore, John Black, and William Hume.

Lieutenant-Colonel Dodgin in the Chair.

Thomas Ludden sworn:—Produced by James Kenzie. He saw the men in the workshop tying Kenzie; he saw Mr. Hines striking him in the face with his hands; does not know if the hand was shut; saw Kenzie's face black; saw master strike him across the legs with a birch rod; saw master put him out of the ranks next day from going to church. Kenzie, after being flogged, worked for the remainder of the same day.

Thomas Ludden.

Did you see any other marks on Kenzie's face than the blackness you describe?—I saw his eyes bloody, and the blood on his face.

Did that proceed from a blow of the rod or of the hand?—I did not see him strike him with a rod in the face.

What part of the face did you see the blood upon?—I saw it coming out of one eye, not out of the other eye.

Continuation of
Appendix N° 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

Did you see any blood from the mouth?—No.

Was Kenzie's feet tied together?—I do not know.

How long have you been in the school?—Ten years since May last.

Did you know in that time of any of the committee calling the boys aside, and inquire if they had any causes for complaints?—I knew Mr. Stokes to do so.

Do you know, that in consequence of Mr. Stokes' interference with the committee of fifteen the play hours were enlarged, and those for work abridged?—I do not; since Mr. Thackeray was here such a change took place.

Was Kenzie's eye in which you saw blood, streaming, or was there only a drop or so, of blood in it?—Only a little; it was not streaming, he has always sore eyes.

Do you recollect when Mr. Lee the inspector was here, that the committee sent the master and usher away, and asked the boys to make any complaints they might have, as to bad treatment or otherwise?—I do not recollect their sending the master away; I do recollect that Mr. Lee asked the boys in the presence of the committee, if they had any complaints to make; I do not know if the master was present.

What is Kenzie's general character; is he a diligent boy?—He is not indeed; he is a very stubborn boy.

T. Ludden.

James Kenzie.

James Kenzie :—Have you been frequently kept from church within the last year, by the soreness of your eyes?—I have been many Sundays indeed, kept from church by the soreness of my eyes.

James Kenzie.

Daniel Kenzie.

Daniel Kenzie sworn :—Produced by James Kenzie. I saw the master beat James Kenzie in the workshop, in the face, and strike him with rods; I saw him choke him, and getting three men to take off his trowsers; the master all the while beating him; saw the master send him to the loft; do not know what happened there; there was a great noise on the loft; after he came from the loft, saw him tied with his back to the loom; saw the master beat him with the handle of the birch rod severely. Kenzie said he was very bad; master replied, oh! you are very bad, and struck him with his fist on the jaw; he then loosed him; after this, master put him on one of the men's back, is sure it was either on Read or Beazely's back; cannot say whether he then beat him or not; he did not beat him.

Were Kenzie's feet tied together?—They were; I saw them tied together.

Did you see any marks upon his face?—I did; I saw his face black, and the blood coming from both his eyes.

Was the blood streaming?—It was not; it was outside, under the eye lids, and he was wiping it with the arm of his shirt; the blood was coming out of his eyes when he was tied to the loom.

Did you wipe any blood off his face, or give him a cloth to do so?—I did not wipe his face, but I gave him a piece of linen to do so.

Was his shirt bloody?—The arms of his shirt were.

You say the blood was coming out of his eyes when he was tied to the loom, as he could not then wipe it off with his arms, did it stain the breast or neck of his shirt?—I cannot say whether it did or not; I don't say it was running down; it was only in the corner of his eyes.

Did you ever see your brother used in this way before?—I can't say he was ever used so badly, but he was used worse than other boys.

Before your brother was tied, did you see him use any resistance by kicking?—I did see him resist violently.

Daniel Kenzie.

Beazely Blundell.

Beazely Blundell sworn :—Am superintendent of the weaving, and assistant in the school; recollects Mr. Hines beating James Kenzie in the workshop, in consequence of his sponcing his work; Mr. Hines took a rod to punish him, but he would not allow himself to be punished like any of the other boys, he being stubborn and sulky; this a little enraged the master, but he did not at that time appear much vexed; he struck him three or four times across the side of the head with his open hand; he then brought him out from behind the bench; Kenzie was not on the loom when Mr. Hines struck him; I assisted in bringing him from behind the bench; the master took him, and as they call it, yoked him, by catching him with his hands by the neck; I never saw a mark left by the master on the neck; the master then flogged him with a rod; the boy kicked the master in the breast; he was on a man or a boy's back; the master complained of this kick, in consequence of which the boy was tied to the loom; the master struck him on the side of the head with his open hand, after which don't recollect that he struck him further; he was then loosed.

Were the boy's feet tied?—They were not tied; I did not see them tied; his arms were tied.

You say the boy was horsed?—To the best of my opinion he was; he was not horsed on my back; I cannot say that it was on Read's back.

Did you see any blood on Kenzie's eyes?—No; I am positive of it.

Did Kenzie return to his work that evening?—I do not recollect.

What is James Kenzie's character?—He is counted always a bad boy; he sponces his time away in the work shop, and neglects his schooling.

Have you often seen boys punished as severely?—No.

Did

Did you ever complain of him to Mr. Hines?—Very often.

In consequence of your complaints, was he punished?—As often as I complained of him the master was inclined to punish him; but I have known him to quit the work shop without being bothered with him; I never recollect boys being punished as severely as Kenzie was.

Are there any other boys in the school as idle and inattentive as James Kenzie?—I don't know any one altogether as bad as he is.

Did you see him flogged twice upon that day?—I don't remember.

What is Mr. Hines' general conduct with regard to punishing the boys?—I see him sometimes kind enough, and sometimes severe enough.

Do you think him too severe, according to your ideas of severity of punishment?—I think him a little severe.

Did you ever see him punish a boy without cause?—I don't remember that he ever did.

Is Mr. Hines' general conduct towards the boys with regard to punishment, the same as towards his own family?—I think he is not more severe towards the boys than he is towards his own sons, when he punishes them; I have seen him beat one of his own sons more severely than I ever saw him beat any of the boys.

Did you ever know of the Rev. Mr. Stokes removing the master and assistants from the school room to examine the boys?—I don't recollect.

Do you recollect any alteration in the hours for work and play since you came here?—I don't remember.

What punishment do you consider as being a "little severe"?—I consider taking a boy by the neck too severe.

Did you ever perceive any bad effects from his taking the boys by the neck?—I did not; but I think it altogether out of the way.

Do you conceive that the boys would rather be yoked than whipped?—I think they would rather submit to any thing than be whipped.

Did you ever know a boy obliged to be absent from his meals, or work or school, in consequence of punishment?—I don't mind that any ever was.

How long have you been in this school?—I was reared in this school; I have been assistant usher and superintendent for nine years past.

Beazely Blundell.

Pat. Grady sworn; fourteen years old, nine years here:—About six months ago I was able to work four yards of linen cloth per day with the fly shuttle; I took pains of my back, and fell back of the work I used formerly to do; the master was not well pleased with that; did not tell the master the cause; master was going to beat me; some time after he changed me to another loom, where I did less; I then eloped, was away a day and a night; was brought back by a man who knew where I came from; this was about a month since; had charter-school clothes on me; about a week after, Mr. Hines came to the workshop, and he looked at one of the boy's webs; he found nothing wrong with him; he came down to my web; said the selvage of my web was uneven; he then gave me a box on the eye which swelled it; he afterwards took me off that loom, and brought me to another; he put me across it, and beat me with his hands, and kicked me, and left the other eye swelled; both my eyes were black; I bled a porringer full of blood; was bleeding from the lips for a quarter of an hour afterwards; on last Saturday I asked him for a pair of stockings; he bid me call upon him on Sunday; another boy and I went to him, and he said he would not give us a pair, either to-day or to-morrow; I then went away; not long ago, about six months ago, he sent for me to the bed-room; he asked me who made my bed; it was tossed; he then took a whip, and flogged me for about half an hour, down stairs, up stairs to the workshop and back again; he broke the whip on me; it was a thong whip; there were no knots on it; it was not the whip which was produced to the Commissioners; that is a new whip.

Pat. Grady.

Was you punished for running away?—Not at the time, not for a week after.

Was not that punishment for a defect in your work?—It was not so bad that he should beat me for it, but he said it was.

Had you another reason for eloping than for having been changed from one loom to another?—I had, because I did not do as much as I used to do, and I did not like to stay in the school; another boy went away with me, George Miller.

Has your manner been always proper and respectful to your master?—Yes; he always said I was a good boy.

Do you think it proper and respectful for a boy to say in the presence of his master, before the entire school, that he has cheated him?—I do not.

Did you not say of the master that he had cheated you, in the presence of Mr. Hume, without any question being asked?—I did.

At the last annual distribution of clothes, how many pairs of stockings did you get?—I got none.

How many pairs have you got since?—One pair, about three months since.

Had you in your possession two pairs of stockings when you got the pair about three months since?—I had; one pair was very bad, the other good.

What had you for dinner yesterday?—Potatoes, and mutton, and cabbage.

You heard the question asked the boys, if they were satisfied with their dinner, did any of them complain but yourself?—No.

Did not the boys say they were well satisfied?—I heard Mr. Hume ask Beahen if he was satisfied,

Continuation of
Appendix N° 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

satisfied, and I heard Beahen say that no bones were allowed in the meat; I did not hear him or any of the other boys say any thing else.

Did you hear the usher say that there was an allowance made for the bones in the weight?—I did.

What complaint did you make of the dinner?—I said I did not like the cabbage, because it had no taste.

Do you recollect any inspector or any of the local committee sending away the master and usher, and ask the boys if they had any complaints to make?—I do recollect Mr. Thackeray and Rev. Mr. Stokes doing so, and also Mr. Lee the inspector, and some of the local committee, and Rev. W. C. Armstrong the catechist, frequently doing so.

Were not there applications made to the boys at different times?—There were.

Do you recollect any alterations being made in the hours of play and labour?—Only upon the interference of Mr. Thackeray.

What is James Kenzie's character in the school?—A very bad one, among the boys.

Do you know of any combination among the boys, and consultations amongst them, as to the statements they were to make to the Commissioners and to the local committee upon the present investigation?—Not before the Commissioners came here; but since they came, upon the day they came to the hotel, and before they came to the school, the boys said they'd tell all that ever happened to them since they came to the school, and Terence Gallagher told him not to let the black eyes pass, and they put one and other in mind of what they were to tell.

Do you know of any book being kept by the boys to put down any complaints against the master?—I do know of a book having been kept so late as last Thursday; it was headed, 'An Account of Injuries done to the Boys,' it was commenced after the Commissioners came here.

Have the boys had any conversations with the ushers or assistants, as to what they were to say to the Commissioners or committee about this investigation?—I don't know of any conversation, except Mr. Blundell asking me how was the business going on, and I said very well; and I told him that Terry Gallagher said he was struck by Mr. Richard Hines, with the butt of a gun and of a fishing rod.

Patt Grady.

Robert Dogherty.

Robert Dogherty, not sworn, too young, 12 years old, one year here:—About three months since was flogged by the master with a birch rod, on the back, for having the cuff of his coat torn; he got 25 blows, counted by Thomas Fullerton.

Did you tell the Commissioners that the sores on your side were caused by the flogging?—I did.

Did you not tell them that the sores did not appear until a week after the flogging?—I did.

Doctor Coyne sworn:—Having examined Robert Dogherty, what do you consider the sores which appear upon his back to have proceeded from?—Erysipelas.

Do you consider those symptoms are likely to have been produced by correction with a rod, and if so, in what interval would it be likely to shew itself?—In a skin predisposed to that disease, a slight correction of the rod might produce it; but I think it must be immediately.

Do you think a week would elapse before it would shew itself?—Certainly not.

B. Coyne, M. D.

Terence Gallagher.

Terence Gallagher, 17 years of age, 11 years here, sworn:—About a year ago I was giving out straw in the barn, the master said I was laughing at him—I was not; he took a peawattle, something thicker than my thumb, and beat me with it; he sent me into the school-room, and beat me, and boxed me, and then he sent me to the weaving shop, and beat me there with a birch rod; he sent up and got my copy, and kept me writing until the boys quit in the evening.

Another time, the master beat me and boxed me, upon a complaint of the servant maid's; about two years since, I had cracked hands, in the winter season, and young Mr. Hines desired me to stuff the horse's feet with cow dung; I kept doing so, as long as I could, until my hands got so sore that it smarted me, and then I was complained of for not doing so, by Armstrong, an apprentice boy; Mr. Richard Hines then came out, and pushed with the butt end of a gun, can't say if the barrel was in it; and he struck me on the butt of the ear, and staggered me; he then sent me into the school-room, and struck me, with a kick in the back, and knocked me over against the desk; he then sent me to my bed, and as I was going up stairs, he pushed me with the butt of the gun. Another time one of the boys complained of me to young Mr. Hines, and he struck me with the butt end of a fishing-rod, which he had in his hand, on the head, and cut me, he then beat me with a rule; some time afterwards I complained to Mr. Armstrong the catechist, and he ordered me to be confined to the potatoe house for a week, and fed on bread and water. Mr. Armstrong inquired into my complaint, when a boy, James Cummins, was called on, and he said, I threatened to strike him; and the master gave so bad a character of me, that I was confined.

Were you in the habit of robbing orchards?—Never, until Mr. Homan's orchard.

When robbing Mr. Homan's orchard did any accident happen to you?—As I was going over over the wall, a stone fell on my ankle, and cut me, and a man gave me a couple of strokes across the shoulders with a rod, and took three apples out of my pocket.

Was it upon the day you was caught robbing the orchard, that Mr. Hines flogged you? —It was not; it was a good while after.

Have you any complaints to make of your food?—Not now; not since the Commissioners were here; before that, we got meat two or three times which was tainted.

During the eleven years you have been in this school, how many dinners did you get that you complain of?—I cannot recollect how many; about four or five Sundays ago there were maggots in the mutton; it was either beef or mutton.

When Patt Grady was going to complain of Mr. Hines, did you desire him not to forget the black eyes?—I did not, positively.

(Pat Grady confronted.—I swear that Terence Gallagher told me not to forget the black eyes.)

When you were cut in the head, did you shew your head to Mr. Bell?—I did not; Mr. Bell was not sent for; unless a boy was sick, Mr. Bell was not sent for.

Do you ever recollect the committee, or any visitor, sending the master and usher away from the boys, and asking them if they had any cause of complaint?—I never recollect it but three times.

Why did you not complain upon those occasions?—I used to be afraid.

Why was you afraid?—He was such a man to me, that if he only looked at me, I was terrified.

Do you recollect Mr. Gillmore laying his hand upon your breast, after the master and ushers were sent away, and asking you if you had any cause to complain of either food or treatment, and that your name should not be mentioned to the master?—I don't remember it, he might have done so.

Terence Gallagher.

Thomas Fullerton, near 12 years old, not sworn; near three years here:—Is employed in winding quilts; it was about a bad bobbin; the master dragged me out, and tied my hands before me, because I would not take down my trowsers; he did not flog me, he put me into the potatoe house, but he untied my hands first; it was after the dinner hour; he kept me in the potatoe house every day for a week. I slept in my bed, he fed me on bread and water. I am certain I was only confined for seven days. I got enough of bread to eat, but nothing else but water; it was in winter, about half a year ago. Mrs. Hines is very good to me.

Thomas Fullerton.

How long have you been employed in the workshop?—Near two years.

Are you positive that Mr. Hines did not beat you before you was confined?—I am positive.

Did any of the boys ask you to make any complaint against Mr. Hines?—Beahan called me the day the Commissioners came here, and asked me how long it was since I was locked up; I said it was a good while ago, and he then called me aside and made me tell him all about it, and Beahan told the gentleman about me and French.

What did you tell Beahan?—I told him I was locked up in the potatoe house for a week; I did not tell him I was flogged, I told him I was hung up in the weaving shop, my feet off the ground, the rope broke, and I fell down; the master then tied me to the bench, and went to his breakfast, and I got loose; I was not a minute hanging up, for the rope broke; Blundell was in the shop below the loft, Pat Kenzie and Edward M'Kee, were on the loft.

Edward M'Kee, not sworn; not 13 years old, two years past in school:—Recollects Mr. Hines punishing Thomas Fullerton, it was for telling the master a lie about the scald; he told the master his head was rubbed with ointment, and it was not; the master was going to whip him, but Fullerton would not let him; he was then going to tie him up to the top of the loft, but he would not let him. Mr. Hines then tied his hands before him, and tied him to a vice for about an hour; he then took him out and locked him up in the potatoe house, every day for a week, and kept him upon bread and water; it was in the latter end of harvest.

Edward M'Kee.

Was he tied up to the top of the house?—He was not; he could not have been so without my seeing it.

John M'Donogh, about 12 years old, not sworn; near three years here:—Recollects Mr. Hines punishing Fullerton about a year ago, it was for telling a lie about his head being rubbed; the master gave him a good flogging with a birch rod on a boy's back; he then struggled, he tied him with a rope round his waist, the rope broke and he fell; he was then confined in the potatoe house.

John M'Donogh.

Investigation continued, September 21st, 1824.

Present, Lieut.-Col. Dodgin, Gowan Gillmor, William Hume and John Black.

Edward Gillow, about 14 years old, not sworn; three years in the school:—Knows Thomas Fullerton; recollects his being confined in the potatoe house, about this time twelve months; recollects the circumstance from having a pain in his knee, and being blistered; at that time he was unable to work, and was allowed to walk about; the master brought him to the weaving shop, where Fullerton was tied to the iron screw, and made him unloose him; the master then brought Fullerton to the potatoe house, and he carried a bucket into the house; he was employed brushing the dirt and scruff out of Fullerton's head, and after he put some ointment on it; he had a scald on his head; he afterwards locked the door on Fullerton, and gave the master the key; he was confined about 10 o'clock in the morning, and brought out in the evening, about bed-time, and he was put in the next morning again. The mistress, he heard himself say, sent him bread and milk for his breakfast. He got his liberty about 11 o'clock that day. Knows this from having met Fullerton about 12 o'clock, when the boys were called to school; he asked him when he got out, he answered, a good while ago.

Edward Gillow.

As you were walking about, do you know whether or not Fullerton was confined for a longer time than that you have now stated?—He was not.

(By Edward Gillow to Fullerton.)—Did you not tell me that you got bread and milk, the second day you were put into the potatoe house, and when I asked you when you were let out that day, did you not say a long while ago?—I do not mind.

Thomas Stanly.

Thomas Stanly, aged 13 years, not sworn; six years in the school:—Recollects Thomas Fullerton being confined in the potatoe house, brought him water and bread; he was put in about 10 o'clock in the morning, and brought out before bed-time; again put in the next morning, and let out at before 12 o'clock that day.

Thomas Fullerton.

Thomas Fullerton being again examined; says, he was at one time confined for two days, and another time, three days.

Were you confined at any other time?—No, Sir.

Why did you say that you had been confined for a week?—He thought he would get out of this and be put to another school.

You said that you told Beahen, that you were tied so that your feet did not touch the ground; now was that really the case?—They first tried to tie me up to the beam; I kicked, and they then tied me to the iron screw and my feet was upon the ground, when I was tied to the iron screw.

Patrick Kenzie.

Patrick Kenzie, aged about 12 years, in the school seven years, not sworn:—The master beat him for having his eyes scraped, it was done by another boy; beat him with a birch rod, gave him 27 blows; beat him before for not attending to his writing.

Did the master beat you for telling lies?—He did more than once.

How do you know you got so many blows?—One of the boys counted them; James Dolan.

James Dolan.

James Dolan, aged about 10 years, not sworn; three years in the school:—Knows Patrick Kenzie; he was flogged very severely for having his face scraped; counted the blows; he got twenty-nine.

Did you count the blows?—I counted them at the beginning; counted ten blows, and counted no more.

How do you know Kenzie got 29 blows?—I heard the boys say so.

Which of the boys?—Maurice Behan and Daniel Kenzie. The way I heard this was, either the usher Mr. Gordon, or some one of the boys, asking Daniel Kenzie how he knew that his brother got 29 blows; he said all the boys in the school counted them; and Maurice Beahen reported this.

Were you ever flogged for neglecting your lessons?—Not flogged; I was often slapped for neglecting my lessons.

Did Patsey Kenzie ask you to be his witness?—Yes; after I told him I would be his witness for the 29 blows.

Daniel Kenzie.

Daniel Kenzie, aged about 18 years, sworn; in the school upwards of 11 years:—Says, that about four or five months since, he had a pain in his heart; the master brought him to the dispensary for advice, but the doctors had not come at the time. He went the Monday following, when he was bled; he thinks on the right arm; his arm was tied up. The master called him up in the school-room, with his copy-book; he said he could not write from his arm being tied up. The master caught him by the breast, gave him three or four boxes on the breast, and afterwards flogged him with a thong whip. After this, the same day, he eloped from the school, but was retaken about five miles from Sligo. The master did not punish him for this offence; the person who caught him was coming home with him, when they met a gentleman, who brought him to Mr. Hines, and got his pardon. Has no other complaint to make of severity, before or since.

Was it the day that you were bled that the master beat you?—It was.

Did the master know you were bled when he beat you?—He did so; for I told him the night before, when he was putting me on the loom, that I was bled in the arm, and could not weave.

Had you your arm in the sleeve of your coat after being bled, and on the day upon which you were beat?—I think I had; but I am not sure.

What was the conduct of Mr. Hines to the boys who were sick or hurt?—He was very good and kind.

Were you flogged for your lessons or writing?—I was for my writing.

Have you been flogged for telling lies?—I have, often.

Have you been flogged for neglecting your work?—Only once or twice; being always attentive.

Did

Did the local committee, catechist, or inspectors, when the master was desired to withdraw from the presence of the boys, inquire if they had any complaints to make?—They did.

Why did you not then complain?—At these times I had no cause of complaints; wishes it to be inserted, that the beating took place the day after he was bled; but his master did not know that he was bled till he told him, when he was putting him on the loom.

Daniel Kenzie.

James Gallagher, aged about 18 years, sworn; in the school nine years:—Has no complaint to make against the master for severity to himself since he came to the school, but has on the part of other boys; says, that about four years since, Mr. Richard Hines, the master's son, beat him with a stick very severely. What was your complaint to Mr. Stokes?—That Mr. Shiels, the usher, beat me.

Do you know any thing about farming?—I do, a little.

James Gallagher.

Richard Swift, aged 12 years, not sworn; two years in the school:—Made a complaint to the catechist about the boys getting up so early in the morning when the master was out; the master on his return gave him 30 blows with a cane, on the backside, his breeches were down; no one was in the school-room at the time but himself and the master.

John Dembigh, aged about 19 years, sworn; 13 years in the school:—The mistress made some complaint of me, and the master took me from the place when I was putting on a fire, and brought me into the school-house, where I eat my breakfast; he swore that if I did not get my copy book in a minute, he would flog me; he then struck me and knocked me down; I fled to the yard, but I was brought back by Mr. Beazely and Mr. Gordon, and I was again flogged. Master Richard beat me on the day I was stooping over a pan of water, when he tumbled me in.

John Dembigh.

Continuation of
Appendix No. 77,

Was it Master Richard, or Mr. Hines himself, that threw you into the water-pan?—It was Master Richard.

Do you feel satisfied as to remaining in the school?—I don't; I think I have been too long in it.

Do you know any thing about Patrick Kenzie's flogging?—He was flogged for wetting the bed; and I recollect another time about potatoes.

How many blows did he then get?—I don't know; I never counted them.

Had you any conversation with the boys about the complaints they were to make against the master?—Not until I heard the Commissioners were to come to the school; and before they came, the same day, James Gallagher, Ludden, Daniel Kenzie, Mills and I, spoke together. I told them I would complain when the gentlemen came; these boys forwarded me up to tell.

What was your object in telling those boys you would complain?—It was my wish they should complain, though I did not desire them to do so.

Do you recollect the visitors, when the master was absent, asking the boys if they had any complaint against the master?—I do.

Why do you prefer Longford?—Because I would have no work to do there.

John May, nine years old; one year at school. No complaint.

James Jones, nine years old; near one month here. No complaint.

John Cavanagh, nine years old; one year at school:—Bed was ill made, master caught me by the throat and kicked me like a ball over the two beds; happened about three months months ago; forgot the whole of it, until put in mind of it as he was coming into the committee room, by Hugh Dolan.—(Hugh Dolan produced; admits that he desired witness to mind the beating he got in the bed room, and the yoking, but denies that he saw him kicked over the beds.)—Witness would not have complained, but for Dolan.

Andrew Armstrong, 18 years old, sworn; 11 years in the school:—Is an apprentice of Mr. Hine's; saw Mr. Richard Hine about a year and half or two years ago give Terence Gallagher a push of a gun in the jaw, upon my reporting that Gallagher refused to stuff the horses feet, nothing else that I saw happened to Gallagher; saw the master about two months ago beat French severely, by catching hold of him by the throat, boxing him, and kicking him, for having mud on his shoes, he knocked him down on the paving stones, and the boy was unable to rise, he was unable to work for two or three days; means by that, that he complained while he was at work.

Andrew Armstrong

Was the barrel in the stock of the gun, at the time the punch was given?—As far as I can recollect the barrel was not in the stock.

Upon what terms are you and Mr. Hines, your master?—We were not upon good terms this good while; I had not much peace either this good while.

Did you leave your master's service since you was his apprentice, and under what circumstances did you do so?—I did leave his service with his consent, and enlisted; I came back the next day with my uncle; Mr. Hines was not inclined to take me back, as he accused me of being a bad boy for the three weeks before; it was on account of my uncle's intreaty, and my own promises of good conduct in future, and my having behaved well formerly, that my master took me back.

Has your master been complaining of your conduct since your return, but before the Commissioners came here?—He has.

Why?—My master did not like the manner in which his horse was cleaned, and he endeavoured to beat me with "the touch," but I ran from him.

Upon what terms are you and Mr. Richard Hines?—Not upon good terms; I am not a friend of his, nor is he a friend of mine.

Upon what terms are you and Mrs. Hines?—We are upon bad terms; Mrs. Hines called me a conniving rogue, and a deceiver, I told the Commissioners so.

Had you any conversation about complaints against Mr. Hines before the Commissioners came here, with any of the boys?—Not before they came to the school, but before they saw French, or the boys that were at the field; I was sent for these boys, and told that there were two gentlemen come; French said to me, if there are any complaints, "I'll tell about the day I was beat;" "Do so," says I, "if there is any thing about it, I'll tell the truth."

Did you hear any of the other boys talk of complaining, before they saw the Commissioners?—I heard them all say they were glad.

You have been for eleven years in the school, do you recollect the local committee and catechist frequently sending the master and ushers out of the way, and asking the boys if they had any complaints?—I mind it but once; the time Mr. Shiels was here.

Did you willingly become Mr. Hine's apprentice?—I did.

Andrew Armstrong.

Anthony Shevelin, 7 years old; one month at school. No complaint.

James Leeson, 6 years old; one week at school. No complaints.

Edward Murphy, 7 years old; one month here. No complaint.

Michael Donoghoe, 7 years old. No complaints.

Francis King, 8 years old; no complaints.

Thomas Ferguson, 11 years old; one year at school:—About a fortnight ago the master took me by the throat, and kicked me about the bedroom, and then whipped me with a rod in the school-room; and in the workshop again he caught me by the throat; and this for not being down in the morning with the other boys. George Miller was present, and also John Kavanagh.

(George Miller called. Did not see the master beat Ferguson within the last fortnight, nor month, nor six months.

John Kavanagh recollects the master catching Ferguson by the throat in the weaving-shop; his face was red after it.

How do you happen to recollect this?—It was Ferguson that bid him recollect to tell, that the master choked him on the loft.

Did you remember any thing about it till Ferguson told you so?—I did not.)

Ferguson recalled. Admits having spoken to Miller and Kavanagh after he was examined.

Thomas Ludden, sworn:—About four months ago, the master came up to the bedroom very early in the morning, and asked me why the boys were not up. I told him I desired the foreman to call them, as he bid me; he then dragged me out of my bed, and brought me over to another bed, and caught hold of me by the throat. At another time, I opened a letter of the master's, which was sealed; I did so by mistake. I got a second letter at the same time,

Thomas Ludden.

Appendix N^o 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

time, which was directed to the boy's mother who brought them to me; the master was going to flog me for this; did not. I opened the second letter too; I saw Mr. Hine's letter, was directed to him before I opened it. I tried to seal Mr. Hine's letter, but could not. I then copied his letter out on another sheet of paper and sealed it, and directed it to the master, and dropped it in the street, and it was picked up by a labouring man, who sent it to the master: this occurred about a month ago. The master said he would not flog me till he saw the catechist come to the school. Mr. Hines never beat me since.

Had you any book for the purpose of entering complaints against the master?—There was a book among the boys; the paper of the book was bought by subscription, by Maurice Beahen and myself. I borrowed the penny I subscribed from John Duncan and Denis Toole; did not let either of them know about the book; not sure whether I did not tell Toole, I wrote in the book, "An account of injuries done to the boys."

Had you any conversation with the boys before they saw the Commissioners, about making complaints?—About six weeks ago, when I saw Rooney beat, I said he got a great beating, and I did not think he deserved it. I said to Beahen, it would be right to tell of the beating Rooney got. On the night the Commissioners came here, I heard a great many boys speaking of complaints; but do not recollect the particular complaints.

Did you see or hear of any boy being struck on the second night of the Commissioners being here, for not joining in making complaints against the master?—I did not see any boy struck for that cause, but I heard there were some; that Patt Grady knocked off John Duncan's cap. I think Daniel Kenzie was with Grady at that time.

Where were you when you wrote in the book for recording injuries?—In the school-room; Mr. Reid and Thomas Stanly were at the same desk with me; the usher was walking about the room getting the room cleaned.

Were there any complaints written in the book?—Yes; "that James Leeson was kept out of the school-room until supper time."

What was he kept out of the room for?—He was kept out to watch the clothes from being tramped by the bull.

Did you or Beahen ever say that you would endeavour to get the master out of the school, or make any declarations to that effect?—We might have been talking about things this long time; but I don't recollect. I heard it said in the school, that the master might be put out for this business; I think Michael Costelloe and James Gallagher said so.

Do you believe there has been a combination among some of the boys, to put the master out of the school?—I don't believe there has been a combination; but I believe they intended to do so.

That who intended to do so?—I believe Beahen and James Gallagher did; because they were saying they'd complain upon going to Dublin, and I'd be glad he was put out; but did not intend to make any complaint. I don't believe the usher would be sorry that the master should be turned out of the school. Mr. Reid has told me that the master was very wicked; he has done so frequently.

When the Commissioners and the committee called upon you, was it your wish to complain against Mr. Hines?—It was my wish to speak about the letter, but of nothing else.

Why was it your wish to speak about the letter, as the master has never flogged you since the transaction?—I thought it better he should beat me at once, than be looking for an excuse.

T. Ludden.

Daniel Cooney, eight years old; four years in the school:—Was flogged with a rod across the back, once for not having my catechism, and again for not having my spelling.

John Mack, eight years old; two years in school:—Was flogged for not having his spelling, but does not complain.

James Armstrong, nine years old; two years in school:—Was flogged for wetting the bed.

Mathew Phibbs, seven years old; one year in school:—Mr. Hines beat me for being behind the table; he caught me by the throat, but did not whip me.

Investigation continued, 23d September 1824.

Present, Lieutenant-colonel Dodgin, C.B. 66th Regiment; Gowan Gillmore, Esq.; William Hume, Esq.

Michael Costelloe.

Michael Costelloe being called in, aged seventeen years; ten years in the school; sworn:—Had you, Thomas Ludden, and James Gallagher, any conversation about the master's being removed from his situation?—No, to the best of my recollection, never had.

Did you hear any thing said by the boys about his removal, what was it, and by whom said?—I heard some of the boys say, the night the Commissioners were here, that the master would be put out of the school; Patt Grady said it, and a number of other boys.

Have you heard any thing said by Mr. Gordon regarding Santry school, and what?—That boys in it were becoming ushers of other schools.

What is your opinion of the master's treatment of the boys?—There are some whom he treats well, and others he punishes when they deserve it.

Have you seen him catch boys by the throat often?—I have.

How does he treat the boys when sick, and unable to work?—He is very kind to them.

Mich^l Costelloe.

Thomas Ludden, being recalled;—says, He made the complaint in January 1823 to the catechist; this complaint was investigated.

By whom was it investigated?—By the catechist and Dr. Johnston.

What was the result of that investigation?—Two boys were confined.

What were they confined for?—One boy, Thomas Duncan, was confined for telling lies, and the other, William M'Intyre, for advising them to run away—the three boys that eloped; I was one of the boys that eloped.

Were both these boys of the complaining boys?—One of them was; Duncan was not.

What did the boys complain about?—Severe punishment, and want of play-hours.

Thomas Ludden.

James Gallagher being recalled:—Had you any conversation regarding Santry boys, with any person, and with whom?—With Daniel Dunn I had a conversation; I told him that the Santry boys were and would be masters of schools.

James Gallagher.

Was any person present, at any time, when you and Daniel Dunn spoke on this subject?—I don't recollect any person being present.

Have you any complaint to make of being worked too hard?—No, I have not.

How many sheets have the boys on their beds?—Only one.

At what hour do they get up in the morning?—Sometimes at five, sometimes at half past four, other times at six in summer; since the Commissioners were here, we have no complaint to make of early rising; can't speak positively about the time of getting up; sometimes we rise early to go to the sea; when I spoke of the Santry boys being masters, it was in consequence of what I heard the Rev. Mr. M'Gee say.

James Gallagher.

Daniel Dunn, labourer, aged upwards of 40, sworn:—Says, that James Gallagher told me they had got fine news—that as masters were put out of schools, Santry boys were to get their situations; he told me so another time in the presence of Mr. Gordon the usher, and Mr. Gordon also told me the same thing.

Daniel Dunn.

How many years are you in the employment of Mr. Hines?—Upwards of 26 years, and slept in his house for 10 years.

How are the boys worked, moderately or otherwise?—I never saw them overworked, within or without.

How has Mr. Hines treated them in your opinion?—I never saw him treat them ill; he punishes them when they deserve it; I think he treats them fatherly.

Have you ever known any boy kept from his labour in consequence of ill usage from the master?—No.

mark.

James Gallagher recalled:—Have you been employed in writing on Sunday, and what was the cause?—I have been so employed writing my piece, but I don't know the cause.

James Gallagher.

Have you ever said, that if the master was dismissed, none of his family would get the situation?—I don't recollect it; I might have said it.

Have you had any private conversations with the usher?—I have often spoken to him when we were alone together; often talking about geography, which he was teaching me.

Did you say you would make any complaint when you went to Dublin against the master?—I did.

James Gallagher.

George Gordon, usher to the school, aged 20 years, sworn:—Has been in the school one year and five months.

George Gordon.

What is the food for breakfast which the children get?—Stirabout and buttermilk before this inquiry, and new milk and stirabout since, except this day, they got butter milk.

What did the boys get for dinner on Sunday the 12th?—Potatoes, beef and cabbage.

What was the appearance of the beef to you that day?—It appeared good.

Did the boys seem satisfied with it?—They did not.

Do you know the reason?—They objected that the meat was bad; they did not say so, but I judged so from their not eating it as at other times.

Do you know any thing against the quality of this beef?—Nothing more than the cow's having a sore udder, which I saw the boys rubbing before she was killed.

How many sheets have the boys on their beds?—One only.

At what time do the boys rise?—Generally, before the investigation, it was very irregular, sometimes at five, sometimes half past four, and other times at half past five; they arose sometimes so early to answer the tide for bathing, but now they are regular to six o'clock.

What was the earliest time for going to work?—Sometimes boys have gone to work so early as five or six o'clock, but it has been in cases of emergency; the time for the boys generally to go to work is nine o'clock.

What are the school hours?—Before the investigation, from the hour the boys get up; immediately after prayers they went to school, and remained till a quarter past eight o'clock.

Continuation of
Appendix N^o 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

o'clock. Generally they went into school again at half past twelve o'clock, and remained till one o'clock; went again at half past five, and remained till eight o'clock in the evening. Since the investigation, the hours directed in the dietary have been strictly complied with, except where bathing interfered.

When did the boys write the specimens to be sent to Dublin, on what day of the week?—On Sunday.

Why were they so employed on Sunday?—I understood that Mr. Hines was in a hurry to send them to Dublin, it being after the time they should have been sent up.

Were any of the boys kept from church in consequence, and how many?—Forty did not go to church, but other reasons kept some of them from church, want of clothes, and sores on their heads; about 18 staid from church on account of the specimens.

These specimens have not been sent to Dublin, and do you know why they are not?—The master told me, that in consequence of his not getting down the abstract from the committee of fifteen, that he was obliged to delay sending up the specimens, as the abstract and the specimens are always transmitted together.

How long has the buttermilk been kept, before given to the boys, from the time it has been churned?—Not more than 24 hours.

What is your opinion of its quality?—It cannot be better.

Have you read the dietary that has lately come down, it directs the description of food since 1821, what is there said of milk?—Buttermilk is allowed for breakfast every day, except Sunday, when new milk and water mixed is to be given; when the boys get milk at dinner, new milk and water is allowed.

You have been at other schools, what is your opinion of the diet at this school?—It far exceeds any of them, both in quantity and quality; I mean charter schools.

Have you ever spoken to the boys, as to their rights, as to the time for work, school and play?—Never.

Had you ever any conversation with the boys about Santry boys being masters, and what was it?—I had a conversation with James Gallagher, who I understood was to go to Santry, telling him how necessary it would be for him to be mindful of himself; I taught him geography in play hours.

Did you ever desire the boys not to signalize themselves by making complaints against the master?—I did.

What induced you to do so?—It was to Beahen particularly, but I do not recollect the reason; heard that he was a complaining boy, and discontented.

Did you ever hear Beahen express any dissatisfaction at the treatment he got from the master?—I did not.

Did you understand that Beahen, or any of the other boys, intended to complain?—I did not.

Have you ever known the master to beat a boy without cause?—Never.

Have you ever known any boy absent from school or his meals, in consequence of the severity of the master's chastisement?—No.

What is the master's treatment of the boys when sick?—He uses them very tenderly, and is angry if they should be neglected, and Mrs. Hines is very kind.

What is your opinion of the general conduct of the master, in his management of the school?—He is attentive to his duties. The only failure I can see is, that he is rather passionate and hasty in respect to his punishments; otherwise, I don't think there can be a better master.

Do you think there is any systematic cruelty or severity exercised towards the boys, by the master?—I am sure there is not; I believe the master would be sorry if the passion of the moment led him to do an injury to any person, his anger is only momentary.

Has the catechist or some other person deputed for him, attended regularly?—Yes.

Have the boys had opportunity of making complaints if they considered themselves aggrieved?—They had often.

George Gordon,

Edward Moffett.

Edward Moffett, aged 18 years, sworn:—Was reared in the Sligo school, and is now bound to a sail maker.

How long were you in this school?—About seven years.

What was your treatment by the master during that time?—As good as I could expect; my father could not treat me better.

What was his treatment to the other boys, while you were in the school?—His treatment to good boys, was every thing a good boy could expect; he punished the bad boys severely, but never to do them any injury.

When boys were sick how were they treated?—I never got so good treatment before or since; Mrs. Hines was a good mistress.

What description was your diet of?—I never got better since I left it; I have no reason to complain of my present master, who feeds me well.

If the boys had cause of complaint when you were in the school, had they opportunities of telling it to the catechist, inspectors and local committee?—They had; the catechist put the question frequently; Mr. Hume and Mr. Black has done so, and certainly these questions were put on board days; the boys were asked privily from the master.

Do you recollect Mr. Lee's putting that question to the boys?—I do; he sent the master away round the house.

Do you recollect the Rev. Mr. Stokes doing so?—I do recollect at the time the complaint was was made against Shiels; we were at dinner, Mr. Hines was in the room; Mr. Stokes desired them all to go out, and asked if the boys had any complaint.

When you were in the school, upon what terms were the boys and the master?—At the time I came first, I recollect some of the boys were in rebellion against the master, they proposed beating him; I do not know the cause; there was an inquiry in it, but after that all went on well, till Conoly's complaint; I neither know nor heard any thing since; all was quiet when I left the school.

Has Mr. Hines interested himself at all about you since you left the school?—At first I was dissatisfied with my situation, and was not so correct in my conduct as I ought to be; Mr. Hines scolded me for it, and was not so free with me as before.

How have you since conducted yourself?—Self-praise is no praise, but I refer to my master; I have found Mr. Hines' advice true, and I have endeavoured to follow it.

How long are you at your trade, and out of the school?—Three years nearly.

Edw^d Moffett.

Patt. Griffin, aged 18 years, sworn.

Patt Griffin.

Where were you reared?—In the Sligo charter school.

How many years were you in it?—Ten and one half years.

What trade are you bound to?—A linen weaver.

What treatment did you receive while in the school as to punishment and diet?—I considered the punishment to a bad boy, was severe, but a good boy was indulged; the diet was remarkable, no one could complain of it; I was severely punished myself.

Have you got as good diet since?—I do not complain of my present diet, but I have not so good constantly, as when I was in the school.

Do you think the boys are as well treated in the school, as they will be in after life?—I think the boys will be fortunate if they meet as good treatment after they leave school, as they have while in it.

If you had a brother, would you wish him to be reared in the Sligo school, from what you know of it?—I had a brother in the school, and if he had no father or mother, I would prefer the school, from the education and diet given in it.

Had the boys opportunities to make complaints, if they had cause, to the inspectors, local committee and catechist, apart or separate from the master, while you were in the school?—Parson Armstrong often asked the question; I heard Mr. Stokes ask it, and I heard it asked on board days.

How long is it since you left the school?—Four years next January.

Patrick Griffin.

John Ingham, aged 18 years, sworn.

John Ingham.

Where were you reared?—In the Sligo charter school.

How long were you in it?—Seven years.

What treatment did you get from the master, both as it regards your diet and punishment?—Very good diet; I never was punished without reason, nor ever severely.

What was the master's general conduct towards the boys?—When they deserved it, he was cross; he was very good to any boy that behaved properly; very good itself.

How did he treat them when sick?—Very well; I have been sick for the space of a month, and if I had been his own son, he could not have used me better, for a month after I was sick he would not allow me to work.

Was there any disturbance in the school, between the boys and master, while you were in it?—I knew some complaints about play, a few boys made their complaints; but generally the boys were on good terms with the master.

Were any enquiries made of the boys by the gentlemen visiting the school, as to their complaints?—Parson Armstrong, the late catechist, often spoke to the boys, and asked if they had complaints to make.

To what trade are you bound?—A painter.

John Ingham.

*James Walsh, aged 30 years, sworn:—*Was reared in the Sligo charter school; now in the revenue police; and is by trade a hackler; is stationed in Ennis, in the county of Clare, and here on leave of absence.

James Walsh.

How long since you were in this school, and how long did you remain in it?—Thirteen years since I left it; I remained nine years.

Who was the master during that period?—Mr. Joseph Hines.

What was the treatment you received, and that of the other boys, as it regards diet and punishment?—It was every thing that was proper.

Was the punishment severe?—I can't say it was; boys were punished when they deserved it.

You have now had some experience of the world; and what is your opinion of the treatment of the boys in this school, compared with that of boys in the same rank in life out of it?—There is a great difference; I have never known any poor children, under the care of their own parents, treated so well, as to clothing, education and diet.

James Walsh.

Continuation of
Appendix N^o 77,
p. 149, Sligo School.

Peter Devany, aged 30 years, sworn.

Did you kill a cow for Mr. Hines, on Friday the 10th?—I did.
Was she in any degree diseased?—Nothing wrong with her, but a sore udder, which I cut off, and threw it away.
Was there any thing wrong with her heart?—Not any thing that I could see.
Was there any thing in the heart or udder, that rendered the beef unfit for use?—Nothing.
What was the quality of the beef?—I think it worth 28s. per cwt.
What do you suppose the weight of the cow?—About 3½ cwt.
What is the price of beef in the market?—Prime cuts from 4½ d. to 5 d. per lb.
What would be the price per carcase?—Prime beef by the carcase would sell at 42s. per cwt.
What weight would such beef be?—Five and a half cwt.
Have you killed much cattle in your time?—I have killed so much, I can't tell the quantity.
Have you slaughtered many cows, or any cows, with sore udders?—I have, hundreds.
Does a sore udder, in your opinion, injure the other parts of the beef?—It does not.
Have you ever killed beef of such description, with sore udders, for the use of gentlemen's families?—I have not for gentlemen's families, but I have for butchers; and it has been sold in the market often, and to private families.
Are you in the habit of killing cows and sheep for Mr. Hines?—I am.
What is the quality of the beef and mutton he kills?—What I killed for him was very fine.

his Peter x Devany.
mark.

Henry O'Connor.

Henry O'Connor, aged upwards of 30 years.

What trade are you?—A butcher.
Are you largely engaged in that trade?—I am; I may say I am one of the principal butchers in Sligo.
What is your opinion of the injury arising to beef from a sore udder?—I don't think it does the beef any harm, if the affected part is taken away. I am certain it don't.
Have you killed any cows with sore udders?—Very frequently, not a week that I may not meet with several cows of this description.
Would you have an objection to kill a cow with a sore udder for private, or gentlemen's families?—Not the smallest.
Have you seen Mr. Hines purchase meat in the Sligo market, and what description does he buy?—I have seen him buy from others, and he buys largely from me; I never knew him to buy bad meat from me, he always bought the best, and I believe I don't kill bad meat.

Henry O'Connor.

Ellen Black.

Ellen Black, re-called; sworn; is cookmaid.

Do you recollect the beef the boys had for dinner on Sunday the 10th?—I do; it was part of a cow killed on Friday before.
Was there any thing wrong with it, and what?—No, except the udder being sore.
What was done with the beef after being killed?—It was salted.
Was any of the part diseased salted?—I did not see any part of the sore udder salted.
Was there any thing else wrong with the cow?—Nothing, except the heart; the colour was pale, and not fresh looking, and the strings of the heart were hard.
When was the cow killed?—On Friday, about nine o'clock in the morning.
When was the heart dressed?—On Sunday, for the boys dinner.
Do you think that the heart's remaining from Friday morning to Sunday might not have changed the colour, and make it not look so fresh?—I can't say.
Did you ever cut up a heart before in dressing it?—I don't recollect I did.
Are the strings you mention in the inside of the heart?—Yes, they are.
Was it a piece of this beef that was dressed the other day, and sent up to the committee for inspection?—It was.
Was not that a coarse piece?—I don't consider it so.
If you had not heard of the udder being sore, or the heart strings hard, from the appearance of that piece, could you have an objection to eat it?—No, if I had not heard so much talk about the cow.
Was it then more from prejudice than from the appearance of the beef, that you formed your opinion?—I suppose I had a prejudice; one has naturally a prejudice, when they hear of any disorder in a cow.
Did the family eat of this beef?—I dressed this beef for the family since the gentlemen were here.
Did the boys get any other beef they complained of?—They did; on two days; they said it had a smell; a taste; a bad one.
Did you dress any of that beef for the family?—I did; twice for the family.
Did the master use any of the cow fresh?—No, Sir; the sirloin was salted.
What is the quality of the food given to the boys, with the exception of those three days?—They got very good mutton generally, and I think they are very well fed.

Is the beef now produced part of the cow with the sore udder and hard heart-strings?—It is.

What, in your opinion, was the value of this beef, in comparison to what you call prime, as to price?—I before allowed that I would rather give 5d. per pound for prime, than 1½d. per pound for this; but I don't know how markets rate.

mark.

Henry O'Connor, recalled.

You have seen a piece of corned beef produced of the cow killed by Mr. Hine; what is your opinion of it?—I think it healthy and sound meat.

Have you known the strings of the heart of a sound cow hard?—Yes, I have; the strings of the heart are generally hard.

If a heart is kept from Friday morning to dinner time on Sunday, will its outside colour be affected?—No doubt of it; it makes a material change in it.

Henry O'Connor.

Henry O'Connor.

James Nelson, aged upwards of 30 years; says he is a butcher.

Look at this piece of corned beef, and state your opinion of it as to its soundness?—It is wholesome beef; I would have no objection to sell such beef, nor to eat it.

Have you killed many cows for yourself?—I have; they are gone past counting.

Have you killed any cows with sore udders?—Some hundreds.

Have you known cows with the strings of the heart hard, and is it a disease?—The strings of the heart are always hard; it is no disease.

Does the udder being sore, affect the quality of the other parts of the beef?—It does not.

What disease renders the beef unsound?—A disorder of the gall or liver would affect the meat.

Have you seen Mr. Hines purchase meat in the Sligo market, and what description does he buy?—I have known him to deal with my father for years, and I never knew him to purchase any meat that his Majesty might not dine off. He has bought from me occasionally, and of the best quality; I keep no meat but of the best quality.

Does he generally purchase large quantities?—He does.

James Nelson.

James Nelson.

William Bell, Esq. County Surgeon, sworn.

How long have you been in attendance upon the Sligo charter school?—Sixteen years.

Have you been constant in your attendance for that period, either as visiting or being called upon by the master?—I have. Either myself or Mr. Murray has attended; he in my absence when required.

Have you ever known any instance of the boys, or any of them, being injured by any punishment inflicted by the master during that period?—A single instance of the kind never came under my observation.

What is your opinion of the conduct of the master and mistress to the boys?—My opinion is, that at all times they have appeared to me to be kind and attentive to the boys, and particularly in times of sickness.

Have they been neglectful or otherwise as to the health of the children?—Quite the reverse; for on the most trivial occasions I have been called for, and often when it was unnecessary, from their anxiety about the health of the boys. The master himself has attended in the sick room, and received my directions as to the treatment of the patient.

Did the master bring any boys for your inspection, to inquire into the state of their health, that complained of being unwell, who were brought to the dispensary?—Yes, he frequently brought the boys when I was at the dispensary or infirmary, those institutions being so near to the charter school.

Can you specify any particular boy?—I perfectly recollect a boy of the name of Kenzie, whom I was in the habit of seeing before as a patient. This boy had been complaining for a long time of a pain in his breast. By my directions he was frequently bled and blistered, notwithstanding my conviction that he did not labour under disease; and I expressed my opinion frequently to the master to that effect.

What was your motive for bleeding and blistering this boy, when you were of opinion he was not labouring under disease?—I did not wish to leave it in the boy's power to say that his complaints were unattended to; and the blistering and bleeding was a punishment, as I was convinced he was sculking: these remedies could do him no harm.

Did the master inquire of you as to the ability of this boy to work; and what opinion did you give?—He did; and the opinion I gave was, that he was perfectly well able to work.

Has this boy been since under your care?—No, he has never been since reported sick to me. I have frequently since seen him, and his appearance was perfectly healthy.

If a blow was given on the face with the hand, would it cause blood to stream or gush from the eyes?—No, I consider it impossible.

Do you know James Kenzie, who got a hurt in the face from the kick of a horse, some years since?—I do, very well; at the time of the accident he was a long time under my care, and has been frequently since.

Did he ever apply to you in consequence of a beating he got from his master, which hurt his his eyes?—Never; I have frequently examined his eyes, and told him that nothing but cleanliness was required.

Did the master ever apply to you, as to his being unable to work from the state of his eyes?—The master has brought Kenzie to me, to inquire whether the state of his eyes would prevent his working. I told him that he was very well able to work.

Do you suppose that Mr. Hines would beat a boy for not attending to his business, when under medical treatment, and unable from sickness?—I cannot suppose him capable of any such act.

William Bell, Surgeon, County Sligo Infirmary.

John Murray

John Murray, Apothecary, Sligo, sworn.

Have you attended the Sligo charter-school for Mr. Bell?—I have, occasionally.

Have you ever been called upon to prescribe for any boy in your attendance, who has suffered, or been injured by any punishment inflicted by the master?—Never.

Did you ever hear of any injury to any of the boys in consequence of punishment, before this investigation?—I never heard of any such thing before.

From your observation, what is your opinion of the treatment of the master and mistress to the boys?—From my observation, I conceive that the master and mistress are most humane and attentive to the boys.

How long have you been attending this institution for Mr. Bell?—I have for thirteen years; I have occasionally during that period attended for Mr. Bell, in his absence.

Did you hear the boys complain of any bad treatment?—I never did; and in my attendance on the boys I never witnessed more attention than was paid by the master and mistress. The attention has not been exceeded even in private families.

J. Murray.

John Reed.

John Reed being recalled:—Were those the only differences you had with Mr. Hines that you stated in your first examination by the committee?—There was another.

What was that difference?—The master was angry with me for purchasing a waistcoat from Thomas Hines.

Were you at any time dismissed from the service of Mr. Hines?—I was.

How long were you out of his service when dismissed?—It was on the 17th July I was dismissed, and I returned to Mr. Hines' service on the 4th August.

For what reason were you dismissed for that time?—I don't know the reason.

On your oath, do you not know the reason?—Sir, you are too exact.

Did you not before swear, that the only two causes of difference between you and Mr. Hines, were those relating to the work of the boys in the weaving-shop?—I did.

Upon the occasions that you then alluded to, namely, the difference relating to the work, did you ever leave the charter-school altogether—go from the house to your own home, on account of the difference?—I did not.

Were either of those differences on the 17th July?—No.

What was the reason, you are again asked, for your dismissal on the 17th July?—I did not know it till I called upon the master for my wages; then he said it was on account of my purchasing the waistcoat.

Through whose interference were you reinstated?—I believe it was Mrs. Hines.

The last day you were examined, you declared to the committee there were only two causes of difference between you and the master; to-day you said there was another cause; which of the statements is true?—I have now sworn the truth.

John Reed.

Elizabeth Hines.

Elizabeth Hines sworn; is wife to the master.

Do you recollect John Reed's being dismissed from Mr. Hine's employment, and what time he remained out of it?—I do; he remained out of Mr. Hine's employment for three weeks.

By whose intercession was he re-instated, do you know?—By mine.

Did any person apply to you in his behalf?—He applied himself, and sent his wife to me to know if I had done any thing for him since.

Had the application of himself and his wife a reference to receiving his wages, or being re-instated in the service of Mr. Hines?—To both.

Have you any reason to know, whether at the time of Reed's dismissal he knew the cause of it?—He told me a long story about the waistcoat, but it was after the time he spoke to Mr. Hines.

Do you think Mr. Hines is likely to dismiss a person, without stating the cause of dismissal?—I do not. Mr. Hines is not that person that would keep his thoughts secret.

Do you think that Reed knew the reason at the time of his being dismissed?—I think he could not have told me about the waistcoat if he had not known this as the cause.

Did he not tell you that he derived the information from Mr. Hines, when he applied to him for the wages?—He did not; I did not ask him.

Elizabeth Hines.

Beazely Blundell.

Beazely Blundell, recalled, and re-examined as to a variance that appears in his testimony given before the Commissioners and Local Committee.

Whether, on the occasion of James Kenzie's being corrected on which you were before examined, the time Kenzie was corrected in the workshop, when Hines, Reed and yourself were were called to the assistance of the master to punish him, were Kenzie's feet tied upon that occasion or not?—They were not.

Why then did you say they were, before the Commissioners?—I did not know the time the Commissioners alluded to.

Can you swear that at any time you saw Kenzie's feet tied together, when punishing?—I mind he was, but not at that time, for he was always a stubborn fellow.

Beazely Blundell.

Thomas Austin, aged 18 years, sworn.

Thomas Austin.

Where were you reared?—In the Sligo charter-school for eight years.

What treatment did you receive from the master during that period, as to diet and punishment?—The best of treatment; the diet was very good; never had occasion to complain of it, nor never heard any of the boys complain of it, while I was in the school. He punished when the boys deserved it; to the good boys he gave every encouragement, giving them presents; I don't consider the punishments were more than what was deserved by the faulty boys.

How did you feel on leaving the school, were you glad or otherwise?—I was glad at leaving school, but regretted parting with my master and mistress, from their kindness to me.

Were you ever sick, and what was your treatment, and that of other boys when sick?—I was sick, and was then treated kindly, and the others appeared to me to be treated in the same way.

How long is it since you left the school?—A year and seven months.

Thomas Austin.

*Beazely Blundell, recalled:—*What do you conceive, on an average, would the boys in the weaving shop earn per week each, in the hours at which they are allowed to work?—Four of the boys in summer will earn 13s. per week each, and the remaining eleven will earn 6s. per week each.

Beazely Blundell.

How many boys are weaving?—Fifteen.

When you said that the boys would earn 20d. to 2s. 3d. per week, did you mean that they would do so, in the hours allowed for work in the charter school?—I did not.

What did you mean?—I mean if they were working out, without any interruption from school or play, they would earn 20d. to 2s. 3d. per week working as regular journeymen.

How many boys are employed attending the looms?—Six or seven boys attend the weavers below, and in the loft warping and winding 18 boys.

Do the boys earn as much in winter as summer?—No, they do not.

What are the other 25 boys worth per week to Mr. Hines?—There are 18 boys who earn when employed 10d. per day from their combined work; the other seven are of little value, as they are attending the weavers; there are two boys working who will earn three halfpence per day when employed; they are not constantly employed.

Thomas Martin

Thomas Martin, aged 18 years, sworn.

 ment?—The best of treatment; the diet was very good; never had occasion to complain of it. I never heard any of the boys complain of it, while I was in the school. He punished with the rod, however; as to the food, boys he gave every encouragement, giving them presents; I don't consider the punishments were more than what was deserved by the boys. I was not in a position to be punished. I was not in a position to be punished.
